The next day at the same hour, that is to say, about nine in the evening, two shadows, one walking a few steps behind the other, slipped into St. Andrew's Church through a side door. By the light of the ever-burning lamps and votive candles offered in memory of the many miracles commemorated there, they made their way toward the altar of Our Lady of the Angels that was also known by the even more charming name of Our Lady of Love, since its first dedication in that name a half-century before had exposed the amorous susceptibility of a bishop. First came a young woman, who knelt before it. The young man who followed knelt beside her, on her right. Both, radiant with youth and beauty, were bathed in the flickering light of the lamp, she with her head down, eyes moist with tears of joy, he with his face raised, his eyes sparkling with happiness. Each said a silent prayer – though by each, we really mean Isabelle de Lautrec. For the words that overflowed her heart formed a prayer on her lips to the dear Mother of God. But men only know how to pray in misfortune; in happiness, their words are but a babble of desire amid sighs of passion. Then, their first surge of love expressed, their trembling hands sought each other's grasp. Isabelle gasped with a joy that was almost pain, and then, with no thought of where she was, cried, "Oh, my love – how much I do love you!"

The count looked up at the Madonna. "See!" he cried. "The Madonna smiles! And so do I, for how much do I love you, my dearest Isabelle." And their heads dropped to their chests, crushed beneath the weight of their happiness. The count pressed Isabelle's hand against his breast, then gently pulled his hand from hers and pressed her fingers against his lips. And then, pulling the ring from the smallest of his fingers, he placed it on the second finger of her hand, saying "Holy Mother of God, patron saint of love both human and heavenly, you whose celestial smile echoes our own, be witness that I hereby pledge to have no wife but Isabelle de Lautrec. If I break that oath, may you punish me as I deserve."

"Oh, no, Virgin Mother," Isabelle cried, "never punish him!" "Isabelle!" said the count, taking her fiercely in his arms, then gently releasing her before the holiness of the place.

"Madonna, holy and all-powerful," she said, "be witness in my turn to my oath. I swear here at your altar before whose divine feet I kiss that from today I belong body and soul to the one who just placed this ring on my finger, and even were he to die or worse, betray his oath, I will be no one else's wife unless it be that of your divine son." With this final word, Isabelle's lips were closed by a kiss. The sainted Madonna smiled down at the count's kiss and at Isabelle's gasp, as she remembered that she'd been called Our Lady of Love before she was called Our Lady of the Angels.

127 The Journal of Sir Bassompierre

As the Duke of Mantua learned from the envoy, the cardinal and the king had left Paris on the fourth of January and, on the fifteenth, they dined at Moulins and supped at Varenne that is not to be confused with that Varennes in the Meuse later made famous by the arrest of a king. For this commencement of the campaign, we have a reliable guide in the journal of Sir de Bassompierre. It is to him we turn for the historical part of our story. The king, after making his fateful pact with Richelieu, left His Eminence's office, and outside encountered Sir de Bassompierre, who had come to pay his respects to the cardinal. Seeing him, the king paused and turned to Richelieu, who was escorting him to the door of the street. "Look, your Eminence – here's someone we can trust to go with us, and who will serve me well."

The cardinal smiled and nodded. "That is the marshal's way." "Your Majesty will pardon me for asking but where are we going?"

"To Italy," said the king. "I go in person to raise the siege of Casale. So prepare to depart, Sir Marshall. We'll take Créqui as well – he knows that country, and hopefully will tell us all about it."

"Your servant, Sire," Bassompierre replied with a bow. "I'll follow you to the end of the world, and even to the Moon, should you choose to mount so high."

"We go neither so far nor so high, Marshal. We rendezvous in Grenoble. If anything delays you from joining us there, please inform the cardinal."

"Sire," said Bassompierre, "with God's help, nothing will go amiss – especially if Your Majesty will order that old scoundrel La Vieuville to pay me what I'm owed as Colonel-General of the Swiss Guard."

The king laughed. "If La Vieuville won't pay you," he said, "the cardinal will."

"Is that so?" Bassompierre seemed sceptical.

"Quite so, Marshal. In fact, if you'll give me your bill now, you can leave here with the money. We depart in three or four days and have no time to lose."

"Your Eminence," said Bassompierre, with that air of grand nobility unique to him, "I never carry cash with me when I go to play cards with the king. I'll leave the bill with you, if I may, and send a lackey around later to pick up the money."

The king departed. Bassompierre wrote out his bill for the cardinal, and sent for the money the next day. The same evening that the cardinal had told Louis XIII that a king must always be true to his word, he sent one hundred fifty thousand livres to the Duke of Orléans, sixty thousand to the queen mother, and fifty thousand to Queen Anne. Also, l'Angely received the thirty thousand livres the king had offered him, and Saint-Simon the appointment of King's Squire, with its fifteen thousand livres per year. As for Baradas, we know that he had been surprised to receive a bearer bond from the king for thirty thousand livres, and had collected it the same day. The cardinal had also settled his accounts. Charpentier, Rossignol, and Cavois all shared in his success – but the payment to Cavois, generous though it was, was small consolation to his wife. For her, the cardinal's resignation had brought about a welcome return to quiet nights without disturbance that was all she'd been praying for – with, as we've seen, the aid of the children. Unfortunately, Man, in creating a personal God who could respond to every person, had so overwhelmed the Deity with entreaties that sometimes even the holiest and most reasonable requests were overlooked. Poor Madam Cavois fell into this category and following His Eminence, Cavois once again left her a widow. Fortunately, he left her once again pregnant. The king had previously bestowed on Sir the title of lieutenant general; but from the moment the cardinal rejoined the king, it was apparent that it would be Richelieu who would manage the conduct of the war, and that the office of lieutenant general would be an empty formality. So, though Sir sent his train by way of Montargis and then followed it beyond Moulins, upon arrival at Chavagnes he changed his mind and announced to Bassompierre that, considering the insult he had been offered, he was withdrawing to his principality of Dombes where he would await the orders of the king. Bassompierre implored him to reconsider but to no end. No one was surprised by Sir's decision, most seeing in it cowardice rather than wounded pride. The king marched quickly to Lyon, where he found the plague was raging, and went on to stop in Grenoble. On Monday, February 19, he sent to the Marquis de Thoiras in Vienna to come join the army and oversee the passage of the artillery over the mountains. The Duke of Montmorency had, on his part, informed the king that he would come by Nîmes, Sisteron, and Gap, joining the king at Briançon. It was there that the real troubles began. The two queens, on the pretext that they feared for the health of the king but actually to subvert the influence of the cardinal, had left Paris with the aim of joining the king in Grenoble. But he had ordered them to stop in Lyon, and they dared not disobey. However, in Lyon they made all the trouble they could, diverting Créquy's attention from preparing for the passage of the mountains, and delaying Guise from joining the fleet. However, nothing discouraged the cardinal: so long as the king was his ally, the king was his strength. He hoped that the king, by taking the personal risk of crossing the Alpine passes in winter, would attract from the neighbouring provinces the help they needed – and it had been working before the two queens began to interfere. When they got to Briançon, it was clear that the two queens' meddling had been so successful that nothing that was supposed to be there had arrived: no food, no mules, almost no ammunition, and no more than a dozen cannon. Worse, there were only two million livres left of all the millions the cardinal had borrowed. All this while, opposing the king was the Duke of Savoy, the most wily and deceitful prince of his time. He held Susa Pass, the way across the Alps to Casale and Mantua. None of these obstacles stopped the cardinal for a moment. He convened their most skilful engineers and sought with them the means of doing everything men's effort could do. Charles VIII had been the first to carry cannon across the Alps but that had been in good weather; it was hard enough to cross these almost inaccessible mountains in the summer, let alone in the winter. They affixed cables to the artillery and attached them to pulleys and winches; some men cranked winches, others hauled cables by hand. The cannon balls were hoisted up in baskets; barrels containing ammunition, powder, and more balls were loaded onto mules, bought at a ruinous price. In six days, all this equipment was brought over Mont Genève and down to Oulx. The cardinal pushed on to Chaumont, where he hastily gathered what information he could and checked it against the intelligence sent on by the Count of Moret. It was there that, upon reckoning all the ammunition, he was told that there were only seven cartridges per man. "What of that," Richelieu replied, "so long as Susa is taken with the fifth?"

Meanwhile rumours of these preparations reached the ears of Charles-Emmanuel, the Duke of Savoy; but the king and the cardinal were already in Briançon when Savoy thought them still in Lyon. Consequently he sent his son, Victor-Amadeus, to call on King Louis XIII in Grenoble; but once in Grenoble, he learned that King Louis had already left and was at that hour crossing the mountains. Victor-Amadeus set out at once in pursuit of the king and the cardinal. He caught up with Louis XIII at Oulx and asked for an audience, just as the last pieces of artillery were descending from the pass. The king received him but refused to listen to him and sent him on to the cardinal. Victor-Amadeus left immediately for Chaumont. There the Prince of Savoy, raised by a master of the ruse, hoped to use on the cardinal the methods familiar to himself and his father – but this time he was outplayed, a serpent against a lion. The cardinal understood from the prince's first words that the Duke of Savoy had but one reason for sending his son, and that was to gain time. But where the king might have been taken in, the cardinal saw clearly the negotiator's intentions. Victor-Amadeus had come to ask for time so his father could find a way out of the promise he'd made to the Governor of Milan not to allow French troops to cross his domain. But even as he began to articulate his request, the cardinal brought him up short. "Your pardon, My Prince," he said, "but His Highness the Duke of Savoy asks for time to repudiate a promise he was in no position to give."

"How is that?" asked the prince.

"Because, in his recent negotiations with France, he agreed to allow my master the king passage through his domain, if needed to support his allies."

Victor-Amadeus was taken aback. "I must beg pardon of Your Eminence but I've seen this clause nowhere in the treaties between France and Savoy."

"And you're well aware why you haven't seen it, Prince. It was a verbal agreement, and out of respect for the duke, your father, we were satisfied with his word of honour and didn't require that clause in writing. According to him, the King of Spain would take offence if he granted such a privilege to France and wouldn't give him a moment's rest until he'd obtained a similar right."

"But," ventured Victor-Amadeus, "the duke my father does not refuse passage to the king your master."

"Then," said the Cardinal, smiling as he recalled the details of the letter received from the Count of Moret, "is it to honour the King of France that His Highness the Duke of Savoy has closed the pass of Susa with a demi-lune bastion large enough for three hundred troops, backed up by barricades with room for three hundred more, and on top of this the Fort of Montabon, built between two redoubts with outworks placed to create a crossfire? Is it to facilitate the passage of the king and the army of France that, in addition to blocking the valley, boulders so large that no engine could move them have been rolled down into the road? Is it to plant trees and flowers along our path that for the last six weeks, three hundred workers have plied pickaxe and spade at work that has attracted visits from both you and your august father?"

"No, Prince, let us not mince words: speak frankly, as rulers should. You delay in order to give the Spanish enough time to take Casale, whose garrison is heroically dying of hunger. Well! As it is in our interest, and is our duty, to rescue this garrison, we say to you that your father, His Highness the Duke, owes us this passage, and your father the duke will give it to us.

"We need two days for the rest of our materiel to arrive." The cardinal drew his watch. "It is now eleven in the morning. Eleven in the morning, the day after tomorrow, will be on Tuesday; at dawn on Wednesday, we attack. You may take it as written. Now, whether you go to open the pass, or to prepare to defend it, you have no time to spare for reflection, so I won't keep you. A frank and open peace, My Lord – or a good war."

"I fear it will be the good war, Your Eminence," said Victor-Amadeus, rising.

"From the Christian point of view, and as a minister of the Lord, I hate war; but from the political point of view and as a minister of France, I think that war, though never a good thing, is sometimes a necessary thing. France is within its rights and will have them respected. When two states come to blows, bad luck comes to he who champions deceit and perfidy. God sees us; God will judge." The cardinal saluted the prince, making it clear that further talk was futile. France would march on Casale, and no matter the obstacles, that was the path they'd chosen.

128

An Old Friend

Victor-Amadeus had scarcely left when the cardinal approached a table and wrote the following letter:

Sire,

If Your Majesty, as God gives me to hope, has fortunately completed transport of our materiel over the mountains, I humbly beg you will order the artillery, caissons, and all machines of war brought immediately to Chaumont. We pray the king will have the kindness to proceed here without delay, as the day of hostilities is to be Wednesday – subject to the will of Your Majesty, though it were best not changed without good reason. I eagerly await Your Majesty's response – or, better still, Your Majesty himself. I send a reliable man upon whom His Majesty can depend for anything, even as an escort should His Majesty choose to travel incognito by night. I have the honour to be, for Your Majesty, Your most humble subject and most devoted servant,

– Armand, Cardinal de Richelieu

Once the letter was written and folded, the cardinal called, "Etienne!"

At once the door of the room opened, and on the threshold appeared our old acquaintance Étienne Latil, last seen entering the cardinal's study in Chaillot, pale, knees trembling, supporting himself against the wall, and feebly offering his devotion. But now with head high, moustache bristling, a spring in his step, hat in his right hand and the left on the pommel of his sword, he was once again that captain who might have stepped out of a sketch by Callot. It had been fully four months since, struck at the same time by the Marquis de Pisany and by Souscarrières, he had fallen unconscious to the floor of Master Soleil's inn. However, if a wound isn't fatal, it's not long before a man put together like Étienne Latil is back on his feet, more hale and hearty than ever. The imminent hostilities lent a gaiety to his face that did not escape the cardinal. "Étienne," he said to him, "mount your horse this instant – unless you'd prefer, for your own reasons, to travel by foot – but however you wish, this letter that is of the highest importance, must reach the king before ten this evening."

"Would Your Eminence tell me what time it is?"

The cardinal drew his watch. "It is nearly noon."

"And the king is in Oulx?"

"Yes."

"Unless I plunge down the Doire, the king will have his letter by eight."

"Try not to plunge down the Doire, as that would cause me grief; whereas if the king receives his letter, I'll be pleased."

"I shall hope to satisfy Your Eminence on both points."

The cardinal knew Latil for a man of his word, so judging that it was pointless to insist, he merely made a gesture of dismissal. Latil ran to the stable to choose a good horse, stopping at the smithy only long enough to have it shod with crampons; that business finished, he sprang on its back and launched himself down the road to Oulx. He found the track in better condition than he'd expected. With the aim of making it passable for the cannons and other equipment, the engineers had done everything feasible to improve it. By four o'clock Étienne was at Saint-Laurent, and by half past seven he was at Oulx. The king was at supper, served by Saint-Simon, who had succeeded Baradas in his favour. At the foot of the table was his fool and confidant, l'Angely. A message from the cardinal was announced, and immediately the king ordered that the messenger be brought before him. Latil was fully conversant with all forms of etiquette, having spent his time as a page of the Duke of Épermon, and thus was no man to let himself be intimidated by royal majesty. He entered boldly into the room, advanced toward the king, placed one knee on the ground, and presented him his hat with the cardinal's letter balanced atop it. Louis XIII watched this with a certain astonishment: Latil had followed the rules of etiquette of the old-time court. "Yeah!" he said, taking the note. "Where do you come by these fine manners, my master?"

"Is not this the fashion, Sire, in which one presented letters to your illustrious father, of glorious memory?"

"Indeed! But the mode is a trifle passé."

"The respect is the same, Sire, so it seemed to me the etiquette should be the same."

"You seem well versed in etiquette for a soldier."

"I started out as page to Sir Duke of Épermon, and in that time I more than once had the honour to present a letter to Henry IV in the manner I have now had the honour to repeat to his son."

"Page to the Duke of Épermon," repeated the king.

"And like him, Sire, I was on the running board of the carriage on May 14, 1610, in the Rue de la Ferronnerie, when Henry IV was slain; Your Majesty may have heard that it was a page who stopped the assassin by holding on to his cloak despite the knife-blows that slashed his hands."

"Yes ... This page, would he be you, by any chance?"

Latil, still on one knee before the king, drew off his deerskin gloves, revealing hands furrowed by scars. "Sire, see my hands," he said.

The king looked at the man with visible emotion, and said, "These hands are the hands of loyalty. Give me your hands, mon brave."

And taking Latil's hands in his own, he gripped them. "Now, rise," he said. Latil rose. "A great king, Sire, was King Henry IV," he said.

"Yes, and God give me the grace to resemble him."

"The opportunity is here, Sire," replied Latil, indicating the note he had brought.

"Let us see," said the king, opening the letter.

"Ah!" he said, after reading it. "Sir Cardinal says that he has engaged our honour, and that whether we disengage it or not, the matter will not wait ... Saint-Simon, inform Gentlemen Créqui and Bassompierre that I must speak with them this very moment."

The two marshals were lodged in a house adjacent to that of the king, and were alerted within minutes; of the two other commanders, Sir de Schomberg was at Exilles, Sir de Montmorency at Saint-Laurent. The king conveyed the contents of Richelieu's letter to the two marshals, and ordered them to get the artillery and munitions to Chaumont as quickly as possible, declaring that everything must be at Chaumont by the end of the next day. As for the marshals, he expected them by Tuesday evening so they could take part in a council of war, in which they would decide the mode of attack for the following day. At ten o'clock that evening, in a murky night swirling with snow, without moon or stars, the king departed on horseback for Chaumont accompanied only by Latil, Saint-Simon, and l'Angely. Having prepared his own horse for ice, Latil now took the same precautions with the king's horse. Then he set out on that route for the third time, leading on foot and probing the road. Never had the king displayed such a bold demeanour, nor been so satisfied with himself. If he didn't have the strength of character for actual grandeur, he at least had a sense of it. He wore his hat with the black plumes, and thought of the white plumes his father Henry IV had worn during his great victory at Ivry. If his son could change his black plume for a white plume, why couldn't Susa be his Ivry? Latil marched before the king's horse, sounding the road with an iron-shod staff, stopping from time to time to find better footing, taking the horse by the bridle and leading him over bad spots. At each guard post the king was recognised, and he gave the order to prepare the troops to march on Chaumont, enjoying in their obedience one of the sweetest prerogatives of power. Just short of Saint-Laurent, Latil had an intimation, from the sharpness of the north wind, of the approach of one of those sudden whirlwinds that are dubbed in the mountains a "snow-plough." He invited the king to dismount and take shelter between Saint-Simon, l'Angely, and himself but the king wanted to stay on his horse, saying that if events called for him to be a soldier, he would act like a soldier. He wrapped himself in his cloak and waited. The whirlwind didn't keep them waiting long; it came on with a whine. L'Angely and Saint-Simon pressed themselves in on either side of the king, who was wrapped in his cloak. Latil seized the horse's bit with both hands and turned his back to the hurricane. It arrived, terrible and howling. In an instant, the road was covered with snow two feet deep. The riders felt their horses tremble between their legs: in such cataclysms of nature, the animals share the fright of man. The silk ribbon which held on the king's hat parted, and the black felt with its black plumes disappeared into the darkness like a night-bird. Upon arrival at Saint-Laurent, the king asked to be led to Sir de Montmorency's quarters. It was one o'clock in the morning; Montmorency had thrown himself fully clothed onto his bed. At the first word of the king's presence, the duke sprang back up and stood in his doorway, awaiting the king's orders. Such promptness pleased Louis XIII, and though not overly fond of Sir de Montmorency, who had at one time been enamoured of the queen, he saluted him. The duke offered to accompany the king and provide him with an escort. But Louis XIII replied that he was on the ground of France; and so long as he was on the ground of France, he felt safe; the escort he had seemed sufficient, being entirely devoted. He merely asked Montmorency to make his way to Chaumont in time for the council of war to be held at nine o'clock the following evening. The only thing he agreed to accept was another hat. When placing it on his head, he realised that it had three white plumes and once again he recalled Ivry. "It's a good omen," he said.

Upon leaving Saint-Laurent, the snow was so deep that Latil invited the king to come down from his horse. The king dismounted. Latil led, taking the king's horse by the bridle; l'Angely came after, then Saint-Simon. Louis XIII thus had a path to follow levelled for him by three men and three horses. Saint-Simon, who was grateful to the cardinal for the favours he'd done him, praised to the king all the precautions Richelieu had taken and all the foresight he had shown. "Yes, yes," answered Louis XIII, "Sir Cardinal is a good servant; I doubt that my brother would have taken so many pains for me in his place."

Two hours later, the king arrived without incident at the door of the Golden Juniper in Chaumont, as proud of his lost hat as of a wound, as proud of his night march as of a victory. He remarked that no one need awaken the cardinal. "His Eminence is not asleep," replied Master Germain.

"And what is he doing at this hour?" asked the king.

"I work for the glory of Your Majesty," said the cardinal as he appeared, "and Sir de Pontis aids me with all his power in this glorious task." And the cardinal invited the king into his room where he found a large fire to warm it and an immense map of the country, drawn up by Sir de Pontis, unrolled on a table.

129

The Cardinal finds the Guide he needs

One of the great strengths of the cardinal was not to believe King Louis XIII had virtues that he lacked but to make the king think he had them regardless. Lazy and languid, he made the king believe he was active; timid and distrustful, he made the king believe he was brave; cruel and bloodthirsty, he made him believe he was just. Richelieu said that, though the king's presence wasn't urgently required in Chaumont at that hour of the night, still he had exalted his glory and that of France by having made the trek, in such peril, on such roads and in the middle of such deep darkness, to answer the call of the nation. However, now the king must take to bed on the instant, as the day just beginning and the one to follow remained ahead of him. By daybreak, the orders had been given all along the route, so that the troops bivouacked in Saint-Laurent, in Exilles, and in Séhault were all under way toward Chaumont. These troops were under the command of the Count of Soissons, the Duke of Longueville, de la Trémoille, d'Halluin, and de La Valette, the Count of Harcourt and de Sault, and the Marquises de Canaples, de Mortemar, de Tavaune, de Valence, and de Thoiras. The four top commanders were the Duke of Montmorency and the three Marshals: Créqui, Bassompierre, and Schomberg. The genius of the cardinal had planned it all; he conceived, the king commanded. Since we've already told the story of the siege of La Rochelle, that glorious climax of the reign of Louis XIII, in our book The Three Musketeers, we are permitted to dwell here at some length on the famous forcing of the Pass of Susa, about which the official historians have made much ado. Upon leaving Richelieu, Victor-Amadeus, to cover his exit, as they say in the theatre, had announced he was heading to Rivoli where the duke, his father, awaited him, and that in twenty-four hours he would announce Charles-Emmanuel's decision; but when he arrived in Rivoli, the Duke of Savoy, whose only goal was to draw things out, had already departed for Turin. Thus around five in the evening, instead of Victor-Amadeus it was Savoy's Prime Minister, the Count of Verrue, who was announced at the cardinal's door. At this, the cardinal turned to the king. "Would Your Majesty," he asked, "prefer the honour of receiving him, or will you leave this burden to me?"

"If it was Prince Victor-Amadeus, I'd receive him; but since the Duke of Savoy sees fit to send me his prime minister, it's only right that my prime minister should answer him."

"Then does the king give me carte blanche?" asked the cardinal.

"Entirely."

"I'll leave the door open," continued Richelieu, "so Your Majesty will hear the entire exchange, and if anything I say displeases him, he'll be able to enter and contradict me."

Louis XIII gave a nod of assent. Richelieu, leaving the door ajar, went into the chamber where the Count of Verrue awaited. This Count of Verrue should not be confused with his famous grandson, husband of the celebrated Jeanne d'Albert de Luynes, mistress of Victor-Amadeus II and known as the Lady of Pleasure – this Count of Verrue, whom history barely mentions, was a man of forty years, acute, discerning, and of proven courage. Charged with a difficult mission, he brought an essential candour to the tortuous negotiations required of an emissary of Charles-Emmanuel. Seeing the grave figure of the cardinal, with that eye that saw to the bottom of hearts, faced with this genius who alone held in check the other sovereigns of Europe, he bowed deeply and respectfully. "My Lord," he said, "I come in place of Prince Victor-Amadeus who is needed at the side of the duke, his father, who has fallen seriously ill. When his son, after having left Your Eminence, arrived last night at Rivoli, he found that his father had been taken to Turin."

"Then, Sir Count," said Richelieu, "you come charged with the full powers of the Duke of Savoy?"

"I come to announce that I precede his arrival, my Lord; ill as he is, the Duke of Savoy wants to plead his case to His Majesty in person. He is being carried here in a sedan chair."

"And when do you think he will arrive, Count?"

"His Highness's state of weakness, and the slowness of his means of transport, means that, in my opinion, he can be here no sooner than the day after tomorrow."

"At about what hour?"

"I wouldn't dare to promise before noon."

"I am in despair, Sir Count: I told Prince Victor-Amadeus that on that day at daybreak we would attack the entrenchments of Susa – and at daybreak we will attack."

"I hope Your Eminence will not be so inflexible," said the Count of Verrue, "since you know that the Duke of Savoy does not intend to deny passage."

"Ah, well, then," said Richelieu, "if we're in agreement, there's no need for further talk."

"It is true," said Verrue with some embarrassment, "that His Highness has one condition ... or rather, one hope," added the count.

"Ah-ha!" said the cardinal, smiling. "And that is?"

"His Highness the Duke hopes that, due to the great sacrifice he is making, His Most Christian Majesty will cede from the Duchy of Mantua the same part of Montferrat that the King of Spain was allotting to Savoy if he prevailed – or if he does not want to grant it to the duke, that he will make a gift of it to Madam, your king's sister and our prince's wife. On this condition, the pass will be open tomorrow."

The cardinal looked for a moment at the count, who could not sustain his regard and lowered his eyes. Then, as if that was what he awaited, Richelieu said, "Sir count, all Europe has such a high opinion of my master the king's regard for justice, that I don't know how His Highness the Duke of Savoy could imagine that His Majesty would consent to such a proposition. Personally, I'm certain that he would never accept it. The King of Spain may well grant part of what does not belong to him in order to engage Savoy to support an unjust usurpation; but God prevent that the king my master, who crosses the mountains to come to the aid of the oppressed Duke of Mantua, would treat his ally so. If the Duke of Savoy forgets what a King of France is capable of, the day after tomorrow he will be reminded."

"But may I hope at least that these final proposals will be presented by Your Eminence to His Majesty?"

"Useless, Sir count," said a voice from behind the cardinal. "The king has heard, and is quite astonished that a man who must know better should make a proposal that would compromise France and stain its honour. If tomorrow the pass is not opened without condition, the next day, at daybreak, it will be attacked." Then, drawing himself up and placing a foot before him with that majesty which he could sometimes assume, King Louis XIII added, "I will be there in person, and you'll be able to recognise me by these white plumes, as my august father was recognised at Ivry. I hope that His Highness the Duke will adopt a similar sign to identify him in the heat of battle. Take him my words, Sir: they are the only response I can and must make."

And he dismissed the count with a gesture, who responded with a deep bow and withdrew. All that day and all that night, the army continued to assemble around Chaumont. By the following evening, the king commanded twenty-three thousand foot and four thousand horse. Around ten at night, the artillery and all its materiel were lined up beyond Chaumont, the mouths of the guns turned toward the enemy. The king ordered a check of the caissons and crates for a report on how much ammunition was available. At this time the bayonet had not yet been invented, so the cannon and the musket decided everything. Today, the rifle has come forward as the weapon of choice for the modern warrior, becoming, as predicted by the Marshall de Saxe, the handle of the bayonet. At midnight, the council was convened. It was composed of the king, the cardinal, the Duke of Montmorency, the three marshals: Bassompierre, Schomberg, and Créqui. Bassompierre who was senior, took the floor. He cast his eyes over the map and studied the positions of the enemy – which they knew perfectly, thanks to the information sent by the Count of Moret. "Unless someone has a better idea," he said, "here's my proposal, sire." And, saluting the king and cardinal to show that he was addressing them, he said, "I propose that the regiments of the French and Swiss Guards take the lead; the Regiment of Navarre and the Regiment d'Estissac, the left and right. The two wings will each be led by two hundred musketeers who will gain the summit of the two peaks of Montmoron and Montabon. Once at the top of the two mountains, nothing will be easier than for them to get the drop on the guards at the barricades. At the first shot heard from the heights, we move; while the musketeers' fire on the barricades from behind, we'll make a frontal assault with the two Guard regiments. Approach the map, Gentlemen, look at the position of the enemy, and if you've a better plan than mine, speak up." Marshall de Créqui and Marshall de Schomberg studied the map and supported Bassompierre's proposal. That left the Duke of Montmorency. Montmorency was better known for his dauntless courage and audacity on the field of battle than as a strategist and man of foresight; moreover, he spoke with a certain difficulty at first, with a stammer that he gradually lost as he went on. However, this time he found the courage to speak before the king. "Sire," he said, "I respect the opinion of Sir de Bassompierre, and of Gentlemen de Créqui and de Schomberg, and am well aware of their courage and experience; but while I don't doubt we can carry them, taking those barricades and the redoubts, especially the demi-lune that completely blocks the road, will be a difficult task indeed. Sir de Bassompierre has rightly said that we must take them; but is there no way to cut off these entrenchments? Can't we find, perhaps by a difficult mountain path, a way to turn the flank, to come down between the demi-lune and Susa and attack this position from behind? It would only be a question of finding a loyal guide and an intrepid officer, two things that don't seem impossible to me."

"You hear the proposal of Sir de Montmorency," said the king. "Do you agree?"

"Excellent!" replied the marshals. "But there's no time to lose in finding this guide and this officer."

At that moment Étienne Latil spoke a few quiet words in the cardinal's ear, and Richelieu's face brightened. "Gentlemen," he said, "I believe Providence sends us our loyal guide and intrepid officer in one and the same person."

And turning toward Latil who awaited his orders: "Captain Latil," he said, "bring in Sir Count of Moret." Latil bowed. Five minutes later, the Count of Moret entered, and despite his disguise as a humble mountaineer, everyone could see the resemblance to his august father – a resemblance that was the envy of King Louis XIII, illustrious son of Henry IV. He had just arrived from Mantua, sent by Providence as the Duke Richelieu had said.

130 Susa Pass

The Count of Moret, thanks to the route he'd taken to cross safely into Savoy, could be at once the loyal guide and the intrepid officer. Indeed, the question had scarcely been stated before, taking a pencil, he traced on Sir de Pontis's map the path that led from Chaumont to the smugglers' inn. He paused to recount how he'd been forced to change his route to escape the Spanish bandits, and how this change of route had brought him to the path whereby one could slip past the ramparts that girdled the mountains above Susa. He was authorised to take five hundred men with him, a larger troop being too awkward to manoeuvre on such a route. The cardinal wanted the young prince to take a few hours of rest but he refused, saying that if he was to arrive in time to create a diversion at the moment of the attack, he didn't have a minute to lose. He requested the cardinal to give him, as second in command, Étienne Latil whose devotion and courage were beyond question. They agreed to all his desires. At three in the morning, Moret's troop quietly departed; each man carried with him one day's rations. Of the five hundred men who were to march under his orders, the Count of Moret knew only the young captain; but once they were told they were to have the son of Henry IV as their leader, the soldiers crowded around him with cries of joy. They brought up torches so they could see his face, whose resemblance to that of the Béarnaise redoubled their enthusiasm. Immediately after the Count of Moret's five hundred men marched out, under cover of a night so dark it was impossible to see ten paces before oneself, the remainder of the army was put in motion. The weather was terrible, and the ground was covered with two feet of snow. Fifty men remained behind to guard the artillery park. The rest of the troops marched to within five hundred paces of the Rock of Gélasse, just short of Susa Pass. Six pieces of cannon and six pallets of balls were brought up to force the barricade. The troops chosen to attack were seven companies of Guards, six of Swiss, nineteen of Navarre, fourteen of Estissac, and fifteen of Sault, plus the king's mounted musketeers. Each unit was to throw out in front fifty storm troopers known as the Lost Children, supported by one hundred men, with those supported by five hundred more. Around six in the morning, the troops were marshalled into order. The king presided over these preparations, detailing some of his musketeers to join the Lost Children. Then he ordered the Sir Comminges, preceded by a trumpeter, to approach the border and ask the Duke of Savoy for passage for the army and the person of the king. Sir de Comminges advanced but a hundred paces from the barricade he was stopped by a challenge. The Count of Verrue appeared and called out, "What do you want, Sir?"

The herald responded, "We wish to pass, Sir."

"But," Verrue replied, "How do you wish to pass? As friends or as enemies?"

"As friends, if you open the pass to us; as enemies, if you close it. I am charged by the king my master to go to Susa and prepare lodgings for him, as he plans to sleep there tomorrow."

"Sir," answered the Count of Verrue, "the duke my master would hold it a great honour to host His Majesty but he comes with so many followers that before I can respond, I must ask His Highness for orders."

"Well," said Comminges, "do you intend, by any chance, to dispute our passage?"

The Count of Verrue came forth and stood before him. "What would you have, Sir?" the herald asked the count.

"I've the honour to say to you, sir," replied Verrue coldly, "that on this subject I must first know the intentions of His Highness, my master."

"Sir, I warn you," said Comminges, "that I must report your reply to the king."

"You may do as you please, Sir," responded Verrue. "You are master of yourself."

And with this, each saluted the other. Verrue returned to his side of the barricades, and Comminges returned to the king.

"Well, Sir?" Louis XIII asked Comminges.

The herald related his discussion with the Count of Verrue: Louis XIII listened without missing a word, and when Comminges had finished, the king said, "The Count of Verrue answered not only as a worthy servant but as a man of spirit who knows his duty."

At that moment the king was on the farthest frontier of France, between the Lost Children ready to charge, and the five hundred men who were to support them. Bassompierre approached, smiling and with hat in hand. "Sire," he said, "the dancers are ready, the violins are in tune, and the masks are at hand; when it pleases Your Majesty, we may commence the ballet."

The king looked at him, brow furrowed. "Sir Marshall, did you know I just received a report that we have only five hundred rounds in the artillery park?"

"Well, Sire," answered Bassompierre, "this is certainly the right time to consider that; if the masque isn't ready, the ballet shouldn't be danced. But let's do it. All will be well."

"Is that your answer to me?" said the king, fixing the marshal with a look.

"Sire, it would be beyond bold to guarantee something as doubtful as a victory; but my answer to you is that we will return with our honour, or I will fall or be taken."

"Make sure that if we are beaten, Sir de Bassompierre that I am taken with you."

"Bah, what can happen to me worse than to be called a coward, as Your Majesty did the Marquis d'Uxelles? But don't worry, Sire, I'll try not to deserve such an insult. Let's just do it."

"Sire," said the cardinal, who held his horse close to the king's, "with an attitude like the marshal's, my hopes are high." Then, addressing Bassompierre: "Go, Sir Marshall, go – and do your utmost." Bassompierre rode to where the other commanders awaited, and dismounted with Gentlemen de Créqui and de Montmorency for the frontal assault on the trenches. Only Sir de Schomberg remained mounted, due to the gout in his knee. They marched past the base of the Rock of Gélasse; for some reason the enemy had abandoned that position, strong though it was, perhaps afraid that those who defended it would be cut off and forced to surrender. But as soon as the troops passed the rock, they were exposed, and fire commenced from the mountain and the broad barricade. And at the first volley, Sir de Schomberg was hit in the lower back. Bassompierre followed the valley floor and approached the demi-lune that blocked Susa Pass from the front, Sir de Créqui close beside him. Sir de Montmorency, as if he were a common soldier, sprang up the mountain on the left toward the peak of Montmoron. Sir de Schomberg was tied to his horse that was led forward by its bridle due to the difficulty of the terrain; he made his way up the right-hand slope in the midst of the Lost Children. Following Bassompierre's plan, these units were to flank the barricades, shooting the defenders from above while the others attacked the front. The Valaisans and Piedmontese defended valiantly; Victor-Amadeus and his father commanded from the redoubt on the peak of Montabon. Montmorency, reckless as always, quickly attacked and carried the first outwork on the left. As his armour had encumbered him while afoot, along the way he had dropped its pieces one by one, attacking the rampart in his simple buff jerkin and velvet trunk-hose. Bassompierre, for his part, remained on the valley floor, weathering the fire from the demi-lune. Behind came the king, with his white plumes, and Sir Cardinal in a gold-embroidered robe of russet velvet. Three times the centre charged the demi-lune, and three times they were repulsed from that curved barricade. Musket balls leaped and ricocheted down the valley from rock to rock, killing one of Sir de Créquy’s esquires within a few feet of the king’s horse. Bassompierre and Créquui then resolved to scale the slopes, each with five hundred men: Bassompierre the mountain on the left, to reinforce Sir de Montmorency, and Créquui the mountain on the right, to support Sir de Schomberg. Two thousand five hundred men remained on the valley floor to maintain pressure on the demi-lune. Bassompierre, overweight, fifty years old, and on the steepest slope, was climbing while leaning on his aide, when suddenly he lost his support: the aide beside him had taken a ball in the chest. He made it to the summit just as Sir de Montmorency was falling back from his third assault on the redoubt. They combined forces for a fourth. Montmorency was lightly wounded in the arm, while Bassompierre’s clothes were riddled with bullet-holes. But the redoubt on the left was carried, and the Savoyard defenders took refuge behind the demi-lune. The two commanders looked across toward the mountain redoubt on the right. The battle there was hotly contested. Presently they saw two riders leave at a full gallop, making for a path that had apparently been prepared for their retreat down to the demi-lune. It was the Duke of Savoy, Charles-Emmanuel, and his son, Victor-Amadeus. A flood of fugitives followed them. The redoubt on the right was taken. Only the demi-lune remained: the hardest nut to crack. Louis XIII sent couriers to congratulate the marshals and Montmorency on their success but telling them to retire and recover. Bassompierre replied on behalf of himself and Honourable Schomberg, Créquui, and Montmorency:

Sire, we are grateful for your concern but at times like these the blood of a prince or a marshal of France is not worth more than that of the simplest soldier. We ask for ten minutes of rest for the men, after which the ball will start anew.

And indeed after ten minutes of rest the trumpets sounded, the drums beat again and the two wings closed on the now-reinforced demi-lune in two tight columns.

131
A Man is Never hanged until the Noose is Tightened

The approaches had fallen to the French – but the last entrenchment remained, teeming with soldiers, bristling with cannons, and anchored by the fort of Montabon, built atop an inaccessible rock; the fort had but one approach, a staircase that could be climbed only in single file. Left far behind were any guns that might bear on either the valley floor or the mountain summits. The soldiers had to assault the demi-lune supported by nothing but what the Italians of the time called their French Fury. From a low rise within range of the enemy’s guns, king and cardinal watched the troops marching forward behind the flower of the nobility, the leaders’ hats held high on the ends of their swords. The soldiers advanced head down, not asking if they were being led to butchery; their commanders led from the front, and that was all they needed to know. His Eminence was with the king on his horse, and the cardinal saw the sudden gaps the cannon ploughed through the ranks; the king clapped his hands, applauding the soldiers’ courage while at the same time his innate cruelty awoke like a tiger scenting blood. When he’d had the Marshall d’Ancre killed, though he was still too small to look out the window, he’d had some of his men lift him up so he could watch the bloody body carried past. The troops reached the barricade; some carried ladders, and the escalade began. Montmorency took a flag and was first upon the wall; Bassompierre, too old to follow, took a position halfway up the ramparts and exhorted the soldiers to do their utmost. Some ladders broke beneath the weight of so many attackers, so keen were they to be the first to set foot on the rampart; others held back to allow time for their companions to go over, drawing up other ladders to mount the assault. The besieged used whatever weapons they could. Some fired at the attackers at close range; others swung spades and picks, saw blood spout from their blows, and sometimes a man would throw his arms wide and fall backwards. Others hurled stones, or swung heavy poles that cleared two or three ladders at a time. Suddenly the French could see disarray among the defenders, while from beyond them came shouting and a fusillade. “Courage, friends,” cried Montmorency, mounting another assault, “it’s the Count of Moret to our rescue!”

And he sprang forward anew, ragged and bloody though he was, carrying along with him, by this supreme effort, all who could see and hear him. The duke was not mistaken: it was Moret who had created the diversion. The count had left at three in the morning, as we have seen, with Latil for captain and Galaor for aide-de-camp. They arrived at the bank of the torrent that had almost drowned Guillaume Coutet; but when the freeze had come, the water had dropped, and now one could cross by leaping from rock to rock. Arriving on the other side of the torrent, the Count of Moret and his men quickly crossed the field that separated them from the mountain. He found the rising path, and his men followed. The night was dark but the glimmer from the new-fallen snow lit the way. The count, familiar with the difficult terrain, had provided his troops with long ropes, one for each twenty-four men. As each twenty-four-man unit marched along the brink, if one man slipped he was supported by the other twenty-three. Twenty-four others marched behind them, acting as another stay or support. As they approached the smugglers’ inn, he ordered the troops to be silent. Though they didn’t know the reason, all remained quiet. The count gathered a dozen men about him, explained to them that the inn before them was their objective, and ordered them to instruct their comrades to quietly surround it. If but one man escaped this nest of villains and gave the alarm, their mission could be compromised. Galaor, who knew the place, took a score of men to surround the inn-yard; with twenty more Latil guarded the gate, while the Count of Moret led a similar number to the only window that let daylight into the house, and by which those inside might escape. The window glowed brightly, indicating that the hosts were in residence. The rest of the troop spread out along the road, in order to leave the bandits no route of escape. The gate of the yard was closed; Galaor, with the lithe agility of a monkey, vaulted over, dropped into the yard, and opened it. In a moment, the yard was full of soldiers, standing with muskets at the ready. Latil arranged his men in two rows opposite the door, ordering them to fire on anyone who attempted to flee. The count had slowly and quietly approached the window in order to see what was going on inside; but the heat of the room had fogged the glass, preventing a view of the interior. One of the window’s four panes had been broken in some brawl and replaced by a sheet of paper affixed to the frame. The Count of Moret got up on the windowsill, cut a slit in the paper with the point of his dagger, and could finally glimpse the strange scene passing within. The smuggler who had warned Guillaume Coutet when they’d passed through before that Spanish bandits were after them was bound and gagged on a table; the bandits whom he had betrayed, gathered en tribunal, had just pronounced judgement. As that judgement could not be appealed, the only question was whether he should be hanged or shot. Opinion was almost evenly divided. However, as is well known, the Spaniards are a thrifty people. One made the point that you couldn’t execute a man with fewer than eight or ten musket shots that would cost them eight or ten charges of lead and powder – while to hang a man, not only did you need only one rope but afterwards that rope, having been used in a hanging, multiplied its value by two, four, even ten times! This sage advice, so economical, carried the day. The bandits chose the rope by acclamation, and the poor devil of a smuggler realised that his fate was sealed. His only recourse was the prayer of the dying: My God, I place my soul within your hands!

Then amid the solemn silence that always precedes the terrible act of violent separation of body and soul, came the order: “Pull!”

But scarcely was this word pronounced when there came from the window the sound of tearing paper, and into the room stretched an arm pointing a pistol. The pistol fired, and the man holding the noose around the neck of the condemned man fell down dead. At the same moment, a vigorous kick broke the window latches, and in two more blows it was open, letting in the Count of Moret, who leaped into the room followed by his men. At the gunshot, like a signal, the front door and the yard door also burst open, so all exits were visibly barred by armed soldiers. Within moments, the condemned was untied, and he passed from anguish to the giddy joy of the man who had made the march to the tomb but leaps from the grave before the earth can cover him. “Let no one try to escape,” said the Count of Moret, with a gesture of supreme authority that was his royal heritage. “Anyone who tries to flee will be killed.”

Nobody moved. “Now,” he said, addressing the smuggler whose life he’d saved, “I’m the traveller you so generously warned, two months ago, of the danger I was in, a warning for which you were just now about to die. It’s only right that the roles be reversed, and this tragedy played out to its end. Point out to me the wretches who pursued us; their trial will be short.”

The smuggler didn’t wait to be asked twice; he indicated eight Spaniards – the ninth was dead. These eight bandits, seeing themselves condemned, and understanding there would be no mercy, exchanged glances – and then with the energy of despair, drew their daggers and fell on the soldiers who guarded the door to the road. But they had bitten off too much. As you may recall, Latil was in charge of guarding that door, and stood on the threshold with a gun in each hand. With two shots he killed two men. The other six fought briefly with the men of the Count of Moret and of Latil. For a few seconds there was the clash of steel, cries, oaths, two more gunshots, the thump of two bodies on the floor ... and it was over. Six were dead in their gore, and three others, still alive, were tied hand and foot and in the hands of the soldiers. “Someone get that rope that was to be used to hang this honest man,” said the Count of Moret, “then find two more to hang these villains.”

The muleteers, who were beginning to understand that they were not under suspicion, and that instead of seeing one man hang they were about to see three, a spectacle three times as entertaining, offered up the ropes on the instant. “Latil,” said the Count of Moret, “I charge you with hanging these three gentlemen. I know you’re efficient – don’t let them linger. As for the rest of this honourable company, leave ten soldiers to keep them under guard. Tomorrow, no sooner than midday, if the prisoners have caused no trouble, they may be set free.”

“And where will I rejoin you?” asked Latil.

“This brave man,” answered the Count of Moret, indicating the smuggler miraculously saved from the noose, “this brave man will lead you; but march double-time to catch up to us.” Then to the smuggler, “Guide him along the same road you recall from before, my good man; later, at Susa, there will be twenty pistoles for you. Latil, you have ten minutes.” Latil bowed. “Let’s be on our way, Gentlemen,” said the Count of Moret. “We lost half an hour here, though in a good cause.” Ten minutes later, Latil, guided by the smuggler, rejoined them; the task the count had left three quarters done was complete. Latil and his guide caught up to Moret at the Giacon Bridge. The smuggler, who hadn’t had time to thank him, threw himself at Moret’s feet and kissed his hands. “It’s good, my friend,” said the Count of Moret. “Now, we must be at Susa within the hour.” And the troops resumed their march.

132
The White Plume

We know the path the Count of Moret had to follow: it was the same route he’d taken with Isabelle de Lautrec and the Dame de Coëtman. Strict silence was decreed, and no noise was heard but the sound of snow crunching under the soldiers’ feet. As they turned the shoulder of the mountain, the town of Susa came into view, limned by the first light of morning. The ramparts, this far up the mountain, were deserted. The road, if the narrow furrow they followed no more than two abreast could be called a road, passed about ten feet above the parapet. From there, one could slip down to the ramparts. The demi-lune that, after the flanks were carried and the redoubts had been taken, still held off the French army, was nearly three miles from the town of Susa; and as no one could imagine an attack from the mountainside, no one was on guard there. However, by the light of dawn the sentinels in the town saw the small troop filing down the side of the mountain and raised the alarm. The Count of Moret heard their cries, saw their reaction, and knew there was no time to lose. Like a true mountaineer, he leaped from rock to rock and was the first to drop onto the ramparts. Latil was right by his side. At the cries of the sentinels, Piedmontese and Valaisans tumbled out of a guardhouse at the gate and formed into a troop of a hundred men, preparing to buy time for further reinforcements. The Count of Moret gathered the first twenty men onto the rampart, and with this twenty he rushed the town gate. In the grey dawn, the soldiers of Charles-Emmanuel saw a long dark file of men circling down the mountain, enemies who seemed to fall from the sky in numbers they couldn’t tell, so they didn’t put up much of a fight; however, thinking it was critical that the duke and his son be informed, they dispatched a rider to Susa Pass to warn them of what was happening. The Count of Moret saw this man being detached and tried to go after him, cutting his way through the mêlée; the courier was in full gallop, and the count suspected where he was going but had no way to stop him. It was just one more reason to secure the Susa town gate, below the pass into which Louis XIII, after flanking the barricades, had made a partial entry. So he rushed the gate with what few men he had, and swarmed over the defenders. The fight was brief; surprised from the direction they least expected it, by a force of unknown size, and believing themselves betrayed, the Piedmontese and Valaisans, good soldiers though they were, cried, “Alarm!”

They ran for it, some through the town and others down the valley. The Count of Moret seized the gate, rallied his troops, and turned four guns to bear on the town. Then, leaving a hundred men to hold the gate and serve the guns, with the four hundred remaining he advanced to attack the fortifications at the pass from behind. Cannon thundered from above, smoke wreathing Montabon peak. The two armies were in a death grip. Moret doubled his men’s pace; however, while still a mile from the entrenchments, he saw a corps of troops being detached from the Savoyard army and sent toward him. The unit was about equal in number to that of the Count of Moret; at its head, mounted, was its commanding colonel. Latil approached the count. “I recognise the officer leading that troop,” he said. “He’s a gallant soldier named Colonel Belon.”

“And so?” said the count.

“I’d like My Lord’s permission to take him prisoner.”

“I’ll allow you to do that – By the belly of the Grey Saint, I could hardly ask for more! But how will you take him?”

“Nothing could be easier, My Lord; when you see the colonel fall beneath his horse, charge his men furiously; they’ll think he’s dead and will scatter. Swoop in and take the flag, while I take the colonel; though you might rather have the colonel and I the flag. The colonel will pay a fine ransom of three or four hundred pistoles – while the flag, for all its glory, is nothing but a flag.”

“To me the flag, then,” said the Count of Moret, “and to you the colonel.”

“Then let’s beat the drums and sound the trumpets!”

Moret raised his sword, the drums beat, and the trumpets sounded the charge. Latil took four men with him, each holding a musket, ready to pass a new weapon to him once he’d fired the first, the second, and even the third. As for the enemy, at the sound of the French drums and bugles, the Savoyard troop seemed to quicken its step. Colonel Belon said a few words, the troops replied with “Long live Charles-Emmanuel!”

And they came on at speed. Soon the two troops were no more than fifty paces from each other. The Savoyard unit stopped to fire a volley. “This is the moment,” said Latil. “Look out, My Lord! Take their fire, shoot back, and then charge the flag.”

Latil had hardly finished when a hailstorm of balls passed like a hurricane – but mainly above the heads of the French soldiers, who held their ground. “Aim low!” cried Latil. And as an example, aiming at the colonel’s horse, he fired just as the officer shook the reins to charge. The horse took the ball just below the shoulder; carried forward by its charge, it fell and rolled to within twenty paces of the French ranks. “To me the colonel, to you the flag, My Lord,” cried Latil and he leaped upon the colonel, sword held high. The French soldiers had fired and, following Latil’s advice, aimed low, so that nearly all their shots struck home. The count took advantage of the chaos to hurl himself into the midst of the Piedmontese. In a few bounds, Latil closed with Colonel Belon, who was pinned under his horse and stunned from his fall. Latil put his sword to his throat and said to him, “My prisoner, rescued or not?” The colonel slid a hand toward his holster. “One move, Colonel Belon,” said Latil, “and you’re dead.” “I surrender,” said the colonel, handing his sword to Latil. “My prisoner, rescued or not?” “Rescued or not.” “Then, Colonel, keep your sword – one does not disarm a brave officer like you. We’ll come to terms after the battle; if I’m killed, you are free.” With these words he helped the colonel out from under his horse, and having set him on his feet, he sprang into the midst of the Piedmontese ranks. It played out the way Latil had predicted. The soldiers of Charles-Emmanuel, seeing the fall of the colonel, and unsure whether he was dead or alive, had lost their nerve. The count had attacked so furiously that the ranks had opened before him, and he’d reached the flag, around which a knot of Savoyards, Valaisans, and Piedmontese put up a brave defence. Latil threw himself into the thickest part of the mêlée, shouting in a voice like thunder, “Moret! Moret to the rescue! Strike for the son of Henry IV!” This final onslaught broke the enemy troop. Cutting down the man who carried it, the Count of Moret seized the Savoyard flag in his left hand. He raised it high and shouted, “Victory for France! Long live King Louis XIII!”

This cry was repeated by every Frenchman still upright. What followed was a rout: the troops who had been sent to oppose the Count of Moret, diminished by a third, took to their heels. “We mustn’t lose a minute, My Lord,” said Latil to the count. “After them, shooting as we go; we don’t have to kill them but it’s important that our fire be heard in the entrenchments.” And indeed, their fire, heard in the demi-lune, spread chaos among the defenders. Attacked from the front by Montmorency, Bassompierre, and Créquì, and from behind by the Count of Moret and Latil, the Duke of Savoy and his son were afraid they’d be surrounded and captured; leaving the Count of Verrue to conduct a desperate defence, they went down to the stables, jumped into the saddle, and flew from the entrenchments. They found themselves in the middle of Colonel Belon’s soldiers, who were fleeing pell-mell with the French in pursuit, firing at will. These two riders trying to reach the mountainside attracted the attention of Latil, who, thinking they looked important, sprang forward to cut them off; but just as he was about to grab the duke’s horse by the bridle, he was dazed by a flash of light and a sharp pain in his left shoulder. A Spanish officer in the service of the Duke of Savoy, seeing his master about to be taken, had jumped in and, swinging his long sword, gashed the shoulder of our swashbuckler. Latil let out a cry, less of pain than of anger at seeing his prey escape. Sword in hand, he threw himself on the Spaniard. Though Latil’s sword was six inches shorter than that of his adversary, they’d barely met before Latil, a master of arms, knew himself master of his enemy. Twice wounded, the Spaniard fell within ten seconds, shouting “Save the duke!” At these words, Latil leaped over the wounded man and resumed his pursuit of the two riders but thanks to their hardy mountain horses they were already far enough down the road to be out of range. Latil returned, furious at having missed such glorious prey; but at least he still had the Spanish officer who, unable to defend himself, surrendered rescued or not. Meanwhile, the demi-lune was in turmoil. The Duke of Montmorency, first onto the ramparts, held his position, dispatching with blows of an axe all who tried to approach him, and opening a space for those who followed him. Piedmontese, Valaisans, and Savoyards fled like a torrent out the postern gates toward the road down to Susa. But there they ran into the Count of Moret, amid gunfire and cries of “Long live King Louis XIII!” Unaware of his true strength, they didn’t even try to fight, they just ran, flowing around each group of French like water around rocks. The Count of Moret entered the demi-lune on the opposite side from Montmorency. They met in the middle, recognised each other, and embraced. Then, arm in arm, they marched victorious to the breach, one waving the French flag he’d first placed on the demi-lune’s ramparts, the other the Savoyard flag he’d won. Saluting Louis XIII and lowering the two standards before him, together they cried “Long live the king!” It was the same cry before which, three years later, both of them would fall. The cardinal called out, “No one is to enter the redoubt before the king.” Just as these words were uttered, Latil slipped in through a postern. Sentinels were placed at all entrances, and Montmorency and Moret went themselves to open the Gélasse gate for the king and the cardinal. The two rode in, musketoen at the knee to signify that they entered as conquerors – and that the conquered, taken by storm, could expect only what was granted at the victors’ good pleasure. The king addressed the Duke of Montmorency first. “I know, Sir Duke,” he said, “that which is the object of your ambition. When the campaign ends, you shall be entitled to exchange your sword for one chased with golden fleur de lys that will elevate you above all the Marshals of France.” Montmorency bowed. The Sword of the Constable was his sole ambition in the world, and this was the king’s formal promise that he would have it. “Sire,” said the Count of Moret, presenting the king with the flag won from Colonel Belon’s regiment, “allow me the honour of placing at Your Majesty’s feet this standard I have taken.” “I accept it,” said Louis XIII; “and in exchange, I hope you’ll be pleased to wear this white plume in your hat, in memory of the brother who gave it to you and of our father who bore three of them at Ivry.” The Count of Moret wanted to kiss the king’s hand but Louis XIII took him in his arms and embraced him warmly. Then the king removed from his hat, the same one he’d received from the Duke of Montmorency, one of its three white plumes. He presented it, along with the diamond clip that held it on, to the Count of Moret. And that same day, around five in the evening, King Louis XIII made his entry into Susa after having received the keys to the town from its authorities on a silver platter.

133

What l’Angely Thought of the Compliments of the Duke of Savoy

King Louis XIII was delirious with joy. It was the second time in less than a year that he’d made a triumphal entrance into a town conquered by force of arms, thereby deserving the title of the Victorious. All that the cardinal had promised had been achieved, from first to last, the last promise being that on March seventh the king would sleep in Susa – and there he slept. But the cardinal, who knew secrets hidden to others, and who saw further than the king, was less at ease than this master. He knew – as did Louis XIII, though the triumph of the day had made him forget – that the fighting had nearly exhausted the army’s ammunition. He knew something else that the king did not know: that the troops were short on food, and the bad weather and condition of the roads prevented the commissaries from bringing more. He knew, moreover, that Casale was hard pressed by the Spanish. If the Duke of Savoy continued to resist them for another week or so that wouldn’t be hard, considering their lack of munitions, then Casale – reduced to the last extremity despite the heroism of its commander, Gurrón, and despite the devotion of its people, who had joined the garrison in defending the city – might be forced to open its gates to the Spaniards. The latest intelligence from Casale reported that they’d eaten their horses and were down to the dogs and cats, the last resort of famine. Thus, that evening, while Louis XIII was celebrating with his marshals, generals, and senior officers, Richelieu approached the king and asked if afterward, unless fatigue prevented it, His Majesty might spare a few moments. The king, who seemed nearly as jubilant as the day he’d had the Marshall d’Ancre killed, replied, “Since every time Your Eminence desires to speak with me, it’s for the good of the state and the glory of the crown, I am and will always be willing to listen to you.” And indeed, when the soirée was over, the king, still glowing with praise, came to the cardinal. “And now, Your Eminence, it’s just us,” he said, sitting down and offering a chair to the cardinal. Once the king was seated, the cardinal obeyed and took a seat as well. “Speak. I’m listening,” said Louis XIII. “Sire,” said the cardinal, “I believe Your Majesty’s now had satisfaction for the insult he suffered and his desire for glory need not push him to continue a war that’d immediately end in a glorious peace.” “My dear Cardinal,” said the king, “I hardly recognise you: you call for war, despite all opposition; and now that the campaign’s barely begun, you propose peace.” “Does it matter, Sire, whether peace comes sooner or later, so long as it brings us what we’d hoped?” “But what will Europe say of us? To make such threats and demands and then give up after just one fight...” “Europe will say, Sire, and it will be the truth, that this one victory was so glorious and absolute that it decided the entire campaign.” “But still, to conclude the peace, we would have to present our demands.” “That is the grand prerogative of the victor.” “Do you think, your Eminence that we’re in position to make such demands?” “We’re certainly in a position to open the negotiations, Sire.” “How so?” “We can say it’s in consideration of the best interests of your sister, Princess Christine.” “True enough,” said the king, “she’s married to Victor-Amadeus. I always forget I have a family. It’s also true,” he added bitterly, “that it’s a family I prefer to forget. So you think...?” “I think, Sire, that though war is at times a cruel necessity, we belong to a church that abhors bloodshed, and it’s our duty to curtail it when we can. That’s within your power, Sire, after such a glorious day, for the God of Hosts is also the God of Mercy.” “How would you present this matter to the King of Marmots?” said the king, using the nickname concocted by Henry IV after his conquest of Bresse, Bugey, Valromey, and Gex. “That’s easily done, Sire. I’ll write in the name of Your Majesty to the Duke of Savoy that he can choose between peace or war: if he prefers war, we will continue to fight as we did today and as your august father did in the past; but if, instead, he chooses peace, we will negotiate with him on the same basis as before our victory. To be specific, he is to allow the passage of French troops, and to assist with the relief of Casale, providing us food and ammunition at a fair market price; and furthermore Savoy will allow us, in the future, passage for whatever troops and materiel might be necessary for the defence of Montferrat, in the event that Montferrat were attacked or we thought such an attack likely; and that to ensure these two contingencies, Sire, the Duke of Savoy cedes to us Fort Gélasse and the Pass of Susa, to be occupied by a Swiss garrison commanded by an officer of your appointment.” “But the Savoyard is going to want something in return for all that.” “If you wish, Sire, we can meet one of his demands. We can offer, on behalf of the Duke of Mantua, in compensation for the House of Savoy’s rights to Montferrat, to cede him the city of Trino, with its annual revenue of fifteen thousand crowns.” “We’d already offered him that, and he refused it.” “Sire, we were not then in possession of Susa.” “All thanks to you, and I’ll never forget it.” “What must not be forgotten, Sire, is the risks Your Majesty faced, the courage of your troops, and the virtues of their commanders.” “If I ever had the misfortune to forget it, Your Eminence would remind me.” “So my proposal is acceptable?” “Whom shall we send with it?” “Doesn’t it seem to Your Majesty that Marshal Bassompierre would be the best ambassador we could choose for this?” “Perfect.” “Then, Sire, he will leave tomorrow morning to present our treaty to the duke. As for the secret articles...” “There will be secret articles?” “Every treaty has secret articles. Those will be negotiated personally between me and the duke or his son.” “Then everything is on hold!” “Just for three days, Sire, until we arrange to receive a visit from the prince your brother, or your uncle the duke.” “That’s right,” said the king, “they are my family. But with one great virtue: they’re family I can publicly make war against. And now, good evening, Sir Cardinal. You must be tired and in need of a good night’s sleep.” Three days later, in fact, as predicted by the cardinal, Victor-Amadeus came to Susa to negotiate with Richelieu, who obtained from him all the conditions he’d proposed to the king. As for the secret articles, they were granted as well, along with the public terms: The Duke of Savoy engages to provide Casale with four thousand bushels of corn and wheat and five hundred casks of honey. In return, once this obligation is met, it is agreed that the troops of France shall not advance beyond Bunolonga, the village between Susa and Turin, and His Majesty will allow the Prince of Piedmont time to persuade the Spanish to lift the siege of Casale. In addition, Charles-Emmanuel will be ceded the town of Trino by the Duke of Mantua, Alba, and Montcalvo. Eight days after this treaty was concluded, Don Gonzales da Cordova personally raised the siege of Casale, thus preserving the honour of Spain. On 31 March and 1 April respectively, the treaty was ratified by the Duke of Savoy and King Louis XIII. However, the truth is that this treaty was regarded as no more binding than those made with the Duke of Lorraine. One day, when William III was telling Charles IV, duke de Lorraine, that he’d signed a treaty in good faith, the duke said with a laugh, “So you’d rely on a treaty, then?”

"But of course," His Majesty naïvely replied.

"Well," replied Duke Charles, "whenever you like, I can show you a whole chest full of treaties that I've signed, none of which have been honoured!"

And though Charles-Emmanuel had nearly as many treaties in his chest, he was happy to add one more, though he had no more intention of honouring it than any of the others. Nonetheless, he expressed the desire to embrace his nephew Louis XIII, so a meeting was arranged. First came the Prince of Piedmont and the Cardinal of Savoy, who greeted the king when the treaty was signed; Victor-Amadeus brought his wife, Princess Christine, the king's sister. Louis accorded his sister all proper honours and every sign of friendship, delighted to show that he loved best this sister who'd made open war upon him, unlike the Queen of England and the Queen of Spain, who were content to conspire against him secretly. Finally came the Duke of Savoy, who was received with open arms by his nephew Louis XIII, who had resolved to steal a march on him and surprise him before he was ready; but Charles-Emmanuel was warned in time and rushed down the stairs in a hurry, to meet the king on his doorstep. "My dear Uncle," said Louis XIII, embracing him, "I'd intended to surprise you in your chamber!"

"You forgot, my dear Nephew," said the duke, "that it's not easy to move secretly when one is King of France."

The king climbed the stairs alongside the duke. But to reach the duke's chambers, he had to pass a row of courtiers and senior officers standing on a trembling balcony that barely supported them.

"Make haste, Uncle," the king said. "I'm not sure how long this will hold us up."

"Alas, Sire!" the duke replied. "See how all the world trembles before the might of Your Majesty."

The king, radiant with this praise, turned to l'Angely. "Hey, fool: what do you think of my uncle's compliments?"

"Oh, I'm not the fool you should ask," said l'Angely.

"Who then?"

"Ask the two or three thousand fools who got killed to earn them!"

134
A Chapter of History

L'Angely, in his response to the king, had summed up the situation admirably. After every war, no matter how long, even the Thirty Years War, a peace is signed, and, once signed, the kings who had made the war embrace each other, without a thought for the thousands of men sacrificed to the conflict, rotting on the battlefields, or the thousands of weeping widows, the thousands of mothers wringing their hands, or the thousands of children dressed in mourning. And given the past history of the "good faith" of Charles-Emmanuel, one could be sure that this new peace would be broken the first time the Duke of Savoy found it advantageous. A month or two passed in celebrations, during which the Duke of Savoy sent his emissaries to Vienna and Madrid. In Vienna, his envoy delivered the message that King Louis's victory at Susa was not so much a humiliation of Savoy as it was of Emperor Ferdinand, as the Duke of Savoy had disputed the King of France's passage in order to sustain the Empire's rights in Italy. The aid France sent to the people of Casale was a clear attack on the emperor's authority, insofar as the place had been besieged by the Spanish in order to compel the duke de Nevers, a Frenchman who'd claimed an Imperial fief, to bend the knee to His Imperial Majesty. In Madrid, Savoy's envoy was charged to convey to King Philip IV and the count-duke, his prime minister, that the affront to Spanish arms at Casale was intended to weaken His Catholic Majesty's authority in Italy, an insult as yet unpunished. The King of France, goaded by Richelieu, planned to drive the Spaniards from Milan, and the Court of Madrid should expect that once they were forced from Milan, then Naples would soon follow. Philip IV and Ferdinand also exchanged emissaries. Here's what they decided:

The Holy Roman Emperor would ask the Swiss Cantons to allow his troops free passage. If the Grisons refused, Imperial troops would attack by surprise, cross the Alps, and march immediately on Mantua. The King of Spain recalled Don Gonzales de Cordova and replaced him with the overall commander of the Spanish troops in Italy, the famous Ambrose Spinola, who was given orders to besiege and take Casale, while the Imperial troops besieged and took Mantua. The French campaign, successfully completed in a matter of days, had caused quite a stir: the affair redounded to King Louis's credit across Europe, and he was acclaimed as the only sovereign, besides Gustavus Adolphus, willing to leave his palace to defend his realm, sword in hand. Ferdinand II and Philip IV, in contrast, waged their cruel wars from a distance, kneeling safely at their altars. If the king and his army had been able to stay in Piedmont, all their gains would have been preserved – but the cardinal was committed to suppressing the Protestants before summer. The Protestants had taken advantage of the absence of the king and cardinal to rally their forces, and fifteen thousand had gathered in Languedoc under the command of the duke de Rohan. The king bade goodbye to his good uncle the Duke of Savoy, disregarding the intrigues the duke was brewing under his very nose in Piedmont. On April 22, he returned to France by way of Briançon, Gap, and Châtillon, and marched on Privas. He avoided Lyon, from which the two queens had fled to escape the plague. As for Sir, still wallowing in his grievances, he'd left not only Paris but France itself, accepting the hospitality of Duke Charles IV of Lorraine in his city of Nancy. By leaving France, he'd abandoned his claim to Princess Marie de Gonzague, transferring his attentions to Princess Marguerite of Lorraine, the duke's sister. Pursued by forty thousand troops led by three Marshals of France and by Montmorency, to whom Richelieu had promised to present the Sword of the Constable, Rohan, the leader of the Protestants, fell into the same mistake made in the previous century by the leaders of the rebellious Catholic League: in return for funds that were never paid, he signed a treaty with Spain, mortal enemy of both France and her Protestants. In the end, Privas, their greatest fortress, was taken. A third of its people were hanged, and the rest were stripped of all their property. On 24 June 1629 with a new Italian campaign pending as the pot there was starting to boil, a final truce was signed, a peace whose primary condition was the demolition of the fortifications of every Protestant city. Even before Privas, it was known that Emperor Ferdinand intended to send troops into Italy; it was said Wallenstein himself would lead fifty thousand men over the Alps of the Grisons. On June 5, Ferdinand published a decree stating that his troops marched into Italy not to make war but to preserve the peace, sustaining the legitimate authority of the emperor and defending the empire's foreign fiefs from claims that infringed on his rights. In the same statement, the emperor requested His Serenity the King of Spain, who possessed the chief stronghold of the Empire in Italy, to provide the Imperial troops with whatever food and ammunition they needed. Everything France had done in Italy had to be done over again. Louis was willing but couldn't be ready to undertake another foreign war in less than five or six months. Lacking money after Privas, Richelieu had been forced to discharge thirty regiments. The envoy Sir Sabran was sent to the Court of Vienna to discuss the emperor's ultimatum. Meanwhile, Sir de Créquy was dispatched to Turin to ask the Duke of Savoy to explain, frankly that side he was on in the event of war. The emperor replied:

The King of France entered Italy with a powerful army, without any declaration of war on Spain or the Empire, and overcame, by arms or agreement, several localities under the jurisdiction of the Emperor. If the King of France will withdraw his troops from Italy, the Emperor will be satisfied to allow all issues to be settled by a court of law.

The Duke of Savoy replied:

The Imperial movement into the realm of the Grisons has nothing to do with the Treaty of Susa. But the King of Spain would like the French to leave Italy and give Susa back. If King Louis satisfies his brother-in-law Philip IV, the Duke of Savoy will persuade Emperor Ferdinand to withdraw his troops from the territory of the Grisons.

Sir de Créquy sent this response to the king, who gave it to the cardinal and charged him with answering it. The cardinal replied:

Tell the Duke of Savoy this isn't a matter of what the King of Spain or the Emperor wants, it's about whether His Highness intends to keep his word by joining his troops with those of France to maintain the Treaty of Susa.

The king returned to Paris, so angry with his brother Sir that he was ready to confiscate all his domains. But the queen mother went to work and mended the division between the brothers: Sir, as usual, humbly begged the king's pardon, presenting his conditions for returning, and instead of losing domains due to his escapade was instead granted a new fief in the Duchy of Valois, increasing his income by a hundred thousand livres a year, as well as the governorships of Orléans, Blois, Vendome, Chartres, and the Château d'Amboise, the command of the Army of Champagne, and, in the absence of the king, the office of lieutenant general in charge of Paris and the surrounding region. In addition, the accord included this curious clause:

Though reconciling with the king, Sir does not agree to overlook Cardinal Richelieu's many insults, affronts for which he will sooner or later be punished.

The cardinal learned of this accord after it was too late to prevent it. He went to the king to see this agreement with his own eyes. Facing him, Louis bowed his head, aware of the weakness and deep ingratitude he had shown in giving in to his brother's demands. "If this is what Your Majesty grants to his enemies," said the cardinal, "what's he willing to do for the man who's proven himself his best friend?"

"Anything such a man asks if that man is you."

And indeed, the king awarded Richelieu the title of Vicar General in Italy and made him generalissimo of all his armies. Upon learning of these concessions to her foe, Marie de Médicis accosted her son and, referring to the cardinal's new commissions, demanded haughtily, "What about us, Sire? In light of this, what rights do you grant to us?"

"The right of monarchs to cure scrofula," said l'Angely, who was present at the dispute.

By dint of incredible effort and by leveraging his new prestige, the cardinal found the wherewithal to mount another campaign. But a new enemy barred the path to Piedmont, an abyss that could swallow half an army. This enemy was the plague – that same plague which had forced the two queens to return to Paris and the king to withdraw through Briançon. This plague arose in Milan – as depicted in Manzoni's novel The Betrothed – and passed from Milan to Lyon, where it wrought terrible havoc. It was said some soldiers had brought it over the Alps, where it broke out just outside Lyon in the village of Vaux. A cordon sanitaire was placed around the village but this plague, like all plagues, had human vice as its ally. The plague found an accomplice in greed: some of the infected paid to be smuggled out of Vaux and into the Church of Saint-Nizier that brought the contagion into the heart of Lyon. It was the end of September. One would have said, watching workers fall as if struck by lightning all across the populous quarters of Saint-Nizier, Saint-Jean, and Saint-Georges, that nature was mocking humanity. For the weather was magnificent: never had a more beautiful sun lit so clear a sky; never had the air seemed so sweet and pure; never had the Lyonnais seen such lush vegetation. There were no sudden changes of temperature, no extreme heat or thunderstorms, none of those atmospheric disruptions so often associated with outbreaks of communicable disease. Radiant and smiling, nature watched as corruption and death came knocking at the doors of house after house. Moreover, the spread of the scourge was inexplicable and oddly capricious. It spared one side of a street and ravaged the other. An island of homes would remain intact, while every house in the surrounding quarter was visited by the sinister guest. The plague passed over some of the most filthy and congested parts of the old city, only to break out in places like Bellecour and Terreaux, among the nicest, airiest, and most open neighbourhoods. Along the river quays, the entire lower part of the great city was devastated. No one knows why but for some reason, the plague stopped dead at Rue Neyret. There, outside a small old house, is a statue bearing the Latin inscription:

Ejus praesidio non ultra pestis 1628.

Beyond, in Croix-Rousse, there's not a single case of plague.

Then as if the plague hadn't done enough damage in its march, infection was followed by murder. As in Marseilles in 1720 as in Paris in 1832, the populace, ever suspicious and credulous, cried out that they'd been deliberately poisoned. But unlike in Paris where it was said criminals had poisoned the fountains or Marseilles where convicts were blamed for corrupting the harbour water. In Lyon it was meat vendors who were accused of spreading the plague. These street sellers were said to be the ones who'd passed the pestilence from house to house. A Jesuit, Père Grillot, claimed the meat vendors were selling tainted lard and tallow. "It's in mid-September," he said, "that we began to notice the spoiled meat. The sacristan in the Jesuit church found a sack of greasy meat behind a bench, and when he burned it, the smoke was so foul that he had to bury what wouldn't burn."

Sir Montfalcon's lovely history book provides us these details but unfortunately doesn't tell us if Père Grillot was able to give absolution to those his claims assassinated. The very next day, an unlucky man who'd gotten tallow on his clothes from a lit candle was stoned by a mob. Then in Guillotière, a doctor who'd concocted a potion for one of his patients was accused of poisoning him, and had to drink his own medicine to escape being killed. Any passing stranger might be accosted, pursued with the cry "Throw that poisoner into the Rhône!"

When the plague broke out in Marseilles, the city aldermen went to consult with Chirac, the municipal physician, who told them, "There's nothing to do but try to keep up your spirits." However, as they found in Lyon, staying cheerful wasn't so easy when the priests and monks advised giving up all hope, as the scourge was surely the instrument of God's wrath. So advised, the simple folk regarded the plague not as an epidemic that could be staved off but as a destroying angel with a flaming sword that no one could escape. The doctors who went on our expedition to Egypt learned a few facts about such plagues: they attack the weak, the feeble, and the afraid. Fear the plague, and you're as good as infected. And who wouldn't be afraid if they saw two Brothers of the Minimes chanting the General Atonement as they carried to Notre-Dame-de-Lorette a silver death lamp, on which were engraved the names of the city aldermen? Who wouldn't be afraid when monks on soapboxes in the squares and on street corners loudly preached the end of the world, while their priests granted final blessings to the dying city? When a monk or priest passed in the street, some knelt in their paths to ask absolution – but many fell before they could receive it. Penitents roamed the city in sackcloth and ashes, ropes around their waists and torches in their hands, and sick citizens, leaning against walls or lying in the street, without knowing whether these penitents were consecrated and had the right to absolve the dying, shouted their confessions to them, hoping to save their souls at the price of their dignity. In such times we see how the grip of terror can sunder the bonds of nature, of friendship, and of love. Kin flees from kin, the wife abandons her husband, and parents leave their children, the chaste surrender their modesty to any who will carry them away. One woman, laughing hysterically, told how she'd sewn into their funeral shrouds her four children, her father, her mother, and her husband. Another woman was widowed six times in six months, burying six husbands. Most citizens locked themselves in their houses or shuttered shops, jumping at every noise, eying passers-by and gazing, haggard, from their windows, behind which they appeared as pale as ghosts. Few people were in the streets; those who had to go someplace did so at a run, with hardly a word for anyone they met. Anyone from outside Lyon who had to come into the city did so on a horse at the gallop, wrapped up to the eyes in a cloak. Gloomiest and most frightening of all were the physicians who made their rounds wearing a strange costume they'd invented, a beak wrapped in oilcloth that covered the mouth and nose, containing a handkerchief soaked in vinegar. Such a getup would have been laughable in ordinary times; but in this lethal atmosphere, it was terrifying. After eight days, the city was almost depopulated, though more by flight than by death. All those who could afford to leave had left; even the judges had vacated, and the courts were quite empty. Women gave birth by themselves, for the midwives had all fled, and the physicians were busy with the plague. The workshops were silent: no labourers sang their work songs, no vendors cried their wares in the streets. Everything was still, everywhere was the silence of death, broken only by the dismal sound of the bell of the dead-cart as it collected the corpses, and by the tolling of the great bell of Saint-Jean that rang every day at noon. These funeral sounds had a woeful effect on the nerves, especially those of women, who would sit gloomily counting their rosaries while uttering only an occasional moan. Some, when they heard the bell of the corpse-cart approaching, fell dead as if stricken by lightning. Others, leaving a church where the death bell tolled, fell ill on the way home and died soon thereafter. One frantic woman threw herself down a well; another young lady ran out of her house in a frenzy and hurled herself into the Rhône. There were three main measures the citizens could take, and they took them: sequester the wealthy sick in their homes; lock up the sick poor in hospitals; and collect the bodies of those who had died. Some adopted a fourth course, skipping the first three, intruding into houses on the pretext of treating the sick or carrying out the dead, and instead carrying out anything of value they could find, breaking open desks, cracking safes, and relieving the dying of their rings and jewellery. To sequester the sick, doors were walled up and food and medicines were passed in through the windows. New gallows were put up in every quarter, and looters caught in the act were taken to them and hanged without delay. The hospitals were overwhelmed, so the city established a quarantine house on the right bank of the Saone. It had room for only two hundred beds but had to accommodate four thousand patients: there were plague victims everywhere, in the rooms, in the corridors, in the cellars and the attics. Every victim who died and freed up a bed was replaced by two more. Doctors and nurses making their rounds could barely pick their way through the press. In between the stiffening corpses that almost immediately began to rot, the dying trembled and shook, throats burning, crying out for water. Here and there a body would rise in a spasm from its mattress or pile of straw and, sunken-faced and wild-eyed, paw at the air with its hands, then utter a deep groan and fall back, dead. Other victims, if they had the energy, recoiled from these visions, tripping over their neighbours and dragging off those sheets that would soon serve as their shrouds. And yet, the patients in the dreadful quarantine house were envied by those poor who were dying alone on street corners and in ditches. Most wretched of all were the beggars and vagrants who were pressed into service as corpse collectors. They were paid three livres a day, plus whatever they found in the pockets of the dead. They had iron rakes and pitchforks that they used to drag out the bodies and pile them onto carts. Any bodies found above the ground floor were thrown out through the windows. The corpses were buried to overflowing in mass graves that fermented and burst open, spewing out rotting human remains. One old man by the name of Reynard had watched his entire family die, leaving him on his own. When at last he felt himself succumbing to the sickness, he was terrified of dying alone, being thrown into a mass grave, and denied a proper Christian burial. So he took a spade and a pick and used the last of his strength to dig his own grave. When the work was complete, he made a cross of his spade and pick and placed it at the head of his grave. Then he lay down on the edge of the pit, counting on his last convulsion to roll him in, in hopes that some passing Samaritan might see his body there and cover it with earth. Most terrible of all, amid the agony of a dying people was the laughter and cheer of some of the corpse collectors, awful men who came to be known as “the crows.” It was as if the dead were their friends, and the plague was their kin. They welcomed the coming of the plague to their city, and their admission into homes from which all their lives they’d been spurned. Like the Marquis de Sade, like the executioner of Mary Stuart, they wallowed in forbidden pleasures – and when a dead woman was pretty, when a corpse was beautiful, they celebrated a monstrous marriage of life with death. Appearing in Lyon, as we said, in September, the plague peaked after about thirty days but continued to rage for another month. Toward the end of December, when bitter cold came south, it tapered off. The citizens celebrated its departure with dances and bonfires but then the warm weather came back, a heavy rain put out the fires, and the plague returned for another bout. The epidemic revived to full force in January and February, then declined in the spring, only to reappear in August before finally disappearing in December. In just over a year, the plague in Lyon killed six thousand people. Archbishop Charles Miron had been the first to die on 6 August 1628 and was succeeded by the Archbishop of Aix, Alphonse de Richelieu, brother to the cardinal. It was to this brother that the cardinal naturally addressed himself to ask if it would be possible to attempt another campaign against Piedmont, marching thirty thousand men through Lyon and the Lyonnais. The archbishop replied that the threat of disease had passed, there would be plenty of empty homes to house the troops – and even the Court should the Court choose to follow the army. When he received this response, the cardinal dispatched Sir de Pontis to Mantua that same day, to assure the duke that help was on its way. De Pontis was also ordered to place himself at the disposal of Duke Charles de Nevers to help plan the city’s defences.

135

1 Year Later

A year had passed since Richelieu, satisfied with the Treaty of Susa, or at least pretending to trust in it, had been forced to leave Piedmont to go fight the Huguenots in Languedoc. During that year, as he’d promised King Louis XIII, the cardinal had crushed the hopes of the Protestants, already badly battered by the fall of La Rochelle. He had reorganised the army, refilled the coffers of the State with new money, and signed his famous treaty with Gustavus Adolphus that supported the Catholics of France against the Protestants, and the Protestants of Germany against the Catholics. He had sent Marshal Bassompierre to the Swiss Council in Solothurn to complain about the passage of the Imperial Germans across the lands of the Grisons, and to see if he could bring back another five or six thousand Swiss mercenaries. Finally, since he couldn’t yet get to Mantua personally, the cardinal had sent the best help he could in the form of his finest engineer, Sir de Pontis, with military advice from Marshall d’Estrées, sent from Venice. With the plague in Lyon exhausted, the French army was put back on the march, though, as mentioned, a year after forcing Susa Pass and imposing terms on Charles-Emmanuel, the cardinal found himself back where he’d started: except that with Susa Pass cleared, and Fort Gélasse in French hands, Piedmont was open to him – he should be able to get to Casale to rescue the Marquis de Thoiras, under siege by Spinola, who’d succeeded Gonzales de Cordova as commander of the Spanish troops. This time, the cardinal felt sure enough of the king that he could afford to leave him behind, having taken pains to reveal to him the treachery of Sir, Marie de Médicis, and Anne of Austria. And the cardinal’s vanity played its part as well: newly empowered, he was able now to undertake a campaign on his word alone, and in the king’s absence to reap its glory for himself. Every man of genius has a weakness, and Richelieu was so great that he had three: he wanted to be recognised not just as a great politician – which no one disputed – but also as a great general – making him a rival to his own commanders, Créquy, Bassompierre, Montmorency, Schomberg, and the Duke of Guise – and as a great poet, a title only posterity could award. At the beginning of March 1630, the cardinal was back at Susa, exchanging ambassadors and envoys extraordinaire with that elusive chameleon called Charles-Emmanuel, that crowned snake who, for fifty years, had been slipping from the grasp of the Kings of France and Spain. The cardinal had already spent a month in negotiations that had led nowhere. But he was compelled to be patient for fear the Duke of Savoy might prevent him from resupplying Casale with food and ammunition, where they were running out. The Duke of Savoy wasn’t strong enough to resist the force of France without the support of Spain or Austria – but he had the support of Spain from Milan, and of Austria from Wallenstein’s troops that had passed the Grisons. In fact, he might be better able to dispute the passage of Montferrat than he’d been to defend the Pass of Susa. As the delays wore at his patience, the cardinal wrote to the Duke of Montmorency, in a tone more friendly than formal:

Sir Duke, you know what we’d agreed between us: when the Italian campaign was over, you would be awarded the Sword of the Constable. But the Italian campaign, as you can see for yourself, won’t be concluded until the Duke of Nevers is confirmed as the ruler of Mantua. Last year’s campaign will be only a skirmish compared to this year’s war that must support Duke Charles in his claims. It’s time we quit dealing with intermediaries and envoys while there’s still a chance of success. Go to Turin under the guise of a pleasure trip and meet secretly with the Duke of Savoy. You are gallant, Sir, and the ladies of the Court of Savoy are beautiful, so I don’t think you can complain too much of this task. But let me speak frankly of the real mission that is delicate. You are related, through your wife, to Queen Marie de Médicis, and are known to be a member of Queen Anne’s circle – which will be a recommendation to the enemies of the king, though you are his friend as well. Try to arrange a direct meeting with the Duke of Savoy, or at least between his son and me, to find out his real position. Meanwhile, I, undistracted by beautiful ladies or lively music, will be sending scouts out in every direction. When you return, Duke, depending on what you find out, we’ll know in which direction to march. Just try to keep the truth of your mission under your hat.

It was the kind of mission perfectly suited to the charming, elegant, and handsome Duke of Montmorency. He had, in fact, married the daughter of the Duke of Bracciano that same Vittorio Orsini who had been one of Marie de Médicis’s lovers before her marriage, and perhaps even after – if the rumours about Louis’s parentage were true, that made Montmorency the king’s brother-in-law. He was, indeed, devoted to Queen Anne, though it was Buckingham who had stolen her heart when he had come to Court as ambassador of Charles I. Buckingham had scattered the pearls from his doublet across the Court of the Louvre but had won a gem far more precious in the gardens at Amiens: a lady’s love. Yes, a man like the Duke of Montmorency would be welcomed at the Court of Savoy by all but the husbands of the beautiful Savoyard ladies. The duke therefore accepted this mission, half diplomacy and half gallantry, and departed for Turin, leaving the cardinal, as he’d said, to study the horizons to see which would be darkened by the oncoming storm. On the northern horizon, in Germany, Wallenstein daily grew more powerful, becoming almost unstoppable. The Emperor had made him the Duke of Friedland, ruling the vast, rich regions he’d conquered for Ferdinand in Bohemia, domains confiscated from so-called rebels. At Wallenstein’s own expense he’d raised an army of fifty thousand troops, repelled the Danes, beaten Mansfield and his allies at the bridge of Dessau, defeated Bethlen Gabor, reoccupied Brandenburg, and conquered Holstein, Schleswig, Pomerania, and Mecklenburg – in token of which the Emperor named Wallenstein the Duke of Mecklenburg as well as of Friedland. But there his series of conquests came to a halt, at least temporarily. Ferdinand was assailed with complaints against his blind general from all sides; seeking a way to remove him from Austria, Denmark, Hungary, and Germany, he sent him east and south. Recruits flocked to Wallenstein: he sent a force of them to Italy, and another to Poland, where a huge garrison of forty thousand men camped on the Baltic, devouring a country already exhausted. To feed his troops he had to conquer or perish, so he went back to war, marching on the rich Imperial cities of Worms, Frankfurt, Schwaben, and Strasbourg. His western vanguard occupied a fort in the Diocese of Metz, and Richelieu learned that their Sir, when he was in Lorraine, had made contact with Wallenstein to invite his barbarians into France – ostensibly to overthrow Richelieu, though the real target was Louis XIII. Wallenstein put two of his corps, those led by Gallas and Aldringen, under the command of Collalto, an Italian general, and dispatched them to Italy to besiege Mantua and support Charles-Emmanuel. On the eastern horizon, Richelieu looked toward Venice and Rome. Venice had promised to create a diversion by attacking Milan but Venice was no longer the power that once had made daring raids on Constantinople, Cyprus, and the Morea. But the Venetians fulfilled the rest of their promises, sending wheat, ammunition, reinforcements, and funds to Mantua, as well as cutting off food supplies to the besiegers. Deprived of food, drink, and fodder, unable to breach Mantua’s walls due to a lack of artillery, the Imperials were about to lift the siege when aid came from an unexpected quarter. The pope allowed them to resupply from the Papal States, provided they did so by buying bread, honey, and hay from one of his nephews (one of the few who hadn’t been granted an ecclesiastical office). So as always, it was the pope, and an Italian pope at that, who betrayed Italy. He was a Barberini, naturally, of the same family that had stripped and sold the bronze plaques from the Pantheon of Agrippa. Nearer to the cardinal, south of Savoy, was Spinola, the Genoese condottiere in the service of Spain. He’d marched into Montferrat when the Imperials had entered the Duchy of Mantua, more to block the relief of the city than to resume the siege of Casale. He had six thousand foot and three thousand horse, nine thousand troops with which to oppose the French if they tried to rescue Mantua. If Mantua fell, the twenty-five or thirty thousand Imperials who’d besieged it would be freed up to join Spinola in taking Casale and then driving the French from Italy. To the west, Richelieu’s horizons were darker still. At least Collalto and Spinola were visible enemies, openly opposed to him. That wasn’t the case in France: there, the cardinal’s enemies were like miners, digging underground in the dark to attack from hiding, while wearing a mask of friendship in the light. Louis, though aware that his life and reputation were linked to those of his minister, was worn out by these endless conspiracies – disgusted with everything, more melancholy than ever, he was prey to constant anxiety. His closest kin – mother, wife, and brother – all lived for a single hope: the fall of the cardinal. With every word and act devoted to that end, they made Louis’s court a sour and bitter place, even while their efforts reinforced the king’s conviction that he had no influence, no grandeur, and no royalty without the cardinal. The king began to comprehend that these attacks on the cardinal were really just a prelude to their real aim that was his own fall, by guile or by open attack. So Louis redoubled his defence of the cardinal, persuaded that to do so was to defend himself. The flight of the Duke of Orléans to Nancy, the secret letter decoded by Rossignol, and especially the treacherous negotiations between the Prince and Wallenstein, all convinced the king that a time was coming when Gaston, supported from outside by Austria, Spain, and Savoy, and from within by Queen Marie, Queen Anne, and malcontents of every stripe, would raise the banner of revolt. And, indeed, there was no shortage of malcontents. The Duke of Guise was angry that he hadn’t been given command of the army, and conspired with Madam de Conti and the Duchess d’Elbeuf to plot against Richelieu. The judges at the Châtelet in Paris, incensed by new fees imposed on officers of the judiciary, refused to render justice. The lawmakers of Parliament were so upset by an increase in their taxes that they secretly offered to support the Duke of Orléans if he promised to abolish the fees when he came to power. We’ve gone into enough detail about the cardinal’s police to make it clear that he was aware of all these malcontents, and had his eye on their intrigues. But despite these threats, he was convinced the king would nonetheless come to rejoin him, for two reasons: first, he knew the king’s incurable melancholy and ennui would send him back to the army, if only to once again hear the glorious sound of victory, and the praise that goes with it; and second, since the king had named Gaston both Lieutenant General of Paris and Commander of the Army of Champagne, Gaston potentially had enough power, with the support of his mother and the queen, to drive the king from Paris, and maybe even from France. Gaston might take advantage of the king’s absence to conspire against the cardinal and maybe even the king but once Louis XIII had joined him, Richelieu feared nothing. He knew Gaston well enough to know that, if faced by an army commanded by the cardinal and the king himself, Sir would abandon his allies and accomplices and beg forgiveness, as he’d done before. His review of the horizons of Europe complete, the cardinal turned from the dangers in the distance toward nearby Turin, to see how well Montmorency was following his instructions.

136

Old Lovers Reunited

The Duke of Montmorency had invited his friend the Count of Moret to accompany him to Turin without revealing the true nature of his trip and Moret had accepted eagerly. The gravity of the historical events we recount sometimes distracts us from the joys or sorrows they bring to the hearts of our characters. We mentioned the besieging of Mantua without relating how this siege dismayed the heart of the son of Henry IV. Indeed, Isabelle, trapped in that city with her father, might suffer misery, famine, even death – all the risks associated with a siege by barbarians such as those who made up the Imperial hordes. So the Count of Moret had volunteered to go and help defend Mantua – especially once he’d heard that Richelieu had sent his rival, Sir de Pontis, to that city as an engineer. Moret was eager not just to defend Isabelle against the besiegers but also to oppose whatever influence de Pontis might gain with Sir de Lautrec. But Richelieu didn't have so many loyal hearts and minds around him that he was willing to deprive himself of a man who, by rank alone, should stand near the king and cardinal – and who, by his courage and quick thinking, had already done great things, and might be called upon to do more. However, to reassure his young protégé, the cardinal informed him that he'd written to Sir de Lautrec, advising him to remember the promise the cardinal had made to the two young people, and to respect his daughter's commitment to the count. Not that we wish to portray our hero as any better than he was: the blood of Henry IV flowed in his veins, and that made him, if not unfaithful, at least a little inconstant. Though he stuck to his oath to Isabelle never to have any wife but her, it would be untrue to say that, after the last campaign, thoughts of another hadn't entered his head while approaching Paris with his brother and the cardinal. Thoughts of a dark-haired woman, wearing a red Basque cap, whose red mouth had given him kisses at the Inn of the Painted Beard so bold that his lips burned again at the thought of them. And more: he remembered the night when, leaving Princess Marie de Gonzague's soirée, he and that enticing woman who'd played the role of his cousin had exchanged promises to meet again – promises that circumstances had forestalled but which he intended to make good. But chance interfered once again: by the time the Count of Moret had arrived in Paris, Madam de Fargis – we assume our readers had guessed it was her – had already left the capital, doubtless in the service of one of even higher rank. So Jacquolino, to his great regret, was unable to renew his acquaintance with his beautiful cousin Marina. But the elegant court of the Duke of Savoy was a place he remembered fondly: he'd spent a month there two years before when on his way back from Italy, when he'd been given messages for Sir and the two queens. It was a court where opportunities for romance were not hard to find. And, indeed, there were few courts as addicted to gallantry and romance as that of the Duke of Savoy. Dissolute himself, Charles-Emmanuel possessed that charm and urbanity that gave others the permission to indulge themselves. If, after all we've said about him, we wanted to further round out his personality, we would add that he was stubborn, ambitious, and wasteful. But he hid his hypocrisy under such an accomplished air of grandeur that his overspending passed for generosity, his ambition as a desire for glory, and his stubbornness as firmness and consistency. Unfaithful in his alliances, greedy for others' wealth, wasteful of his own, ever poor but lacking in nothing, he continually outfoxed Austria, Spain, and France, taking from whoever offered the most, and giving in return the least he could get away with, particularly in matters of war. And he made war on his neighbours whenever it seemed to his advantage, because he was tormented by the need to increase his domains. Though forced eventually to sue for peace, in the subsequent treaty he always managed to insert a few ambiguous clauses that enabled him to violate it later. A master of delaying tactics, he was a modern Fabius of diplomacy. He had managed to marry himself to King Philip's daughter Catherine, and his son to King Henry IV's daughter Christine – though these two alliances provided only partial protection against the consequences of his habitual treachery. This time, at last, he faced his most formidable opponent, Cardinal Richelieu – and it would break him. The Duke of Savoy gave a warm welcome to his two visitors: Montmorency, preceded by his reputation for courage, charm, and generosity; and Moret, who was remembered for his gallantry on his last visit. Madam Christine was particularly gracious to the young prince who so resembled Henry IV, and treated him like a brother. Knowing Montmorency's romantic tendencies, Charles-Emmanuel had summoned to court all the most beautiful women of Turin and the surrounding area, in hopes of enticing the duke's interest from France to Savoy. But among all those beautiful faces, Antoine de Bourbon looked in vain for the one he'd hoped to see, that of the Countess Matilda of Espalomba. There's a story about this lovely countess which, as it occurred before the opening chapter of this book, and didn't bear on the subsequent story of our prince, we haven't shared with our readers. One day, Charles-Emmanuel had seen a new star appear at his court, an unknown moon, pale and shining, in orbit around a planet that shed no light of its own. Though he came from one of the leading families of the realm, Count Urbain of Espalomba had married a commoner – Matilda of Cisterna, the loveliest flower of the Aosta Valley, to paraphrase Shakespeare – and brought his bride to Court. Charles-Emmanuel, though sixty-seven, had preserved during his long reign those habits of gallantry that led him to treat his court like a private harem, where he had but to toss his ducal handkerchief to make his choice. Dazzled by the beauty of the Countess of Espalomba, he'd let her know that she had only to say the word to be the next Duchess of Savoy; but that word the lovely countess never said. For once, the duke's heart was ignited, not by vulgar ambition but by the burning flame of love. But the countess, just eighteen years old, had already set eyes on the Count of Moret, a young prince of twenty-two: April and May came together, and spring was declared with a kiss. The Count of Espalomba had his suspicions but only about the Duke of Savoy. With his eye fixed on Charles-Emmanuel, he could see nothing else, and so it was that in the shadow of the old husband's jealousy, the two young lovers found happiness. But the sovereign's eye was sharper than that of the husband – the duke suspected something, though he wasn't sure what. He mulled it over: Count Urbain was poor and avaricious, and had come to court seeking the duke's favour, so Savoy named the count Governor of Fort Pinerolo, with orders to take immediate command. There the countess was sent as well to be locked away in a safe place, like a rich gem in a coffer to which only the duke held the key. Forced to separate, the young lovers had wept and promised each other eternal fidelity; we've seen how well the Count of Moret kept his part of that oath. Meanwhile, Matilda had no choice but to while away the time on her own; the chances for romance in Pinerolo were few and unappealing, especially after one had loved a young and handsome king's son. Matilda had learned that the count had left Savoy right after her departure, and she was grateful that her lover hadn't wanted to stay in a court that lacked her presence. For the past eighteen months, she'd dreamed of their reunion. So she was overjoyed when she learned her husband had been asked to leave Pinerolo and spend a few days in the capital during the fêtes planned to welcome the two princes to the Court of Turin. At last the two lovers were reunited! Did each bring to this meeting an equal share of love? We dare not say – but each brought an equal share of youth, the thing that love resembles most. However, once again their bliss was to be short-lived. The princes had only a few days to spend in Turin – but the Italian campaign could last for months, even years, so there might yet be opportunities for further reunions. They were careful to meet in secret, after which, thanks to information from his beautiful lover, the Count of Moret was able to draw a detailed plan of Fort Pinerolo. Upon studying it, he was delighted to see that the bedchambers of the count and countess were at opposite ends of the château. So the lovers set up a method of secret communication. When the young bride had left the lovely Aosta Valley, she'd brought along her slightly older foster sister, Jacintha – a standard precaution when a young woman married an older husband, as sisters made natural allies in marriages of convenience. Jacintha had a brother named Selimo who was two or three years older, so they arranged that he would bring the count, under the assumed name of Gaetano, to meet her at Pinerolo. What could be more natural than that a brother should come with his friend to visit his sister, especially when that sister lived with ten or twelve people in a grand abode that could easily house fifty? Once under the same roof, the youths would be poor lovers indeed if they couldn't manage to see each other three or four times a day, and at least once every night. They worked all this out within the first day of seeing each other again. The young are said to be heedless of the future but this pair of lovers, on the contrary, took the future quite seriously. These arrangements were made right under Count Urbain's nose, whose suspicions were once again all directed at the Duke of Savoy. But the duke had either given up hope of winning the lady's love or, fickle as always, had decided that he preferred to torment Urbain by denying him his salary, on the pretext that money was so tight, he was going to have to beg his own subjects for contributions! For his part, the Duke of Montmorency was the happiest man on earth. Young, handsome, wealthy, and wearing, after the royal houses, the greatest name in France, the ladies simply flocked to him. Flattered by the master of one of the most sophisticated courts in Europe, his vanity was stroked at every turn. For example, once, when leading the court from the table to the ballroom, the Duke of Savoy had called out, "Since you arrived, Duke, our ladies speak of nothing but how handsome you are, abandoning their husbands to worry and sorrow." The eight days the two ambassadors spent at Turin or in Rivoli Castle passed in dinners, balls, cavalcades, and fêtes of every sort – and meanwhile the cardinal met with Victor-Amadeus in the castle or, as the cardinal preferred, in the village of Bunolonga. The cardinal liked Bunolonga better since it was only an hour's ride from Susa, and there the Prince of Piedmont came to him, rather than he to the Prince of Piedmont.

137
The Cardinal takes the Field

The negotiations were intense. Each party had to deal with a formidable opponent. Charles-Emmanuel wanted peace for himself but all-out war between France and the House of Austria, in hopes he could remain neutral until the opportunity came to reap the greatest reward by throwing his support behind one crown or the other. But the cardinal had already chosen the day he would go to war with Austria – the day that Gustavus Adolphus marched into Germany. The cardinal turned the question from peace to war, asking Victor-Amadeus, "What price would the Duke of Savoy ask to declare for France, open his borders, and add ten thousand men to the army of the king?" Since all possibilities, and this one in particular, had been foreseen by Charles-Emmanuel, Victor-Amadeus was ready with his answer: "It would take the King of France to attack Milan and the Republic of Genoa, with which Charles-Emmanuel is at odds, and to refuse all proposals of peace from the House of Austria until Milan is conquered and Genoa destroyed." Here was a new proposal indeed, one that showed how the situation had evolved since the Treaty of Susa. The cardinal appeared surprised by this proposal but quickly replied, in terms preserved for us by historians of the time: "What's this, Prince? My king sends his army to ensure the freedom of Italy but the Duke of Savoy wants him to use it to destroy the Republic of Genoa, with whom His Majesty has no quarrel? France will willingly use its good offices and authority to negotiate with the Genoese to give satisfaction to the Duke of Savoy but declaring war on them is out of the question. Now, if the Spaniards put the king into the position of having to attack Milan, he'll probably do it, and pursue it with all rigor – and the Duke of Savoy can rest assured that once he prevailed, the king wouldn't keep any domains that didn't belong to him. The king, in the person of his minister, gives his word as to that." The proposal had been quite specific, and so was the reply. Victor-Amadeus, backed into a corner, asked for a few days to consult with his father. Three days later, in fact, he was back in Bunolonga. "My father," he said, "fears that my brother-in-law Louis will come to terms with the King of Spain before the aims of the war are achieved. Prudence prevents him from declaring for France unless the king commits not to lay down arms until Milan has fallen." Richelieu simply referred him back to the terms of the Treaty of Susa. Victor-Amadeus asked for more time to confer with his father, and returned again, saying "The Duke of Savoy is prepared to adhere to the terms of the treaty, provided the ten thousand infantry and one thousand horse he provides are used to help reduce the Republic of Genoa, that matter to be concluded before embarking on another." "And this is your final word?" asked the cardinal. "Yes, My Lord," replied Victor-Amadeus, rising from his seat. Richelieu rapped twice on a panel behind him, and Latil appeared. The cardinal called him over and whispered, "The prince's leaving. Go ahead and make sure he receives no royal honours in passing." Latil bowed and hurried out. The cardinal was satisfied: he knew an order given to Latil was as good as done. "Prince," the cardinal said to Victor-Amadeus, "I had for the Duke of Savoy, on the behalf of my master the king, all the regard a King of France can have for one who is not only a fellow sovereign but an uncle. Add to this all the esteem the king has for Your Highness, who as the husband of his sister is no less than a brother. But in my double role as His Majesty's minister and generalissimo, I would fail in my duty if I didn't see Savoy severely punished for refusing to live up to its word. It's an insult to the king, and the Army of France won't stand for it. It's seventeenth March." He drew out his watch. "Today, on seventeenth March as of six-forty-five in the afternoon, France and Savoy are at war. Take care! Because we mean business." And he bowed to the prince, who then left him. Two sentries stood watch outside Cardinal Richelieu's door, halberds on their shoulders. Victor-Amadeus passed between them without either appearing to notice him or pay him the least regard. Other soldiers, who were playing dice on the stairs, didn't even pause their game to get out of his way. "Ah," murmured Victor-Amadeus. "So they've been ordered to insult me!" If he had any doubts that such was the case, they were settled at the gate where the guards completely ignored him. Prince Victor-Amadeus had scarcely left before the cardinal had summoned the Count of Moret, the Duke of Montmorency, and the Marshals Créquy, la Force, and Schomberg. He explained the situation to them and asked for their advice. All were of the opinion that since the cardinal had committed them to war, they must go to war. Ordering them to prepare to mobilize the following day, the cardinal dismissed them, keeping only Montmorency behind. Once they were alone, he asked, "Prince, would you like to be constable tomorrow?" Montmorency's eyes flashed. "My Lord," he said, "the way Your Eminence phrases the question makes me wonder how that might be possible." "It's not only possible, it's easy. We've declared war on the Duke of Savoy, as he'll learn at Rivoli Castle within two hours. Take fifty well-mounted cavaliers, gain entrée to the castle, seize the duke and his son, and bring them here. Once we have them, we can do as we like with them. They'll soon see reason." "My Lord," said Montmorency, bowing, "just last week, in that same castle, I was the guest of the duke as your ambassador. It would be dishonourable to return there today as an enemy." The cardinal shrugged. "You're right," he said. "One doesn't propose such things to a Montmorency. This is a mission for a swashbuckler – and I have one at hand. But I'll remember your refusal, my dear Duke. The next time you wish a favour, remember that I'd asked one of you." Montmorency bowed and departed. "That was a mistake," the cardinal murmured thoughtfully as the door closed behind the prince. "Here is the price of relying so much on men of lower rank. Anyone else would have accepted the task but men of high blood are too haughty. But he has an honourable heart, and though he doesn't like me, I'd trust him and his honest dislike before others who boast of devotion." Then, knocking twice on the panel, "Étienne!" he called. "Étienne!" Latil appeared. "Do you know Rivoli Castle?" the cardinal asked. "The château a league outside Turin?" "Yes. Right now it houses the Duke of Savoy and his son." Latil smiled. "So it's time to strike," he said. "Meaning?" "To take the two of them." "You'd do that?"

“For God’s sake! Would I?”
“How many men would you need?”
“Fifty, well-armed and well-mounted.”
“Pick your men and your horses. If you succeed, there’s fifty thousand livres in it for the men, and twenty-five thousand for you.”
“The honour of the deed would be quite enough but if My Lord insists on adding to that, I won’t argue.”
“Do you have anything else to say?”
“Just one thing, My Lord.”
“What’s that?”

“When undertaking a task like this one, one always hears ‘If you succeed,’ never ‘If you don’t succeed.’ But no matter how well such a mission is performed, how skilfully managed, one of those unexpected events could occur that thwart even the greatest of captains. Then the men, through no fault of their own, get nothing, and that’s discouraging. Promise us something even if we don’t succeed, no matter how little.”
“You’re right, Étienne,” said the cardinal, “and that’s good advice. A thousand livres per man and twenty-five thousand for you if you succeed – and if you don’t, two crowns per man, and twenty-five for you.”
“Then here’s how I see it, My Lord: it’s seven o’clock now, and it’ll take three hours to get to Rivoli, so we assail the castle at ten. The rest is up to luck, good or bad.”
“Go, my dear Latil, and rest assured I believe that if you don’t succeed, it won’t be your fault.”
“It’s in God’s hands, My Lord!”
Latil took three strides toward the door, then turned around. “Has My Lord mentioned this mission to anyone else?”
“Only one person.”
“By the Belly of the Grey Saint, as King Henry IV used to say. That cuts our chances by fifty percent!”
Richelieu frowned and said to himself, “If he turns this down, I must warn him that I’ll take it hard.” Then to Latil: “Well, go anyway – and if you fail, I’ll know that I’m the one to blame.” 10 minutes later, a troop of 50 cavalry led by Étienne Latil rode past the window of the cardinal who watched them go from behind the blinds.

138
The Empty Lair

Though in the shadow of a powerful and determined enemy who might declare war on him at any moment, it wasn’t the Duke of Savoy’s style to show fear; so while his son Victor-Amadeus was at Bunolonga negotiating with Richelieu, at Rivoli Castle the duke was throwing a grand party. On the evening of March 15, the prettiest women in Turin and the most elegant gentlemen of Savoy and Piedmont were all gathered at Rivoli that was brilliantly lit, streams of light shining from the windows in all four directions. The Duke of Savoy, charming, witty, and spry, despite his sixty-seven years, laughed and revelled with the vigour of a young man, and was the first to flatter his daughter-in-law, in whose honour the party was given. But occasionally, an almost imperceptible frown briefly darkened his face. He was thinking the French were only eight or ten leagues away – the French, who had forced the impregnable Pass of Susa within a matter of hours. Even now his fate hung in the balance in the secret struggle between Cardinal Richelieu and Victor-Amadeus, his son. Charles-Emmanuel had made excuses for his son’s absence, saying he was expected back that evening – and meanwhile, he counted every passing moment. Indeed, at about nine o’clock, the prince appeared in splendid attire. A smile on his lips, he greeted Princess Christine first, then the ladies, then those Savoyard and Piedmontese great nobles whom he honoured with his friendship. Finally he approached Duke Charles-Emmanuel and, kissing his hand, spoke to him in a low voice as if inquiring about his health. His face was calm but what he said was, “France has declared war on us; hostilities begin tomorrow. We must take care.”
The duke replied in the same tone, “Leave after the quadrille and give orders to concentrate the troops at Turin. As for me, I’ll dispatch the governors of Forts Viellane, Fenestrelle, and Pinerolo to their posts.”
Then he waved his hand to the musicians, who had paused when the prince had entered, and gave the signal to resume the dance. Victor-Amadeus took the hand of his wife, Princess Christine, and without saying a word about the rupture between Savoy and France, led off the royal quadrille. Meanwhile, Charles-Emmanuel approached the governors of Piedmont’s three main forts and ordered them to leave at once for their citadels. The governors of Viellane and Fenestrelle had come without their wives, so they had but to saddle their horses and don their cloaks to follow the duke’s command. This wasn’t the case with Count Urbain of Espalomba; not only had he brought his wife but she was dancing the quadrille with Prince Victor-Amadeus. “My Lord,” he said, “your order won’t be easy to follow.”
“And why is that, Sir?”
“Because the countess and I came here from Turin dressed for the ball, in a hired carriage that doesn’t come from Pinerolo.”
“The wardrobe of my son and daughter-in-law will provide you with everything you need, and you can take a coach from my stables.”
“I’m not sure the countess could undertake such a journey without risk to her health.”
“In that case, leave her here and go alone.”
The count gave Charles-Emmanuel a strange look. “Yes,” he said, “I see how such an arrangement would be convenient for Your Highness.”
“Any arrangement is convenient for me, Count, so long as you depart without wasting a minute.”
“And the dishonour, My Lord?” the count demanded.
“Where is the dishonour, my dear Count, in ordering a commander to his post?” replied the duke. “On the contrary, it’s a proof of confidence.”
“That’s no explanation for this sudden departure.”
“A sovereign doesn’t have to answer to his subjects,” Charles-Emmanuel said, “especially when these subjects are in his service and he has orders for them. Now I order you to go at once to Pinerolo, and if the town and citadel are attacked you are to defend it until no stone is left standing upon another. You and Madam may ask for whatever you need, and it will be provided for you at once.”
“Should I take the countess out of the quadrille, or wait until it’s finished?”
“You can wait until it’s finished.”
“Very well, My Lord. When the quadrille is over, we’ll depart.”
“Go quickly, Count, and put up a strong defence.”
And the Duke of Savoy walked away, ignoring the oaths Count Urbain swore under his breath. When the quadrille was finished, the count related the order he’d been given to his astonished countess. They left the hall by one door, while Victor-Amadeus went out the other. The governors of Viellane and Fenestrelle, who’d had no part in the quadrille, were already gone. The duke whispered a few words to his daughter-in-law, who followed the count and countess. Outside the hall, she assigned one of her maids to assist the countess, then returned to the fête to organise the next quadrille in place of Prince Victor-Amadeus. Ten minutes later the prince was back in the ballroom, visibly paler than when he’d left. He went up to Duke Charles-Emmanuel, linked arms with him, and walked him to a window embrasure. There he gave the duke a note. “Read this, Father,” he said.
“What is it?” asked the duke.
“A note that was just handed to me by a dust-covered courier who arrived on a horse coated with sweat. I tried to give him a purse full of gold for his effort but he refused it, saying ‘I serve a master who doesn’t allow others to pay his servants.’ And with that, having given his horse no more time to catch his breath than it took to say those words, he galloped off.” As he said this, Duke Charles-Emmanuel was reading the note. It was short:
A guest who was hospitably received by His Highness the Duke of Savoy takes this opportunity to pay for such hospitality by warning him that he and Prince Victor-Amadeus must depart Castle Rivoli this very night. There’s not a moment to lose. To horse, and ride for Turin!
“No signature?” asked the duke.
“None. But it’s obviously from the Duke of Montmorency or the Count of Moret.”
“What livery was the courier wearing?”
“No livery – but I thought I recognised him as one named Galaor who accompanied the duke.”
“That must be it. Well?”
“Your opinion, My Lord?”
“My opinion, my dear Victor, is that we should follow this advice. Nothing bad will happen if we do but we might suffer a terrible turn if we don’t.”
“Then let’s be on our way.”
The duke strode to the centre of the ballroom, still smiling. “Ladies and gentlemen,” he said, “I’ve just received information that I must respond to immediately, with the aid of my son. But don’t concern yourselves – dance on, have fun, my palace is yours. Princess Christine, will you do the honours?”
Though couched as an invitation, it was a command. The ladies and gentlemen parted into two lines and bowed as the two princes passed, smiling and waving. Once out of the ballroom, all pretence was abandoned. Father and son summoned their valets, who threw cloaks over their shoulders as they hurried down the stairs. They crossed the courtyard and went straight to the stables, saddled the two fastest coursers, slipped pistols into their holsters, mounted, and rode. They launched themselves at a gallop down the road to Turin, only a league away. Meanwhile, Latil and his fifty men were also at the gallop along the road from Susa to Turin. Where the road forks, and one branch, lined with poplars, heads toward Rivoli Castle, Latil, who rode in the lead, thought he saw a shadow approaching. On his side, the rider – for the shadow was that of a mounted cavalier – came to a halt, examining the band of riders with the same curiosity the riders were examining him. Latil was about to cry “Who goes there?” when he stopped himself, for fear that his French-accented Italian would betray him. He decided to ride forward alone, and urged his horse toward the rider who stood in the road like an equestrian statue. But as soon as the shadowy rider saw him coming, he drove in his spurs and left the Rivoli road, galloping cross-country toward the road to Susa. Latil rode to cut him off, shouting, “Halt!”
But the shadow just rode all the faster. As they converged, Latil considered that the rider was now within pistol range but two ideas gave him pause: first, the rider might not be an enemy; and second, a pistol shot this close to Rivoli might raise the alarm. They reached the road but the unknown rider was three lengths ahead of Latil, and he was better mounted; Latil pursued but the rider not only maintained his lead, he increased it. After five minutes, Latil gave up the pursuit and returned to his detachment. The darkness of night swallowed the rider and even the sound of his horse, leaving nothing behind. Latil, shaking his head, resumed his position at the head of the troop. The event might mean nothing but to Latil it was deathly important. He said to himself, “I’d wager anything the duke’s been forewarned. Why would a cavalier riding from Rivoli be so desperate to hide his identity? Why would he ride to Susa, unless he’d come from Susa in the first place? By the sound of its breathing, his horse had clearly ridden a long way already.”
His suspicions were further confirmed when, as they approached Rivoli, Latil saw not one but two shadowy riders on the road ahead, who like the first stopped when they saw the approaching troop. But the pause was only momentary before they launched themselves in the opposite direction from the first rider, that is, toward Turin. Latil didn’t even consider pursuing them, as they rode fresh, first-rate horses whose hooves barely seemed to touch the ground. There was nothing to do but continue on to the château, whose windows glowed on the near horizon. But Latil was convinced that he knew the explanation for his encounters with these riders. In ten minutes they were at the château gates. There was no sign of warning or alert. Latil rode around the compound, assigning six troopers to each door, and then, at the head of the final half-dozen, he rushed, sword in hand, up the stairs to the main doorway. At the sight of armed men in French uniforms rushing into the ballroom, the astonished musicians abruptly stopped. The dancers, frightened, turned this way and that but soldiers were coming in through every door. Latil, having ordered his men to hold the doors, advanced, hat in one hand and sword in the other, toward the centre of the room. But Princess Christine met him halfway. “Sir,” she said to him, “I presume you come to call upon my father-in-law, the Duke of Savoy, and my husband, the Prince of Piedmont. I regret to say they’re not here, having left for Turin no more than fifteen minutes ago, where I anticipate by now they’ve safely arrived. If you or your men are in need of refreshments, well, Rivoli Castle is famous for its hospitality, and I’d be happy to do the honours for an officer and soldiers of my brother Louis XIII.”
“Madam,” Latil replied, summoning all his memories of the old royal court so as to reply properly to the wife of the Prince of Piedmont, daughter-in-law of the Duke of Savoy and sister of his king, “we visit solely to bring news of Their Highnesses. We met them no more than ten minutes ago, on their way, as you did the honour to inform me, to Turin – and the way they spurred their horses, they were eager to get there. As for the hospitality you do us the honour to offer us, we must decline as we are obliged to report our news to the cardinal.”

And then, bowing to Princess Christine with an elegance one might find surprising in a mercenary captain, he withdrew. “Come on,” he said, rejoining his men. “As I suspected, they’re forewarned and the lair’s empty!”

The Count of Moret offers to take a Mule & a Million to Fort Pinerolo

When he heard the results of Latil’s expedition, Richelieu was furious. Like Latil, he had no doubt but that the Duke of Savoy had been forewarned. But who could have alerted him? The cardinal had shared his plan with only one person, the Duke of Montmorency. Was he the one who’d warned Charles-Emmanuel? That seemed consistent with his exaggerated devotion to chivalry. But such chivalry on behalf of an enemy verged on treason to the crown. Richelieu didn’t reveal his suspicions about Montmorency, for he knew Latil was attached to the duke and to the Count of Moret but he asked a number of probing questions about this shadowy cavalier glimpsed in the dark. Latil described what he’d seen: a young man aged seventeen or eighteen, wearing a large plumed hat and wrapped in a dark blue or black cloak, whose horse was as black as the night with which it had merged. After Latil left, the cardinal sent to ask what orders the sentries had followed between eight and ten that night, and was told that no one could enter or leave the Susa garrison without the password that that evening was “Susa and Savoy.” Of course, the password was known to all the high officers: Marshals Schomberg, Créqui, and La Force, the Count of Moret, the Duke of Montmorency, and so forth. The cardinal called the sentries in and questioned them. From Latil’s description, one of them recognised a youth who had gone out, giving the correct password. He’d left by the gate toward France rather than the gate to Italy but that didn’t mean anything: once outside the gate and into the town, he could easily have changed direction. So they discovered at daybreak, when they found the tracks of a horse. The trail went out the France gate, around the town of Susa, and joined the road to Italy a mile beyond. The cardinal lost no time in delays. The day before, he’d declared war to Victor-Amadeus; so by ten o’clock, his investigations having been concluded, he gave the order to march, and the drums and trumpets sounded. The cardinal watched as the army passed, four corps commanded by Schomberg, La Force, Créqui, and the Duke of Montmorency. Among the officers standing near him was Latil. Montmorency was accompanied, as always, by a large entourage of gentlemen and pages. Among these pages was Galaor, wearing a wide plumed hat and mounted on a black horse. As the young man passed, Richelieu touched Latil on the shoulder. “Maybe,” said the latter, “but I couldn’t swear to it.”

Richelieu frowned, and his eyes flashed in the direction of the duke. Putting his horse into a gallop, he rode to the head of the column, preceded only by the vanguard known as the Lost Children. He was dressed in his usual wartime attire, a steel breastplate over a richly embroidered golden doublet. A feather floated from his broad felt hat. As they might meet the enemy at any moment, two pages went before him, one carrying his gauntlets and the other his helmet. At his side, two other pages led a rare and powerful war-horse. Cavois and Latil, the captain and lieutenant of his guards, followed close behind. After an hour’s ride, they reached a small river which the cardinal had had scouted out the previous day. Confident of his information, he was the first to ride into the water, and arrived without accident on the other side. A heavy rain began to fall as the army crossed the river but the cardinal, nothing daunted, continued his march. It would have been impossible to shelter an army in the few isolated houses that lined the road but the soldiers, disregarding the possible, began to complain and wish the cardinal to the Devil. These complaints were loud enough that the cardinal could scarcely miss them. “Well!” said the cardinal, turning to Latil. “Do you hear that, Étienne?”

“What, My Lord?”

“What those clowns are saying about me.”

“Well, My Lord,” said Latil, laughing, “it’s the custom of suffering soldiers to wish their commanders to the Devil – but the Devil has no hold on a Prince of the Church.”

“Perhaps, when I’m wearing my red robes – but not when I wear the uniform of His Majesty. Ride down the ranks, Latil and advice them to be more patient.”

Latil passed down the ranks, and then returned to his place by the cardinal. “Well?” asked the cardinal.

“Well, My Lord, they’ve decided on patience.”

“Because you told them I was unhappy with them?”

“Not exactly, My Lord.”

“What did you tell them then?”

“That Your Eminence was grateful for how they endured the hardships of the road, so much so that when they arrive at Rivoli, they’ll be issued a double ration of honey.”

The cardinal gnawed at his moustache for a moment. “You may have hit on the answer,” he said.

And indeed, the murmurs had subsided. Besides, the weather was clearing, and under a sunbeam in the distance, they could see the shining roofs of Rivoli Castle and the village that clustered around it. Marching without pause, they arrived at Rivoli in just three hours. “Would Your Eminence like me to direct the distribution of honey?” Latil asked.

“Since you promised these buffoons a double ration, we must give it to them – but it must be paid for in cash.”

“Indeed, they must have it, My Lord but ... cash?”

“Why, yes. Everything costs money.” The cardinal stopped, drew a tablet from his saddle, and wrote on the top sheet:

The Treasurer will pay Sir Latil the sum of one thousand livres, charged to my account.

Then he signed it. Latil took the note and went on ahead. When the army entered Rivoli three quarters of an hour later, the soldiers were struck dumb to see, in every tenth doorway, an open honey barrel surrounded by glasses. Their mute astonishment changed to loud satisfaction, the complaints about water were converted to cheers for the honey, and cries of “Long live the cardinal!” rang down the ranks. Amid this ovation, Latil rejoined the cardinal. “Well, My Lord?” he said.

“Well, Latil, I think you understand soldiers better than I do.”

“For the love of God! Each to his own! I know soldiers because I’ve lived among soldiers. Your Eminence understands churchmen, having lived among men of the Church.”

“Latil,” said the cardinal, placing his hand on the swashbuckler’s shoulder, “if there’s one thing I’m learning by living among soldiers, it’s that the more one lives among churchmen, the less one knows about anything.”

Having arrived at Rivoli Castle, the cardinal summoned his principal commanders. “Gentlemen,” he said, “I think this castle is large enough to provide quarters for all of you. Gentlemen Montmorency and Moret were guests here of the Duke of Savoy, and can show you around. In one hour, we’ll convene for a war council. Be prompt; we have important matters to discuss.”

The marshals and high officers, soaked to the bone and as eager to warm up as the soldiers, promised to be punctual and hurried away. One hour later, the seven high commanders were gathered before Cardinal Richelieu in the audience chamber that just the day before had belonged to the Duke of Savoy. These seven were the Duke of Montmorency, the Marshals Schomberg, Créqui, La Force, and Thoiras, Sir d’Auriac, and the Count of Moret. The cardinal stood, gestured for silence, rested both hands on the table, and said, “Gentlemen, we have an open gate into Piedmont. This gate, Susa Pass, was unlocked with the price of our blood. However, when dealing with a man as devious as Charles-Emmanuel, one gate isn’t enough – we need two. Here is my plan of campaign: before pushing further into Italy, I want to open another gate between Piedmont and Dauphiné so we can bring in further reinforcements, and in case we need a route for a withdrawal. For this purpose, I propose to seize Fort Pinerolo. “You know, gentlemen, how the feeble Henry III ran afoul of the Duke of Savoy in his youth. Charles, the Duke of Mantua, whose claim we cross the Alps to support – his father, the old Duke of Nevers, Governor of Pinerolo and general of the armies of France in Italy, used his powers of eloquence to persuade Henry III to agree to a terrible mistake. Nevers foresaw the day that his son might lay claim to the Duchy of Mantua, and would want to control the passes to France. So he persuaded Henry III to trade away the governorship of Pinerolo in hopes it would fall to Mantua – despite the fact that this was not in France’s best interest. So, Gentlemen, it falls to us to return Fort Pinerolo to the crown of France. Should we attempt this by force, or by deception? If we choose force, it will cost us both time and troops. So I prefer deception. Philip of Macedon said there’s no fort so impregnable it won’t open its gates to a mule loaded with gold. I have the mule, and I have the gold but I lack the man or the means to get it inside. Help me out: we need a way to turn a million in gold into the keys to this fortress.”

As usual, the question was opened up to the floor, everyone having the opportunity to answer in order of seniority. Each commander asked for twenty-four hours to think about it, until they reached the Count of Moret, who was youngest and therefore the last to speak. No one expected him to say anything, so he surprised everyone when he stood up, bowed to the cardinal, and said, “If Your Eminence will prepare the mule and million, I’ll undertake to get those keys. All I’ll need are three days.”

The Foster-Brother

The day after the council at Rivoli Castle, a young peasant named Gaetano, aged about twenty-four, dressed like a mountaineer from Aosta Valley and speaking with a Piedmontese accent, appeared at the gates of Fort Pinerolo at about eight in the evening. He said he was the brother of the Countess of Espalomba’s chambermaid, Signora Jacintha, and asked to see her. When informed of this by a soldier of the garrison, Signora Jacintha gave a little squeal of surprise that could easily have been mistaken for a cry of joy. Then, as if she had first to get her mistress’s permission in order to respond to a summons of family at the fortress gate, she ran into the countess’s bedroom. Five minutes later, she left by the door she’d gone in, while the countess darted out the opposite door and down the stairs to a charming little private garden that happened to be overlooked by the windows of Jacintha’s room. Once in the garden, the countess made her way to its most secluded corner, a bower shaded by lemon, orange, and pomegranate trees. Meanwhile, Jacintha ran down to the courtyard like a sister in a hurry to see her beloved brother, tenderly crying out “Gaetano! Dear Gaetano!”

The young man threw herself into her arms, just as Count Urbain of Espalomba returned from reviewing his sentries. He was in time to see the happy embrace of the young people, as they exclaimed that they hadn’t seen each other for nearly two years, ever since Jacintha had left her mother’s house to follow her mistress. Jacintha approached the count with a pretty curtsy and asked permission to host her brother. He had, it seemed, some urgent business in the area, though he hadn’t yet had time to explain it. The count asked to speak with Gaetano and, after a few words, satisfied with the lad’s demeanour, gave permission for him to stay in the fortress. Gaetano assured him that he wouldn’t be there long, forty-eight hours at the most. Then the count, deciding he’d spent enough time with these commoners, dismissed them and went inside to his chambers. Gaetano remarked that the count appeared to be in a sour mood, a fact that seemed to interest him more than one might expect from a farmer who had little to do with the affairs of the great nobles. Jacintha told him Urbain was angry with his sovereign, on two counts. First, for the arrogant way the Duke of Savoy had courted his wife in the very presence of her husband; and second, for the abrupt order to shut himself up in this citadel and defend it to the death against all comers. Count Urbain had said to his wife, in Jacintha’s presence that no noble of Spain, Austria, or France would stand for what he had to suffer in Piedmont – and neither should he. Gaetano seemed so pleased with this news that, when they turned a dark corner of the corridor, as if in a surge of affection for his sister, he took Jacintha in his arms and gave her a big kiss on each cheek. Jacintha’s chamber was off that very corridor; she opened her door, ushered her “brother” inside, and shut it behind him. Gaetano said happily, “Here I am at last! And now, dear Jacintha, where is your mistress?”

“What? I thought you’d come to see me!” the young woman laughed.

“For you ... and her,” said the Count of Moret, for it was indeed him. “But mostly for her. I’ve political matters to arrange with your mistress and as you’re the maid of a woman of affairs, you know business comes first.”

“And where would you like to arrange these important matters?”

“Here in your room, if it’s all right with you.”

“What! In front of me?”

“Well, no. We have full confidence in you, my dear Jacintha but some matters are too dangerous to share.”

“Then what am I to do?”

“You, Jacintha, will sit outside your mistress’s bed, where the curtains are drawn due to her sudden indisposition, keeping watch to make sure her husband doesn’t intrude and wake her.”

“Ah, Sir Count,” Jacintha said with a sigh, “I had no idea you were such a clever diplomat.”

“But I am, as you see. And for a diplomat, nothing is more precious than time, so tell me quickly – where is your mistress?”

Jacintha sighed even more deeply, opened the window, and said, “See for yourself.”

The count then remembered the private garden Matilda had told him about, where she so often dreamed of him. She had spoken of a bower of pomegranate, orange, and lemon trees, where it was shady even in daytime, and more so at night. Jacintha had scarcely opened the window before he’d leaped to the ledge and down into the garden. Then, as Jacintha wiped away a tear she’d been unable to keep back, she watched him disappear into the little wood whispering, loudly, “Matilda! Matilda!”

At the sound of her name, Matilda instantly recognised the voice that spoke it and darted toward it, crying “Antoine!”

As the lovers met, they threw themselves into each other’s arms, embracing against an orange tree that rained a flurry of blossoms on their heads. There they remained for a time, if not silent, at least not quite talking, just uttering the vague murmurs that, on the lips of lovers, say so much without saying a word. Finally both, as if awaking from a lovely land of dreams, said at the same time: “It’s you!” And in a single kiss, both answered, “Yes!”

Then, as reality returned, the countess cried, “My husband?”

“All taken care of as planned – he took me for Jacintha’s brother and has admitted me into the fortress.”

Then they sat down side by side and hand in hand. The time had come for explanations. Between lovers, explanations can take a long time. They started them in the garden but then took them into Jacintha’s room, while Jacintha, as arranged, spent the night in her mistress’s bedroom. Around eight the next morning, a gentle knock sounded on the door of Count Urbain’s bedchamber. He was already up and dressed, having been awakened at six o’clock by a message from Turin announcing that the French were at Rivoli and appeared to be in preparations to besiege Pinerolo. The count was anxious, and showed it in the abrupt way he barked “Enter!”

The door opened, and to his amazement it was the countess. “It’s you, Matilda!” he said, rising. “Have you heard the news? Is it to that that I owe the pleasure of this unexpected early visit?” “What news, Sir?”

“Only that we’re probably about to be besieged!”

“Yes, that’s what I wanted to talk to you about.”

“How and when did you learn this news?”

“Just last night, as I’ll explain. It kept me awake all night long.”

“As I can tell from your complexion, Madam – you look tired and pale.”

“I was waiting impatiently for morning so I could speak to you.”

“Couldn’t you have awakened me, Madam? The news was important enough.”

“But it stirred up such a tumult of doubts and worries, Sir that I wanted to talk with you about the situation before sharing what I’d heard.”

“I don’t understand, Madam, and I confess that I can’t think how a woman heard secret news about a matter of politics and war…”

“Oh, I know you think we’re not clever enough to think about such things.”

“And you think that’s wrong,” said the count, smiling.

“I do, because women are capable of good advice.”

“So, if I asked for your opinion on our situation, what advice would you give me?”

“First of all,” the countess said, “I’d remind you of how shabbily the Duke of Savoy has treated us.”

“No need of that, Madam – his disrespect was plain and clear, and I’ll never forget it.”

“I’d remind you of the festivities for the ambassadors at Turin, during which our sovereign made proposals to me that were an insult to both of us.”

“I remember them, Madam.”

“I would remind you of the brusque and uncivil way in which he ordered you to leave Rivoli and go to Pinerolo to be butchered by the French!”

“I haven’t forgotten it, and I’m waiting for the chance to prove it to him.”

“Well, that chance has come. You, Sir, are in one of those situations where a decisive man can be the arbiter of his own destiny and choose between two futures: servitude under a harsh and arrogant master, or freedom with dignity and an ample fortune.”

The count looked at his wife in astonishment. “I confess, Madam, I have no idea where you’re going with this.”

“I will speak clearly about the matter. Jacintha’s brother is in the service of the Count of Moret.”

Now the count was doubly astonished. “The natural son of King Henry IV?”

“Yes, Sir.”

“And so, Madam?”

“So, the day before yesterday, Cardinal Richelieu declared before the Count of Moret that he’d give a million in gold to anyone who would bring him the keys to Pinerolo!”

The count’s eyes narrowed with greed. “A million,” he said. “I’d like to see that.”

“You can see it whenever you like, Sir!”

The count rubbed his hands together. “A million,” he whispered. “You’re right, Madam, this is a matter worthy of discussion! But how do you know this money is really … available?”

“That’s easily explained. The Count of Moret took charge of the affair and sent Gaetano ahead with orders to test the waters.”

“And that’s why Gaetano arrived to see his sister last night?”

“Exactly. His sister brought the proposal to me, so if it miscarried I’d be the only one who was compromised.”

“How could it miscarry?” the count asked.

“It seemed possible … you might refuse it.”

The count was thoughtful for a moment. “What guarantees am I offered?”

“Cash.”

“But, then, what guarantees would they ask of me?”

“A hostage.”

“A hostage? Who?”

“Me. It makes sense that you’d send your wife away from a fortress on the verge of a siege where you’re planning to defend to the death. You can say you’re sending me to my mother at Selimo but actually let me know where to meet you later in France – since I assume you’ll negotiate for a safe haven there.”

“And how will the million be paid?”

“In gold.”

“When?”

“As soon as, in exchange for the money Gaetano brings you, you sign an order of capitulation and hand me over as the hostage.”

“Send him. When Gaetano returns tonight with the gold, be ready to go with him.” That night at eight o’clock, the Count of Moret, still under the name of Gaetano, entered the gates of Fort Pinerolo with a mule loaded with gold, as he’d promised Cardinal Richelieu. And he left with the countess as he’d promised himself. The capitulation came two days later, after the cardinal had placed the fortress under siege. The garrison was allowed to leave with their lives and all their baggage.

141 The Eagle & the Fox

Two days later, Cardinal Richelieu occupied Fort Pinerolo just as Charles-Emmanuel was leading troops from Turin to lift the siege. When the latter was only three leagues from Turin, his scouts informed him that a body of eight hundred men under the Savoy banner was coming to meet him. He sent one of his officers forward on reconnaissance, and he reported back that, to his astonishment, the troops were the garrison of Pinerolo returning to Turin. The fortress had surrendered. This news was a terrible blow to Charles-Emmanuel. He paused, turned pale, put a hand to his forehead, and then called the commander of his cavalry. “Charge that rabble,” he said, pointing to the poor devils who’d had no choice but to leave their garrison, since the governor had surrendered it. “And if possible, leave no one standing.”

The order was executed to the letter: three-quarters of the wretches were put to the sword. The fall of Pinerolo, the cause of which was still unknown to the Duke of Savoy, forced him to reconsider his position. It was disastrous. All the tricks and intrigue of a reign of nearly forty-five years – a reign composed entirely of tricks and intrigue – had come to this: the army of a terrible enemy was in the heart of his domain. His only recourse now was to throw himself into the arms of the Spaniards and Austrians, begging for aid from Spinola – a Genoese, and thus an enemy – or Wallenstein – a Bohemian, and thus a barbarian. One must bend before the iron hand of necessity. The duke sent to Spinola, the Spanish commander-in-chief, and to Collalto, the German commander in Italy, asking them for aid against the French. But Spinola, that canny warrior, was camped in Milan, from which he’d been keeping an eye on Charles-Emmanuel; he hadn’t the least bit of sympathy for that intriguing and ambitious princeling, who had so many times, through his deceptions and reversals, caused Spinola to draw his sword and then put it back in its sheath. As for Collalto, he had but a single goal in Italy: equip and enrich his army and himself, and as a climax to the campaign, like a true condottiere, to take and pillage Mantua. Men of this stamp were understandably little moved by the pleas of the Duke of Savoy. Spinola declared that he couldn’t divide his army, as he needed all his troops for his operations in Montferrat. Collalto was another matter. As we said, he could call on as many men as he needed from Germany. Wallenstein, at the head of the horde, led over a hundred thousand men – or rather was led by them – frightening Ferdinand with their power, sometimes even frightening himself, so he was willing to hire them out to whoever could afford them. So the negotiations between Collalto and Charles-Emmanuel were simply a matter of money; a few words and a large coffer of cash yielded the Duke of Savoy ten thousand men. It was only Charles-Emmanuel’s fervent hatred of France that allowed him to strike this terrible bargain, for he was bringing into Piedmont an enemy more terrible than the one he wanted to drive out. The French soldiers marched under rigorous discipline, plundering nothing but money; the Germans, on the contrary, stole everything they could carry. The Duke of Savoy soon realised that his best chance was to make one last attempt to come to terms with Richelieu. Thus, two days after taking Pinerolo, as the cardinal worked in the same chambers where Count Urbain had received his countess on the morning after Gaetano’s arrival, he was informed of the visit of a young officer in the service of Cardinal Antonio Barberini, the pope’s nephew and his envoy to Charles-Emmanuel. The cardinal immediately guessed what this was about. Latil had announced the officer, and as the cardinal had great confidence in both the courage and the insight of his lieutenant of the guards, he said “Come here.”

“At your command, Your Eminence,” Latil replied, touching his hat.

“Do you know this envoy from My Lord Barberini?”

“He’s new to me, Your Eminence.”

“And his name?”

“Also unknown to me.”

“To you but maybe not to me.”

Latil shook his head. “There aren’t many names I don’t recognise.”

“What’s he called?”

“Mazarino Mazarini, my Lord.”

“Mazarini! You’re right, I don’t recognise that name, Étienne. I don’t like to play if I can’t see my neighbour’s cards. Is he young?”

“Twenty-six; twenty-eight at the most.”

“Handsome or ugly?”

“Good-looking.”

“Useful to both a woman and a prelate! What part of Italy is he from?”

“By his accent, I’d say the nobility of Naples.”

“Sophisticated and subtle, then. Is he well groomed?”

“Like a coquette.”

“So, to summarise: twenty-eight years old, handsome, well turned out, sent by Cardinal Barberini, the nephew of Urban VIII – he’s either a useful idiot, or a capable agent, and we’ll soon know which. In either event, thanks to you, he won’t surprise me. Have him enter.”

Five minutes later, the door opened again and Latil announced, “Captain Mazarino Mazarini!”

The cardinal glanced at the young officer. He was just as Latil had described him. For his part, as he bowed respectfully to the cardinal, the young officer, whom we’ll call Mazarin – for that was his name after he became a French citizen in 1639, and thus he is known to the history of the realm – made as complete a survey of His Eminence as a man with a quick and incisive mind can do at a glance. We have once already, depicting Sully and Richelieu, showed the past meeting the present. Depicting Richelieu and Mazarin, we show the present meeting the future. But this time, instead of titling our chapter The Two Eagles, we must call it The Eagle and the Fox. The fox came in with his astute and sidelong glance. The eagle fixed him with his sharp and penetrating gaze. “My Lord,” said Mazarin, pretending to be flustered, “forgive my emotion in finding myself before the leading political genius of the century – I, a mere captain of the papal forces, and so young.”

“Indeed, Sir,” said the cardinal, “you’re only twenty-six?”

"Thirty, My Lord."

The cardinal laughed. "Sir," he said, "when I went to Rome to be consecrated as a bishop, Pope Paul V asked me my age, and like you, I exaggerated – I said I was twenty-five though I was only twenty-three. He made me a bishop, and after the ceremony I threw myself at his feet and asked for absolution. I confessed that I'd lied and added two years to my age, and he gave it to me. Would you like absolution?"

"I will ask for that, My Lord," replied Mazarin with a smile, "on the day I'm made a bishop."

"Is that your ambition?"

"I hope, Your Eminence, to someday be a cardinal."

"That won't be hard, with the resources you have."

"And what would My Lord say these resources are?"

"First, the mission you've been given that I'm told is on behalf of Cardinal Antonio Barberini."

"That rope is a thin one, since I'm merely a protégé of a nephew of His Holiness, and not of His Holiness himself."

"When I see a protégé of any of the nephews of His Holiness, I see the influence of His Holiness."

"However, you know what His Holiness thinks of his nephews."

"I recall that, in a moment of candour, he said that his first nephew, Francesco Barberini, when he left the Collegio Romano, was good only for saying paternosters; his brother Antonio, who sent you to me, was strong only in the stench of his trousers that is why he'd given him a cardinal's robe; that Cardinal Antonio, when young, was nicknamed Demosthenes because he stammered and got drunk three times a day; and last of all Taddeo, who was named Generalissimo of the Holy See, was better with a knitting needle than a sword."

"Ah, my Lord! I'll press that question no further. But having said what the uncle thinks of his nephews, I imagine you can tell me what the nephews think of their uncle."

"That the favours they receive from Urban VIII are legitimate rewards for the pains they took to get him elected. On the first round of voting, the future pontiff had no supporters. But the nephews bought off the Roman populace, paying them to shout beneath the windows of Castel Sant'Angelo, "Barberini as pope, or death and fire!" At the next round, he got five votes that was significant: only thirteen were needed. Two cardinals led the faction that was opposed to Barberini at all costs. Within three days, both cardinals passed away, one struck, they say, by apoplexy, while the other succumbed to an aneurysm. They were replaced by two Barberini supporters that gave him seven votes. Two other opposing cardinals died soon thereafter. Then came word of an outbreak of plague; everyone was eager to get out, so the conclave was rushed to its conclusion. In the end, Barberini had fifteen votes, two more than the thirteen he needed."

"That wasn't too high a price, considering the great reforms proclaimed as soon as His Holiness Urban VIII assumed the papal throne."

"Yes, indeed," said Richelieu. "He forbade the Recollects to wear sandals and pointed hoods in the manner of the Capuchin Order; he defended the renaming of the Carmelites as the Reformed Carmelites; he demanded that the Spanish Premonstratensians revert to their old, sombre habits and give up their proud new ones. He beatified two Theatine fanatics, André Avellino and Gaetano Tiane; a Barefoot Carmelite, Felix Cantalice; an Illuminatus, the Florentine Carmelite Corsini; two female ecstatic, Magdalena de Pazzi and Elizabeth, Queen of Portugal; and finally the blessed Saint Roch and his dog."

"Ah, well," said Mazarin. "It's clear Your Eminence is up to date on His Holiness, his nephews, and the Court of Rome."

"But you, who seem like a sensible man," said Richelieu, "why are you in the pay of such nonentities?"

"We start where we can with what we have, My Lord," said Mazarin with a sly smile.

"That's so," said Richelieu. "And now we've talked enough about them; what about us? What do you hope to get from me?"

"Something you'll never agree to."

"Why?"

"Because it's absurd."

"Why undertake such a mission?"

"Because it brings me before the man I admire most in the world."

"What is it, then?"

Mazarin shrugged. "I am to inform Your Eminence that due to the capture of Fort Pinerolo, the Duke of Savoy has become gentle as a lamb and supple as a serpent. Through this envoy, he begs Your Eminence, who is known for his generosity, if, for the sake of the king's sister the Princess of Piedmont, you would return Fort Pinerolo, as this would greatly advance the cause of peace."

"My dear Captain," replied Richelieu, "it's as well that you started out as you did, or I'd have wondered why you were fool enough to take such a mission, or if you simply thought that I was a fool. In any case: no! Giving up Fort Pinerolo was one of Henry III's greatest shames, and regaining it will be one of the glories of the reign of Louis XIII."

"Are those the terms in which you would have me state your reply?"

"No, not exactly."

"Then how, My Lord?"

"Like this: His Majesty has not yet learned of our conquest of Pinerolo; I can do nothing until he informs me whether he wishes to keep it, or prefers to give it up as a courtesy to his sister. I'm told the king has left Paris bound for Italy, so we must wait until he arrives in Lyon or Grenoble. At that time, we can enter into serious negotiations and perhaps render a more positive response."

"Rest assured, My Lord, I shall deliver your response verbatim. Just allow me, if you please, to give them some hope."

"What will they do with that?"

"Nothing – but it may be useful to me."

"Do you plan to stay in Italy?"

"No but I want to accomplish as much as I can before I leave."

"You don't think Italy has sufficient scope for your ambitions?"

"Italy is a shambles, and has been for centuries, My Lord. The last hundred years, as you know better than I, have been a disaster, the final collapse of all that remained from the feudal era. The two pillars of the Middle Ages, the Church and the Empire, are in disarray; once the pope and the emperor were the twin hands of God but since Rudolph of Hapsburg, the emperors have been a series of despots, and since the rise of Luther, the pope is no more than the leader of a sect."

Mazarin appeared hesitant to continue. "Go on," said Richelieu. "I'm listening."

"You, listening to me, My Lord! Until today I doubted myself but if you listen to me, I'll doubt myself no more. There are still Italians but Italy is no more. Spain holds four of its capitals, Naples, Milan, Florence, and Palermo. France wants Savoy and Mantua. Venice is in decline, and Genoa gets by from day to day. A frown from Philip IV or Ferdinand II can shake even the pope, successor though he is to Gregory VII. Every man of leadership calls for freedom but their voices lack strength; the nobles have crushed the people, and have themselves been reduced to mere courtiers. The nobility is powerless, seeing plots and invisible enemies on all sides, so they surround themselves with standing armies, with mercenaries and thugs, terrified of poison, cowering inside chain mail. Worse, they've handed over the Council of Trent to the Inquisition. The courage to fight in the open, to take the war to the battlefield, is gone, and with it the heart of the people. Maintaining order is everything, and order is the death of life."

"If you leave Italy, where will you go?"

"Wherever there are revolutions, My Lord: maybe England but probably France."

"If you come to France, will you seek me out?"

"I would be happy and proud to do that, My Lord."

"Sir Mazarini, I hope we shall meet again."

"That is my one desire, My Lord."

And the artful Neapolitan bowed to the ground and backed out of the chamber. "I had heard," the cardinal murmured, "that the rats were leaving the sinking ship; I didn't expect to meet one who might weather the storm." And he added softly: "This young captain will go a long way, especially if he trades his uniform for a cassock."

Then, rising, the cardinal stepped out into the antechamber, where he paced back and forth so thoughtfully that he almost overlooked the arrival of a courier, who gave him a letter from France. "Ah!" said the cardinal, seeing that the courier was covered in dust. "This letter must be urgent."

"Quite urgent, My Lord." Richelieu took the letter and opened it; the letter was brief but, as we shall see, was of some importance:

Fontainebleau, 17 March 1630

The king has left for Lyon but got no farther than Troyes before he returned to Fontainebleau. Beware: he's in love!

P.S.: If the courier has arrived before the 25th, give him fifty pistoles!

The cardinal read the letter over several times. He recognised the handwriting as that of Saint-Simon who wasn't in the habit of conveying false information. But this news seemed so unlikely, he was doubtful. "No matter," he said to Latil. "Get me the Count of Moret; this is rather in his line."

"Has My Lord forgotten," Latil laughed, "that the Sir Moret is escorting his beautiful hostage to Briançon?"

"Seek him out wherever he is and tell him to come without delay. I'm sending him to Fontainebleau with the news that we've taken Pinerolo!" Latil bowed and went out.

142
Aurora

As we said in our previous chapters, King Louis XIII, harassed by his mother; fearful of his brother after granting him too much power; aware that Queen Anne, despite her disavowals, continued to meet and conspire with the Spanish ambassador – the king, separated from the cardinal, his political touchstone, had fallen into a melancholy that nothing could allay. What was especially irksome was the understanding, affirmed by the moral sense God gave him, that Richelieu was more essential to the survival of the State than he himself was. And yet everyone around him, with the exception of l'Angely, his fool, and Saint-Simon, whom he'd made grand equerry, either openly opposed this essential man, or conspired secretly against him. In every society throughout history, there has always been a conservative or conventional party that opposes all new ideas as violations of tradition. This party prefers the known routine to an unknown future: that is to say, progress. The adherents of the status quo, favouring stagnation over movement, death versus life, saw in Richelieu a revolutionary whose efforts to reform society would just cause unrest. And Richelieu was not just the enemy of the conservatives but of the entire Catholic world. Without him, Europe would have been at peace: Savoy, Spain, Austria, and Rome, all seated at the same table, would take turns plucking the leaves of the artichoke of Italy. Austria would have Mantua and Venice, Savoy would get Montferrat and Genoa, Spain would have Milan, Naples, and Sicily, and Rome would rule Tuscany and the minor duchies – while France, uninvited to the feast, could keep to herself on the other side of the Alps. Who opposed this peace?

Richelieu alone. That's what the pope implied; that's what Philip IV and the Emperor proclaimed; that's what the choir of Queens Marie de Médicis, Anne of Austria, and Henriette of England all sang. Beside these great voices who cried "Anathema!" against the minister were ranged lesser voices such as that of the Duke de Guise who'd hoped to lead the armies and had withdrawn, disgruntled to his governance of Provence; that of Créquy, the Governor of Dauphiné who thought he had the right to inherit the Sword of the Constable from his stepfather.

Lesdiguières and Montmorency who at different times had been promised that sword, the latter now afraid it had slipped from his hands since he'd refused to abduct the Duke of Savoy for the cardinal; and all the Great Nobles, such as Soissons, Condé, Conti, and Elbeuf, who hated the cardinal's systematic dismantling of the rights and privileges of the dukes and princes. Despite all these voices, or rather because of them, Louis was determined to leave Paris and keep the promise he'd made to his minister to join him in Italy. It goes without saying that this resolution that would place the king under the influence of the cardinal, had been opposed with great outcry by the two queens, who declared that if the king went to Italy, they had no choice but to follow. For this they had the usual excuse, their fear for the king's health. Despite these objections, the king had sent the cardinal notice of his intent to depart, and in fact had left for Lyon on 21 February. His route would take him through Champagne and Burgundy; the two queens and the King's Council were to join him in Lyon. But events didn't unfold quite so smoothly. The day after the king had left Paris, his brother Gaston, who until then hadn't dared to stray from his city of Orléans, left his post and marched with a great to-do to the capital, entering the city at about nine in the evening. He went straight to the palace of the queen mother, where she was holding court. Marie de Médicis rose, astonished, and, feigning anger, dismissed her ladies and shut herself up in her study with Gaston. Queen Anne joined them a few moments later, entering by a secret door. There they renewed the pact, continually proposed by Queen Marie, that Sir would marry Queen Anne in the event of the king's death. This marriage would have been for Marie de Médicis a sort of prolonged regency, and she would gladly forgive God for carrying off her eldest son if that was her compensation. Blinded by her interests, Queen Marie was the only one who'd entered the pact honestly, as she couldn't see beyond her immediate desires. The Duke of Orléans had conflicting commitments to the Duke of Lorraine, whose sister he was in love with. He was in no hurry to marry his brother's widow, who was seven years his senior and who'd had, moreover, that deplorable affair with Buckingham. Queen Anne, for her part, hated Sir, despised him even more than she hated him, and didn't trust a word he said. Nevertheless, everyone repeated their promises. No one outside really knew what happened in that chamber, and gossips, unaware of the presence of Queen Anne, spread the rumour the next day that the Duke of Orléans had come to Paris to tell his mother of his undying love for Princess Marie de Gonzague, and to take advantage of his brother's absence to marry her. This report seemed confirmed when, immediately after the duke's arrival, Marie de Médicis sent for the young princess and had she detained at the Louvre, where she was kept, to all intents, a prisoner. For his part, Gaston loudly declared that such was his dearest desire. All the malcontents began to gather around him, insinuating that if, in the king's absence, he would openly declare against Richelieu, he would find himself at the head of a large and powerful party, one that would support him not only against the cardinal but against Louis XIII, whose fall might well follow that of his minister. Many chose to believe that Gaston had accepted these proposals. The Cardinal de La Valette, son of the Duke of Épermon, and the Cardinal of Lyon, that brother of the Duke Richelieu who led so bravely during the plague, arrived together to call upon the Duke of Orléans; the latter paid a thousand compliments to Cardinal de La Valette but the Cardinal of Lyon was left waiting in the hall without a word. The day after Gaston's arrival in Paris, the queen mother wrote to Louis XIII to inform him of his brother's unexpected return – though it had probably been expected by her. Of course, nothing was said of the meeting and pact between her son and her stepdaughter but she went on at length about Gaston's love for Marie de Gonzague. Louis, who was already in Troyes when he received the letter from Marie de Médicis, announced that he would return to Paris; but at Fontainebleau he was met by a letter informing him that Gaston, hearing news of his return, had withdrawn to his estate at Limours. Three days later came the news that the king, instead of continuing his journey south, would spend Easter at Fontainebleau. What was behind the king's latest decision?

We shall tell you.

The night of the meeting in Luxembourg Palace between the queen mother, Gaston d'Orléans, and Queen Anne, Madam de Fargis returned home from Spain, where she'd gone to support her husband's political efforts that had appeared shaky. With the war between France and Piedmont seemingly over, her support was no longer needed in Madrid, and Madam de Fargis, to the great satisfaction of Anne of Austria, had been recalled to Paris. When the queen saw her, she uttered a cry of joy, and as the lady ambassador knelt to kiss her hand, Anne lifted her up and embraced her.

"I see," Madam de Fargis said with a smile, "that my long absence hasn't cost me Your Majesty's good graces."

"On the contrary, dear heart," said the queen, "your absence just made me appreciate your loyalty all the more – and I've never had as much need for it as tonight."

"My arrival is timely, then, and I hope to prove to my sovereign that, far or near, I'll take care of her. But what's happened to make the presence of your humble servant so necessary?"

The queen told her of the king's departure, of Gaston's arrival, and of the pact they'd just renewed. "So Your Majesty trusts her brother-in-law?" asked Madam de Fargis.

"Not for an instant; this pact is meant to quell my suspicions and keep me waiting off to the side."

"Has the king grown worse?"

"Morally, yes – but physically, no!"

"To the king, morality is all, as you know, Madam."

"What shall I do?" asked the queen. Then, in a lower voice: "You know, my dear, the astrologers' claim that the king can't last beyond the next rise of Cancer."

"My lady," said Madam de Fargis, "you recall that I proposed a certain plan to Your Majesty."

The queen blushed. "But you know I could never go through with it," she said.

"That's a shame, because it's the surest method, and I even got the approval of the King of Spain, Philip IV."

"Dear God!"

"Or would you rather trust the word of a man who has never once kept his word?"

The queen was silent for a moment. "But, my dear Fargis," she said, resting her head on her confidante's chest, "even supposing I had the permission of my confessor – oh, just thinking about it makes me ashamed! – surely the plan you proposed should be the last resort, after we've tried everything else?"

"Will you allow me, dear mistress," said Madam de Fargis, taking advantage of the queen's position to drape an arm around her neck and gaze into her face, her eyes sparkling like diamonds, "to relate to you a story of the court of King Henry II that says something about Queen Catherine de Médicis?"

"Speak, dear heart," said the queen, relaxing with a sigh upon the siren to whose voice she so unwisely listened.

"Well! Now the story goes that Queen Catherine de Médicis arrived in France at the age of fourteen, where she was married to the young King Henry II, and went, like Your Majesty, eleven years without children."

"I've been married for fourteen years!" said the queen.

"Well," Madam de Fargis smiled, "Your Majesty's marriage may have taken place in 1616 but it wasn't consummated until 1619."

"That's so," said the queen. "But what explains Queen Catherine's sterility? King Henry II didn't have the same ... aversions as King Louis XIII, as proven by his mistress, Diane de Poitiers."

"He had no aversion to women, true – only to his wife."

"Do you think, Fargis, that the king's aversion to me is ... personal?" the queen gasped.

"What, for Your Majesty? By the belly of the Grey Saint, as the king his father used to say! And as the sweet Count of Moret still does, to whom Your Majesty should pay more attention. Anyway, don't even think it!"

Then, casting an eye like Sappho on her queen, anxious and piqued by doubt, she said, "And where would he find such eyes as yours, such a mouth, such lovely hair?" She ran her hand along the queen's arched neck. "Where would he find ... such skin? No, Madam – no, my Queen, you are the loveliest of all, the beauty of beauties. But unfortunately for Queen Catherine, she had none of this.

On the contrary, born of a diseased father and mother, she had the cold, slimy skin of a snake."

"Is this true, dear heart?"

"It's true. So when the young king, used to the pale and silky skin of Madam de Brézé, felt at his side a living corpse, he cried that he hadn't been sent a flower from the Pitti Gardens but a worm from the Médicis tombs."

"Hush, Fargis! You give me a chill."

"So, my beautiful Queen, this revulsion King Henry II had for his wife, who was it helped him to overcome it? One who always had his interest at heart: that same Diane de Poitiers, she who, if the king died childless, would have fallen under the power of another Duke of Orléans, one not much better than yours."

"Where are you taking this?"

"To here: if the king fell in love with a woman who he knew was devoted to you, a woman with the same religious convictions as the king, why, he'd return from seeing her to Your Majesty and then..."

"Well?"

"Well, a child would make the Duke of Orléans beholden to us, rather than us to him."

"Ah but my dear Fargis," said the queen, shaking her head, "King Henry II was a man."

"As King Louis XIII may yet be..."

The queen replied with a sigh, "But where would you find a woman both pure and devoted?"

"I already have," Fargis said.

"One more beautiful than...?" The queen stopped, biting her lip. She'd almost said, "One more beautiful than me?"

Fargis understood. "More beautiful than you, my Queen? Impossible! But one with beauty of another kind. You are the rose at the peak of its bloom, Madam; she, she is a bud but with such a glow that her family and friends all call her the Aurora."

"And this marvel," said the queen, "is she at least of noble blood?"

"Of the highest class, Madam: she's the granddaughter of Madam la Flotte, the queen mother's chief maid of honour, and the daughter of Sir de Hautefort."

"And you say this young lady is devoted to me?"

"She would give her life for Your Majesty," and she added, smiling, "maybe more."

"Is she aware of the role we want her to play?"

"Yes."

"And she accepts with resignation?"

"With enthusiasm, Madam – in the interest of the Church! We have her confessor on our side, who compares her to Judith of Bethulia, and the king's doctor..."

"What does Bouvard have to do with it?"

"He will persuade the king your husband that he's sick due to chastity!"

"For a man who purges and bleeds him two hundred times a year, that'll be difficult!"

"He'll manage it."

"So it's all arranged?"

"It lacks nothing but your consent."

"But I'd at least like to see and speak to this amazing Aurora!"

"Nothing simpler, Madam – she's here!"

"And she – she'll do it?"

"Yes, Madam."

The queen gave Fargis a look with just a touch of suspicion. "You arranged all this since your arrival tonight?" she said. "Truly, you don't waste any time, dear heart."

"I arrived three days ago, Madam but I waited to see Your Majesty until everything was ready."

"And now everything is prepared?"

"Yes, Madam. But if Your Majesty prefers to adopt the first means I proposed, we can abandon this one."

"Not at all, not at all," the queen quickly said. "Perhaps you should bring in your young friend."

"Command your faithful servant, Madam."

"Bring her in!"

Madam de Fargis went to a side door and opened it. "Come in, Marie de Hautefort," she said. "Our beloved queen consents to receive your homage."

The young woman gave a cry of joy and rushed into the room. The queen, seeing her, gasped in admiration and astonishment. "Do you think her beautiful enough, Madam?" asked Lady Fargis.

"Maybe too beautiful," replied the queen.

143
The Letter & the Lure

And indeed, Miss Marie de Hautefort was wonderfully beautiful. She was a blonde of the South, with rose-petal skin and shining hair, and, as Madam de Fargis had said, she was called, "Aurora." It was Vautier who had discovered her on a trip to Périgord, and then come up with the scheme, remembering a look he'd seen the king give Miss de Lautrec one day. He had the idea that this invalid king, bled white as a ghost, might be susceptible to the infection of love. He'd arranged everything in advance, making sure no parent, lover, or friend would object to the young woman's commitment to the cause but delayed, on the advice of Queen Marie, until the return of Madam de Fargis, who would coat the rim of the glass with honey before presenting the absinthe to the queen. We've already seen how eager the queen was to swallow it. But when she saw the beautiful girl at her feet, arms outstretched and crying "I would give my all, everything for you, my Queen!" – She saw this delicate bud, heard that sweet voice that couldn't lie, and gently raised her up. That very evening, all was decided. Miss de Hautefort would do everything she could to make the king love her, and, once she was loved, use all her influence to urge him to reconcile with the queen and to dismiss Cardinal Richelieu. They just had to set the stage for the enchanting scene that would captivate

Louis XIII. The queens announced that, as the king was at Fontainebleau, they would join him there for Easter. And in fact, they arrived on the eve of Palm Sunday. The next day, the king attended services in the château chapel, and everyone was summoned to hear mass with His Majesty. Just a few paces from the king, lit by a ray of sunlight through a stained-glass window that bathed her in a halo of gold and purple, was a young woman kneeling on the bare floor. He, the king, had his knees softly cradled on a gold-tasseled cushion. His chivalric instincts were awakened; he was ashamed to have a cushion under his knees when this beautiful girl had none. He had a page take it to her. Miss de Hautefort blushed, considering herself unworthy to place her knees on a cushion where the king had knelt. She stood up, bowed to His Majesty, and respectfully placed the cushion on a chair, all with the innocent and virginal air of one of the noblest daughters of the South. The king was moved by her grace. He'd been moved thus once before in his life, taken by surprise even more suddenly that helps to explain the impression Miss de Hautefort made on this enigmatic man. On a journey to the provinces, he had, in a small town, attended a ball. Toward the end of the performance, one of the dancers, a certain Gau the Courtesan, had stepped gracefully onto a chair and raised a wooden candlestick holding a simple tallow candle. The king, when chaffed about his distaste for women, always recounted this story, saying this young woman had performed this act with such delicacy that he fell in love with her on the spot and, upon leaving the city, had sent her thirty thousand livres for her virtue. Only he didn't say whether he sent her the thirty thousand livres because he wanted to defend her virtue, or possess it for himself. The king was taken no less suddenly by the lovely Marie de Hautefort than he'd been by the virtuous Gau the Courtesan. Upon returning to the château, he inquired as to who was the ravishing person he'd seen in the chapel, and learned she was the granddaughter of Madam de la Flotte, arrived that day in the household of Queen Marie de Médicis to be one of her maidens. And that very day, to the astonishment of everyone, and to the great satisfaction of those involved in the matter, he made a complete change in the royal routine. Instead of staying locked in his darkest room, as he'd done for a month in the Louvre, and for the last week at Fontainebleau, he went out and about, in his carriage or walking in the park, as if seeking someone. And in the evening he came to visit the queens – as he hadn't done since the departure of Miss de Lautrec – to spend the evening chatting with the lovely Marie, and to inquire where she'd be the following day. The next morning, he sent a letter by courier to Bois-Robert, summoning him to Fontainebleau with all haste. Bois-Robert was amazed by this mark of favour that was the sort of thing he expected from Richelieu but not from the king. His surprise was even greater when Louis led him to a window embrasure, pointed out Miss de Hautefort, who was walking on the terrace, and told him he wanted a verse written about that particular lovely lady. Astonished though he was, Bois-Robert didn't have to be asked twice. He praised Miss de Hautefort's beauty and, learning that she was called Aurora, said he could have sought high and low and found no better name for her dawn-like loveliness. It gave him, moreover, a subject for his verse. In his poem, Louis XIII, under his sometime title of Apollo – Apollo was the god of the lyre, and Louis XIII, as we know, liked to compose music – begged Dawn not to rise so early and vanish so quickly. Desiring her since the beginning of the world, he pursued her daily in his horse-drawn celestial chariot without ever quite reaching her, always seeing her disappear just as he reached out his hand to touch her. The king read this verse and approved it, except for one point. "This is fine, Le Bois," he said, "But remove the word desiring."

"Why is that, Majesty?" asked Bois-Robert.

"Because I don't ... desire."

There was no answer to that. Desiring was edited out. As for the king, he set music to Bois-Robert's words, and words and music were sung by his official musicians, Molinier and Justin who given the importance of the matter, wore their most splendid attire. The two queens, and especially Anne of Austria, applauded the poetry of Bois-Robert and the melody of the king. Louis XIII performed his Easter rites. His confessor Suffern who was in on the scheme, soothed His Majesty's conscience, citing the example of the Patriarchs, who were unfaithful to their wives without inviting the wrath of the Lord – but the king assured him that there was no such danger, as his love for Miss de Hautefort was pure and without sin. Not so Madam de Fargis and company, who definitely had sin in mind. For a mind like La Fargis's, sin was always the object. Once Easter was past, the cabal watched Louis XIII with some anxiety but he made no move to continue his journey south; instead, he ordered hunts and banquets – but at both banquets and hunts, though he devoted himself exclusively to Miss de Hautefort, his conduct toward her was still perfectly respectful. There was one gambit yet to try: to make the king jealous. There existed a certain Sir d'Ecquevilly Vassé, of the family of President Henequen. Though never finalized, there had been some talk of marriage between him and Miss de Hautefort. He arrived at Fontainebleau, having been invited by Madam de Fargis with an eye toward making him an object of jealousy. And indeed, Sir d'Ecquevilly seemed inclined to revive his old courtship, despite the unusual attentions the king was paying his intended. Louis XIII took pause and asked Miss de Hautefort about the matter, who confirmed that the families had discussed a marriage. And so finally Louis XIII became jealous – and jealous of a woman!

The two queens met with Madam de Fargis to figure out how to exploit this jealousy. And Madam de Fargis came up with a scheme. That evening, Gretchen the dwarf, who could approach without question, would speak to Miss de Hautefort and awkwardly slip her a perfumed letter, in such a way that the king couldn't help but notice. The king would want to know who'd sent such a letter. The rest was up to the queen and Miss de Hautefort. That evening, the usual circle gathered around Her Majesty Queen Anne. The king was sitting near Miss de Hautefort, cutting out paper dolls. Miss de Hautefort was carefully dressed, at the personal instruction of the queen. She wore a low-cut dress of white satin, and her dazzling arms and shoulders, whiter even than her dress, drew the lips like a magnet draws iron. The king, from time to time, passed his eyes over these arms and shoulders but no more than that. Fargis stared openly. "Ah, Sire," she whispered to the king, "if I were a man..." Louis XIII frowned. Anne of Austria adjusting the hem of her dress also seemed to be looking at this beautiful image in rose-coloured marble. At that moment, little Gretchen crawled out on all fours from between the king's legs. The king thought it was Grisette, his favourite dog and moved his feet to let her through. The dwarf shrieked as though the king had stepped on her hand. His Majesty stood. Gretchen took advantage of the movement to slip the letter as clumsily as instructed into Miss de Hautefort's hand. The king couldn't fail to see it. Taking part in this farce made the young woman blush that served the conspirators' purposes perfectly. The king saw the letter pass from the dwarf's hand to Marie's, and from Marie's hand into a pocket. "The dwarf gave you a letter?" he asked.

"Do you think so, Sire?"

"I know so."

There was a brief silence. "Who is it from?" asked the king.

"I don't know," said Miss de Hautefort.

"Then read it and you'll know."

"Later, Sire!"

"Why later?"

"There's no hurry."

"With me, there is."

"But it seems to me, Sire," said Miss de Hautefort, "I'm free to receive letters from whomever I like."

"Not so!"

"Why not?"

"Not when..."

"Not what?"

"Not when ... not when ... I love you!"

"What, you, love me?" said Miss de Hautefort, laughing.

"Yes!"

"But what will Her Majesty the queen say?"

"Her Majesty the queen says I can't love anyone; this will prove I can."

"Bravo, Sire!" said the queen. "In your place, I'd want to know who's written to this young lady, and what it says."

"But I'm desperate! The king mustn't know," said Miss de Hautefort.

She rose. "We'll see about that," said the king. And he rose as well.

Miss de Hautefort backed quickly away. The king made a move to grab her. The door to the queen's boudoir was behind her, and she ran for it. Louis XIII chased her through it, the queen right behind, calling "Watch your pockets, Hautefort!"

The king cornered her and raised his hands, clearly intending to search the girl. But she, knowing the king's prudery, pulled the letter from her pocket and thrust it into her bosom. "Take it from there, Sire," she said.

And with the shamelessness of innocence, she presented her chest to the king. The king hesitated, and dropped his arms. "Take it, Sire, take it!" cried the queen, laughing aloud, to the great embarrassment of her husband. To remove the young woman's last defence, she grabbed Miss de Hautefort's hands and pinned them behind her back. "Now, Sire – take it!"

Louis looked around, caught like a sugar cube in silver tongs ... and then chastely, without touching her skin, drew the letter from its warm sanctuary. The queen, who hadn't really expected this, released Miss de Hautefort's hands and murmured to herself, "I may have no choice but to adopt Fargis's proposal."

The letter was from Miss de Hautefort's mother. The king read it and, ashamed, returned it. Then all three went back into the salon, each with different emotions. Madam de Fargis was chatting with an officer who'd just arrived from the army, bringing, he said, important news for the king. "The Count of Moret!" murmured the queen, recognising the young man she'd seen only two or three times before, though it was always Madam de Fargis who'd spoken to him. In truth, he was quite handsome. Then she said, even lower: "He does look a bit like the Duke of Buckingham." Was she just noticing it now or did she suddenly wish for a reason to find a resemblance between Richelieu's messenger and the former ambassador of the King of England?

(Unfinished & Abandoned)

BOOK III
THE DOVE
1637
144

5 May

Beautiful dove with your silver plumage, your black collar and pink feet, since your prison seems so cruel that you threaten to batter yourself to death on its bars, I give you your freedom. But, as you doubtless want to leave me to rejoin a person you love more, I must justify your week's absence. I need payment for the service I render you in setting you free from eternal captivity – for the heart is selfish, and does nothing without asking payment in return, often at double value. Go then, gentle messenger, go and, by your return, tender these regrets to the person who calls you despite the distance. This note that I attach to your leg, is the proof of your loyalty. So goodbye – the window opens, and heaven awaits ... farewell!

145

6 May

Thank you, whoever you are, for returning my sole companion. But that blessed act must be its own reward. If only the charming messenger who brought me your letter could have known how to thank you, or tell me where you live, for I'd hate you to think me cold and uncaring. But the same restlessness that took her to your home brought her back to mine. Yesterday Iris was full of the joy of her return to me. However, this morning – how changeable we are! – this morning, I wasn't enough for her. She beat with her wings and her beak, not at the bars of her cage, for she never had a cage but at the panes of my window. She is no longer mine alone – she belongs to both of us. Now, my opinion may not be shared by many but I think that by sharing we double what we have. From now on, our Iris is not single but double – and notice how prescient I was in naming her Iris, as if I knew she would become our messenger! Your Iris will bring you my letters, and my Iris will bring me yours – because I hope you will kindly reply to tell me how she came into your hands. It may surprise you that I'm so quick to be familiar with a stranger, an unknown – but I know you must be a good man or woman, since your returned me my dove. Furthermore, the tone of your letter bespeaks a person of distinction and heart; all such noble spirits are sisters, all such refined minds are brothers. So treat me as a brother – or a sister, if you will – because I need to find the brother or sister I never had. Iris, my dear friend, go back to where you came from, to that person I refer to as him or her – and add that I'd rather be thought of as her than as him. Go, Iris – and remember that I'm waiting for you.

146
As the Angelus tolls

My sister,

God in that shimmering radiance. Tell me all this, then tell me more: what you see from your window, plains or mountains, peaks or valleys, streams or rivers, lake or ocean. Tell me all, and it will distract my thoughts from the troubles that plague my mind – and then perhaps my heart, distracted by my thoughts, will manage to forget, if only for a moment ... no, no, no, tell me nothing. I will never forget!

150

13 May

The one you loved is dead: that’s why you still have tears. The one I love betrayed me. That’s why I have none! Tell me about your love all you want but don’t ask me to speak of mine. For four years I’ve lived in a monastery – and yet I’m not a monk! Why, you may ask, is that? I’ll tell you. When my love that was my last link to life, failed me, I fell into such despair that I gave myself to God – not from virtue but from pain. I’ve waited for this despair to subside so the Lord wouldn’t have to receive me as the abyss receives the blind but as a generous host receives a weary pilgrim who, after toilsome travels, seeks a night’s rest at the end of a long day. I wanted to bring him a strong spirit, not a broken heart, a whole body and not a cadaver. But now, four years after seeking such solitude, though daily purifying myself with prayer, I’ve not yet dared to trade the habit of a novice for the robes of a monk. My former self still lives in me, and it would be sacrilege to offer so worldly a creature to our heavenly Creator. Now you know as much of my past and private life as I can tell you. As to my present life and situation, here is what I can say: I live, not really in a monastery but rather in a hermitage built halfway up a hill, in a room with whitewashed walls, lacking all ornament but the portrait of a king for whom I have a special reverence, and an ivory crucifix, a masterpiece of the sixteenth century that was given to me by my mother. My window is surrounded by a luxuriant jasmine whose branches are laden with flowers; they scent my room as they open with the rising sun, on the horizon which is probably toward where you are: for from there I see our dove approaching from afar, and when she leaves I see her start in the same direction and fly for a mile or so until, dwindling, she merges into the azure sky or grey clouds. Given the lay of the land, dawn has a particular charm for me. It’s a view I adore and will try to describe. My horizon is bounded to the south by the high Pyrenees, with their purple slopes and snowy peaks; to the east by a hilly ridge that rises toward the main range; while to the north there stretches as far as the eye can see a country of plains, dotted with olive orchards, lined with small streams among which, like a sovereign receiving the tribute of its subjects, one of the greatest rivers of France majestically winds. The plateau beneath me slopes down from south to north, from the mountains to the plains. It has three very different aspects: in the morning, noon, and evening. In the morning, the sun rises behind the ridge of hills to the east. Ten minutes before it appears, I see a ray of rosy light stream slowly up until it fans across the sky, darkening the hills to black silhouettes. Through this fan spike the spearheads of early sunlight, all the colours from brightest pink to fiery yellow. As the sun rises behind the hills, it begins to gild their contours with its rays, the highest hill all aglow until, like a moving fire, ever expanding, the day star itself appears, splendid, gleaming, streaming flames, as if from the crater of some inextinguishable divine volcano. As it rises into the heavens, the life of the earth below is reborn; the tops of the Pyrenees shimmer white and silver; their dark sides slowly lighten from black to purple, and from purple to light blue. As light floods down from over the ridge, day spreads across the plain. The streams glisten like silver strands, the river twists and undulates like a shining ribbon; the birds sing in the oleander bushes, among the pomegranates, in the clumps of myrtle, and an eagle, the king of the sky, soars through the ether, banking around a circuit of a league or more, disappearing and reappearing. At noon, the entire basin I just described becomes a fiery furnace. Lit from top to bottom, the mountains cannot conceal their naked flanks, stony limbs that extend into the granite bones of the earth. Broken sunlight rebounds from shiny rock surfaces, streams and rivers seem torrents of molten metal, the flowers fade, the leaves bow down, the birds grow silent; invisible cicadas sing from the branches of creaking pine trees, and the only living movement that animates this baking desert is a green lizard that sometimes climbs my window trellis, or a mottled snake that, coiled in a spiral, pants with its mouth half open, ignoring the midges that pass within range of its fangs. In the evening, life is reborn for a while, like the last flare of a lamp before it goes out. One after another, the cicadas fall silent, their buzzing succeeded by the plaintive but monotonous cries of the crickets. The lizards flee, the snakes disappear, and the bushes are agitated by the anxious fluttering of birds seeking lodging for the night. The sun goes down toward the horizon behind me, and as it descends, I see the Pyrenean snows change from soft pink to purple, while the shadows elongate across the plains, filling the spaces between them until, according to natural law, the whole world belongs to darkness. Then all noise ceases, the earthly glow is extinguished, the stars emerge silently from the sky – and in the middle of the night’s silence, a single melody unfolds into space: the song of the nightingale, star-lover, and dark-singer. You asked me what I could see from my window, and I’ve told you. Fix this triple vision in your mind, and allow your mind to distract your heart, for your salvation in this world is in nothing but this word: Forget!

151

Forget! You tell me to forget! Listen to what is happening to me. You must understand: when darkness comes, it brings with it something frightening, something incredible and unnatural. When I sleep, death is no longer death, and the dead return to life! He is next to me, with his long dark hair, his pale face, his manly features imbued with all the nobility of his heritage. He is there – I speak to him – I extend my hand, I cry out “Are you still alive? And do you still love me?” And he replies that yes, he still lives, and yes, he still loves me. This same vision, undeniable, unrelenting, almost palpable, is repeated every night, only to disappear with the first light of dawn. My God, what must I do to get this nightmare, this vision from the angel of darkness, to stop tormenting me? I’ve prayed at the sacred altar, wrapped holy rosaries around my neck and wrists, laid a crucifix on my chest and fallen asleep with my hands crossed on the feet of the divine martyr – but all was vain, futile, useless; the day brings me back to God but the darkness returns me to him. I’m like the queen described by the poet Homer whose work every day was undone every night. If there were no night, there would be no sleep and if no sleep, then no dreams – and then maybe I could forget. Can you get God to grant me that?

152

14 May

All that can be obtained from God through prayer, I’ll obtain for you; for you are sorely wounded, and the wound is grievous and deep. Let us pray.

153

15 May

I don’t know but somehow, through writing to you, I gain some peace and a certain relief. This is indeed a new turn to my life; I was alone in the world, without family, isolated from all, half in the grave, weeping and desperate – and now suddenly I’ve found a brother. Because it seems to me you’re like a brother ... a brother I never knew, one who left France before I was born but whom I’ve been waiting and searching for. And now, you come at last: revealed, though not present, revealed by voice alone. I cannot see you but I hear you. I cannot touch but I listen. You have no idea how the landscape so brilliantly conjured by your pen occupies my thoughts. Let no one deny to me the reality of shared vision, for shared vision exists. By the constant force of my will, your landscape is now reflected in my mind as in a mirror. I see everything, from the rosy morning rays rising behind the hills to the creeping grey shadows of evening; I hear everything, from the sound of the flower as it opens its petals to the morning dew, to the song of the nightingale trilling out into the solitude and silence of the night. And I see it all so clearly that, if I ever found myself within the circle of your vision, I could say, “There are the flaming hills, there the snow-capped mountains, there the silver streams, there the gleaming river, here the pomegranates, here the oleander, here the myrtle – all here!” So clearly do I see your hermitage rising above the walls of the garden, with its window veiled by jasmine and vines. Then I see you in your whitewashed cell, kneeling in front of our brother Christ, praying for yourself and, especially, for me. Tell me who is the king whose portrait hangs in your cell, this king for whom you have a special reverence, so I, too, can envision this king’s portrait, and my reverence can echo yours. But you, as well, I would like to see you ... oh, only in my thoughts, rest assured of that! You said that the you of the past no longer existed, and I should ask only about the person of the present and the future. Let the past fade, then – tell me how old you are now, and those traits that will help me imagine you clearly. Tell me how and when you came to this hermitage, and what accounts for your bidding farewell to the world. I would also like to know how far you are from me. Is it possible to calculate that distance? You seem so good, I have no fear of tiring you; you seem so learned, I’m not afraid to ask the impossible. I shall think about how you might answer; and when you do, I shall think about how you replied. Go, dear dove – fly, and come back soon!

154

3<sup>PM</sup>

There, you see: by occupying your mind, I was able, for a moment, to distract your heart. The soul is not like the body; if one who is soul-sick can forget why he suffers, he suffers no more. You want me to tell you about me, to see if you can find something to like in this man, physical or moral, alive or dead? Well, listen. I was born at Fontainebleau on 1 May 1607, so my age is thirty years and fourteen days. I’m sturdy of frame, brown-haired, blue-eyed, with a pale complexion and high forehead. I retired from the world on January 17, 1633, when I took a vow that, unless something occurred to change my destiny, I would devote myself to God for the next five years – which would be my last. I withdrew from the world in the aftermath of a great political disaster that swallowed up my dearest friends – and after a deep personal injury that broke my heart. The portrait of the king that hangs in my cell, for whom I have a special reverence, is of King Henry IV. Now, you wanted to know the distance between us. It’s now just short of three o’clock. I’ll date this letter at three o’clock exactly, the time I shall release our messenger. Pigeons fly at fifteen or sixteen miles per hour, as I learned when I was in a circumstance to employ them. Note the time you receive this letter, and calculate. Don’t reply for two or three days; take those days to imagine me, poor recluse, and then put your ideas, whether illusion or reality, on paper. Then send me a summary of your research, the distillation of your dreams. God be with you!

155

2 hours after receiving the letter

Listen! Hear me! It’s not in two or three days I must answer you but now! My God! What mad idea grips my mind, my heart, my soul! What if ... the one I love is not dead! What if you are the one I love, the one I call, the one I seek, the one who appears to me every night! You were born on May 1, 1607 – so was he! You’re strong – like him! You are brown-haired, blue-eyed, with a pale complexion and high forehead – like him! Then remember the words you told me in another letter that remain alive in my memory: you fell from the heights of human eminence, you trembled at the wind of the axe as it took the heads of those around you, and in your fall you lost a kingdom. I don’t know how all these things can apply to you but if they do – my God! My God! It must really be you. You have in your cell a portrait of a king whom you love and revere, a portrait of King Henry IV. And he, he, he was the son of King Henry IV! If you are not Antoine de Bourbon, Count of Moret, said to have been killed at the Battle of Castelnaudary, then who’re you? Answer me! In the name of heaven, answer me!

156

16 May

At daybreak, if you are not Isabelle de Lautrec, whom I believed unfaithful, then who are you? I am Antoine de Bourbon, Count of Moret, whom all think died at the Battle of Castelnaudary – but who lives, not by the mercy but by the vengeance of the Lord. Oh! If things are as I fear they are, then woe to us both! The dove must have gotten lost in the night, or perhaps she got tired and was forced to rest. She didn’t arrive until the first light of dawn.

157

7<sup>AM</sup>

Yes, yes, yes, O sufferer! Yes, I’m Isabelle de Lautrec! You believed me unfaithful? Me? How? Why? For what reason? To defend myself, I must know. Did you know the dove takes only two hours to go from you to me or me to you? Did you know there must be only thirty miles between us? Tell me, tell me, how have I deceived you? How have I betrayed you? Speak, speak! Fly, dove: you carry my life!

158

11 o’clock

The eyes, the heart, the soul – can all be deceived at once? Are you or are you not the Isabelle de Lautrec I saw enter Valence Cathedral on January 5, 1633? Are you not she who was dressed as a bride, and who walked behind Emmanuel, Viscount de Pontis, dressed as a groom? Or was it all an illusion of the Archfiend? No quibbles, no hesitation, no half-answers. Proof, or silence.

3pm

Proof? You shall have it! It's easy enough to provide. Everything you saw had the appearance of truth, yet everything you saw was false. But I have a long story to tell you, and alas! Our poor dove is exhausted and needs rest. Instead of the usual two hours, it took her nearly four hours to fly back to me. I'll write part of the story tonight. Dear Lord God, give me some peace – my hand trembles so, I can barely hold the pen. But first, my God, I must give thanks to you for letting him see ... there. I spent three hours on my knees, praying, pressing my burning forehead against the chilly flagstones, and now I'm calmer. To return to you. Let me tell you all, tell you everything, from the moment I left you in Valence, to that woeful moment when I pronounced my vows. The night you left, do you remember it as well as I do? It was August 14, 1632, when we parted; you said goodbye to me without telling me where you were going. I was full of foreboding; I couldn't let go of the edge of your cloak. It seemed to me it wasn't to be a parting for a few days, as you'd promised but a parting forever. Eleven o'clock was tolling from the church in the town; wearing a dark cloak, you mounted a white horse; you rode slowly at first, and three times you turned back to say goodbye. The third time, you made me go inside, because you said if I stayed in the doorway, you might never leave. Why didn't I stay? Why did you go? I went in but only to run up to my balcony. You looked back, and saw me waving a handkerchief wet with my tears. You lifted your hat, plumes fluttering, and I heard your farewell waft on the wind, diminished by distance to no more than a sigh. A great cloud drifted across the sky and obscured the Moon; I raised my hands as if to stop it before it could cut off the silver radiance by which I could still see you. Finally, like a dark aerial monster, it opened its mouth and swallowed the pale goddess, who disappeared within it. When I lowered my eyes to the horizon, I sought for you in vain. I could still hear the sound of hooves ringing on the road in the direction of Orange but I could see you no more. Suddenly a flash tore open the cloud, and by the lightning's gleam I glimpsed your white horse. But you, in your dark cloak, had already merged with the night. Your mount rode away quickly but seemingly without a rider. Twice more the lightning flashed to reveal your horse, fading like a ghost. Then even the sound of the hooves was lost. A fourth flash came with a roar of thunder but the horse was gone. All that night, the thunder growled, while the wind and rain beat against my windows. The next day, nature, distraught, dishevelled, and drained, seemed to grieve like my heart. I knew what was happening in the direction toward which you'd disappeared – that is to say, in Languedoc. It was said your friend the Duke de Montmorency, who was governor there, had joined the party of Sir and the exiled queen mother. Prince Gaston had crossed France to meet the Duke de Montmorency, raise the province in revolt and muster troops to march against the king and Sir de Richelieu. So you went, to join one of your brothers to fight against the other – and far more dangerous, to draw your sword and risk your head against terrible Cardinal Richelieu, who had already broken so many swords and taken so many heads! As you know, my father was in Paris with the king. So I followed you south with two of my ladies under the pretext of a visit to my aunt, who was Abbess of Saint-Pons – but really to get closer to the theatre of events in which you were to play a role. It took me eight days to travel from Valence to Saint-Pons. I arrived at the convent on August 23. The holy women there were unused to affairs of the world but the events occurring nearby were so grave, they were the subject of all conversations, and every inhabitant of the convent was discussing the news. And what had they heard?

They said the king's brother, My Lord Gaston d'Orléans, had met up with the Marshall-Duke de Montmorency, bringing two thousand men he'd raised in the Principality of Trier; and these, added to the four thousand already with Montmorency, brought their total troops to six thousand. With these six thousand soldiers, he held Lodève, Albi, Uzès, Lunel, and Saint-Pons where I was. Nîmes, Toulouse, Carcassonne, and Beziers, though populated by Protestants, had refused to join him. It was also said that two armies were on the march against the Duke de Montmorency. One of them, commanded by Marshal Schomberg, was coming by way of Pont-Saint-Esprit. The other, led by the king, as the cardinal had decided Louis XIII himself was needed in the theatre of war, was said to have arrived at Lyon. A letter that caught up to me from Valence not only confirmed this news but informed me that my father, the Baron de Lautrec, was with His Majesty. This letter came from my father, and also announced that he and his old friend the Count de Pontis had decided to strengthen the ties between our two houses by a marriage between me and the count's son, the Viscount de Pontis. As you'll remember, I'd already spoken to you of this proposed marriage, and you'd said to me, "Just give me three months. In three months, things will be different for everyone. Give me three more months, and I'll ask the Baron de Lautrec for your hand."

Imagine my torment at knowing you were allied with those my father called rebels, as fear and hatred grew between your house and that of my father, a loyal and faithful servant of the king. In his mind the king and the cardinal were one, and almost daily he announced, "He who is enemy to the cardinal, is enemy to the king."

On 23 August, a royal decree declared the Duke Montmorency attainted, forfeiting all honours and dignities, property and domains, and ordering him to appear before the Parliament of Toulouse for trial. The next day, the rumour spread of a similar declaration against you, son of a king though you were, and against Sir de Rieux. Imagine the feelings these rumours inflicted on my poor heart! On the 24th, an emissary of the cardinal passed through Saint-Pons, going, they said, to offer peace terms to Sir de Montmorency. I persuaded my aunt to offer him refreshments, and he accepted, stopping in her parlour. I spoke with him there, and what they said of his mission was true. It gave me hope. My hope increased when I heard that the Archbishop of Narbonne, a close friend of Sir de Montmorency, had passed through Carcassonne for the same purpose, to ask the marshal-duke to lay down his arms. The proposals he was carrying to the Governor of Languedoc were, they said, fair, reasonable, and conducive to his fortune and honour. The rumour soon followed that Montmorency had refused. As to you – because, you understand, you were the subject of much talk that was a cause of both consolation and dread for me – as to you, it was said that a letter had been written to you by the cardinal himself but you had replied that your word had long been promised to Sir, and that Sir alone could release you. And alas!

That selfish coward refused to let you go. On 29 August, word came that the armies of Marshal Schomberg and the Duke Montmorency were face to face. But the wily old marshal knew that Richelieu was a minister who could fall, and the king was a man who could die – and that Sir, against whom he was pitted, was heir to the throne, and would then become King of France. So he sent Sir Cavois to parley and open one last negotiation. We heard all the reports. My soul rose at each bit of hopeful news. I anxiously awaited Sir de Montmorency's final answer. You know his response. Whether from despair or conceit, fear or courage, he said, "First we'll fight; after the battle, we'll talk."

Thereafter, since all hope of accord was lost, and a victory by the Duke Montmorency was your only salvation, I forgot my duty as a daughter, I forgot my duty as a subject, and, prostrate at the altar, I prayed to God Almighty to look with favour on the hero of Vellano and the son of the victor of Ivry. From that moment, I lived only to wait upon news of the battle. Alas! On September 1, at five in the evening, came the terrible, fatal, heart-breaking news. The battle was lost. The marshal-duke was a prisoner, and you were either mortally wounded or ... dead! I didn't wait to hear any more. I went to fetch the gardener, whom I'd spoken to in advance. I told him to prepare two horses and meet me at nightfall at the garden gate. The night came, I met him, and we mounted and rode for the battlefield. We skirted the base of the mountains, crossed two or three streams, passed on the left the little village of Livinière, and reached Cannes at eight o'clock, where we stopped. My horse was lamed and limping; I determined to trade him for a fresh horse and discover what news I could. They said Montmorency and de Rieux were both dead. As to you, reports were conflicting: some said you were dead, others mortally wounded. If you were dying, I wanted to close your eyes; if dead, I wanted to wrap you in your shroud. We left Cannes at half past eight, crossing the fields and avoiding the roads; the gardener was from Saissac – he knew the country, and took us straight to Montolieu. The weather resembled that of the night we parted: dark clouds rolled across heaven, gusts roared through the trees, and a warm, suffocating wet wind spat large drops of rain, while thunder rumbled behind Castelnauary. We rode straight through Montolieu without stopping. Beyond that small town, we met the first outpost of Sir de Schomberg's troops. I repeated my questions. The battle had begun around eleven in the morning and lasted an hour or less; barely a hundred people had been killed. I asked if you were among the dead. They weren't sure but had heard a soldier of the vanguard say he'd seen you fall. We found him; he had indeed seen one of the leaders go down but wasn't sure it was you. I wanted to take him with me but he was on duty and couldn't come. But he told the gardener it was definitely the Count of Moret who'd led the charge, and if he'd been killed, it was by an officer of fusiliers named Bitéran. As I listened to these details, a chill came over me, my chest froze so I couldn't speak, and beads of sweat rolled down my face to mingle with my tears. We resumed our journey. We'd come twelve or thirteen leagues in five hours but as I'd changed horses in Cannes, I knew I could make it to Castelnauary. If the gardener fell behind, he promised to keep up by linking his reins with mine. Leaving Montolieu, we passed patrols in the woods. We recognised our location, and found our way to a ford over the Bernassonne. After crossing two more streams, we were well on our way again. Between Ferrals and Villespy, the gardener's horse fell and couldn't get up again but fortunately we were almost there: we could see the bivouacs of the royal army, and saw lights moving about the field where the battle had taken place. My companion told me the lights were probably those of soldiers out to bury the dead. I asked him to make one last effort to follow me; I dug my spurs into my horse, itself ready to fall, and rode past the first campfire. I was just passing the village of Saint-Papoul on my right when my horse reared. I bent down to see a shapeless mass: a dead soldier. I had found the first corpse. I jumped from my horse and left it to its own devices. We had arrived. The gardener ran toward the nearest group of torches. I sat on a grassy hillock and waited. The sky was still strewn with dark clouds, and thunder continued to rumble in the west, the occasional flash lighting the battlefield. The gardener returned, carrying a torch and followed by some soldiers. He had found them digging a large pit, and looked to check for bodies but none had yet been thrown in. Finally, I began to get some positive news. Sir de Montmorency, though wounded twelve times over, was not yet dead but he was definitely a prisoner; he had been captured and then carried to a farm a quarter of a mile from the battlefield, where he'd made his confession to Sir de Schomberg's chaplain. Then his wounds had been dressed by the surgeon of the light horse, and he'd been brought to Castelnauary on a litter. Sir de Rieux had been killed, and his body positively identified. As for you, you'd been seen falling from your horse but after that no one could say what had become of you. I asked where you'd been seen to fall, and was told it was at the ambushade. The soldiers wanted to know who I was. "Look at me," I said to them, "and guess." Sobs choked my voice, and tears streamed down my face.

"Poor woman," one of them said, "she loves him!"

I seized the man's hand – I could have kissed him. "Come with me," I said, "and help me find him, dead or alive."

"We'll help you," said two or three soldiers. "Follow us," one of them said.

The one I'd chosen to be our guide took the torch and lit the way. I came after. One of them offered to let me lean on him. "Thank you," I said, "but I'm strong enough."

In fact, I felt no fatigue, and it seemed to me I could go to the end of the world if I had to. We walked three hundred paces. Every ten steps there was a body, and I wanted to check to see if it was you but the soldiers drew me forward, saying, "It wasn't here, Madam."

Finally we came to a little ravine beneath some olive trees, where a path ran along a stream. "Here," the soldiers said.

I passed my hand over my forehead and staggered, feeling faint for a moment. Then we began the search, starting down from the crest. I took the torch from the guide and bent low to the earth. One after another, I checked every body. Two were face-down, one dressed as an officer, with dark hair like yours. I turned him on his back and parted his hair: it wasn't you. Suddenly I cried out – I'd spotted your hat! I stooped and picked it up. There were the plumes I'd put on it myself – there was no mistaking it. This was where you had fallen. But had you fallen dead, or only wounded? That was the question. The soldiers who'd come with me were speaking in low voices. I saw one of them gesture toward the stream. "What are you saying?" I asked.

"We were saying, Madam," replied the one who'd gestured, "that a wounded man, especially one who's shot, is always thirsty. If the Count of Moret was only wounded, perhaps he crawled to the stream at the bottom of the ravine to drink."

"Oh! It's a hope!" I cried. "Come!" I darted through the olive trees.

The slope was steep but I barely noticed. Ceres, torch in hand, seeking for lost Persephone, could have gone no quicker, goddess though she was. In an instant, I was beside the stream. In fact, two or three of the wounded had tried to reach it. One had died on the way; the second had gotten his hand into the stream but no more; the third had his head in the water, and had died while drinking. One of the three sighed; it was the man who had reached the edge of the stream and then passed out. The coolness of the night air, or some miracle, had brought him around. I knelt beside him, lit his face with the torch – and uttered a cry. It was Armand, your squire. At the sound, he opened his eyes and looked at me, confused. His eyes focused on my face. "Water," he croaked.

I fetched water in your hat and brought it to him. One of the soldiers stopped me. "Don't let him drink," he said in my ear. "Sometimes they die while drinking."

"Water!" the dying man repeated.

"Yes," I said, "I'll let you drink but first tell me what happened to the Count of Moret."

He looked more closely at my face, and recognised me. "Miss de Lautrec!" he murmured.

"Yes, Armand, it's me," I said. "I'm looking for your master. Where is he? Where is he?"

"Water!" he demanded, voice fading.

I remembered I had a vial of smelling salts in my pocket. I held it to his lips, and he seemed to revive a little.

"Where is he, in heaven's name?" I asked.

"I don't know," he replied.

"Did you see him fall?"

"Yes."

"Dead or wounded?"

"Wounded."

"Where did this happen?"

"On the banks."

"Which side?"

"The side toward Fendeille."

"Among the king's troops, or Montmorency's?"

"Montmorency's men."

"And then?"

"That's all I can remember. I was wounded myself, my horse was killed, and I fell. Night came, and I crawled, because I was so thirsty. I nearly reached the stream but I fainted. Water! Water!"

"Let him drink now," the soldier said. "He's told us all he knows."

I cupped water from your hat. The soldiers raised the wounded man's head and I brought the water to his lips. He drank three or four sips greedily and then leaned back, sighed, and stiffened. He was dead. "You see, you had to make him talk before letting him drink," said the soldier.

He released poor Armand's head, and it fell heavily to the ground. I stood for a moment, wringing my hands anxiously. "What do we do now, Madam?" asked the gardener.

"Do you know which way is Fendeille?" I asked him.

"Yes."

"Then we go toward Fendeille." I turned to the soldiers and asked, "Who will come with me?"

"All of us!" they said.

"Then let's go."

We followed the path up out of the ravine, then over into a meadow, where we saw an officer at the head of a dozen soldiers. My companions spoke softly to each other. "What are you saying?" I asked.

"We say that officer might be able to give you some information."

"Which one?"

"That one."

They pointed at the captain leading the patrol. "Why do you think he could give me information?"

"Well, because he fought here."

"Let's go to him, then." And I walked quickly toward the officer.

One of my soldiers stopped me. "Pardon," he said, "but you see..."

"Why do you stop me?"

"Are you sure you want to know what he has to say?" the soldier asked.

"At all costs!"

"No matter what he tells you?"

"No matter what."

"Then I'll call him over." He stepped forward. "Captain Bitéran?"

The officer paused, peering toward him through the darkness. "Who calls?" he asked.

"We'd like to speak with you, officer."

"Who is that?"

"A lady."

"A lady! On the battlefield, at this hour?"

"Why not, Sir – if that lady comes to the battlefield seeking one she loves, to treat him if he's wounded, or bury him if he's dead?"

The officer approached; he was a man of about thirty. Seeing me, he removed his hat, to reveal a noble and distinguished face framed by blond hair. "Whom do you seek, Madam?" he asked me.

"Antoine de Bourbon, the Count of Moret," I replied.

The officer looked at me more closely. Then, paling slightly, voice altered, he repeated, "The Count of Moret? You seek the Count of Moret?"

"Yes, the Count of Moret. These good men tell me that you, better than anyone, should be able to tell me what happened to him."

He looked at my soldiers, grimaced and frowned. "Mon Captain!" one of them said. "It seems this lady is his fiancée, and she wants to know what's become of him."

"Sir, in heaven's name!" I cried. "You saw the Count of Moret, you know something about him. Tell me what you know."

"Madam, here's what I know: I was sent with my company of fusiliers to hide in ambush there in the ravine. We fired a volley, then pulled back to draw the enemy in. The Count of Moret, who never refused a fight and was quick to show his courage, charged recklessly at us, and fired his pistol at ... well, Madam, I won't lie ... at me. His bullet cut the feather from my hat. I shot back but more accurately, I'm sorry to say."

I uttered a cry of terror. "It was you?" I said, drawing back.

"Madam," the captain said, "it was a fair fight. I thought I was dealing with just another officer of the marshal-duke's army. If I'd known that he who charged me was a prince, and moreover the son of Henry IV, I'd certainly have forfeited my own life before taking his. But it was only when I heard him shout 'To me! For the Bourbons!' that I realised what a catastrophe I'd caused."

"Oh, yes!" I cried. "A terrible catastrophe! But, tell me, was he killed?"

"I don't know, Madam – just then, their musketeers opened fire. My fusiliers replied in good order. We withdrew, and I saw them standing over the body of the count, bloody and hatless."

"Oh! His hat, it's here!"

I crushed it passionately to my lips. "Madam," the captain said, with genuine pain, "give me your orders. After causing such a calamity, how can I ... I'll not say alone but at least help you in your search? Tell me, and I'll do everything in my power to help."

"Thank you, Sir," I said, trying to get hold of myself, "but the only thing you can do is tell me in which direction the count was carried away."

"Toward Fendeille, Madam," he replied; "but for safety's sake, follow the path that starts a hundred paces to your right. After a mile, you'll come to a house where they should know something."

"Very well," I said, and then, to the gardener, "You understand, don't you?"

"Yes, Madam."

"Let's go."

"I could offer the lady my horse," the officer said timidly.

"Thank you, Sir," I replied. "I asked you for all I needed, and you gave me all I asked."

I passed a handful of crowns to my three soldiers. Two went off but the third insisted on escorting me to the house of which we'd been told. However, I couldn't resist the desire to take one last look at the ground consecrated by your blood; I turned, and saw the captain standing where I'd left him, staring at me like a man stunned by misfortune. On the way to the house, we found corpses all along the path but I was used to them by then and walked with a firm step through bloodstained grass that rose to my knees. We reached the house that was overflowing with wounded from both sides, some lying outside on ground strewn with straw. I came into this asylum of pain to question the dying with my voice, and the dead with my eyes. At my questions, one dying man raised himself on his elbow.

"The Count of Moret?" he said. "I saw him go past in the carriage of Sir."

"Dead or wounded?" I asked.

"Wounded," said the dying man, "but he was like me, more dead than alive."

"My God!" I cried. "Where were they taking him?"

"I don't know – but I did hear them mention a name as the carriage turned at the crossroad."

"Whose?"

"That of Madam de Ventadour."

"Yes, that makes sense – Madam de Ventadour is nearby, at the Abbey of Prouille. That's it! Thank you, my friend."

And, leaving a few crowns beside him, I went out and told the gardener, "He's at the Abbey of Prouille."

Prouille Abbey was about two miles from there. The gardener's horse was exhausted, and I'd left mine in the meadow of the battlefield. It was impossible to find a carriage, or even a farmer's cart, and to search for one would have wasted valuable time. I felt no fatigue, so we set out on foot. We'd gone barely a mile when the threatened storm finally broke and it began to rain. But all I could think of was you – I didn't feel the rain, I couldn't hear the storm, I marched through torrents of water on a path intermittently lit as bright as day. We came to a large oak; the gardener begged me to shelter there a while and wait until the storm had passed but I shook my head and continued on my way without answering. A minute later, lightning struck the oak and shattered it to splinters. I paused long enough to point out what had happened. "Yes, Madam," the gardener said, "you're protected from the sky, so, for as long as God gives you strength, let's go on."

We went on for another hour or so, until the lightning showed us the abbey where we were bound. I doubled our pace; and soon after, we arrived. In the abbey, all were asleep, or pretending to sleep. I made enough noise to awaken them from the deepest slumber: gatekeeper, sisters, and the abbess herself. After a thousand precautions, they finally opened up. They'd clearly heard me knocking but seemed to fear the assault of some rapacious horde. I hastened to identify myself, and immediately asked for news of you. The sister gatekeeper knew who I meant but claimed not to have seen you, or even to know you'd been wounded. I asked to speak to Madam de Ventadour, and they took me to her. I found her in full habit – having heard the noise I'd made, she'd arisen and dressed. I thought she looked pale, and seemed to tremble. She dismissed this as signs of the fear she'd felt when she heard me knocking, afraid it was rogue soldiers at the gate. I reassured her, and told her I'd come from Saint-Pons, how I'd gone to the battlefield, and found the place where you'd fallen. I showed her your hat, still clenched in my hand; I told her what I'd learned from the dying soldier, and begged her, in the name of heaven, to tell me what she knew about you. She replied that he must have been mistaken, or that the coach, after turning on the path to the abbey, must have gone another way, either right or left, and taken another route. In any event, she hadn't seen you, and had no news of you. I dropped my pleading hands and slumped onto a nearby settee – my strength had left me, along with my hope. The abbess summoned her women, who stripped me of my soaking clothes, still stuck to me from the drenching rain. I'd lost my shoes somewhere in the muddy road, and had walked at least a mile in bare feet. They brought a bath and placed me into it, where I lapsed into a stupor, almost unconscious. As I slowly came around, I heard them talking about someone having seen a carriage take the road to Mazères. I questioned them: the information came from a peasant who had brought the convent their evening milk. The abbess offered me her own carriage and horses, if I wanted to continue my search. I accepted. They brought me my clothes, for, seeing the first light of day streaming in, I didn't want to lose a moment before taking up the trail. It was quite possible they'd taken you to Mazères, as Mazères was a château that had stood on the side of Montmorency. Madam de Ventadour lent me her personal driver, and we departed. At Villeneuve-le-Comtat, at Payra, at Sainte-Camette, we sought information but not only had nobody seen anything but in those villages they didn't even know the Battle of Castelnaudary had taken place.

We continued on the road to Mazères. There, somebody would have to know something: the gates would be guarded by sentries loyal to Sir de Montmorency, who would have no reason to conceal the presence of the Count of Moret. We arrived at the gates: they hadn't seen a carriage, didn't know the Count of Moret was wounded, and their first news of the Battle of Castelnaudary came from us. We soon had proof that this was the truth, as an officer galloped up at full speed, announcing that Sir de Montmorency was a prisoner, Sir de Rieux was dead, all was lost, and it was every man for himself. After that, everyone was too busy to answer more questions. I had completely lost track of you! We began to search at random, casting around the theatre of events in a great circle, as hunters do when tracking game. We visited Belpech, Cahuzac, Fanjeaux, Alzonne, Conques, and Peyriac; in none of these places was there any hint of your passage. Somewhere between Fendeille and the abbey, your carriage had disappeared like a mirage. At Peyriac, I found the steward of our house in Valence. My father had sent word that he would spend two or three months at our château there. They implored me to come home, and that put an end to my search. After three weeks of looking, I'd lost all hope of finding you. I went to the château. My father arrived the next day. He found me despondent. After a word from the steward, everyone in the château was very considerate, and no one mentioned my journey. My father came and sat by my bedside. He was a very serious, even severe man, as you know. I'd told him of my love for you, and your promise to be my husband. The honour of such an alliance was so great that he'd given up his favourite project, that of my marriage to the Viscount de Pontis, the son of his oldest friend. But with your death, that project once again was his foremost desire. Besides, Louis XIII had had words with him about his daughter's love for a rebel. As you were his brother, the king was particularly angry with you. Your property and domains were all confiscated, and if you hadn't been presumed dead, you would have been tried and treated just as Montmorency had been, king's son though you were. So it was a blessing that you were dead, and had died on the battlefield. That captain I'd seen and interrogated, that killer whom I'd cursed and whose pale face haunted me in my dreams, that murderer had saved you from the scaffold. I listened, sadly and sombrely, to my father. His mind was made up: the Count de Pontis, who had fought in the army of Marshal Schomberg, was in the royal favour. It was my father and him against me and the cardinal. On my side, I did what I could. I asked my father for three months: if, after that time, I'd had no news of you, or your death was confirmed, I would go to the church with the Viscount de Pontis. On October 30, Sir de Montmorency was executed. Then I almost blessed your murderer, for I knew that if you'd had to suffer like the poor duke, it would have killed me. There was no doubt about your fate – everyone said you'd been killed. I was a widow who'd never been married! Three months passed. On the last day of the third month, my father came to the château with the Viscount de Pontis. I knew how punctual my father was, and didn't want to keep him waiting. When he arrived, he found me already in my bridal gown. The clock struck eleven. The priest awaited us at the church. I rose and rested my arm on my father's. The Count de Pontis walked behind with his son. They were followed by five or six mutual friends, a few dozen relatives, and the servants. We made our way toward the church. My father didn't speak, only looked at me. He seemed surprised to find me so quiet. Like a martyr marching to her death, my face lit up as I approached the place of execution. As we entered the church, I was pale but smiling, like a castaway fighting a storm who sees the safety of port. The priest was waiting at the altar; we approached, and all went down on their knees. I'd been afraid that when I arrived at this point, my strength would fail me. But I was still strong, and I thanked the Lord for it with all my heart. The priest asked the Viscount de Pontis if he took me for his wife. "Yes," he replied. He gave me the same question, asking if I took Sir de Pontis as my husband. "My husband in this world and the next," I replied, "is my divine saviour Jesus, and I shall never have another." I made this response in a tone so calm and firm that no one in the church missed a word. Sir de Pontis looked at me with a frightened air, as if I'd gone mad. My father took a step forward. But I, I passed through the gate that separated me from the altar, raised my arms to heaven, and cried in a loud voice, "From this moment, I belong to God, and only God has a right to claim me!" "Isabelle!" my father shouted. "Would you defy my authority?" "There is an authority higher and holier than yours, my father," I replied respectfully. "It's the authority of the one who sustained my faith while on the road to misfortune. Father, I am no longer of this earthly world – pray for me. As I will pray for all of you." My father moved to pass the gate and snatch me from the altar but the priest held his arms out to block him. "Woe!" said he. "Woe to he who would impede this call to vocation, or try to prevent it! This girl has given herself to God, and I receive her in his name. The house of God is a holy sanctuary where no one, not even her father, has a right to take her against her will." My father might not have been stopped by this warning but the Count de Pontis dragged him away. The viscount and the rest of the entourage followed the old man out, and the door closed behind them. The priest asked me where I wished to retire. I had myself driven to the Ursuline convent. My father went to Paris at once, to appeal to the cardinal. But all he got from the cardinal was an order that I was not to take my vows for the term of a year. That year passed. After a year and a day, I took the veil. That was four years ago. For four years, not a day has passed without my praying for you, kissing the feathers of the hat I'd picked up on the battlefield at Castelnauary, the only relic of you I had. Now, you know everything. And now, in your turn, tell me all, in detail; tell me by what miracle you live; tell me where you are; tell me how I can see you. And tell it all quickly, before I go mad!

– 17 May, 4AM

160

6AM

Immediately after your letter, for a moment, God turned his eyes away from us – and in that moment, the angel of evil passed over us and touched our heads. Listen in your turn. You know what pledges I'd made to my brother Gaston. I'd hoped that, by making good on one, I'd account for them all. The king's prime minister seemed to think only of the king, not of the rest of us. Such tyranny was intolerable to the Sons of France; every time the cardinal employed the king's name, and used his seal, without consulting him, was a mark against his minister. Daily he gave orders in the house of Henry IV without regard for his sons, including the one who was on the throne. And meanwhile, as he gathered a fortune of two hundred million, barely a third of France's people could get decent bread; another third lived on coarse oat bread, while the final third, like filthy farmyard animals, sustained themselves on acorns and mash. Across the realm he'd been granted control of numerous royal fortresses and domains. He had Brouage, Oléron, Ré, La Rochelle, Saumur, Angers, Brest, Amboise, Le Havre, Pont-de-l'Arche, and Pointoise, at the very gates of Paris. He was master of the province and citadel of Verdun. In addition to the garrisons of all these towns, forts, and citadels, he was Admiral of the Navy. He had his own personal company of guards. He held in his hands all the keys to France. The rest of France, gathered against him, wasn't enough to raise an army to oppose his own. The prisons had become graves to bury the true servants of the king, and the crime of lèse-majesté no longer applied to those who rebelled against the king or the State but to anyone who lacked the zeal and blind obedience to follow the will and purposes of his prime minister. I had to say all this, first and foremost, because it's my excuse for leaving you and taking the side of one who, later, would deny us all, alive or dead. It was the trial and execution of the old Marshall de Marillac that decided everything for me. I had been in correspondence with my brother Gaston and with Queen Marie de Médicis, who had always been perfectly friendly to me. I determined to join my fortune to theirs. Do you remember how melancholy I was at that time? Do you remember my emotion, my voice breaking into sobs when I told you that my future was less certain than that of the new leaves on the tree under which we sat? Do you remember how I asked you for three more months before making you my wife, while saying that my happiest day would be the day I became your husband? In fact, from that moment, I was privy to all the affairs of my brother Gaston and acted as intermediary between him and poor Montmorency. You ask me not to leave out any details. And I won't forget or omit anything, if only to justify myself to you – and to me. We had to have the Spanish and Neapolitans on our side. And in fact, when Montmorency declared for us, the Neapolitans did indeed appear off the coast of Narbonne but they didn't dare to land. As for the Spaniards, they mustered at Urgel on their side of the border but never crossed to ours. You saw the insurrection rise all around you. You heard the cries of revolt in Bagnols, in Lunel, in Beaucaire, and in Alais. One morning I received – with a heavy heart, because I knew it betokened our separation – one morning there came the manifesto in which my brother Gaston declared himself Lieutenant General of France. Shortly thereafter, as you learned in a letter from the king to your father, ordering him to Paris, Gaston returned to France with eighteen hundred horse, who burned the outlying suburb of Saint-Nicolas and the houses of the members of parliament who'd tried and condemned Marillac. A day later, in my turn, I too received a letter. My brother wrote to me from Albi and summoned me to keep my oath to him. That was the day I took leave of you, 14 August 1632 – a fatal date, burned as deeply into my heart as yours. Oh, all your details of my departure are true! Your depiction of that night is perfect, except I could see you for longer than you could see me. You were on the balcony of your room, lit from behind, while I plunged into deepening darkness. But eventually the road reached a turn, beyond which I'd see you no more. At that point, I halted my horse, wondering if it wouldn't be better to forget all my oaths and commitments, sacrificing honour to love to return to you. But your window closed, your light went out, and I thought it a warning from God to continue on my path. So I dug my spurs into my horse, wrapped my head in my cloak, and rushed forward into the darkness drowning the horizon while urging myself, "Forward! Forward!" Two days later, I was in Albi, where I nearly caught up to my brother, who'd left five hundred Polish horse as my command and marched on to Beziers. On August 29, I received orders from the marshal-duke to join him. I went with my five hundred, and reached him on the night of August 30. On the 31st, we met to consider our position. We believed Sir de Schomberg was marching on Castelnauary, and marched there in our turn. But Schomberg got there first and occupied a house only ten minutes from the field, where he formed up a corps of Guards. It was then September 1, at eight in the morning. The marshal-duke was apprised of the situation; he took five hundred men to scout Schomberg's army in force; and when he reached the house, he charged it. Those within soon abandoned their posts. Sir de Montmorency left a hundred and fifty men to guard the house, and returned to us quite pleased with this initial success. He found us gathered in the largest house in town: my brother Gaston, Sir de Rieux, Sir de Chaudebonne, and me. Approaching my brother, Montmorency announced, "Sir, today you will triumph over all your enemies, today the son will be reunited with his mother. But," he added, gesturing with his bloody sword, "only if by tonight your sword is like mine, that is to say, red to the hilt." My brother doesn't care for swords, especially when they're bloody, and he turned away. "Eh, Marshal!" he said, "Do you never tire of boasting? Always you promise me great victories but these hopes are never fulfilled." "In any case," said the marshal, "assuming you're still with me and I, as you say, have given you hope, today that's more than anyone's done for your brother the king – for there's not just hope at stake here, there's life itself." "Why, Marshal!" Gaston said with a shrug. "Do you really suppose the life of the heir apparent is in play? No matter what happens, I'm sure to make my peace, as I did the last three times." The marshal smiled sourly and, turning from the prince, approached the rest of us. "Well, now we come to the bout," he said, "and our man already has a nosebleed. He says he, at least, will get away clean. But I think if he does, neither I, nor you, Sir de Moret, nor you, Sir de Rieux, will be part of his escort." We said we certainly would not. "Very well," the marshal-duke continued, "then come with me – because we swore that when this day came, we'd meet it sword in hand." Just then, the report came that Schomberg's army had left the woods and was marching toward us. "Come, gentlemen," the marshal-duke said, "The time has come – every man to his post." We had to pass over a river on a small bridge where they might have disputed our crossing but no one did. On the contrary, Sir de Schomberg's plan was to draw us forward into an ambush on that sunken road where you found my poor squire. The bridge crossed, I took my position on the left wing that was under my command. It was, as you know, my first battle. I was eager to show that, though of the same blood as Sir, my blood ran hotter than his. Ahead, I saw a troop of fusiliers detached as forward skirmishers: I charged them. I particularly noted the officer you met on the night after the battle. He was a brave gentleman, as calm under fire as if he were on parade. I spurred straight at him and discharged my pistol which, as you said, trimmed the feather from his hat. He returned fire. I felt a blow to my left side; I put my hand to it without knowing what I'd find, and drew it away covered with blood. I didn't feel much pain at the time but something like a red cloud passed before my eyes, and the earth spun beneath me. My horse shied, a movement I didn't have enough strength to control. I felt myself slipping from the saddle. I cried, "To me! For the Bourbons!" And I saw a vision of you. As my eyes closed, I seemed to hear a volley of musketry, and a curtain of flame unrolled before me. Doubtless my Poles bore me away, because from that moment until I recovered my senses, a mile or two from there, I was unaware of what happened to me. I was in terrible pain when I came to. I opened my eyes, to see a curious crowd peering in from around the carriage. I tried to figure out where they were taking me. I remembered the sister of my friend Sir de Ventadour was the abbess of a nearby convent. With an effort, I put my head out the door, and gave orders to take me to Madam de Ventadour. You see, your dedicated pursuit put you on the right trail, and it isn't your fault you didn't catch up with me. The pain that had awakened me then plunged me back into unconsciousness. I don't know quite how I was brought before Madam de Ventadour but when I awoke I found myself lying on an excellent bed. However, I was in some sort of underground vault. The doctor of the convent was near at hand but someone beside me, seeing my eyes open, whispered to me, "Don't say who you are." You'd been my final memory, and you were my first thought. I looked for you but you weren't there. I saw only unknown faces, and a man with rolled-up sleeves and bloody hands. It was the doctor who'd tended to me. I closed my eyes. Later that night you came to the abbey but, due to their fear of the cardinal, they told you they hadn't seen me. So you didn't know I was there, and I didn't know you'd come. We came so close but missed each other. I have little sense of what happened during the two weeks after I was wounded. It was less a recovery than a pause at the door of the tomb. Finally, my youth and strength of will prevailed; I felt life return to my feverish and languid limbs, and from that moment, the doctor declared I had turned the corner. But I was forbidden to leave my bed, or be taken outdoors. I was still at risk of my life for another four to six weeks. It was during this time that they tried and executed the marshal-duke. That execution only reinforced the terror of the poor sisters who were tending me. They had no doubt that even a prince of the blood would be treated like Sir de Montmorency. For hadn't Montmorency allied with the traitorous Marie de Médicis? Outside, everyone decided I must be dead, and as it was in everyone's interest to believe it, the news of my death soon spread. After two months, I could get up. Though I'd remained hidden in the vaults beneath the convent until then, now my recovery required fresh air. It was November but Languedoc's mild winter didn't prevent night-time walks. I was allowed to take the night air in the convent garden. Along with thought and feeling – though not yet strength, because I was so feeble, I couldn't go up or down stairs – my love for you, numbed till then by the nearness of death, returned with full force. I spoke only of you, longed only for you. As soon as I could hold a pen, I asked to be able to write to you. They gave me what I asked for, and a messenger took my letter away – but as a message would reveal that I still lived, and as Madam de Ventadour was terrified that such news would result in their persecution, imprisonment, perhaps even death, the messenger just stayed in the area for two weeks, then returned to say that your father had taken you to Paris, and he'd delivered my letter to those of your women who seemed most devoted to you. That reassured me. I was certain my appeal to your love would bring a prompt reply. A month passed; every day that went by was another blow to my confidence, a wound to my hope. It was three months since the Battle of Castelnauary. I ached to know the current news. Wounded at the outset of the fight, I knew nothing of the result. They hesitated to tell me the news until I threatened to go find out for myself. Finally they told me everything: the loss of the battle, Gaston's flight and reconciliation – his fourth, as he'd said – the trial and death of Montmorency, the confiscation of my property, the loss of my rank and my dignity. I took this news better than they expected. Certainly the death of the poor marshal was a heavy blow. But after the execution of Sir de Marillac, we'd foreseen that death was a possibility for both Sir de Montmorency and myself, and had discussed it more than once. As for the loss of my rank, my dignity, and my fortune, I met that with a contemptuous smile. Men had taken from me everything that could be given by men – but they'd left me with what God had given me: your love. From that moment, your love for me was the one hope I had left in life. It was the only star shining in the sky of the future that had become as dark as that of the past had been radiant. The messenger hadn't found you – so I resolved to be my own messenger. Your response had never come, so I decided to seek an answer for myself. But leaving the convent wasn't going to be easy. They kept a close watch on me, afraid I might be seen and recognised. I therefore told them I proposed to leave, not just the convent but France itself. For the abbess, this was the best proposal I could possibly make. It was agreed that I would disguise myself as a angler and travel among others as far as Narbonne, where I would leave them. At Narbonne Abbey, I would dress in ecclesiastical garb and continue in the abbess's carriage. I'd never been to that area, and besides, everyone thought I was dead, so it was unlikely that I'd be recognised. The good abbess put her coffers at my disposal. I thanked her but when wounded I'd had on me two hundred crowns or so that was still in my purse, plus diamond rings and brooches worth ten thousand crowns at least. And you were rich, so what use had I for money? I left the abbey in early January, full of gratitude for the hospitality they'd given me. Alas! I had no idea how dearly that hospitality had cost me. It was twenty-eight leagues to Narbonne, and I was still so weak that I could walk for only short distances – though perhaps I exaggerated my weakness a bit, so they'd underestimate me. The first night, we lodged in Villepinte; the second, in Barbaira; the third, in Narbonne. The next day, they made arrangements to sail me to Marseilles. I was to be a sick prelate with ailing lungs ordered to take the air at Hyères or Nice. I rested for a day at Narbonne and departed the next. With a good wind behind me, forty-eight hours later I was in Marseilles.

There, I paid my boatmen, said farewell to the two servants of the abbess who'd come with me, and was once again perfectly free. In the market I hired a coach to take me to Avignon, and from Avignon up the Rhône to Valence. My cavalier airs might betray me, so I made myself an officer's uniform of the Cardinal's Guard. Wearing that uniform, I was sure I wouldn't be bothered. I left Marseilles and reached Avignon in three days. In Avignon, the wind was blowing up from the sea, ensuring good navigation, so I entrusted myself to the Rhône. When the wind died, we roped the boat to horses and were drawn along by a cable. Early one day, I saw your château in the distance. It was there that you would be waiting for me – or, if what I'd been told was true and your father had taken you to Paris, it was there that I'd find news of you. I wanted to be put ashore, the boat got on so slowly but unfortunately I was still too weak. Oh, if only I'd arrived just one hour sooner! If only I'd seen you first! But it was not to be – we were doomed ... I could only stand in the prow and await our arrival. Even so, half a league short of Valence, I disembarked. I could walk only slowly but that was faster than the boat. Moreover, the hope of seeing you revived my strength. From far off I saw your balcony, the one from which you'd waved goodbye as I turned the corner of the road – but the balcony was empty and the blinds were shut. There was something about the château that I'd yearned to see for so long, something bleak and empty that chilled me. Suddenly, I saw the main gate open. A procession marched out, turned toward the city, and disappeared. I was still a quarter-league away but without knowing why, I felt my heart sink and my strength fail me. I leaned against a tree beside the road, sweat beading my forehead; I wiped it away and resumed my trek. I came upon a servant. "My friend," I asked, hesitating, "does Miss Isabelle de Lautrec still live in that château?"

"That's right, officer," he said. "Miss Isabelle de Lautrec. But half an hour from now, she'll be called something else."

"Something else! What will she be called?"

"Madam la Viscountess of Pontis."

"Why the Viscountess of Pontis?"

"Because in half an hour she'll be the wife of my master, the Viscount de Pontis."

I felt myself go pale and mopped my face with my handkerchief. "So," I said, "the procession I saw leaving the château...?"

"Was that of the betrothed?"

"And at this moment...?"

"At this moment, they're in the church."

"No! It's impossible!"

"Impossible!" said the servant. "Well, if you want to see it with your own eyes, Officer, there's still time. Take this shortcut, and you'll be at the church soon enough."

I couldn't believe the man's story – I wanted him to be wrong, I wanted to see with my own eyes that there was no such terrible reality. For some reason he must be telling me a lie, a bald-faced lie. I knew Valence, having lived there for three months. I quickly crossed the bridge, entered the town, and followed the streets that would take me most directly to the church. Besides, I was guided by the jubilant sound of the bells. The cathedral square was crowded with people. Despite the pealing bells, despite the crowd of celebrants, I still couldn't believe – I told myself the man had misled me that someone else was walking to the altar. But though I passed through a teeming crowd, I didn't dare to ask anyone. If I hadn't been dressed as one of the Cardinal's Guard, I certainly couldn't have pushed through to the front ranks but the crowd parted at the sight of my uniform. And then ... oh, it takes all my strength to recount these terrible details – until yesterday I didn't know for sure it was you who was writing to me, I hadn't yet reopened this lethal wound ... You suffered through my death but oh, I suffered through your betrayal. Your betrayal ... forgive me, Isabelle, forgive me, I know now it was only the appearance but oh! For me, unhappy wretch, it was reality. When I saw you, a cloud rose before my eyes like the one when I was shot from my horse by that officer. It was the same feeling but more painful – because while the bullet struck my side, this pierced my heart. I saw you appear: you were pale but almost smiling. You walked with a firm stride across the square, seemingly in a hurry to get to the church. I passed a hand over my eyes, stumbled, panting, muttering in a low voice that surprised those around me, "My God, this can't be true ... my eyes, ears, all my senses must be deceiving me ...! But she's alone, alone – she couldn't wrong me, she couldn't wrong me so."

You passed no more than ten feet from me but I was struck dumb, hoping you wouldn't enter the church that you would turn away, you would cry out that this was a violation of your love – and then I, I would rush forward, and though it cost my life I'd cry, "Yes, I love her! Yes, she loves me! Yes, I am the Count of Moret, dead to everyone but her, Isabelle de Lautrec, my bride in this world and the next! Let me be with my fiancée!" And I would have carried you away in the face of all of them, despite everything, because I felt I had the strength of a giant. But Isabelle! O Isabelle! You didn't speak, you didn't stop, and you went on into the church. A long cry, a heart-breaking wail rose from the depths of my breast as you disappeared through the doors ... and then, before anyone could ask me why I moaned so, I turned, darted through the crowd, and disappeared. I returned to the riverbank, I found my boat, I threw myself amid the boatmen, burying my hands in my hair and crying "Isabelle! Isabelle!" They left me a while in my despair. Then they asked me where I wanted to go. I pointed downriver. They loosed the boat, and the Rhône carried us away. What more can I say? I must have survived the next four years, since today you find me, still alive and still in love. But before today, I didn't exist. I've been waiting to take my vows until the end of the term I'd imposed on myself. That term, you have brought to an end – thank you! Since I know you didn't betray me, since I know you still love me, entering my vocation will be easier for me, and now I can go calmly to God. Pray for your brother ... as your brother prays for you.

– 3PM

161

5:30PM

What's this you tell me? I don't quite understand. You have found me; you're sure I didn't betray you; you know I love you; and this, you say, ends the term of waiting to take your vows, makes your vocation easier, and makes you calm enough to consecrate yourself to God! Good Lord! Would you continue with your strange project of renouncing the world? Just listen to me: God is not unjust. When I dedicated myself to him, it was in the belief that you were dead. But you live! God won't require me to keep a vow made in despair, if the cause of my despair doesn't exist. I'm free, despite my vows. Yes, yes, it's as you say: we nearly touched each other at the abbey but had no way of knowing we were so close to each other. Oh but I'm wrong, I belie my own heart, for an inner voice cried to me, "Stand firm, argue, insist – he is here."

Yes, I understand, the poor abbess was terrified, afraid of what the hospitality she gave you would cost. Oh, why couldn't I have found you! I'd been proud of the mission God have given me to save the son of Henry IV. I wanted the pride and glory to be able to say, "When the whole world abandoned him, I alone endured, I alone rescued him." Fool that I am! Saying that would have betrayed you, and you'd have been lost like the marshal-duke. Better, then, for her to hide you from me so you should live – better that I should suffer, should despair, should die. But why despair now? Why should I die? You've yet to take your vows, and I regard mine as invalid. Let's leave, let's go to Italy, to Spain, to the end of the world. I'm still rich – and besides, why do we need money? We love each other! Come! Let's go! Oh, answer me. Yes, tell me where you are, tell me how to find you. Consider this: you doubted me – me, your Isabelle! You thought me deceitful, and you owe me expiation.

I wait, I wait.

162

5AM

Your letter stirs the most secret depths of my heart. Ah, for what was to have been ours! You offer me the happiness I sought, expected, desired all my life – and I cannot accept that happiness. Isabelle! Isabelle!

You are a lady, as I am a gentleman. Neither of us would betray a promise made to men, let alone an oath made to God. Don't try to deceive yourself: the vows you made are real, and God doesn't admit of equivocation. For us there is only one future, the one to which misfortune has led us. You showed me the sacred path, and you were the first to take it. I follow you – and we shall arrive together, since we have the same goal. I will pray for you, as you pray for me. We pray as one, not for ourselves but for the eternal life and eternal love that we shall receive from the Lord, in place of worldly love and mortal life. And don't believe that, because I tell you this, I love you less than you love me. No, I can't love you less, I know – I love you with the heart of a man much stronger since he fell from his heights to the depths, and who, having touched death with his hand, returns pale from the tomb bearing revelations of another life beyond. Believe me, Isabelle, the more I love you, the more certain I am on this point. Don't risk your eternal salvation on such sophistry. The life of this world is to eternity as a second is to a century. We live for a second on the earth but we live forever with God. And then, moreover, listen to this, my bride in this world and the next: though it was God who willed despair into your heart when it was deceived, that power to bind has the power to unbind. Urban VIII is pope, and your family has powerful allies in Italy. Use them to get a nullification of your vows. On that day, Isabelle, you truly can tell me, "I'm free!"

And then, then ... oh, I dare not think of what blessed happiness, what bliss without remorse we would find!

163

2PM

Yes, you are right; there must be no shadow on our happiness. In our hearts shall be neither fear nor remorse, and our dark and stormy sky shall be followed by a firmament glittering with stars. Yes, I spoke to one who has listened to me; yes, she assures me she'll find mercy for me; yes! I ask you for three months to go free myself, and if in three months our dove hasn't borne you the ecclesiastical order that liberates me, then our only hope is in heaven. Then you may give yourself to God as I did, bound by an unbreakable oath. Oh, I couldn't bear to know that you were free, when I am forever chained! Tomorrow, I'll be on my way.

164

4:30PM

Go, and may God be with you!

1638

1 June

It's just a month since I received your last letter; a month I've spent watching for the coming of our dove; a month with no words about you, except those from my heart. How the time passes! Now, minutes become hours; hours become days; days become years. Can I live like this for two more months? Yes, because I will hold out hope until the very last day. I write this letter without knowing if you'll ever receive it – but I write for that day that shall separate us or bring us together. For you know, Isabelle, I think about you with every beat of my heart.

165

22 June

Fly, beloved dove, fly to my dear returned one, tell him it was his prayers that protected me – tell him I'm free, and tell him we are happy! Free! Free! Free! Let me tell you, my beloved ... I don't know where to start, I'm so mad with joy! As you may know, the same day I wrote my last letter to you, the good news came, officially confirmed, that the queen was pregnant. To celebrate the occasion, there were to be great festivals throughout France, and pardons granted by the king and cardinal. I resolved to go and throw myself at the feet of the cardinal, who has, in ecclesiastical matters, all the powers of Rome. That's why I asked you for only three months. The same day I wrote you, I departed, with the permission of our mother superior. My neighbour in the next cell agreed to take care of our dove. I was so sure of myself, I left her without fear. I departed – but despite my best efforts, I couldn't get to Paris in less than seventeen days. The cardinal was at his country estate in Rueil. I left immediately for there. At first he was ill and couldn't receive me. I took lodgings in the town and waited, after leaving my name with Father Joseph. On the third day, Father Joseph himself came to tell me that His Eminence was ready to receive me. I rose at this news but fell back in my chair, pale as death. My heart quivered, and my legs were too weak to hold me. They say Father Joseph isn't tender of heart – and yet, when he saw me collapse at the mere idea of an audience with the cardinal, he did his best to encourage me, telling me that if I had something to ask of His Eminence, the time was right, as the cardinal was better than he'd been for quite some time. Oh, my entire life, and yours, depended on what was to happen between that man and me!

I followed Father Joseph, blind to my surroundings, my eyes fixed only on him and matching my pace to his, as if his movements directed mine. We passed through the town and entered the estate. We went up an avenue of tall trees. I saw everything at once, all blurred together, so the details escaped me. Finally, I saw before us an arbour of honeysuckle and clematis, and under it a man half lying on a couch. He was dressed in a white robe and wearing a red cap, the biretta of a cardinal. I pointed toward the man and Father Joseph understood. "Yes," he said, "that's him."

Just then I was passing a large tree; I paused and leaned against it, for I felt that if I took another step without support, I'd fall. The cardinal saw my hesitation, the stagger that betrayed my weakness; he rose. "Approach without fear," he said.

An indescribable tone softened his usually gruff voice, and it was that change in his voice that suddenly filled me with hope. I regained my strength and, almost running, I threw myself at his feet. He waved Father Joseph away, who obeyed, retreating out of earshot but still within view. I bowed and extended my hands before me. “What do you want of me, my daughter?” asked the cardinal-duke.

“My Lord, My Lord, a blessing upon which depends not just my life but my salvation.”

“Your name?”

“Isabelle de Lautrec.”

“Ah! Your father was a loyal servant of the king – a rare thing in this time of rebellion. We had the misfortune to lose him.”

“Yes, My Lord. Is it permitted to invoke his memory in your presence?”

“Were he alive, I would grant him whatever he asked, except for those things that are in the purview of the Lord, for whom I am but a simple vicar. Speak: what do you wish?”

“My Lord, I have taken vows.”

“So I recall, because, at your father’s request, I opposed these vows with all my power, and instead of granting your wish to take them, asked you to delay for a full year. So you took these vows despite the year’s delay?”

“Alas, My Lord, I did!”

I admired the prodigious memory of this great man of affairs who recalled so unimportant an event as a poor child he’d never seen taking the veil. “Ah, and now you repent them.”

I preferred to blame my repentance on inconstancy rather than desire. “My Lord,” I said, “I was just eighteen years old, and the death of a man I loved had driven me mad.”

He smiled. “I see. And now that you are twenty-four, you’ve become more reasonable.”

I waited, hands clasped. “So now,” he said, “you would break those vows, as with time the woman has overcome the holy sister. The memories of the world have pursued you in your seclusion, and though you swore your body to God, your soul, I perceive, remains on earth. O human weakness!”

“My Lord! My Lord!” I cried. “I’m lost unless you have mercy on me!”

“It was, however, freely and voluntarily that you took your vows.”

“Yes, freely and voluntarily. I repeat, My Lord – I was mad.”

“And what excuse can you give God for this failure to keep your oath?”

My excuse – an excuse already well known to God, who had preserved your life, my beloved – that I couldn’t tell him, or all would be lost. I remained silent but for a tiny moan. “So, you’ve no excuse,” said the duke.

I wrung my hands in agony. “Well, then, I must find one for you,” he said, “however mundane.”

“Oh, help me, My Lord, aid me, and I’ll bless you till the last breath of my life!”

“Hmm! As minister to King Louis XIII, I don’t wish a name as loyal and good as yours to perish. Your house is one of the true glories of France, and the true glories of France are dear to me.”

Then, gazing at me, he asked, “You love someone?”

I bowed my head into the dust. “Yes, that’s it,” the duke continued. “I guessed as much: you love someone. And the one you love is free?”

“Yes, My Lord.”

“He knows of your request, and expects it?”

“He is waiting.”

“Very well. You shall be free, and this man shall join his name, whatever it is, to that of Lautrec, so that the name of the victor of Ravenna and Brescia shall not perish.”

“Oh, My Lord!” I cried, kissing his feet.

He lifted me, breathless with joy, and beckoned to Father Joseph, who approached. “Escort Miss Isabelle de Lautrec back where you found her,” the cardinal said, “and in an hour you can bring her the order that releases her from her vows.”

“My Lord, My Lord, how can I thank you?”

“That’s easy enough: when you’re asked your opinion of me, say that I know both how to punish and how to reward. Living, I punished the traitor Montmorency; dead, I reward the loyal Lautrec. Go, my daughter, go.”

I kissed his hands ten times over, and then followed Father Joseph. An hour later, he brought me the order that nullified my vows. I left at once, without losing a minute, the precious order next to my heart that was even more devoted to God since God had released me from my words. My return trip took only thirteen days, and here I am, writing to you, beloved – not telling all I have to say, because that would take a book, and it would be a week before you knew that I’m free, I love you, and we shall be happy! I hasten to finish because I don’t want to delay this wonderful news a single minute. I’m keeping the horses harnessed – at the return of the dove, I’m ready to go. Just tell me where you are, and wait there for me. Go, my dove: I’ve never had such need for your wings. And then return! Do you hear, my beloved: tell me nothing but where I need to go to find you. I don’t want to delay our reunion by even so long as it takes to write – I love you!

10 minutes later

Oh, woe! Woe is upon us! That man is fatal to us, beloved – perhaps even more so the second time than the first. Listen, listen, although you can’t hear me. Listen, although you may never know what I must tell you. Listen! I attached my letter as usual to the leg of our dove, this letter in which I told you everything, this letter that bore our whole future happiness. I had released little Iris, and followed her with my eyes as she sprang into the sky – when suddenly, from the other side of the cloister walls, I heard a gunshot, and saw our dove stop in its flight, flutter, and fall. I gave so agonised a shriek, I feared my soul would leave my body. Frantic, I immediately rushed from the convent. It was so obvious that I was in distress that no one tried to stop me. I’d seen in which direction the dove had fallen, and ran that way. Fifty paces beyond the walls of the cloister, I saw an officer dressed for the hunt. It was he who had shot the dove; he held it in his hands, gazing with astonishment and some regret at the letter attached to its leg. I approached him with outstretched hands, unable to say anything but “Woe! Woe! Woe!” Four steps away I stopped, faint, struck to the heart as if by lightning – this hunter, this officer, who had just shot our dove, was the same I’d seen that night on the Castelnauudary battlefield. It was that same Bitéran who shot you from your horse! We recognised each other. Oh, I tell you, his pallor was almost equal to mine; he saw me dressed as a nun, and realised who it was beneath the sister’s habit. “Ah, Madam,” he whispered, “I am truly desolate!”

And he handed me our poor dove, who struggled in his hand and fell to the ground. I picked it up – fortunately, it had only a broken wing. But she holds the secret of your location, my beloved. And this secret she keeps to herself. How can I find you if she can’t fly to you? Fly to tell you where to find me, that I’m free, that we should be happy! Oh, beyond doubt, that poor little creature has a soul. If you’d only seen, my beloved, how she looked at me as I carried her into the convent. Meanwhile, motionless and speechless, the assassin’s eyes followed me, as they’d followed me when I’d walked away through the bloodstained meadow grass of that battlefield. I don’t know if this man will ever be able to make good all the evil he’s done but if there’s no redress for this, I’ll curse him until my final hour! I laid the dove in a basket, and placed the basket in my lap. Fortunately, the wound hadn’t injured her body, just the end of her wing. I detached the blood-spattered letter from her leg. My God! My God! If not for this sudden accident, by now it would almost have reached you. Where are you? Where are you? Who will tell me where to find you? Ah, I’d sent for the convent’s doctor, and here he comes ...

4 hours later

The doctor is a fine man, a good man; he understands that existence is mysterious and strange, and sometimes the life of a dove is as precious as the life of a king. He understood when he saw my despair, and when he saw the blood-spattered letter. The injury, he said, was minor, and the dove would survive – once he took off her wing. I snatched her back, and then fell to my knees, saying “If you take her wing, you take my life. She must fly! She must fly!”

“To save the wing is much harder,” he said, “and I can’t answer for its success – but I’ll do everything I can. If all goes well, in only two or three weeks, she’ll fly once more.”

“So it will take up to three weeks – but she’ll fly! She’ll fly!”

You understand, my love: all my hope is in this. He bound her wings against her body. She seems to understand, poor thing – she can’t move but she looks at me. I put grain and water within reach of her beak but she will only take food from my hand. What to do while I wait? How can I tell you what happened? What messenger can I send to find you? How should I know, like a castaway lost at sea, in which direction to send my distress signal? Why wasn’t it one of my arms that was broken, instead of her wing?

23 June

Yes, you were right, my beloved: if I hadn’t gotten a release from my vows, there would always have been a shadow of remorse on our happiness – or, rather, we’d have had no happiness at all, for it would not have been sanctioned by God! When I told you “I’m free, let’s go off together, we’ll be happy,” I wanted that to be so but deep in my soul was a voice of regret that, no matter how strong my love, could not be silenced. Today I’m very sad, because I don’t know how to find you or see you but my conscience is clear; and when I say, when I repeat, “I love you, my husband,” I no longer feel the hollow in my heart I’d felt when I said, “Don’t worry, my beloved, we’ll be happy.” I have cared for our poor dove as I would have watched over an ailing sister. She suffers, and sometimes I can see the pain in her eyes. Then I bathe her wing in ice water, and it seems to do her good. She strokes me with her pink beak, as if to thank me. Poor dove! She has no idea how much selfishness there is in the care I give her. But you, you! My God! What must you be thinking?

1 July

Two months have passed, and still no news. My eyes are worn out from scanning the horizon, vainly seeking our beloved dove. Each black dot I see in the sky, I think, “This is it...” and then after a moment, I realise my mistake, and my chest that had heaved with hope, deflates with a sigh. No matter: I still wait, I still hope. You live; you love me; why am I so desperate for happiness? But ... the time passes. It’s now two months since you left. If I calculate correctly, it’s eight or ten days since you should have returned. O my God! My God! Would you deny me, and turn this heart to bronze? Even though she said she still loves me? Lord my God, do not abandon us!

2 July

Oh! If you knew, poor beloved of my heart, everything I’ve written to you in the last fortnight! In there, you’d see a whole world of thoughts, desires, hopes, regrets, and memories! If we’re ever reunited – God willing, and as I ardently pray every day, and more so at night! – if we’re ever reunited, you’ll read all of it, and then, only then, I swear to you, will you understand how much you were loved! If we never meet again ... oh, all the tortures of hell are wrapped up in that fear ... well, it is I who will reread these letters, it is I who will daily add another note more desperate than that of the day before, it is I who, until I die, will still write “I love you!”

Each day I think I’ve exhausted all the anguish and joy in my heart – and then I feel that ahead there are still depths of joy or pain I’ve not yet glimpsed! Tomorrow! Why does my hand shake so when writing that word? It’s because tomorrow will be the day that decides my life; tomorrow, I’ll see if our dove can fly. It’s already three days since she left the basket; she moves about the room, she stretches her wings, she flits from the door to the window. She seems to understand, poor thing, how important it is for us that she finds the strength to fly. Tomorrow! Tomorrow! Tomorrow! I will write a short note for her to carry, so as not to load her with unnecessary weight. Just a few words but enough to tell you everything. Tomorrow, my beloved! I’ll spend the night in prayer. I won’t even try to sleep, it would be useless. What are you doing to us, God? Do you doubt how much I love, and how much I suffer?

6 July

It’s dawn, beloved, and as I told you, I haven’t slept for a moment. I spent the night in prayer; I hope God has heard me, and that today you’ll know where I am, that I’m free and waiting for you. The dove is even more anxious than I; it beats against the window with its beak and its wings. We’ll open that window, little one! God grant that your wing is strong enough for the trip you’re about to take. I interrupt this long letter to write the short note she will carry to you – or perhaps, alas, only try to carry to you!

4<sup>am</sup>

Oh my dove happens to reach you, my beloved, read this post and leave without losing a second – as I would do myself, if only I knew where to find you. I’m free, I love you, and I await you at the convent of Montolieu, between Foix and Tarascon, on the banks of the Ariège. You’ll see why I don’t write more, why this note is so short, and the paper so thin. You’ll know all this and a thousand things more, all our misfortunes, our fears, our hopes, if our beloved messenger reaches you – for if that happens, you'll set out at once, won't you? I await you, my beloved, as the blind await the light, as the dying hope for life, and as the dead await resurrection. Go, beloved dove, go!

5AM

We are accursed! Oh, my beloved, what have we come to? There's nothing left for me but to die in tears and despair. She cannot fly; after a hundred paces her wing faltered, and she landed in the topmost branches of a poplar she was trying to fly over – but she flew right into it and, branch by branch, fell to the ground. I ran to her, arms outstretched, heart breaking – I ran with a moan that became a cry of pain. I picked her up, and she rested a moment, and again tried to fly – and again she fell! And I fell beside her in despair, rolling on the ground, tearing at the grass with my hands and my teeth. My God! My God! What will become of me? I was too proud, too happy, too certain of bliss, I had it all in my grasp, and then fate struck me down and my dearest treasure is gone. O my Lord! Send me an inspiration, a light, a hope! Lord, Lord, help me! Pity me, O Lord! I'm going mad ... wait. Wait. Divine goodness, you hear me! You answer me! Listen, listen, beloved, hope has revived in my heart, hope that comes to me from on high. Listen! From my window, I've often watched the flight of our dove, from when she departs to a distance of, if I'm not mistaken, two or three leagues. She passes over the sources of the broad stream that flows into the Ariège at Foix. She flies over the small wood of Amourtièr, then above the Salat between Saint-Girons and Oust. Well, here's what I'll do: I'll don a pilgrim's cloak, and then begin looking for you, starting at the small village of Rieupregan. I always lose sight of the dove near that village; once I've passed it, I'll find which way to go from her. She can fly about a hundred paces at a time. So, I'll let her fly a hundred paces, rest for a while, and then fly another hundred. She'll be my guide, and I'll follow her like the Hebrews followed the column of flame by night and the column of smoke by day – because I, too, am in search of the Promised Land, and I'll find it, or die of pain or exhaustion along the way. Alas, I know the road will be long! Poor dove, forgive me for how I'll make you suffer, a martyr to our love! The dear thing won't be able to go more than one or two leagues a day – but no matter, my beloved, for if it takes the rest of my life to find you ... oh! Then I'll seek you for the rest of my life. So I'm leaving – today immediately. I've told our mother superior everything – everything, except your name. She's a worthy woman, a holy woman, who's suffered along with my pain and cried along with my tears. She offered to send someone to accompany me but I refused. I don't want anyone; what I must do I understand, instinctively, involves only heaven and myself. But I promised to write to her if I found you. If I don't write, she'll know I've died, or gone mad, or hidden myself away in the corner of some wood or along a back road on the bank of a lonely river. I go, carrying with me all these letters I've written that you haven't received, that perhaps you'll never receive. Oh, if one day I can drop them all at your feet and tell you, "Read! Read, my beloved!" You will see, on that day, how I've suffered – but on that day, how happy I'll be! I go now; it's three o'clock in the afternoon, and I hope to make it to Rieupregan before the end of the day.

7 July

At night, before leaving, I passed through the chapel, in order to bring God, as it were, along with me. I prostrated myself before the altar, pressed my forehead on the carved stone where the sculptor had carved a cross, and I prayed. Oh, it's true: there is a comfort in prayer. Prayer is the green knoll where one sits and rests after a tiring journey. Prayer is the cool stream where one finds refreshment in the middle of the desert. I left the chapel full of strength and hope, feeling like God had attached angel's wings to my shoulders. It has always been prayer that lifted me from the earth and carried me to the Lord. This is only a test, Lord, is it not? You haven't cursed me, have you, my Lord? That's not what I'll find, will I, Lord, at the end of this road I've only just begun? Wait for me, beloved, wait for me, because I swear, one day soon I'll get there.

I've paused for a moment to lean on the sill of a window that looks out toward the village of Boussenac. That village is along my road, and I'll reach it tomorrow, unless our dove takes me a different way. A dog is sadly howling, probably lost in the small wood I see to my right, a dark blot on the landscape. I said to myself: "If the dog stops howling, it will be a good omen, a sign that I'll find him."

And the dog fell silent. One is superstitious when suffering, don't you think, my heart's beloved? Are you suffering, too? Dear God, what a beautiful night! I imagine you're at your window as I am at this one, looking toward me as I look toward you, thinking about me and God, as I think about God and you. Did you see that lovely shooting star that carved a fiery furrow across the sky? How many miles did it cover in just a second? Oh, if only I had the power to reach you in a second, even if, as I arrived, I sparked and burned out! I would embrace such a bright second of happiness, even if what followed was eternal night. Tomorrow, my beloved – tomorrow, I hope, I will be nearer to you than ever.

9 July

I've stopped at a small village named Soulan. Dear God, what a storm! What had the Earth done for the Lord to menace it in such a terrible voice? The water fell in torrents and swelled the Salat, making it impossible to ford. I'd have to go back to Saint-Girons to find a bridge, and that would cost me two days. I've been told that tomorrow, once the river ebbs to its usual level, I should be able to resume my journey. Oh! A day lost! A day during which you await me! A day in which, perhaps, you'll lose hope in me!

12 July

Evening in the village of Alos, a farmer agreed to be my guide, and I crossed the river on his mule. In the river there was a moment, only a third of the way across, when all was almost lost – the beast stumbled in its footing, and I looked up to heaven, crossed my hands on my chest, and said, “If I die, my God, you know I died for him.” But you see, all must be well, since I didn’t die.

15 July

My marathon continues, guided as ever by our dove. On the 13th, we went from Alos to Castillon; that was a big day for our poor girl. I should have been sorrier for her – we must have gone three leagues. The next day, the 14th, I was repaid for my cruelty of the day before, as we made barely a league. Now it's the 15th, and I've reached Saint-Larry, just across a small unnamed stream that flows into the Salat. At least I'm sure I'm on the right road. The dove doesn't hesitate for a moment, doesn't deviate for a second. She goes straight ahead without pause. Only, time is passing, while still you wait. Time is flying toward the day you take your vow. Oh, that vow, be in no haste to take it, beloved! Believe in me, believe in your Isabelle. If you doubt me for a moment, it could cost us everything.

18 July

For three days I've wandered almost at random, through woods and along streams. Alas, the air lacks the obstacles of the land, and the dove often goes where I can't! I confess, O my beloved that for once my courage and strength have failed me, and I've collapsed at the foot of a tree, desperate and dying. It's already eleven days since I left, and I've covered only fifteen to eighteen leagues of what she flew in only an hour when she was our messenger of love, flying fast as an arrow above the miserable beings who call themselves kings of creation but haven't the abilities of a bird, and must take eleven days to travel what a dove can do in an hour. Tell me, how can it be that a wretched magnetic needle knows where north is, while I, a thinking being, made in the image of God, don't know where you are? How it is a ship can sail from one point in the world, go to the far side of the Earth and find a particular island in the ocean, while I can't seem to find you, though you were close enough to speak to or reach out and touch? Oh, I know well, dear God, that if I want to find him, it's not to him but to you that I must reach out. My God, support me! My God, go with me! My God, guide me!

29 July

return to my senses; to daylight; to life. I nearly died, my beloved – and few would disbelieve that then, at last, I'd know where you are, for the dead know everything; few would disbelieve that the ghost of your Isabelle could enter your cell at night, in the hour when the spirits walk. And that's why I wish to live. If you saw my shadow, you'd have known I was dead – whereas if you see neither my shadow nor my body, you may think I've only forgotten or betrayed you. Don't say, alas, that you no longer believe in me! For I haven't forgotten or betrayed you – I love you! I love you! I nearly died – that's all. Do you remember the dying soldier I saw that night, who'd dragged himself to the stream, leaking his last drops of blood, gasping his last breath, yearning for water, and then dying at his first swallow? Well, that was almost me. After a long trek through a forest that I was told was called the Mauleon, I arrived breathless at a spring. This spring came right out of the rock, and was icy cold. I drank, thinking it would restore my strength and I could continue my journey. I continued but walked for only a hundred steps and then stopped, shivering. A chill overcame me, and I fainted beside the small path I was following. I don't know what happened after I passed out. All I know is that yesterday, when I came to, the light was very dim. I looked around and found myself in a fairly clean room, on a bed, watched from its foot by an unknown woman. Beside me on the bed perched our dove, stroking my cheek with her poor wounded wing. This woman had found me while returning with two men from the Mauleon market. They saw I was still breathing, took pity on me, and brought me where I am now. Where I am is a small village near Nestier, or so I've been told. The room I'm in must be at some altitude, because from my bed, out the windows I can see only sky. The sky! The sky is the only road to he who awaits me. Yesterday I asked the date, and was told it was July 28. Alas! I've spent more than twenty days in my wandering. Where am I – near to you, or far? I asked for paper, ink, and a pen but after tracing just a few letters, my head was swimming and I couldn't continue. Tonight I'm better, and can write almost without tiring – I've had to stop only three or four times so far while writing this letter. I thanked the woman who was watching over me. I no longer need constant care, I'm better, I feel strong. Tonight I'll try to get up, and tomorrow resume my journey. It would kill me to just lie here while you're waiting for me – as you'd expect, wouldn't you, my heart's beloved, who waits for me? The dove is also well rested. I hope it will be capable of longer flights, and therefore guide me to you more quickly. I'd planned to spend all night in writing to you but I'd overestimated my strength. I must stop. I must say goodnight to you – my ears are ringing, the room spins around me, and my pen seems to trace letters of fire. Ah...!

9<sub>AM</sub>

I slept for two hours or so, a horrible, restless sleep more like delirium. Fortunately, upon opening my eyes, I saw the day was almost born. O my beloved, what a beautiful thing daybreak would be, if we were near each other, and watched together as the stars disappeared – all those stars whose names you know, and that merge and disappear into the ether ahead of the sun, who chases them and appears in his turn! I just opened my window to gaze out upon a huge expanse. Alas! The more land I see, the more lost I feel. My God! The love story of Theseus and Ariadne, was it truly just a fable? My prayer, deep, ardent, and eternal, is that you'll send me some blessed angel who will bring me a thread that leads me to him. Oh! I listen; I watch; I wait. But there is nothing, dear God, nothing! Only the sun, that is to say, your image that, still tinted pink, colours the atmosphere above and the mountain behind which it rises. If only my heart were calm, this spectacle would be beautiful. The hills emerge, their blue outlines silhouetted against the golden rays, showing their lovely and graceful forms. The ridge of mountains that girds the southern horizon is vast and beautiful, with snowy peaks that shimmer and sparkle like the flames of a divine star. A great river appears crossing the plain, broad and majestic, like ... oh, my God! My God, I can't be mistaken! The angel I begged for, pleaded for – he came, invisible but real! Those hills behind which the sun rises, the double crest he tops, these snowy mountains that seem like silver pillars supporting the vault of heaven, that great river flowing from north to south taking in tributaries as a sovereign receives his subjects ... it's the hills, the mountains, the river he described to me, that he sees from his window. My horizon is his! My God – did I lose my way, only to find at last my road to him? Did you close my eyes, just to show me the light I'd see when they opened? My God! Your mercy is infinite! You are great, you are holy, you are good, and it is only on my knees that I should address you. Kneel, therefore, faithless heart who doubted the goodness of the Lord! On your knees! On your knees!

30 July

4AM

I have thanked God, and I depart. My strength came back to me with my faith. I was weak only because I was desperate. But first, a final look. Oh, it's your picture to the life, my beloved! Painter, I have seen your vision! Poet, it is as you described so well! There are the peaks of the Pyrenees, changing from white to shining silver; their dark sides gradually lightening from black to purple, from purple to blue, as a flood of light flows down from the high peaks; there the daylight spreads across the plain, there are the streams that glisten like silver strands, there the river that twists and undulates like a ribbon of satin; here are the birds singing in the oleander bushes, the pomegranates and clumps of myrtle; and there flies the eagle, king of the sky, circling in the ether. Oh, my beloved! We are joined in vision, and I see what you see. Only, from where do you see it? Wait, wait, your letter is here. Oh, your letters, they don't leave my side for a moment; when I die, they'll be next to my heart, and those who lay me in the grave will be charged under pain of sacrilege to bury them with me. From where do you see it?

Dear God, it's as if I just read it. Fortunately, I know them by heart – if I lose them, I could rewrite them without missing a word, I've read them so often. "My window is surrounded by a luxuriant jasmine whose branches are laden with flowers; they scent my room as they open with the rising sun."

That's it! That's it! The sun has just risen to my left, so you are to my right. "The plateau beneath me slopes down from south to north, from the mountains to the plains."

That's it, exactly. Yes, that's the very horizon. Thank you, Lord, for making the day so clear!

Yonder are the highlands where I'll find your hermitage. Oh, why are they still so far away, and why is the human eye so feeble? I see hundreds of white specks scattered among the green trees – which of all these white specks is your hermitage? Oh, darling dove – beloved dove – dove, daughter of heaven – it's up to you to tell me that. I go, my beloved, I go; each minute of delay is a minute stolen from our happiness; to delay is to tempt Providence. For wasn't it only by the delay of a minute that you lost me? Come, dove! Yes, tomorrow, perhaps even tonight, we'll see him again!

31 July

The night has interrupted my search, beloved – but hope, I hope! I questioned everyone I met, and was finally shown, on a distant ridge, a Camaldolese monastery, and near it a small house that looks to me like the one you described. I saw it shining through the rising mists of evening; perhaps it's yours, perhaps you looked out over your horizon without knowing that it hid, invisible to your eyes, a poor, anxious creature who lives only for you, and will die without you. I was told that that small house is inhabited by a recluse, a sage and man of God but one still young and handsome. That man is you, my beloved, is it not? It's you. And if so, during the day sometimes you must visit the village of Camons where I am now. You once visited a poor carpenter who broke his leg falling from a roof; you took care of him, and healed him. When the whole family kneeled before you as you were leaving, you said, "if you are consoled, pray for the consoler." Oh, that's you – I recognise your sorrowful way of speaking. You wait for me, not knowing what's become of me, and you suffer. You suffer, because you doubt. Oh, man must always doubt; if you didn't doubt, I'd think you were dead. To think that if I'd arrived here only two hours earlier, I might perhaps have met you! I say perhaps, for if I was sure it had been you, it would break me – I'd hire a guide, I'd even have them carry me.

But what if I was wrong? Our dove’s instinct is the best guide of all; she hasn’t deviated for a moment. If by some fate I just missed you, I can still rely on her. What are you doing at this moment, wherever you are, my beloved? Unless you are thinking of God, I hope you’re thinking of me. It’s eleven o’clock. Tomorrow! Tomorrow! This great hope, too strong not to have come from heaven, says I’ll see you – tomorrow.

11 o’clock

I don’t know if you’re returning to me, heart’s beloved but hurry, hurry – midnight approaches, and the stroke of midnight will end the last day of my life as part of the world. Tomorrow is the day on which I’m to take my vows. I waited religiously for the full three months but I cannot forever postpone my promise to God. God speaks to me, since you are silent; God calls me, since you leave me alone. Oh, it’s not without deep sorrow that I renounce this hope. If only you had come, if but for a moment. I have dwelled, body and soul, in the past, that is to say, in happiness; it will cost me more to set aside that happiness than it would cost me to set aside life. The life of the cloister, no matter what people say, is neither death of the body nor death of the soul. I have often examined corpses, cast my eyes over their pale and livid faces, and it’s only the material flesh that has broken down. No dream stirs in those sleeping brains, no pain, physical or moral, afflicts those flaccid fibres. I have often examined, on the other hand, these living corpses called monks. Their faces are as pale or paler than those of the dead but their visages are not those of the deceased: tears flow forever from their hearts, a deep and inexhaustible source that reddens their eyes, sinking them in their sockets, and ploughs bitter furrows down their cheeks. By this we recognise God’s suffering elect, whom I hope, at least, derive some comfort from his love. The nervous energy that drives the living animates them only with sadness. It’s neither the composure of life nor the quiet of the grave; it’s the agony, the fever of slow consumption, the withering from this world to the next, from life to death, from the cradle to the grave. Well, Isabelle, I can fool myself no longer, and postpone the abyss by plumbing its depths; I, too, will embark on this agony, in hopes it will quickly carry me to death! Goodbye. I shall spend the night in prayer. The monastery bells will sound at two o’clock to say that a soul, though not a body, is leaving the earth for heaven. At nine in the morning, those who will be my brothers in God will come for me.

1 August

5<sup>AM</sup>

I just saw my life’s last rising of the sun. He has never been brighter, more splendid, and more magnificent. What matter to him the pains of this poor little world he illuminates? What matter the tears I shed that drown this paper? I’ve watched his dawn break for but ten short minutes, and already he drinks the dew that trembles at the tip of a blade of grass, or glistens like a diamond in the pedalled chalice of a flower. I shall never see his dawn again. The cell assigned to me looks into a high-walled courtyard; through an archway, I can just glimpse the corner of the cemetery. I’ll try to have them put my grave in that corner – I want it to be as close as possible, so the journey will be short. Now, pray!

9<sup>AM</sup>

The chanting approaches; they’re coming for me. I don’t want those men coming in here. I don’t want them to see your letters, or what I’ve been writing. I don’t want them to see my tears. I’ll wait on the threshold. My soul remains with you: they bear away only my corpse. Goodbye! The cry that rose from all of creation at the death of the Son of God was not deeper, more agonizing, or more lamentable than that which I utter at the death of our love. Goodbye! Goodbye! Goodbye!

10 o’clock

Your empty chamber! Your letter, wet with tears! Your final goodbye! I arrived half an hour too late. If only your vows have not yet been spoken! My God! My God! Give me strength. Oh, dove, my dove, if only I had your wings, broken though they are!

(This fragment of a letter was found in the archives of the Ursuline Convent at Montolieu but the first part is missing.)

...At daybreak I left the village of Camons, where I told you, dear Mother Superior, everything had led me to believe he sometimes spent the day. I had questioned the entire family of the poor injured carpenter, and I would have known him from their descriptions, even if my heart hadn’t already told me it was him. Moreover, the words he’d spoken upon leaving them – “If you are consoled, pray for the consoler” – those could have come only from a suffering soul preparing to give himself to God. My strength was restored by the hope of seeing him again. I set out on foot, for if I took a horse or a carriage, I’d have to make a wide detour to reach that white speck beside the vast, dark Camaldolese monastery that, though almost three leagues off as the crow flies, sent me the sound of its bells on the wings of the wind. Upon leaving the village, I let fly the dove. The poor dear made one of its longest flights, nearly two hundred paces toward the house my eyes devoured. There was no doubt – I was headed toward the goal she’d shown me with the last of her strength. Unfortunately, there was no marked path; I had to follow the slope of the mountain, sometimes split by ravines, sometimes crossed by streams, sometimes cloaked with small woods which I dared not enter, for fear of losing myself. I walked three hours without pause but due to these detours, I covered only two leagues. The house was often out of sight, and without my darling dove, I’d have been lost. I cast her in the air and followed wherever her flight led me. Finally, it seemed to me my route became a bit easier. I heard the bells of a small village sounding eight o’clock; I don’t know why but the tone of the bells seemed so sad, I felt my heart clench. It seemed that every hour as it passed me on wings of bronze, pealed out, “Hurry! Hurry!”

So I hurried, and soon I could distinguish the details of the house. As I approached, I recognised it from the description he’d given me: the window through which he watched the sun rise, and the jasmine that shaded the window and seemed to me like a green palisade. For a moment I thought I could see him in that window, and whether illusion or reality, I spread my arms and shouted. Alas! He was still over a mile away, and neither saw nor heard me. The bells of the monastery were ringing. I remembered the continual peals of the bells the night before I took the veil, and a terrible suspicion crept into my mind and heart that these bells tolled for the same reason. But I shook my head and told myself, “No, no, no!”

As I approached, I saw a long procession of monks make their way to the little white house and then, moments later, return toward the monastery. Who did they seek in that house? Someone alive – or dead? Soon I’d know, for I was barely a hundred steps from the house, when suddenly a deep mountain stream barred my way. It was a steep cascade, muddy and full of rocks, so deep I didn’t dare try to cross it. I climbed toward its source, despite my fatigue but it felt like I’d never reach that house before my fleeting strength abandoned me. After a quarter hour’s walk, I found a tree that had fallen across the chasm. At any other time, I wouldn’t have dared to venture upon so flimsy a bridge. But I leaped onto it, my feet sure, my eye fixed on the far side, and then I was across. There I found, instead of obstacles, a sort of paved path, so I went ever faster as I approached. I reached my desired goal; the door was open; I crossed the threshold; a stairway opened to my right, and I rushed up it without calling out. I hadn’t dared breathe since passing the doorway – I was convinced I’d find an empty room. The chamber was empty, the window open, and a letter was on the table, all wet with tears. This letter, O my mother! It was less than half an hour old, and it was his final farewell. I had arrived half an hour too late: he was at the church, taking his vows. I felt the house shiver beneath my feet; everything seemed to spin around me. I began a shriek that would end as my last breath, when suddenly the thought came that maybe his sacrifice wasn’t yet made, his vows were not yet pronounced. I rushed out of the house, instinctively taking my dove that had perched on a branch of the blessed jasmine. The monastery was no more than a hundred paces away but I felt my strength would fail me before I reached the church. My brain was empty of thought, my lungs gasped for air. I heard the priests singing the Magnificat. I heard the organ playing the Veni Creator. My God! I had only seconds, no more. And woe betide me! As luck would have it, I’d gone around the wrong side of the apse – the door was on the other side. The window to the nave was open – but how could I hope my voice would be heard above the organ and the chanting of the monks? I tried to shout but all my chest could produce was a dull rattle. It was a moment in which it seemed all was lost, all was in vain. My mind was confusion, my thoughts were a blur – and then, in the midst of this chaos came a light, and a fire lit my heart. I cast my dove through the window, and fell in a swoon. Heaven be praised! When I came to, I was in his arms. He already wore the robe of a monk and had the tonsure of a priest – but he was mine! Mine! Mine! Then, and forever. The oath was upon his lips when the dove, like the Holy Spirit descending on a sunbeam, had interrupted it. Beloved dove, your image will be carved on our tomb, asleep in our intertwined hands! I promised I would write to you if I found him, Mother Superior. God, in his infinite mercy, has allowed me to find him – and so I write.

Your respectful and ever grateful daughter,

Isabelle de Lautrec, the Countess of Moret

Palermo

10 September 1638

BOOK IV
20 YEARS AFTER
171

The Ghost of Richelieu

In a chamber of the Palais Cardinal, or Royal Palace as it was now known, near a vermeil-gilded table stacked with books and papers sat a man with his head resting on his hands. Behind him was a vast fireplace, glowing with heat, with flaming embers crackling over large gilded andirons. The glow from the fireplace lit the dreamer’s magnificent robes from behind, as the flickering light from a grand candelabra illuminated the front. To see this crimson robe edged with intricate lace, this pale forehead bent in meditation in the solitude of his study, to hear the silence of its antechambers and the measured tread of the guards outside on the landing, one might have thought the shadow of Cardinal Richelieu (Mazarin) still haunted this room. Alas! It was no more than the shadow of that great man. France badly weakened, the authority of the king disregarded, the Great Nobles once more strong and defiant, foreign enemies menacing the borders – all testified that Richelieu was no more. But more than anything, the proof that this red-robed form was not that of the former cardinal was his isolation that seemed, as we’ve said, more like that of a ghost than a living man. It was the halls devoid of courtiers; the courtyard bristling with guards; the air of disdain and derision blowing in through the windows from the streets, the breath of a whole city united against this minister; and finally, from near and far, the rattling of gunfire, not, fortunately, aimed with intent to injure, so much as to show the guards – the Swiss, the musketeers, and the soldiers stationed around the Royal Palace – that the people, too, had arms. But Mazarin now stood alone and knew his weakness. “Foreigner!” he muttered. “Italian!” These are the words they use as curses. With these same words they assassinated and dismembered Concini – and if I let them, they’d do the same to me, tear me limb from limb, though I’ve never done anything worse than just squeeze them a little. Fools! Unable to see that their enemy isn’t this Italian who speaks poor French but rather those lords who feed them fine words in a pure Parisian accent. Yes, yes,” continued the minister, pale lips smiling a subtle and incongruous smile. “Yes, you tell yourselves that the fortunes of favourites are precarious – but you should know I’m no ordinary favourite! Though the Earl of Essex wore a splendid diamond-crusted ring given him by his royal mistress, and I wear only a simple ring engraved with a number and a date, my ring has been consecrated by a vow in the Royal Palace chapel. They won’t break me to their will! Let them join their eternal call of ‘Down with Mazarin!’ to cries of ‘Long live Sir de Beaufort!’ or ‘Long live Sir Prince!’ or even ‘Long live the Parliament!’ Well – Sir de Beaufort* is locked up in Vincennes, the Prince de Condé* may join him any day, and as for parliament...”

Here the cardinal’s smile twisted into an expression of hatred more virulent than seemed possible on such a mild face. “Well, as to parliament ... parliament, too, will get what’s coming to it. We have the royal strongholds of Orléans and Montargis. We have time. In time, all those who today shout, ‘Down with Mazarin!’ will in their turn shout, ‘Down with the princes.’ Richelieu, whom they hated while he lived but can’t stop talking about now that he’s dead – he had worse days than this, when he feared he’d be dismissed, or seemed actually forced out. But Queen Anne* will never dismiss me – and if the people force me out, she will go with me. Then we’ll see how the rebels like having neither a king nor a queen! Oh, if only I wasn’t a foreigner! If only I were French, and a nobleman!”

He fell back into his reverie. Indeed, the situation was dire, and the day that had just ended had made it more complicated still. Mazarin, always driven by sordid avarice, was crushing the people with taxes. In the words of Advocate General Talon, the people had been left with nothing but their souls, and still had those only because they couldn’t be sold at auction. The people had been advised to be patient, as great victories were in the offing but since glory couldn’t feed empty mouths, the people used their mouths for muttering their discontent. But that wasn’t all, because when it’s only the people who complain, the Royal Court, insulated by the bourgeoisie and the gentry, doesn’t hear it. However, Mazarin had been so reckless as to offend the magistrates! He had created offices for twelve newly made Judges of Requests and sold them, and as the existing judges had paid high prices for their positions, and the addition of twelve new colleagues could only dilute their value, the magistrates had united against him. They’d sworn on the Gospels to oppose these appointments and to resist all encroachments from the Court, promising each other that any member who lost his office by this rebellion would be reimbursed by the others. Now, here’s how the conflict played out:

On 7 January 1648, 700 or 800 mutinous Parisian merchants had gathered to protest a new tax on business owners, sending 10 delegates to talk to Prince Gaston, the Duke of Orléans* who had always been popular with them. The duke, receiving them, had been told they were determined not to pay this new tax, and were even willing to take up arms against anyone the king might send to collect it. The Duke of Orléans listened politely to them that gave them hope; he promised to speak to the queen about it and dismissed them with the usual response of princes: “We’ll see.”

For their part, on the ninth the Judges of Requests came before the cardinal, and their designated representative spoke so firmly and fearlessly the cardinal had been astonished. He gave them the same response the Duke of Orléans had given the merchants: “We’ll see.”

So, in order to see, the King's Council had assembled and sent for d'Émery, the superintendent of finances. This d'Émery was widely despised by the people, first of all because he was the superintendent of finances, and all superintendents of finances should be despised, and second because, it's fair to say, he deserved it. He was the son of a banker of Lyon named Particelli who had, after filing for bankruptcy, changed his name to d'Émery. Cardinal Richelieu, who recognised his merits as a financier, had presented him to King Louis XIII* under this new name, recommending d'Émery for the position of superintendent of finances, and the king had agreed. "Excellent!" he'd said. "I'm glad to hear about this Sir d'Émery, as we need an honest man for the post. I'd thought you were going to sponsor that swindler Particelli for the job and was afraid you'd persuade me to agree."

"Sire!" replied the cardinal. "Don't worry, that Particelli you mentioned has been hanged."

"All the better!" said the king. "It's not for nothing that I'm known as Louis the Just."

And he'd signed the appointment of Sir d'Émery. It was this same Superintendent d'Émery who'd been sent for by Prime Minister Mazarin. He rushed in pale and frightened, saying his son had been nearly assassinated that day on the Place du Palais; a crowd had confronted him, complaining of the extravagance of his wife, who'd decorated their home with hangings of red velvet trimmed with gold fringe. She was the daughter of Nicolas Le Camus, who'd come to Paris with just twenty livres but had by 1617 become royal secretary. His salary had been only forty thousand livres but somehow his children had received an inheritance of nine million. D'Émery's son had barely avoided violent suffocation at the hands of the mob that had threatened to squeeze all the stolen gold out of him. So, the council decided to take no action that day, as the superintendent was in no condition to think straight. The following day, First President of Parliament Mathieu Mole, whose courage in these affairs, according to Cardinal de Retz, was equal to that of the Duke Beaufort or of Sir Prince de Condé – the two men who were considered the bravest in France – the next day, we say, the first president was attacked in his turn. The people threatened to take him to task for the ills they were suffering but the first president, always unflappable and self-possessed, replied with his usual calm that if the malcontents didn't bend to the king's will, he would erect enough gallows in the squares to hang the lot of them. To which they replied that they asked nothing better than some new gibbets, as they would serve to hang those judges who bought favour from Court at the cost of the misery of the people. There was more: on the eleventh, when the queen went to mass at Notre Dame, as she did every Saturday, she was met by over two hundred women crying out and demanding justice. They had no worse intention than that, wishing only to kneel before her to try to move her to pity but the guards kept them back, and the queen, haughty and proud, passed without paying any attention to their cries. That afternoon, the King's Council met again; it resolved to maintain the royal authority, and summoned parliament to convene on the following day, the twelfth. That day, on the evening of which our story begins, started when King Louis XIV, then ten years old and just recovered from smallpox, had gone to Notre Dame to give thanks for his deliverance. This gave him a pretext for calling out his troops – guards, Swiss, and musketeers – and posting them around the Royal Palace, on the Pont Neuf, and on his route along the quays. After hearing mass the king had made a surprise call on parliament, where he held an impromptu lit de justice, confirming all his previous tax edicts as well as issuing five or six new ones, each one, according to Cardinal de Retz, more ruinous than the last. The new measures were loudly opposed by President Blancmesnil and Councillor Broussel. Furthermore, the first president, who as we saw had supported the king only the day before, indignantly protested this high-handed method of bringing the king in person to impose the royal will on parliament. These edicts decreed, the king returned to the Royal Palace. Crowds of people lined his way but though they knew he came from parliament, they didn't know whether he'd gone to demand justice for the people or to oppress them further, so no cheers greeted his passing, and there were no felicitations on his return to health. Every face was anxious or gloomy, and some were even threatening. Though the king had passed, the troops remained in position; it was feared there would be riots once word of the decrees at parliament got around – and indeed, at the merest rumour that, instead of rolling taxes back, the king had increased them, crowds began to gather. Soon a great clamour filled the streets, with shouts of "Down with Mazarin!" as well as "Long live Broussel" and "Long live Blancmesnil."

The people knew that Broussel and Blancmesnil had spoken out on their behalf, and though their eloquence had been to no avail, it had won them the citizens' goodwill. Attempts were made to dispel these crowds and silence their shouts but as often happens, that served only to increase the throngs and redouble their cries. The Royal Guards and the Swiss were first ordered to stand firm, and then sent to patrol Rue Saint-Denis and Rue Saint-Martin, where the crowds seemed thickest and most animated. At this point the merchants' provost appeared at the gates of the Royal Palace, and was immediately admitted. He came to say that if the troops weren't ordered to stand down, all of Paris would be under arms within two hours. While the options were being debated, Lieutenant of the Guards Comminges* came in from the street, his clothes torn and his face bloodied. Seeing him, the queen cried out in surprise and asked what had happened. As the provost had predicted, the sight of the guards had inflamed the crowds. They had swarmed the belfries and rung the tocsin. Comminges had stood firm and arrested a man who appeared to be one of the leading agitators, and then, in order to make an example of him, ordered the man hanged from the Croix du Trahoir. The soldiers had moved to carry out this order but were attacked with stones and halberds by rioters from Les Halles. The rebel had taken advantage of the chaos to escape, reaching the Rue des Lombards, where he'd disappeared into a house. Despite an aggressive search, they couldn't catch the culprit. Comminges had posted sentries in the street and then, with the rest of his detachment, returned to the Royal Palace to report these events to the queen. They were followed all the way back by threats and curses, several of his men were wounded by pikes and halberds, and he himself had been cracked over the eyebrow by a stone. Comminges's report only confirmed the advice of the merchant's provost. The authorities were unprepared to withstand a serious revolt; the cardinal had the rumour spread among the people that the troops stationed along the quays and the Pont Neuf were there only for the ceremony and were being withdrawn. Indeed, by four in the afternoon they were all concentrated around the Royal Palace, with a detachment at the Barrière des Sergents, another at the Quinze-Vingts, and a third at the Butte Saint-Roch. They filled the courtyards with Swiss Guards and musketeers, and they waited. This is where things stood when we introduced our readers to Cardinal Mazarin's study that had once belonged to Cardinal Richelieu. We saw in what state of mind he heard the crowd noises and gunshots that echoed into his windows. Suddenly he looked up with a determined expression, like a man who has made up his mind. He stared at a huge clock that was on the verge of striking ten, reached for a silvered whistle placed on the table within reach of his hand, and trilled on it twice. A hidden door in a tapestry opened soundlessly, and a man dressed in black emerged and moved silently to stand behind the cardinal's chair. "Bernouin," said the cardinal without turning, for having whistled twice he knew it was his valet, "that King's Musketeers are guarding the palace?"

"The Black Musketeers, My Lord."

"Which company?"

"Tréville's."

"Is there an officer of that company in the antechamber?"

"Lieutenant d'Artagnan."*

"He's a good one, I believe?"

"Yes, My Lord."

"Get me a musketeer's uniform and help me into it."

The valet went out as quietly as he'd entered, and returned a few moments later, carrying the requested outfit. Silent and thoughtful, the cardinal began removing the ceremonial robes he'd worn to attend the session of parliament and then donned the military uniform that he wore with a certain ease thanks to his time in the Italian campaigns. Once he was fully dressed, he said, "Get me Sir d'Artagnan."

And the valet, silent and mute as ever, went out through the antechamber door like a shadow. Left alone, the cardinal regarded himself in the mirror with some satisfaction. He looked young for his forty-six years, and though a bit short, he still cut an elegant figure. His complexion was fair and smooth, his eyes expressive, his nose large but well-shaped, his brow broad and majestic. His chestnut hair curled slightly, and his beard that was darker, took a curling iron well. He straightened his baldric, then looked complacently at his hands that were handsome and of which he took great care. He removed the buckskin riding gauntlets from his belt and replaced them with simple gloves of silk. At that moment the door opened. "Sir d'Artagnan," announced the valet.

An officer entered. He was a man of thirty-nine or forty years, compact but lean and well made, with a sharp and clever eye, his goatee still black though his hair was touched with grey, as often happens when a man has lived too well or not well enough, especially if he's of dark complexion. D'Artagnan stepped into the study, recalling that he'd come into it once before in Cardinal Richelieu's time, then stopped when he saw no one within but one of his company's musketeers. At a glance he recognised the cardinal under the uniform. He remained standing in a respectful but dignified pose, as befits a gentleman who has spent much of his life among the Grands. The cardinal fixed him with a gaze more cunning than penetrating, looked him over carefully, and said after a few moments of silence, "You're Sir d'Artagnan?"

"Himself, my Lord," said the officer.

The cardinal considered for a moment that intelligent face and mobile expression restrained by years and experience; but d'Artagnan withstood the examination like a man who has been subjected to a far more piercing gaze. "Sir," said the cardinal, "come with me – or rather I'll go with you."

"I'm at your orders, My Lord," d'Artagnan replied.

"I'd like to personally inspect the guard posts around the Royal Palace. Do you think there's any danger?"

"Danger, My Lord?" asked d'Artagnan, astonished. "From where?"

"They say the people are in open revolt."

"The uniform of the King's Musketeers still commands respect, My Lord – and even if that weren't the case, I think with four of my men we could chase off a hundred of these clowns."

"Didn't you see what happened to Comminges?"

"Sir de Comminges is an officer of the guards, not the musketeers," d'Artagnan replied.

"In other words," said the cardinal, smiling, "the musketeers are better soldiers than the guards."

"Everyone prefers his own uniform, My Lord."

"Except me, Sir," the cardinal said, still smiling. "As you see, I prefer yours to my own."

"Plague, My Lord," said d'Artagnan, "now that's modesty. As for me, I confess that, if I had one of Your Eminence's grand outfits, I wouldn't need any other."

"Perhaps but to wear one of those out tonight might not be safe. Bernouin, my hat."

The valet returned, carrying a musketeer's broad-brimmed hat. The cardinal put it on, cocked it like a cavalier, and turned to d'Artagnan. "You have horses saddled in the stables, don't you?"

"Yes, My Lord."

"Very well! Let's go."

"With how many men, My Lord?"

"You said that with four men you could chase off a hundred of these rabble; we might meet two hundred, so bring eight."

"As My Lord wishes."

"I'll follow you. No, wait." The cardinal paused. "We'll go this way. Bernouin, a light." The valet brought a candle; the cardinal took a small golden key from his desk and unlocked the door of a secret staircase. A few moments later they found themselves down in the side courtyard of the Royal Palace.

172 A Night Patrol

Ten minutes later, the little troop went out through the Rue des Bons-Enfants, behind the theatre built by Cardinal Richelieu for the play Mirame, and in which Cardinal Mazarin, a patron more of music than of literature, had sponsored the production of one of the first operas performed in France. The great city showed every evidence of turmoil: large crowds roamed the streets, and despite what d'Artagnan had said, stopped to watch the soldiers pass with a menacing air of mockery that showed the citizens had temporarily traded their usual deference for insulting belligerence. From time to time a commotion was heard from the markets of Les Halles. Gunfire rattled toward Rue Saint-Denis, and occasionally, for no apparent reason, church bells were rung. D'Artagnan steered his course with the nonchalance of a man unimpressed by such nonsense. When a crowd blocked the middle of the street he rode his horse straight for them without a word of warning and, whether rebels or not, they seemed to see what manner of man they were dealing with and parted to let the patrol pass. The cardinal envied his composure that he attributed to familiarity with danger, and he regarded the officer with the esteem the cautious accord to cool courage. As they approached the detachment posted at the Barrière des Sergents, the sentry cried, "Who goes there?" D'Artagnan replied and having asked the cardinal for the passwords, advanced at the order.

The countersign was Louis and Rocroi. The passwords acknowledged, d'Artagnan asked if Sir de Comminges wasn't commander of the post. The sentry indicated an officer on foot talking to another on a horse. D'Artagnan recognised him and returned to the cardinal, saying, "There is Sir de Comminges."

The cardinal urged his horse toward them while d'Artagnan held back discreetly. However, from the way the two officers removed their hats, he knew they'd recognised His Eminence. "Bravo, Guitaut,"* said the cardinal to the mounted officer, "I see that despite your sixty-four years you're as alert and devoted as always. What were you telling this young man?"

"My Lord," replied Guitaut, "I was saying we live in unusual times, and that today looked a lot like things must have during the days of the Catholic League I heard so much about as a youth. Do you know there's even talk of the mob throwing up barricades across Rue Saint-Denis and Rue Saint-Martin?"

"And what did your nephew Comminges have to say to that, my dear Guitaut?"

"My Lord," Comminges replied, "I said that you can't make a League without the essential element of a Duke Guise. Besides, they won't repeat what they did before."

"No, this time they'll make a Fronde, as they call it," said Guitaut.

"What's that you said? A Fronde?" asked Mazarin.

"My Lord, that's the name they've given their party."

"Where does it come from?"

"Apparently several days ago Councillor Bachaumont said at the Palais that all these rowdies in the alleys were like schoolboys slinging stones – Fronding – ruffians who scatter when they see a constable, only to gather again once he's passed. The rebels picked up on the word frond, quick as a Brussels beggar, and started calling themselves Frondeurs. Since yesterday, everything is the Fronde: Fronde hats, Fronde gloves, Fronde fans, even Fronde bread, and ... well, just listen to that." A window had opened, and a man stuck out his head and began to sing:

*The Fronde wind blows
So, let her in
I think it goes
Against Mazarin
If the Fronde wind blows
We'll let her in!*

"Insolent wretch!" Guitaut growled.

"My Lord," said Comminges, whose injury had put him in a bloodthirsty mood, "shall I have that fellow shot to teach him a lesson about what to sing?"

And he reached toward the holster on his uncle's horse. "By no means!" cried Mazarin. "Diavolo! You'll spoil everything, my friend, and just when things are going so well! I know your Frenchmen as well as if I'd made them myself. If they sing the song, they'll pay the piper. During the days of the League that Guitaut was speaking of, they only sang the mass, and things ended badly for them. Come, Guitaut, let's see if they keep guard at the Quinze-Vingts as well as they do at the Barrière des Sergents."

And, with a salute to Comminges, he rejoined d'Artagnan, who assumed the lead of the little troop, followed immediately by Guitaut and the cardinal, with the rest as rear guard. "That figures," Comminges muttered, watching them ride away. "I forgot that he's satisfied so long as everyone pays."

Along Rue Saint-Honoré the people were gathered in small groups discussing the new edicts. They pitied the young king, used as a tool to plunder the people unknowingly, and blamed Mazarin for everything. They talked of appealing to the Duke of Orléans and Sir Prince, and applauded Blancmesnil and Broussel. D'Artagnan passed through these groups as inflexibly as if he and his horse were iron. Mazarin and Guitaut talked softly together, while the musketeers, who had finally recognised the cardinal, rode in silence. They reached Rue Saint-Thomas-du-Louvre and the post at the Quinze-Vingts. Guitaut beckoned to a junior officer, who advanced to report. "Well?" Guitaut asked.

"Ah! All is well on this side, my Captain but I think something is going on over there."

And he pointed toward a beautiful hôtel, or mansion, on the spot where the Vaudeville Theatre now stands. "That's not just any mansion," said Guitaut. "That's the Hôtel de Rambouillet."

"I don't know about any Rambouillet," said the officer. "All I know is I saw some pretty shady characters go in there."

"Bah!" said Guitaut, laughing. "Those are just poets."

"Bah yourself, Guitaut," said Mazarin. "I'll thank you not to speak of those gentlemen with such irreverence! Didn't you know I was a poet myself in my youth? I wrote verses in the style of Sir de Benserade."

"You, My Lord?"

"Yes, me. Shall I recite some of it?"

"Not on my account, My Lord! I don't know Italian."

"Yes but you know French, don't you, my brave Guitaut?" replied Mazarin, laying his hand in a friendly way on the officer's shoulder. "And whatever order you're given in that language, you'll follow?"

"Of course, My Lord, as I always have – provided it comes from the queen."

"Ah, yes!" said Mazarin, biting his lips. "You're absolutely devoted to her."

"Well, I have been captain of her guards for more than twenty years."

"Onward, Sir D'Artagnan," the cardinal said. "All is well here."

D'Artagnan resumed the lead of the column without saying a word, displaying the unquestioning obedience that is the hallmark of an old soldier. Passing through Rue de Richelieu and Rue Villedo, they arrived at Butte Saint-Roch, the third post. It was the most isolated, for it was just inside the walls, and the city was sparsely populated in this neighbourhood. "Who is in command here?" asked the cardinal.

"Villequier," replied Guitaut.

"The devil!" said Mazarin. "You speak with him – you know I'm at odds with him since I charged you with the arrest of the Duke Beaufort. He complained that he, as captain of the Royal Guard, should have had that honour."

"I know it, and I've told him a hundred times he was wrong. The king couldn't have given him that order, as he was barely four years old at the time."

"Yes, Guitaut but I could have ordered him on the king's behalf, and I chose you instead."

Guitaut didn't reply, just urged his horse forward, and after being recognised by the sentry, called for Sir de Villequier.

He came out. "Ah! It's you, Guitaut. What the devil are you doing here?" he said, in his usual ill-humoured tone.

"Just checking the situation in this direction."

"Why bother? There were shouts earlier of 'Long live the king!' and 'Down with Mazarin!' – But there's nothing new in that. We're used to it by now."

"And do you join in?" Guitaut replied, laughing.

"My faith, sometimes I'd like to! I think they're right, Guitaut. I'd give five years of my pay that they don't pay me, if it would only make the king five years older."

"Really? And what would happen if the king were five years older?"

"He'd be at the age of majority and could give his orders himself. I'd much rather obey the grandson of King Henry IV than the son of Pietro Mazarini. Death of the devil! I'd kill for the king. But if I got killed on account of Mazarin, like your nephew nearly was today, there's nothing in heaven worthwhile enough to console me for it."

"All right, all right, Sir de Villequier," said Mazarin, coming up. "Rest assured, I'll report your devotion to the king." Then, turning to the escort: "Let's go, Gentlemen – all is well here."

"So, Mazarin was there all along!" said Villequier. "So much the better, Guitaut – I've wanted to tell him that for a long time. You gave me the opportunity, and though I don't imagine you did it as a favour, I thank you."

And turning on his heel, he returned to the guardhouse, whistling that tune of the Frondeurs. Mazarin was thoughtful on their return. What he'd heard in succession from Comminges, Guitaut, and Villequier just confirmed his suspicion that, if it came to a crisis, he'd have nobody on his side but the queen. And yet the queen had so often abandoned her friends, it seemed to the minister that, despite his precautions, her support couldn't be counted upon. During the whole of their nocturnal ride, that is, for an hour or so, the cardinal, while studying in turn Comminges, Guitaut, and Villequier, was keeping his eye on another man. This man, self-assured despite the angry populace, responding neither to Mazarin's wry remarks nor to the catcalls of the crowd – this man seemed to him above and beyond, a person well adapted to the events taking place, and even more suited for events yet to come. The name of d'Artagnan wasn't completely unknown to Mazarin, although he hadn't come to France until around 1635 – that is, seven or eight years after the events we related in The Three Musketeers. It seemed to the cardinal that he associated that name with a person said to be a model of courage, skill, and dedication. He was so taken by this idea that he immediately wanted to learn all he could about d'Artagnan – but he couldn't exactly ask d'Artagnan about himself. From the few words he'd heard the lieutenant of musketeers say, he'd recognised the accent of Gascony, the Italians and Gascons are too much alike, and know each other too well to ever trust what any of them would say of themselves. As they arrived at the walls that enclosed the Royal Palace gardens, the cardinal knocked at a small door right about where the Café de Foy stands now, and after thanking d'Artagnan and asking him to wait in the courtyard, he gestured to Guitaut to follow him. Both dismounted, handed the bridles of their horses to the lackey who'd opened the little door, and disappeared into the garden. "My dear Guitaut," said the cardinal, leaning on the arm of the old captain of the guards, "you told me just now that you've been in the queen's service for twenty years?"

"Yes, that's the truth," Guitaut replied.

"Now, my dear Guitaut," the cardinal continued, "I know that in addition to your courage that is proven, and your loyalty that is beyond question, that you have an excellent memory."

"You've noticed that, my Lord?" said the guard captain. "The devil! Too bad for me."

"What do you mean?"

"Beyond all doubt, the most important quality of a courtier is to know how to forget."

"But you're no courtier, Guitaut, you're a brave soldier, a veteran captain from the time of King Henry IV, one of the few who are still among us."

"Plague, My Lord! Did you ask me to come with you so you could cast my horoscope?"

"No," said Mazarin, laughing, "I brought you here to ask whether you noticed our lieutenant of musketeers."

"Sir d'Artagnan?"

"Yes."

"No need for me to notice him, My Lord – I've known him for a long time."

"What kind of man is he, then?"

"What kind?" said Guitaut, surprised. "Why, he's a Gascon!"

"Yes, I know that; what I want to know is if he's a man one could trust."

"Sir de Tréville holds him in high esteem – and Tréville, as you know, is a good friend of the queen."

"I need to know if this is a man who's proven his worth."

"If you're asking if he's a brave soldier, then yes. At the Siege of La Rochelle, at Susa Pass, at Perpignan, it's said he did more than his duty."

"But you know, Guitaut, we poor ministers often need men who are more than just brave. We need people who are quick and capable. Wasn't this d'Artagnan, according to rumour, involved in some intrigue in Cardinal Richelieu's time that he managed to conclude quite cleverly?"

"As to that affair, My Lord," said Guitaut, who saw what the cardinal was getting at, "I have to tell Your Eminence that I don't know any more than what everyone knows. I never meddle in intrigues, and if I'm sometimes told things in confidence, since those secrets aren't mine to share, I'm sure My Lord won't mind if I keep them to myself."

"Upon my word," Mazarin said, shaking his head, "I've heard some ministers are actually lucky enough to get told what they need to know."

"My Lord," Guitaut replied, "those ministers don't weigh all men in the same balance. They ask men of war what they need to know about war, and intriguers about intrigue. Ask your questions of some intriguer of that period, and you'll find out what you want to know – for the right price, of course."

"Pay, by God!" said Mazarin, with the grimace he always made at the subject of payment. "Then we'll pay ... if we must."

"Does My Lord seriously wish to know the name of a man who was involved in all the conspiracies of that time?"

"Per Bacco!" Mazarin swore, as he was growing impatient. "It takes an hour to get something through that iron head of yours."

"There's one man who can tell you everything you want to know – if he'll talk."

"That's my problem."

"Ah, My Lord! It's not always easy to get someone to tell you what they don't wish to say."

"Bah! With patience, I find, one gets results. And this man is...?"

“The Count de Rochefort.”
“The Count de Rochefort!”
“Unfortunately, he disappeared four or five years ago, and I don’t know what became of him.”
“Ah but I do, Guitaut,” said Mazarin.
“Then why is Your Eminence complaining that he doesn’t know anything?”

“So,” Mazarin said, “you think that Rochefort...”
“He was Richelieu’s demon twin, My Lord – but I warn you, this will cost you dearly. The old cardinal paid his creatures well.”
“Yes, Guitaut,” said Mazarin, “Richelieu was a great man but he did have that tragic flaw. Thank you, Guitaut – I’ll try to take advantage of your advice this very evening.”

As they had arrived at the courtyard of the Royal Palace, the cardinal dismissed Guitaut with a salute; then, seeing an officer walking up and down the yard, he approached him. It was d’Artagnan, who was awaiting the return of the cardinal, as ordered. “Come, Sir d’Artagnan,” said Mazarin in his friendliest tone. “I’ve an order to give you.” D’Artagnan bowed, followed the cardinal up the secret staircase, and a moment later found himself in the office from which they’d departed. The cardinal sat down at his desk and wrote a few lines on a sheet of paper. D’Artagnan stood, impassive, waiting with neither impatience nor curiosity. He seemed like a military automaton, clockwork soldier. The cardinal folded the letter and sealed it with his ring. “Sir d’Artagnan,” he said, “you’ll carry this dispatch to the Bastille and return with the person who’s named in it. Take a carriage and escort, and guard the prisoner carefully.”
D’Artagnan took the letter, touched his hand to his hat, turned on his heel like a drill sergeant, and a moment later could be heard ordering in his curt monotone: “An escort of four men, a carriage, and my horse.” Five minutes later came the sound of carriage wheels and the ringing of horseshoes on the pavement of the courtyard.

173
2 Old Enemies

D’Artagnan arrived at the Bastille just as the clocks were striking half past eight. He was announced to the governor who, when he heard the visitor came with an order from the cardinal, came out to meet him on the steps. At that time the governor of the Bastille was Sir du Tremblay, brother of the famous Capuchin monk known as Father Joseph, that terrible servant of Richelieu who had been called His Grey Eminence. When Marshal Bassompierre was in the Bastille, where he stayed for twelve years all told, and heard his fellow prisoners say, when dreaming of liberty, “I’ll be released at such-and-such a time,” or “I’ll soon be free of this place,” Bassompierre would say, “As for me, Gentlemen, I’ll leave when Sir du Tremblay leaves” – by which he meant that when the old cardinal died, du Tremblay would lose his post as governor, and Bassompierre would be freed to resume his place at Court.

But his prediction failed to come true, because to Bassompierre’s surprise, when the cardinal died things just went on as before: Sir du Tremblay didn’t leave, and neither did Bassompierre. Du Tremblay was therefore still governor of the Bastille when d’Artagnan presented himself with the minister’s order. He was received with great courtesy, and as the governor was about to dine, he invited d’Artagnan to join him. “I would accept with pleasure,” said d’Artagnan, “but unless I’m mistaken, the envelope of this letter is marked Urgent.”

“Quite so,” said Sir du Tremblay. “Ho there, Major! Send down Number two-hundred-and-fifty-six.” Upon entering the Bastille, one ceased to be a man and became nothing more than a number. D’Artagnan shuddered at the sound of the keys. Still in the saddle, he looked around at the ironbound doors and barred windows; he had no desire to dismount inside these thick walls that he’d always seen from the other side of the moat, and which he’d learned to fear twenty years before. A bell rang. “I must go,” said Sir du Tremblay. “They’re calling for me to sign the release of the prisoner. I hope to see you again, Sir d’Artagnan.”

“Devil take me if I share that hope,” d’Artagnan murmured from behind a gracious smile. “Only five minutes in here, and I’m sick of it already. Let’s go – I’d rather die penniless in a shack than be a rich governor of the Bastille, even if it paid ten thousand a year.” He’d scarcely finished this monologue when the prisoner appeared. Seeing him, d’Artagnan started with surprise, a movement he quickly suppressed. The prisoner entered the carriage without appearing to recognise d’Artagnan. “Gentlemen,” d’Artagnan said to his four musketeers, “I was ordered to keep an eye on the prisoner and since the carriage doors have no locks, I’m going to ride with him. Sir de Lillebonne, be so kind as to lead my horse by the bridle.”

“Of course, Lieutenant.”
D’Artagnan dismounted, handed his horse’s bridle to the musketeer, and entered the carriage. He sat next to the prisoner, then ordered, in a voice that showed no emotion, “To the Royal Palace, at the trot.”

The carriage moved, and as it passed under the gatehouse, d’Artagnan took advantage of the shadow it cast to grip the prisoner in an embrace. “Rochefort!” he cried. “It’s really you!”
“D’Artagnan!” cried Rochefort, astonished.
“Ah, my poor friend!” d’Artagnan said. “I haven’t seen you for four or five years, and feared you were dead.”
“My faith,” said Rochefort, “there’s not much difference between being dead and being buried – and they buried me deep.”
“And for what crime were you in the Bastille?”
“Do you want to know the truth?”

“Yes.”
“Well, then – I have no idea.”
“Are you serious, Rochefort?”
“I’m serious, faith of a gentleman! At any rate, it can’t be for the crime they accused me of.”
“What was that?”
“Petty theft.”
“You, a petty thief? Are you kidding me?”
“I wish I was. You want the whole story?”
“I’ll say I do.”

“Well, here’s what happened. One evening, after roistering at Reynard’s in the Tuileries with the Duke d’Harcourt, Fontrailles, de Rieux, and some others, d’Harcourt proposed we go cloak-snatching on the Pont Neuf. As you know, that sort of prank had been made quite fashionable by the Duke of Orléans.”

“What, at your age? Were you crazy, Rochefort?”
“No, just drunk. But it didn’t sound like fun, so I told the Knight of Rieux we should just watch rather than take part – and to get the best view, we should climb onto King Henri’s bronze horse. No sooner said than done! We used the royal spurs as stirrups and sat on the king’s crupper. Perched there, we could see everything. Already four or five cloaks had been snatched with great flair, from victims who hadn’t dared say a word in protest, until one fool, less patient than the others, called out, “Guards! Guards!” that got the attention of a patrol of archers. D’Harcourt, Fontrailles, the others ran for it, and de Rieux wanted to do the same but I remember telling him they’d never see us where we were. But he wouldn’t listen to me. He put his foot on the spur to climb down, the spur broke off, and he fell, broke his leg, and instead of keeping quiet about it, began to howl like a hanged man. I tried to jump down in my turn but too late: I jumped right into the arms of the archers. They took me to the Châtelet, where I slept soundly enough, as I was sure I’d be out the next day. But the next day passed, then another, and then a whole week, so I wrote to the cardinal. That same day they came for me and took me to the Bastille, where I spent the next five years. Do you think that was for committing the sacrilege of riding pillion behind Henry IV?”

“No, you’re right, my dear Rochefort, it can’t be for that. But you’re probably about to learn what it was for.”
“Ah, yes, I forgot to ask – where are you taking me?”
“To the cardinal.”

“What does he want?”
“I don’t know, since I didn’t even know it was you I was going to get.”
“Impossible. A favourite like you?”
“Me, a favourite?” d’Artagnan cried. “My dear Count! I was a cadet from Gascony when I met you at Meung twenty-two years ago, and I’m still not much more than that!” He finished with a deep sigh.
“But you’re leading a command, aren’t you?”

“Because I happened to be the one in the antechamber when the cardinal called. But I’m still just a lieutenant of musketeers, as I’ve been for the last twenty years.”
“Well, at least nothing bad has happened to you.”
“What could happen to me? To quote some Latin verse I’ve mostly forgotten, or rather never knew, ‘Lightning doesn’t strike the valley’ – and I’m a valley, my dear Rochefort, the deepest around.”

“And Mazarin is still Mazarin?”
“More than ever! They say he’s secretly married to the queen.”
“Married!”

“If he’s not her husband, he’s certainly her lover.”
“So, she resisted Buckingham but gave in to Mazarin!”

“Women!” said d’Artagnan, philosophically.
“Not just a woman but a queen!”

“My God, queens are just women twice over.”
“And Sir de Beaufort, is he still in prison?”

“Indeed. Why?”
“It’s just that he thinks well of me and might get me out of this.”
“You’re probably closer to being free than he is, and will have to get him out of it.”

“Then, the war...”
“Oh, we’ll have a war.”
“With the Spanish?”
“No, with Paris.”

“What do you mean?”
“Don’t you hear that gunfire?”
“Yes. What is it?”

“That’s the citizens getting warmed up before the game!”
“And you think these civilians mean business?”
“That’s right, if they can find a good leader to pull them together.”
“What a rotten time to get out of prison.”
“Good God, cheer up! If Mazarin sent for you, it’s because he needs you, and if he needs you – well, my compliments! He hasn’t needed me in years, and you see where I am.”
“Then speak up about it! That’s my advice.”
“Listen, Rochefort – let’s make a deal.”
“What’s that?”
“We’ve been good friends to each other.”
“For the love of God! I’ve got three sword wounds to prove it.”
“Well, if you get back in favour, don’t forget about me.”
“On the honour of a Rochefort – but you must do the same for me.”

"Deal! Here's my hand. So, the first chance you get to put in a word for me..."

"I'll speak up. And you?"

"I'll do the same."

"And what about your old friends? Are they included?"

"Which friends?"

"Athos,* Porthos,* and Aramis* – have you forgotten?"

"Just about."

"What's become of them?"

"I don't know."

"Really?"

"Good Lord, yes! We parted, as you know; I sometimes hear indirect news, so I know they're still alive but that's all. But where in the world they might be, devil take me if I know. Upon my honour, the only friend I have is you, Rochefort."

"And your illustrious ... what did you call that lad who made sergeant in the Piedmont Regiment?"

"Planchet?"

"Yes, that's it. And the illustrious Planchet, what happened to him?"

"He married the owner of a confectioner's shop in the Rue des Lombards ... he always did have a sweet tooth. So, he's a merchant of Paris, and probably leading the riots. It's funny but he'll probably make alderman before I make captain."

"Come, my dear d'Artagnan, buck up! It's when you're at the bottom of the wheel that it turns you back to the top. Your fate may change this very evening."

"Amen to that!" said d'Artagnan, halting the carriage.

"What are you doing?" asked Rochefort.

"We're nearly there, so I'm getting out. It shouldn't look like we know each other."

"Quite right. Goodbye!"

"Au revoir; remember your promise."

And d'Artagnan mounted his horse and took over lead of the escort. Five minutes later they entered the courtyard of the Royal Palace. D'Artagnan led the prisoner up the grand stair, across the antechamber, and along a corridor. At the door of Mazarin's study, he was about to have himself announced when Rochefort laid his hand on his shoulder. "D'Artagnan," said Rochefort with a smile, "do you want to know what I was thinking as we rode along that route, passing those angry mobs that watched you and your four men with flaming eyes?"

"What?" said d'Artagnan.

"Just that all I had to do was shout for help and they'd have torn you to pieces, you and your escort – and I'd have been free."

"Why didn't you do it, then?" said d'Artagnan.

"Come now!" Rochefort replied. "What of our sworn friendship? Now, if it had been someone other than you who was taking me, I don't say..."

D'Artagnan saluted him – and said to himself, "Has Rochefort become a better man than I?"

And he had himself announced to the minister. "Bring in Sir Rochefort," came Mazarin's impatient voice, as soon as he heard the names, "but ask Sir d'Artagnan to wait – I've not yet finished with him."

At these words d'Artagnan withdrew happily. As he'd said, it was a long time since anyone had needed him, and this directive from Mazarin seemed a good omen. As for Rochefort, the summons had no effect on him other than to put him on his guard. He entered the study and found Mazarin seated at his desk in his usual attire, that of a prelate of the Church – similar to the robes of an abbot of the period but with stockings and mantle of purple. As the doors closed, Rochefort glanced at Mazarin from the side of his eye, and saw the minister sizing him up from the side of his own. The minister was the same as always: curled, primped, perfumed, and thanks to this grooming, looking less than his age. As for Rochefort, that was something else; five years in prison had aged Richelieu's worthy aide, turning his black hair white and changing his healthy complexion to a wan pallor. Seeing him, Mazarin shook his head slightly with a look that said, "Here's a man without much use left in him."

After a silence that stretched out for what seemed to Rochefort an age, Mazarin took a letter from a pile of papers, showed it to him, and said, "I see here a letter in which you request your freedom, Sir Rochefort. Are you in prison, then?"

Rochefort trembled at this question. "But," he said, "It seems to me Your Eminence ought to know that better than anyone."

"Me? Not at all! There's still a crowd of prisoners in the Bastille who've been there since Sir de Richelieu's time, and I don't know all their names."

"Oh but me, My Lord, that's another thing entirely! You knew my name, since it was by Your Eminence's order that I was taken from the Châtelet to the Bastille."

"You think so?"

"I'm sure of it."

"Yes – I think I do remember it. Didn't you, at the time, refuse a mission to Brussels on the queen's behalf?"

"Ah," said Rochefort, "so that's the real reason? I've been wondering for five years. Fool that I am, not to have seen it!"

"I don't say that's the cause of your arrest, I'm just asking a question, that's all. So, listen: did you not refuse to go to Brussels on the queen's service, after you'd gone there on the service of the old cardinal?"

"It's precisely because I'd gone there in service to the cardinal that I couldn't go back in service to the queen. I'd left Brussels in terrible danger. I'd gone during the Chalais conspiracy to intercept the correspondence between Chalais and the archduke, and when I was recognised, I was nearly torn to pieces. How was I supposed to go back after that? Instead of serving the queen, I'd have been lost to her."

"Well, here we see, my dear Sir Rochefort, how even the best of intentions can be misconstrued. When you declined to go, the queen saw it as insubordination. Her Majesty still bore a grudge about some of your services to the late cardinal!"

Rochefort smiled sourly. "Now that he's dead, the fact that I served Cardinal Richelieu against the queen is exactly why I would serve you, My Lord, against all the world."

"Unlike Cardinal Richelieu, Sir Rochefort," said Mazarin, "I am far from all-powerful. I'm just a minister who, as servant to the queen, needs no servants of his own. But Her Majesty is very sensitive; having heard of your refusal, she took it as a declaration of war, and since you were a capable man and therefore dangerous, Sir Rochefort, she ordered me to ... attend to you. Which is how you found yourself in the Bastille."

"Well, My Lord," said Rochefort, "it seems to me that if I was in the Bastille by mistake..."

"Yes, yes," Mazarin replied, "I'm sure this can all be worked out. You're a man who understands how tangled affairs can become, and how to untangle them – by whatever means."

"That was what Cardinal Richelieu thought, and I'll admire that great man all the more if you tell me you share his opinion."

"It's true," said Mazarin, "Sir de Richelieu was a great politician, a much greater man than I, who am simple and straightforward. That's what holds me back, that frankness so entirely French."

Rochefort had to bite his lips to suppress a smile. "So, I'll come to the point. I need good friends and faithful servants – when I say I need, of course I mean the queen needs. I do nothing except at the orders of the queen, is that clear? I'm not like Cardinal Richelieu, who followed his own whims. No, I'll never be a great man like him; but at least I can be a good man, Sir Rochefort, and I hope to prove it to you."

Rochefort remembered well that silky voice that sometimes slipped into sibilants like the hiss of a viper. "I'm quite prepared to believe that, My Lord," he said, "though for my part, I've seen little proof till now of that good nature Your Eminence speaks of. Remember, My Lord," he continued quickly, seeing the minister's expression, "remember that I spent the last five years in the Bastille, and nothing darkens a man's vision like seeing things through prison bars."

"Ah but Sir Rochefort, I already told you it wasn't my idea to put you in prison. The queen ... well, the anger of a woman, and moreover a princess, what would you have? But it goes as quickly as it comes and is soon forgotten."

"I understand, My Lord, how five years at the Royal Palace, amid gallants and gaiety, might make one forget – but I, who passed them in the Bastille..."

"My God, Sir, do you think life at the Royal Palace is all parties and fun? Not at all! We have here, too, our trials and troubles. But let's say no more about it. I'll lay my cards on the table, Sir Rochefort. Now tell me, are you with us?"

"Please understand, My Lord, I ask nothing better – but I have no idea of the state of affairs. At the Bastille, one talks politics only with soldiers and jailers, and you have no idea how little such people know about what's really going on. I've always been a partisan of Sir de Bassompierre myself – is he still one of the Seventeen Lords?"

"He is dead, Sir, and it's a great loss. He was a man devoted to the queen, and men so loyal are rare these days."

"For God's sake! Quite so," said Rochefort, "especially once you've sent them to the Bastille."

"Very well, then," said Mazarin, "how would you measure devotion?"

"By action," said Rochefort.

"Indeed – by action," said the minister thoughtfully. "But where does one find men of action?"

Rochefort shook his head. "There's no shortage of them, My Lord – if you know how to look for them."

"I don't know how to look for them? What are you saying, Sir Rochefort? Kindly instruct me. You were close to My Lord le Cardinal and must have learned a lot. Ah! What a great man he was!"

"My Lord won't take offence if I lecture a bit?"

"Me? Never! As you know, I listen to everyone. I want to be loved, not feared."

"Well, My Lord, on the wall of my prison cell, scratched in with a nail, is a proverb."

"And what is this proverb?" asked Mazarin.

"Just this, My Lord: Like master..."

"... Like manservant. I know it."

"No: like retainer. It's a minor change made by those devoted followers I was speaking of."

"Well. So, what does this proverb mean?"

"It means Sir de Richelieu knew how to attract loyal retainers by the dozen."

"He, the target of every assassin! He, who spent his life warding off attack after attack!"

"But he did ward them off, despite their number. Because though he had many enemies, he had just as many friends."

"But that's all I ask!"

"I've known people," continued Rochefort, thinking it was time to put in a word for d'Artagnan, "people so capable they were even able to foil the cardinal, with all his guards and his spies – people without rank, without money, and without support who nonetheless saved a crowned head her crown, and made the cardinal cry mercy."

"But these people you speak of," said Mazarin, smiling to himself at manoeuvring Rochefort into bringing up the very subject he wished to discuss, "these people weren't devoted to the cardinal, since they fought against him."

"No, though they would have been better off if they had been. But they had the bad luck to be devoted to this same queen for whom you were just now trying to find servants."

"But how is it you know all this?"

"I know this because, at the time, these people were my enemies; because they were pitted against me, and though I did them all the harm I could, they got the better of me; because one of them, my particular nemesis, gave me three sword wounds, the last one seven years ago ... and that settled our old account."

"Ah!" said Mazarin, with good-natured longing. "If only I knew such men."

"Well, My Lord, you've had one of them standing outside your door for the last six years, and you haven't seen fit to do anything with him."

"But who?"

“Sir d’Artagnan.”

“That Gascon?” cried Mazarin in a perfect imitation of surprise.

“That Gascon saved a queen, and in skill, courage, and wit made Sir de Richelieu look like a schoolboy in comparison.”

“Really?”

“It’s exactly as I have the honour to tell Your Eminence.”

“Tell me the whole story, my dear Sir Rochefort.”

“That’s rather difficult, My Lord,” said the count, smiling.

“He’ll tell me himself, then.”

“I doubt it, My Lord.”

“And why is that?”

“Because the secret is not his to tell – because, as I’ve said, it’s the secret of a great queen.”

“And he alone accomplished such a feat?”

“No, My Lord, he had three friends, three brave men who backed him up, just the sort of loyal companions you said you were looking for.”

“And these four men worked together, you say?”

“As if they weren’t four men but one; as if four hearts beat in one chest. What they’ve done together, those four!”

“My dear Sir Rochefort, you pique my curiosity, truly you do. Are you sure you can’t share their story?”

“No but I can tell you a tale – a true fairy tale, as it were, My Lord.”

“Then tell me, Sir Rochefort! I do so love a good story.”

“You’re sure that’s what you want, My Lord?” said Rochefort, trying to understand the cardinal’s motive in all this.

“Yes.”

“Well then, listen! Once upon a time there was a queen ... not just any queen but the queen of one of the greatest kingdoms of the world, a queen whom a great minister wished to harm because once he’d loved her too well. No point in trying to guess who I mean, My Lord, as all this took place long before you came into the queen’s kingdom. Now there came to Court a brave ambassador, so rich and so elegant, that all the women lost their hearts to him. Even the queen was taken with him, and doubtless because of how diplomatically he conducted himself, she had the imprudence to present him with some royal ornaments so remarkable and unique that they were irreplaceable. Now as these ornaments had been given to her by the king, the minister persuaded His Majesty that she should wear them at an upcoming ball. Needless to say, My Lord, the minister was well aware that these ornaments had left with the ambassador and were now far across the sea. Alas, the great queen was lost – doomed to fall from her high estate to below the lowest of her subjects!”

“Really!” said Mazarin.

“Yes, My Lord! But four men resolved to save her. Now these four men were not princes, nor dukes, nor peers, nor even men of wealth – they were just four soldiers with bold spirits, strong arms, and quick swords. So, they went to recover the necklace. But the minister knew of their departure and had placed men along their road to prevent them from reaching their goal. Waylaid by numerous assailants, three of them were brought low but one fought through to the port, killed or wounded those who tried to stop him, crossed the sea, and returned the ornaments to the great queen. She wore them proudly to the ball on the appointed day, and the minister was nearly ruined as a result. And what do you say to that deed, My Lord?”

“It was magnificent!” said Mazarin in wonder.

“Well, I could tell ten more such tales.”

Mazarin didn’t reply. He was thinking.

Five or six minutes passed.

“Have you anything more to ask of me, My Lord?” said Rochefort.

“So that’s it. And d’Artagnan was one of these four men, you say?”

“It was he who took the lead.”

“And the others, who were they?”

“My Lord, allow me to let d’Artagnan name them to you. They were his friends, not mine, and only he would have any influence over them. I never even knew them under their true names.”

“I see you still don’t trust me, Sir Rochefort. Well, I will continue to be frank: I need him – and you – and all of them!”

“Then start with me, My Lord, since you sent for me, and here I am. I’m sure it will come as no surprise that after five years in prison, I’m curious to know what plans you have for me.”

“You, my dear Sir Rochefort, will be in charge of security; you will go to Vincennes, where Sir de Beaufort is imprisoned, and keep him under careful guard. Well! What do you think?”

“I’m afraid the position you offer me is impossible,” said Rochefort, shaking his head ruefully.

“Impossible? How can it be impossible?”

“Because Sir de Beaufort is one of my friends, or rather, I’m one of his. Have you forgotten, My Lord, that he’s the one who sponsored me to the queen?”

“Since then, Sir de Beaufort has become an enemy of the State.”

“Yes, My Lord that may be. But since I’m neither king, nor queen, nor minister, he’s no enemy to me, and I can’t accept what you offer me.”

“So, this is what you call devotion? Good luck with that. Such devotion won’t get you very far, Sir Rochefort.”

“But My Lord,” Rochefort replied, “to come out of the Bastille only to go to Vincennes, for me that’s just changing one prison for another.”

“Just be honest: you’re really on Sir de Beaufort’s side, aren’t you?”

“My Lord, I was locked up so long I’m not allied to any party, except the party of fresh air. Assign me anywhere else, send me on a mission, and give me anything to do so long as it’s active!”

“My dear Sir Rochefort,” said Mazarin archly, “your zeal is admirable, and though I’m sure you have the heart for it, in you the fire of youth has gone out. Trust me, what you need now is rest and plenty of it. Hey, there, outside!”

“You’re not sure what to do with me, then, My Lord?”

“On the contrary, I’ve decided.” Bernouin entered. “Call a bailiff for me,” Mazarin said to him in a low voice, “and stay nearby.”

An officer was summoned. Mazarin wrote a brief note and handed it to him, then nodded. “Goodbye, Sir Rochefort,” he said.

Rochefort said, “I see, My Lord, that you’re sending me back to the Bastille.”

“Clever man.”

“I’ll go, My Lord but I say again, it’s a mistake not to make use of me.”

“You, the friend of my enemies!”

“What would you have? I didn’t make them your enemies. I could still be on your side.”

“Do you think you’re the only one for that post, Sir Rochefort? Believe me, I’ll find others just as good.”

“Then it is my turn to wish you luck, My Lord.”

“All right, off with you. And by the way, bother to write me no more letters, Sir Rochefort, as I’m afraid they’ll just go astray.”

“Well, I got played for a fool that time,” Rochefort muttered on his way out. “But if d’Artagnan isn’t satisfied with that little tribute I gave him, he’s a hard man to please. Wait a minute, where the devil are they taking me?” In fact, they took Rochefort out by the secret staircase, instead of passing through the antechamber where d’Artagnan was waiting. In the side courtyard he found the carriage and four-man escort waiting for him but his friend was nowhere to be seen. “Oh ho!” Rochefort said to himself. “That changes everything. If the mob still crowds the streets, then by God, we’ll show Mazarin we’re still good for something more than just guarding a prisoner.” And he leapt into the carriage as lightly as if he were no older than twenty-five.

174

Anne of Austria at Age 46

Left alone with Bernouin, Mazarin paused a moment, thinking. He’d learned a lot but he needed to know more. As Brienne has informed us, Mazarin was a card cheat that he called just taking advantage of his opportunities. He resolved not to commence the game with d’Artagnan until he knew all of his opponent’s cards. “Would My Lord like anything?” Bernouin asked.

“I would,” Mazarin replied. “Light the way; I’m going to see the queen.”

Bernouin took a candlestick and led the way. There was a secret passage that connected Mazarin’s suite with the queen’s apartments; the cardinal could use that corridor to visit Anne of Austria at all hours. Arriving in the bedchamber at the end of the passage, Bernouin met Madam Beauvais; he and she were the confidants of this pair of aging lovers. Madam Beauvais went ahead to announce the cardinal to Anne of Austria, who was in her oratory with the young Louis XIV. Anne of Austria, seated in a grand armchair, elbow leaning on a table and head resting on her hand, watched the royal child as he lay on the carpet, leafing through a big book of battles. Anne of Austria was a queen who knew how to waste her time without losing her dignity; she sometimes spent hours idling in her bedchamber or oratory, neither reading nor praying. As for the king’s choice of reading matter, it was an edition of Quinte Curce’s History of Alexander profusely illustrated with engravings. Madam Beauvais appeared at the door of the oratory and announced Cardinal Mazarin. The child got up on one knee, frowning, and asked his mother, “Why does he just come right in without asking for an audience?”

Anne coloured slightly. “In times like these,” she replied, “it’s important for a prime minister to be able to report what’s happening to the queen at any time of day, without exciting the curiosity or commentary of the whole Court.”

“But it seems to me Sir de Richelieu didn’t barge in like that,” replied the child, unappeased.

“How would you know how Sir de Richelieu behaved? You were too young to remember.”

“I don’t remember it – I asked about it, and they told me.”

“Who told you that?” asked Anne of Austria, with poorly disguised irritation.

“I know better than to tell on those who answer my questions,” replied the child. “If I tell, they’ll stop answering and I won’t learn anything.”

At that moment Mazarin entered. The king stood, picked up his book, put it on a table, and stood next to it that compelled Mazarin to remain standing as well. Mazarin took in the scene with a thoughtful eye, giving the queen an inquiring look. He bowed respectfully to Her Majesty and deeply to the king, who replied with a rather cavalier salute – but at a reproachful look from his mother Louis XIV swallowed the hatred he’d felt toward the cardinal since infancy and greeted the minister with a forced smile. Anne of Austria tried to guess the reason for this unexpected visit from Mazarin’s expression, as the cardinal usually didn’t come in to her until everyone else had retired. The minister nodded slightly toward the door and the queen said, “Madam Beauvais, it’s time for the king to go to bed. Call La Porte.”

The queen had already told young Louis two or three times that it was time to retire, and the child had fondly insisted on staying with her – but this time he made no reply, just pursed his lips and turned pale. La Porte appeared at the door, and the child went straight to him without embracing his mother. “Louis,” Anne said, “aren’t you going to kiss me goodnight?”

“I thought you were mad at me, Madam, since you send me away.”

“I’m not sending you away but you’re just recovering from the smallpox, and I don’t want you to get overly tired.”

“You weren’t worried about that today when you sent me to parliament to issue those nasty edicts the people are complaining about.”

“Sire,” said La Porte, trying to distract him, “who would Your Majesty like to carry your candlestick tonight?”

“Anybody, La Porte,” the child answered, then added, raising his voice, “so long as it’s not Mancini.”

Mancini was one of Mazarin’s nephews whom the cardinal had made a child-of-honour to the king, and whom Louis XIV treated with a measure of the disdain he felt for his minister. And the king marched out without kissing his mother or bowing to the cardinal. “Excellent!” said Mazarin. “I’m delighted to see His Majesty being brought up to abhor deceit.”

“Why do you say that?” asked the queen, almost timidly.

"It seems to me the king's exit makes that quite clear. His Majesty doesn't even try to hide how little affection he has for me – which doesn't prevent me, however, from being entirely devoted to his service, and to that of Your Majesty."

"I beg your pardon on his behalf, Cardinal," said the queen. "The child is too young to understand all the obligations and duties you have." The cardinal smiled. "But you must have some important reason for coming," the queen continued. "What is it?"

Mazarin sat or rather lay back on a large chaise and said with a melancholy air, "It's just that in all probability, we'll soon be forced to part unless your devotion's such that you'd go with me back to Italy."

"And why is that?"

"Because," Mazarin said, "as they sang in the opera Thisbe, 'The whole world conspires to come between us.'"

"You're jesting, Sir!" said the queen, trying to recover some of her former dignity.

"Alas, no, Madam!" said Mazarin. "It's no laughing matter. On the contrary, I'm trying my best not to weep. And when I say, 'The whole world conspires to come between us,' I have to say you're part of that world, a part of what's driving us apart."

"Cardinal!"

"No? Didn't I see you the other day smiling very agreeably at Sir, the Duke of Orléans – or rather at what he said?"

"And what was it he said?"

"Madam, he told you, 'It's your Mazarin who's the stumbling block here – once he goes, all will be well.'"

"But what am I supposed to do?"

"What? Why ask me? You're the queen, it seems to me."

"Some monarch, disrespected by every scribbler in the Royal Palace, and every petty lord in the realm!"

"Nonetheless, you still have the power to banish from your presence anyone who displeases you."

"You mean to say, anyone who displeases you!" replied the queen.

"Me!"

"Yes! Who sent away Madam de Chevreuse,* after she'd been persecuted for twelve years under the old regime?"

"She was an intriguer who wanted to continue her conspiracies under Sir de Richelieu and turn them against me!"

"Who sent away Madam de Hautefort, that friend so loyal and good that she refused the king's good graces in order to stay in mine?"

"Bah: a prude who told you every night, as she helped you undress, that it was risking your soul to love a priest – as if being a cardinal makes one a priest!"

"Who arrested Sir de Beaufort?"

"A ruffian who boasted of nothing less than planning to have me assassinated!"

"You see, Cardinal," replied the queen, "That your enemies are made into mine."

"That's not enough, Madam – your friends must also be my friends."

"My friends, Sir?" The queen shook her head. "Alas! I no longer have any."

"How can you have so few friends in prosperity, when you had so many in adversity?"

"Because in prosperity, Sir, I've forgotten my old friends. Because I acted like Queen Marie de Médicis who, upon returning from her first exile, turned her back on those who'd suffered it with her, so that when she was banished a second time, she died friendless in Cologne, abandoned by all the world, even her son."

"Then it's past time to try to repair the damage," said Mazarin. "Think back and recollect your oldest friends."

"What do you mean, Sir?"

"Just what I said: recollect."

"Looking around now, I seem to have little influence with anyone. Sir, the Duke of Orléans, follows his current favourite around, as always – yesterday it was Choisy, today La Rivière, tomorrow someone else. Sir Prince, Condé, is led around by Coadjutor de Retz who himself follows Madam de Guéménée."

"Ah, Madam, I didn't say to consider your friends of today but to recollect your friends of old."

"My friends of old?" said the queen.

"Yes, your oldest friends, those who aided you against Sir de Richelieu, and even vanquished him."

"What is he getting at?" the queen said to herself, looking anxiously at the cardinal.

"Yes," he continued, "under the right circumstances, that powerful will and determination that characterises Your Majesty was able, with the help of friends, to repel your opponent's attacks."

"Me?" said the queen. "I just suffered through those times, that's all."

"Yes," said Mazarin, "as women suffer – by avenging themselves. To the point. Do you know Sir Rochefort?"

"Sir Rochefort was never one of my friends," said the queen, "quite the opposite. He was one of my bitterest enemies, an agent loyal to the old cardinal. I thought you knew that."

"I know it so well," said Mazarin, "that for you I had him put in the Bastille."

"Is ... is he out?" asked the queen.

"No, never fear – he's still inside. I mention him only to bring up another. Do you know Sir d'Artagnan?" continued Mazarin with a shrewd look at the queen.

For Anne of Austria, it was a blow to the heart. "Has the Gascon been indiscreet?" she muttered, then said aloud, "D'Artagnan! Wait a moment ... yes, that name is familiar. D'Artagnan, a musketeer who loved one of my women. Poor little thing, she was poisoned because of me."

"That's all?" said Mazarin.

The queen looked at the cardinal in surprise. "Sir," she said, "are you subjecting me to an interrogation?"

"Even if I was," Mazarin said, with his soft voice and eternal smile, "you'd still give only such answers as suit you."

"Be direct with your questions, Sir, and then I'll be direct with my answers," said the queen, beginning to lose her patience.

"Well, Madam!" said Mazarin with a bow. "I want only to make your friends mine, so I can share with them what little talent and energy Providence has given me. The situation is serious and calls for active measures."

"What, again?" said the queen. "I thought we'd settled things when we dealt with Sir de Beaufort."

"Yes! We diverted a torrent that threatened to drown us but now we're menaced from deeper pools. There's a proverb in France about still waters, I believe."

"Go on," said the queen.

"Well!" continued Mazarin. "Every day I suffer insults from your princes and titled minions, all of them marionettes blind to the fact that I'm pulling the strings, nor do they see that beneath my calm exterior, I'm suppressing the hollow laugh of the injured man who'll one day prove their superior. True, we arrested Sir Beaufort but he may have been the least dangerous. There's still Sir Prince..."

"The victor of Rocroi! Even he is on your mind?"

"Yes, Madam, and frequently – but patienza, as we Italians say. Then, after the Prince de Condé, there is Sir, the Duke of Orléans."

"What are you saying? Gaston, the First Prince of the Blood, the king's own uncle!"

"Not the First Prince of the Blood, not the king's uncle but the cowardly conspirator who, under the previous reign, driven by caprice and resentment, eaten up by envy and idle ambition, jealous of all those who were admired for loyalty and courage, disgusted with his own worthlessness, made himself the crier of every slander, the centre of every cabal – he who encouraged good men who had the folly to take him at his royal word to conspire on his behalf, then disowned them as they mounted the scaffold! Not the First Prince of the Blood, I say, not the king's uncle but the assassin of Chalais, of Montmorency, and of Cinq-Mars, who is now trying to play the same game again, and imagines that this time he'll win because he has a new opponent, a man who doesn't threaten but instead ... smiles. But he is mistaken. He has lost by losing Sir de Richelieu, as I have no interest in keeping near to the queen this agent of discord whom the late cardinal used for twenty years to make the king's blood boil."

Anne blushed and hid her face in her hands. "I will not have Your Majesty humiliated," said Mazarin, regaining his calm tone, though beneath it was an unusual firmness. "I want people to respect the queen, and to respect her minister, since in the eyes of the world I am no more than that. Your Majesty knows that, despite what they say, I'm not just some Italian dancing monkey. The rest of the world must know me as Your Majesty knows me."

"Well, then, what should I do?" said Anne of Austria, submissive before this domineering voice.

"You must search your memory for the names of those loyal and devoted men who crossed the sea despite Sir de Richelieu, spilling their blood along the road, to bring back to Your Majesty certain jewels you'd given to the Duke of Buckingham."

Anne rose, angry and majestic, as if stiffened by a steel spring, and regarded the cardinal with that hauteur and dignity that had made her so admired in the days of her youth. "You insult me, Sir!"

"I want you, at long last," continued Mazarin, finishing the speech interrupted by the queen, "I want you to do today for your husband what you once did for your lover."

"That old slander once again!" cried the queen. "I thought it was finally dead and buried, something you've spared me until now ... but you bring it up at last. Fine! We'll settle this between us, and it will be over and done, do you hear me?"

"But, Madam," said Mazarin, taken aback by this show of strength, "I'm not asking you to tell me everything."

"But I want to tell you everything," said Anne of Austria. "So, listen. I want to tell you, Sir, that there were indeed at that time four faithful hearts, four loyal spirits, four devoted swords who saved more than my life – for they saved my honour."

"Ah! You admit it," said Mazarin.

"Is it only the guilty whose honour may be at stake, Sir, and can't a person, especially a woman, be dishonoured by appearances? Yes, appearances were against me, and my honour was at risk – and yet, I swear, I wasn't guilty. I swear by..."

The queen looked around for something holy she could swear on, pushed aside a tapestry to reveal a cabinet, and drew from it a small, rosewood box chased with silver. Laying it on her altar, she said, "I swear upon these sacred relics that though I loved the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke of Buckingham was not my lover!"

"And what are these relics upon which you take this oath, Madam?" Mazarin said, smiling. "For I warn you, in my capacity as a Catholic prelate I know when a relic is a relic."

The queen detached a small golden key from a necklace and handed it to the cardinal. "Open it, Sir, and see for yourself."

Mazarin, astonished, took the key and opened the coffer, in which he found a rusted knife and two letters, one of them stained with blood. "What's this?" he asked.

"What's this, Sir?" said Anne of Austria with a queenly gesture, taking the coffer in her arms, still beautiful despite the years, and holding it open. "I'll tell you. These two letters are the only letters I ever wrote to him. And this knife is the one with which Felton killed him. Read these letters, Sir, and see if I speak the truth."

But despite being given permission, Mazarin hesitated to read the letters, and instead took up the knife that Buckingham, dying, had torn from his wound and sent by La Porte to the queen. The blade was all corroded for the blood had become rust and after a moment's examination, during which the queen turned as white as the altar cloth she was leaning on, he replaced it in the coffer with an involuntary shudder. "It is well, Madam," he said, "and I accept your oath."

"No!" frowned the queen. "Read! I insist upon it. I want this settled between us so we never return to it. Do you think," she added, with a ghastly smile, "that I'm going to open this coffer for you at every accusation?"

Mazarin, daunted by this outburst, obeyed almost mechanically, and read the two letters. One was that by which the queen had asked Buckingham for the return of her diamond studs, the one d'Artagnan had brought him in the nick of time. The other was the one La Porte had borne to the duke in which the queen had warned him of his assassination, and had come too late. "It's ... well, Madam," said Mazarin. "I've nothing more to say about it."

"If, Sir," said the queen, closing the coffer and resting her hand upon it, "I have anything still to answer for, it's that I've always been ungrateful to those men who saved me, and did everything they could to save ... him. I gave nothing to that brave d'Artagnan, of whom you spoke just now, other than my hand to kiss, and this diamond."

The queen extended her beautiful hand toward the cardinal and showed him a marvellous stone that sparkled on her finger. “He sold it, it seems,” she said, “in a moment of want; he sold it to save me a second time, because he needed to send a messenger to the duke to warn him of the assassination.”

“So d’Artagnan knew of that?”

“He knew everything. How? I never learned. He sold this ring to Sir des Essarts on whose finger I saw it and from whom I bought it back. But this diamond belongs to him, sir, so return it to him for me – and since you’re lucky enough to have such a man near at hand, try to make use of him.”

“Thank you, Madam!” said Mazarin. “I’ll follow your advice.”

“And now,” said the queen, brittle with emotion, “do you have anything else to ask of me?”

“Not a thing, Madam,” said the cardinal, in his most soothing voice, “except to beg you to forgive my unworthy suspicions. It’s just that I love you so dearly, is it any wonder I’m jealous even of the past?” An indescribable smile passed over the queen’s lips. “Well, then, Sir,” she said, “If you have nothing else to ask of me, you may go. You must understand that you’ve upset me, and I need some time to myself.”

Mazarin bowed. “Then I retire, Madam,” he said. “Will you allow me to return?”

“Yes but tomorrow. That should give me enough time.”

The cardinal took the hand of the queen and kissed it gallantly, and then withdrew. He’d scarcely left before the queen went into her son’s apartments, where she asked La Porte if the king had gone to bed. La Porte just pointed toward the sleeping child. Anne of Austria went up the bed’s steps, put her lips to her son’s furrowed brow and gently kissed it. Then she retired as quietly as she’d come, only saying to the valet, “Try, my dear La Porte, to help the king appreciate Sir Cardinal, whom he and I owe so much.”

175
Gascon & Italian

Meanwhile the cardinal had returned to his study, where Bernouin waited at the door. Mazarin asked him if anything had happened, and if there was any news from outside; the valet shook his head, and the cardinal motioned him away. Left alone, he went through the door to the corridor, then the one to the antechamber, where he found d’Artagnan on a bench, exhausted and asleep. “Sir d’Artagnan!” he said softly. D’Artagnan didn’t flinch. “Sir d’Artagnan!” he said louder.

D’Artagnan continued sleeping. The cardinal approached him and touched a finger to his shoulder. This time d’Artagnan started, awoke, and instantly stood like a soldier under arms. “I’m here,” he said. “Who calls?”

“Me,” said Mazarin with his broadest smile.

“I beg Your Eminence’s pardon,” said d’Artagnan. “I was so tired…”

“Ask for no pardon, Sir,” said Mazarin, “When you tire yourself in my service.”

D’Artagnan had to admire the minister’s gracious manner. “Oh ho,” he said to himself. “What’s that proverb about good things coming while one sleeps?”

“Come with me, Sir!” Mazarin said, returning to his study.

“Well, well,” murmured d’Artagnan. “It looks like Rochefort kept his word. Only where the devil has he gotten to?”

And he looked into every corner of the study without finding Rochefort. “Sir d’Artagnan,” said Mazarin, sitting comfortably in an armchair, “you’ve always seemed to me a brave and gallant man.” Perhaps so, thought d’Artagnan but he took his time in telling me. That didn’t stop him from bowing to the ground to acknowledge the compliment. “Well,” continued Mazarin, “now is the time to profit from your talents and worth!”

The officer’s eyes flashed with a joy he immediately covered, for he didn’t know where Mazarin was leading him. “Command me, My Lord,” he said. “I’m at Your Eminence’s orders.”

“Sir d’Artagnan,” Mazarin continued, “in the previous reign you distinguished yourself in several exploits.”

“It’s kind of Your Eminence to remember that. In fact, I think I fought with some success.”

“I’m not speaking of your exploits in war,” said Mazarin, “because, though commendable enough, there were others who did more.”

D’Artagnan was astonished. “Well?” said Mazarin. “Have you nothing to say?”

“I’m waiting,” d’Artagnan said, “for My Lord to tell me what exploits he’s referring to.”

“I speak of a certain adventure … you know which one I mean.”

“Alas, My Lord, I don’t,” d’Artagnan replied, perplexed.

“I see you’re discreet. Fine. I speak of the adventure of the queen’s diamond studs, and that journey you made with your three friends.”

Hello, thought the Gascon, is this some kind of trap? Better play dumb.

And he adopted an expression so bewildered it would have been the envy of Mondori or Bellerose, the greatest comedians of the time. “Very good!” said Mazarin, laughing. “Bravo! I knew you were the man I needed. So, how far are you willing to go for me?”

“As far as Your Eminence needs me to,” said d’Artagnan.

“You’ll act for me as you formerly did for a queen?”

Clearly, d’Artagnan thought, he wants me to speak of it first. Devil take his cunning but he’s no Richelieu. “For a queen, My Lord? I don’t understand you.”

“You don’t understand that I need you – you and your three friends?”

“What friends do you mean, My Lord?”

“Your three friends of former days.”

“In former days, My Lord,” replied d’Artagnan, “I didn’t have three friends, I had fifty. When you’re twenty, you call everyone your friend.”

“Come now, Sir Lieutenant,” said Mazarin, “discretion is a fine thing – but you might regret being overly discreet.”

“My Lord, Pythagoras made his students listen quietly for five years to teach them to be silent.”

“And you’ve been silent for twenty years, Sir that is fifteen years too long, even for a Pythagorean philosopher. Now speak, for the queen herself releases you from your oath.”

“The queen!” said d’Artagnan.

This time his astonishment was unfeigned. “Yes, the queen! And the proof that I speak on her behalf’s that she told me to show you this diamond that you’ll recognise and she bought from Sir des Essarts.”

And Mazarin extended his hand toward the officer, who sighed as he recognised the ring the queen had given him on the night of the ball at the Hôtel de Ville. “So, you see that I speak to you in her name. Answer me without any more comedy – for as I’ve said, and I repeat it, your fortune is at stake.”

“My faith, My Lord! My fortune is long overdue – Your Eminence has long forgotten it!”

“It’s but the work of a week to repair it. Now, here you are – but where are your friends?”

“I don’t know, My Lord.”

“You don’t know?”

“No. All three have left the service, and it’s been long since we separated.”

“But you can find them again?”

“No matter where they are. That’s my affair.”

“Good! And you require…?”

“Money, My Lord, is what this kind of business needs. I remember too many times when we were thwarted for lack of money. Without that diamond that I had to sell, we would have failed entirely.”

“The devil! Money, and in no small amount, I’ll wager,” said Mazarin. “You ask a great deal, Sir Lieutenant. Don’t you know the king’s coffers are empty?”

“Then do as I did, My Lord, and sell the crown jewels. Believe me, it does no good to be stingy; one can’t do great things with meagre means.”

“Well!” said Mazarin. “I suppose we can accommodate you.”

Richelieu, thought d’Artagnan, would already have given me five hundred pistoles in advance.

“So, you’re with me, then?” said Mazarin.

“Yes, if my friends are.”

“But if they refuse, I can still count on you?”

“I’ve never been any good by myself,” said d’Artagnan, shaking his head.

“Then see that you find them.”

“What will I say to persuade them to serve Your Eminence?”

“You know better than I do. Persuade them according to their characters.”

“What can I promise on your behalf?”

“If they serve me as they served the queen, the rewards will be lavish.”

“And what are we to do?”

“Everything, since it seems you know how to do everything.”

“My Lord, when one has confidence in people and wants them to return your trust, one is more forthcoming with information than Your Eminence is.”

“When the time for action arrives,” said Mazarin, “I assure you I’ll tell you everything.”

“But until then?”

“Await events – and go find your friends.”

“My Lord, they might not be in Paris, in fact they probably aren’t that means I’ll have to travel. I’m only a poor lieutenant of musketeers, and travel is expensive.”

“I don’t intend for you to travel with an entourage,” said Mazarin. “My missions are covert and mustn’t draw attention.”

“Still, My Lord, I can’t travel on my pay that is already three months behind. And I can’t travel on my savings, because after twenty-two years’ service the only thing I’ve saved is debt.”

Mazarin thought for a moment, as if struggling with himself. Then, going to a cabinet closed with a triple lock, he drew out a purse, weighed it two or three times in his hand, and then gave it d’Artagnan.

“Use this,” he said with a sigh, “to fund your travels.”

Well! D’Artagnan thought. If these are Spanish double-pistoles, or even gold crowns, we may be able to do business together.

He saluted the cardinal and stuffed the purse into his belt pouch. “So, then,” said the cardinal, “you’re off.”

“Yes, My Lord.”

“Write to me daily to report the progress of your negotiations.”

“I shall not fail, My Lord.”

“Very good. By the way, what are the names of your friends?”

“The names of my friends?” said d’Artagnan, with a touch of anxiety.

“Yes – while you search on your side, I’ll investigate on mine, and maybe I’ll learn something.”

“The Count of La Fère, formerly known as Athos; Sir du Vallon, known as Porthos; and the Knight d’Herblay, now the Abbot d’Herblay, known as Aramis.”

The cardinal smiled. “Younger sons,” he said, “who joined the King’s Musketeers under assumed names to avoid compromising their families. The usual thing: empty purses but long rapiers.”

“If God wills these rapiers to join Your Eminence’s service,” d’Artagnan said, “I dare to hope My Lord’s purse will become lighter and theirs heavier – because with these three men, and me, Your Eminence shall move all of France, and even Europe, if he so desires.”

"These Gascons," Mazarin laughed, "almost match the Italians for bravado."
"In words," said d'Artagnan with a matching smile, "and we're even better with deeds."
And he left, after receiving an indefinite leave order signed by Mazarin himself.
Once outside in the courtyard, he went to a lantern to take a quick look into the purse. "Silver crowns!" he said with contempt. "I suspected as much. Ah, Mazarin, Mazarin! You still don't trust me. Too bad – that will bring you misfortune."
Meanwhile the cardinal was rubbing his hands. "A hundred pistoles!" he murmured. "For a hundred pistoles I bought a secret for which Sir de Richelieu would have paid twenty thousand crowns. And I got this diamond into the bargain," he said, looking lovingly at the ring he'd kept, instead of giving it to d'Artagnan. "Why, this diamond must be worth ten thousand livres." And the cardinal retired to his chambers, delighted with an evening in which he'd made such a handsome profit. He placed the ring in a silk-lined jewel box filled with gems of every kind, for the cardinal had a taste for precious stones. Then he called Bernouin to undress him, without another thought for the distant shouts coming in through the windows, or the gunshots resounding across Paris, though it was eleven at night. Meanwhile d'Artagnan was making his way toward the Rue Tiquetonne, where he lived at the Hôtel de La Chevrete ... but let's say a few words about d'Artagnan's home and tell how he came to live there.

176
D'Artagnan at Age 40

Alas! In the time since we last saw him in The Three Musketeers, when d'Artagnan lived in the Rue des Fossoyeurs, many years had passed and much had gone with them. D'Artagnan hadn't missed his opportunities, the opportunities had missed d'Artagnan. When his friends had surrounded him, d'Artagnan's youth and inventiveness had flourished; he had one of those open and ingenious natures that easily assimilate the qualities of others. Athos gave of his grandeur, Porthos his enthusiasm, and Aramis his elegance. If d'Artagnan had continued to abide with these three men, he would have become a truly superior man. But Athos had left him first, to retire to the small estate he'd inherited near Blois; Porthos had gone second, to marry the prosecutor's widow; finally, Aramis, the third, to take his vows and become an abbot. From that moment, d'Artagnan, who seemed to have counted on a future that included his three friends, found himself alone and unsteady, lacking the drive to pursue a career in which he couldn't quite excel without the spiritual essence contributed by each of his friends. Thus, though he continued as a lieutenant of musketeers, d'Artagnan found himself feeling isolated. He was not of sufficiently high rank, like Athos, for the Grands to open their houses to him; he wasn't vain enough, like Porthos, to feel entitled to mix with high society; and he wasn't well-bred enough, like Aramis, to get by on sheer elegance and sophistication, drawing on depths from within. For a while the memory of the charming Madam Bonacieux gave the young lieutenant a certain poetic melancholy; but like all things of this world, even this memory gradually faded. Life in a garrison is fatal to delicate sensibilities. Of the two opposing sides that composed d'Artagnan's nature, the material side had gradually won out – and slowly, without even noticing it, d'Artagnan, always in garrison or in camp, had become what we call in our time a career soldier. It's not that d'Artagnan lost his native cleverness but rather that he'd turned his innate finesse toward solving small problems rather than great ones, focusing on the soldier's mundane concerns of finding comfortable quarters, good food, and an accommodating hostess. And d'Artagnan had found all three of these things six years before in Rue Tiquetonne, at the sign of La Chevrete. In the early days of his stay there, the mistress of the boarding house, a fresh and pretty Flemish woman of twenty-five or twenty-six, had been quite taken with him but their amorous intentions had been blocked by an inconvenient husband. After d'Artagnan had pantomimed running him through with his sword a few times, one fine morning this husband had disappeared forever, after selling the best bottles in the honey cellar and carrying off what money and jewellery he could. Everyone assumed he was dead – especially his wife who, fancying herself in the condition of a widow, boldly asserted his death. Eventually, after three years of a liaison that d'Artagnan had carefully maintained, finding his lodging and his mistress more agreeable every year, as the two went so well together, the mistress decided it was once more time to be a wife, and proposed that d'Artagnan should marry her. "How so?" d'Artagnan replied. "That'd be bigamy, my dear! Don't even think of it!"

"But I'm quite sure my husband's dead."
"He was a thoroughly inconsiderate fellow and would certainly return just to see us hanged."
"Well, if he comes back, you'll kill him – you're so brave and masterful!"
"Plague! That's just one more route to the hangman, my love."
"So, you reject my proposal?"
"Completely! That's not going to happen."

The pretty hostess was devastated. If she'd had her way, Sir D'Artagnan would have been not just her husband but deity – he was so very handsome and had such a proud moustache!
During the fourth year came the campaign in Franche-Count. D'Artagnan was given his orders and prepared to leave. There was agony, rivers of tears, and solemn promises to remain faithful – though all from the hostess, of course. D'Artagnan was too much the grand lord to make promises, other than to promise to do what he could to add glory to his name. There was no doubting d'Artagnan's courage: he conducted himself admirably, and, charging at the head of his company, he took a ball in the chest that laid him out at full length on the battlefield. Everyone saw him fall from his horse, and no one saw him get up, so everyone assumed he was dead – especially those who hoped to assume his position. From the generals of the divisions who hope for the death of the commander in chief, down to the private soldiers who dream of the deaths of their corporals, everyone wants someone deceased. But d'Artagnan wasn't the sort of man to be killed so easily as that. After lying unconscious on the battlefield through the heat of the day, the cool night air brought him around. He made his way to a village, knocked on the door of the finest house, and was received as wounded Frenchmen are always and everywhere: he was taken in, treated, cured, pampered even, and restored to better health than ever. One morning he set off down the road to France, once in France took the way to Paris, and once in Paris to the Rue Tiquetonne. But d'Artagnan found his room occupied by another man's wardrobe, complete except for a sword. "He must have returned," he said to himself. "Well, too bad, and all the better!"

D'Artagnan, of course, was thinking of the missing husband. He asked the new servants where their mistress had gone and was told to the promenade. "Alone?" asked d'Artagnan.
"With sir."

"Sir has come back, then?"
"He must have," the servant naïvely replied.
"If I had any money," d'Artagnan said to himself, "I'd leave – but since I don't, I'll just have to stay, take my hostess's advice, and put this conjugal ghost to rest."
He'd just completed this monologue, monologues being suited to all dramatic occasions, when the servant who was waiting by the door, called out, "Look! Here comes madam now, returning with sir."
D'Artagnan glanced up the street and saw, at the corner of the Rue Montmartre, the hostess returning on the arm of an enormous Swiss Guard, who swaggered with such airs that d'Artagnan was pleasantly reminded of his old friend Porthos. "So that's sir?" said d'Artagnan. "He's grown a bit, I think."
And he sat down in the parlour where he couldn't be missed. The hostess entered first, and gasped when she saw d'Artagnan. By this, d'Artagnan knew he'd been recognised; he leapt up, ran to her, and kissed her tenderly. The Swiss looked on, stupefied, while the hostess turned pale. "It's you, Sir! Wh-what do you want from me?" she asked, dismayed and flustered.

D'Artagnan, unabashed, said, "Sir here is your cousin? Or is he your brother?"
And without waiting for a reply, he embraced the huge Helvetian, who stiffened uncomfortably. "Who is this man?" the Swiss asked.
The hostess just choked, unable to speak. "And who is this Swiss?" asked d'Artagnan.
"He's going to marry me," said the hostess, between gasps.
"Your husband's finally died, then?"

"Vhat you zay?" said the Swiss.
"I'll zay plenty," replied d'Artagnan. "I zay you may not marry madam without my permission and I..."
"Und you...?"
"And I ... don't give it," said the musketeer.

At this, the Swiss turned red as a beet. He wore a gold-trimmed uniform, while d'Artagnan was wrapped in dull grey cloak; he was six feet tall, d'Artagnan was five and a half; he thought he was at home, and d'Artagnan was an intruder. "Vill you get out of here?" the Swiss demanded, stamping his foot like a man growing seriously angry.
"Me? Unlikely!" said d'Artagnan.

"But he'll just throw you out," said the houseboy who couldn't understand how any normal man could stand up to the huge Swiss.
"You," said d'Artagnan, beginning to lose his temper and taking the houseboy by the ear, "get out of the way and don't move unless I say so. As for you, illustrious descendant of William Tell, get your clothes out of my room and take them elsewhere – they annoy me."
The Swiss began to laugh loudly. "I, leave? Vhy would I do zat?"
"Ah, so you do understand French," said d'Artagnan. "Come take a little walk with me, and I'll explain why."

The hostess, who knew d'Artagnan for a swordsman, began to cry and tear her hair. D'Artagnan turned and said, more gently, "You should send him away, Madam."
"Pah!" said the Swiss, who had needed a moment's thought to understand d'Artagnan's intentions. "Pah! Who are you, crazy one, to ask me to take a walk with you?"
"I am a Lieutenant of the King's Musketeers," said d'Artagnan, "and therefore your superior in every way. However, this isn't a question of rank, just the right to quarters – and you know the custom. You want them? Then let's take a walk. The one who returns gets the room." And d'Artagnan led the Swiss away, despite the lamentations of the hostess. Deep down, she felt her heart yearn toward her old love – but since he'd insulted her by refusing her hand, she wouldn't be sorry if the proud musketeer was taught a lesson. The two adversaries marched straight to the moat outside the Montmartre wall. It was dark by the time they arrived; d'Artagnan politely requested that the Swiss yield him the room and be on his way; the Swiss shook his head in refusal and drew his sword. "Then you'll sleep here instead," said d'Artagnan. "This is a wretched bed but you chose it, and it's not my fault." And with these words he drew steel and crossed swords with his adversary. His opponent had a strong wrist but d'Artagnan far outmatched him in agility. The Swiss soldier's rapier never even found the musketeer's blade, and he took two wounds before he realised he'd been touched. He felt a chill, a sudden weakness, and was surprised to find he was sitting down, dizzy and bleeding. "There!" said d'Artagnan. "What did I tell you? That's the price of being stubborn. But you're strong, and you'll be good as new in a fortnight. Stay here, and I'll send the houseboy along with your clothes. Farewell ... Oh, you'll need a place to stay: try the Chat Qui Pelote, on Rue Montorgueil. You'll be well fed there, if I know the hostess. Goodbye!" And with that he strutted all the way home. The houseboy was standing exactly where he'd left him; d'Artagnan sent him to take his clothes to the Swiss, who was still sitting there, dumbfounded by his opponent's coolness. After that, the houseboy, the hostess, and the entire household regarded d'Artagnan as if Hercules had returned after completing his twelve labours. But once he was alone with the hostess, he said, "Now, fair Madeleine, you see the difference between a mere soldier and a gentleman. As for you, you've behaved like a tavern wench. More's the pity, because as a result you've lost my esteem and my lodging. I chased off the Swiss to teach you a lesson but I'm not about to stay under such a low roof as this. Hey, houseboy! Carry my things to the Muid d'Amour in the Rue des Bourdonnais. Goodbye, Madam." D'Artagnan said these words in a manner both moving and majestic. The hostess threw herself at his feet and begged his forgiveness, clinging to him tenderly. The roast was turning on the spit, the stove was glowing, and beautiful Madeleine wept adoringly. Hunger, warmth, and love all spoke together; he forgave her, and having forgiven, he remained.

177
D'Artagnan is confounded but receives Aid from an Unexpected Quarter

From the Royal Palace, d'Artagnan made his way thoughtfully toward home, somewhat reassured by the purse given him by Cardinal Mazarin but thinking of the beautiful diamond he'd seen sparkling for a moment on the prime minister's finger. "If that diamond ever fell into my hands again," he said, "I'd instantly turn it into cash. I'd buy a few properties around my father's small château that is a lovely house but has very few outbuildings, and a garden plot no larger than the Cemetery of the Innocents. Then it's probable some rich heiress, attracted by my nobility and good looks, would come and marry me. We'd have three boys: I'd make the first a grand lord like Athos, the second a handsome soldier like Porthos, and the third a refined abbot like Aramis. My faith! It would be infinitely better than the life I lead now – but unfortunately Sir de Mazarin is a gutless rat who wouldn't give me that diamond."
What would d'Artagnan have said if he'd known the queen had entrusted the diamond to Mazarin to give it to him?
As he turned into Rue Tiquetonne, he found it in a tumult with a large crowd outside his boarding house. "Oh ho!" he said. "Is there a fire at the Hôtel de La Chevrete or has the husband of the beautiful Madeleine actually returned at last?"
As d'Artagnan approached he saw it was neither, as the crowd was in front of the house next door rather than the boarding house. Some of those gathered bore torches, and by their light d'Artagnan could see armed men in uniforms. He asked what was happening, and was told that a mob of twenty men, led by a bourgeois, had attacked a carriage escorted by some of the cardinal's musketeers but when reinforcements had arrived the citizens had fled. Their leader had gone to ground in the house next to the hôtel, and the troops were searching the building. In his younger days d'Artagnan would have run to join the men in uniform and aid them against the citizens but his hot head had grown cooler over time. Besides, he had the cardinal's purse in his pocket, and didn't want to carry that into a riot. Formerly d'Artagnan had always wanted to know everything but now he knew more than enough already. He went into the boarding house without asking any more questions. Inside he found the beautiful Madeleine, who wasn't expecting to see him, as d'Artagnan had told her he'd be on duty that night at the Louvre. So, she used his unexpected return to propose a small celebration, hoping to engage him because she was worried about what was going on in the street, and had no burly Swiss Guard to protect her. She tried to draw him out as to what was going on outside, and with his own affairs but d'Artagnan was in no mood for chat; he told her to send supper up to his room, along with a bottle of old Burgundy. Pretty Madeleine had been trained to obey at a gesture, like an officer's valet. And this time around d'Artagnan had deigned to speak with her as well, so she obeyed twice as quickly. D'Artagnan took his key and his candle and went upstairs. He was satisfied with a simple room on the fourth floor, leaving the better rooms for Madeleine to rent out. The respect we have for the truth compels us to admit his room was next to the gutter and just below the roof. Here was the tent of this latter-day Achilles. D'Artagnan would camp out alone in his room when he wished to punish fair Madeleine by his absence. Once inside, his first act was to open an old desk with new locks and put away the purse full of coins, without even bothering to take the time to count them. A few moments later his supper arrived, along with the bottle of honey, and he dismissed the houseboy and sat down. Not to think, as one might assume, not yet: for d'Artagnan was a man who believed in doing each thing in its turn. He was hungry, so first he ate his supper, and when he was done he turned in. Nor was he one of those people who do their best thinking when abed; when d'Artagnan was in bed, he slept. In the morning, refreshed, was when his mind was clear and he had his best ideas. It had been a while since he'd had to think much about anything but nonetheless he saved his thinking for the morning. At daybreak he awoke, jumped out of bed like a soldier at reveille, and paced around his room, thinking. "In '43," he said, "six months or so before the death of the late cardinal, I had a letter from Athos. Where was I? Let's see ... ah, yes, I was at the Siege of Besancon, I remember. I was in the trenches. What was it he said? He was living on a small estate – yes, that's it, a small estate. But where? I'd read only that far when a gust of wind carried the letter off. When I was younger I would have gone after it, even if it meant running out of cover into a crossfire. My youth would have cost me a pretty price! So, I let the wind blow my letter away to the Spanish, who were too rude to return it to me. That was my last contact with Athos. On, then: Porthos. I last had a letter from him inviting me to his estate for a grand hunt in September of 1646. Unfortunately, I was in Béarn at the time due to my father's death, and though the letter followed me there, I was gone again by the time it arrived. They sent it after me to Montmédy but once again it missed me. It finally caught up to me in April but by then it was April 1647, and as the invitation had been for the previous September, I was out of luck. Now, where is this letter? It must be with my title deeds."

D'Artagnan went into a corner and opened an old trunk stuffed with parchments pertaining to the D'Artagnan estate, most of which had been out of the family for 200 years. He searched through it and finally he gave a cry of joy as he recognised the great looping handwriting of Porthos, followed by some spidery lines traced by the wrinkled fingers of his worthy wife. He remembered what it said, so d'Artagnan skipped through the body of the letter to get to the address: Château du Vallon. Porthos had included no other information. In his pride he thought everyone knew the location of the château that bore his name. "Devil take him!" said d'Artagnan. "Still the same vainglorious lummox! However, it's nonetheless a good idea to find him first, as he can't be short of money, having inherited eight hundred thousand livres from Sir Coquenard. But the other two are bound to fail me. By now Athos will have pickled his brain from drinking, and Aramis will be worn thin from his devotions."

D'Artagnan took one more glance at the letter and noticed it contained this sentence as a postscript: I write by this same courier to our worthy friend Aramis at his abbey. "At his abbey! Yes but which abbey? There are two hundred in Paris and three thousand in France. And for all I know when he became an abbot he changed his name for the third time. If only I was learned in theology and remembered the subject of that thesis he discussed so earnestly at Crèvecœur with the curate of Mont Didier and the superior of Jesuits! Then I might figure out which order he'd entered and which saint he'd taken as his patron. Maybe I should ask the cardinal for a safe-conduct that would enable me to inquire at all the abbeys – maybe even the convents? That's an idea ... but it would be admitting right at the outset that I need help, and the cardinal would be finished with me. The great are only grateful when one does the impossible for them. 'If it was possible,' they say, 'I'd have done it myself.' And rightly so. But wait a minute – I recall I had a letter from my old friend, in which he asked a favour of me. Yes, I remember it! But where's this letter now?" D'Artagnan thought for a moment, then went into his dressing room and opened the wardrobe where he kept his old clothes. He was looking for the doublet he wore in early 1648, and as d'Artagnan was an orderly man, he found it hanging right where it belonged. He reached into its pocket and drew out a paper: it was the letter from Aramis.

Sir d'Artagnan,
As you know, I've quarrelled with a certain gentleman, and he's given me a rendezvous for this evening in the Place Royale. As I'm a member of the Church and it would reflect poorly if it were known I took part in a duel, I can ask only the most loyal and discreet friend to help me, so I'd like you to stand as my second. Come in through the Rue Neuve Sainte-Catherine entrance and look for your opponent under the second lamppost on the right. I will be with mine under the third.

Entirely yours,
ARAMIS

This one lacked even a postscript. D'Artagnan remembered the affair: he'd gone to the rendezvous and met his opponent, a man he didn't know, and had given him a pretty thrust through the arm. Then he turned toward Aramis, who was already approaching, having finished with his man. "All done," said Aramis. "I think I've killed the insolent dog. Thank you, dear friend, and if you need me in the future, I'm entirely at your service."

And Aramis
/ had shaken his hand and disappeared under the arcades. So, he had no more idea where Aramis was than Athos or Porthos. The embarrassment of it was just turning to irritation when he heard the sound of a window breaking in his bedchamber. He immediately thought of the money bag locked in his desk and ran to his room. He was right: as he came in the door, he could see a man entering through the window. "Ah ha! Wretch!" snarled d'Artagnan, taking the man for a thief and grabbing his sword.

"Sir!" the man cried. "In heaven's name, leave your sword in its scabbard and hear me out! I'm not a thief, far from it! I'm an honest citizen, a local merchant, and I'm called ... but wait! Aren't you Sir d'Artagnan?"

"And you – you're Planchet!" cried the lieutenant.
"At your service, Sir," said Planchet, smiling in delight and relief, "if I still can be."
"Maybe," said d'Artagnan, "but what the devil are you doing running over the roofs at seven in the morning in January?"
"Sir," said Planchet, "if you must know – but maybe you don't have to know."
"You think not?" said d'Artagnan. "Well, first put a towel over that broken window, and draw the curtains."
Planchet leapt to obey, and when he was done, d'Artagnan said, "Well?"
"First of all, Sir," said Planchet warily, "how do things stand between you and Sir Rochefort?"
"Very well indeed. Didn't you know Rochefort's now one of my best friends?"
"Ah! All the better."
"But what does Rochefort have to do with the way you got into my room?"
"Ah, well, you see, Sir ... I must inform you that Sir Rochefort is..."
"For the love of God!" d'Artagnan said. "I know, he's in the Bastille."
"That is to say, he was," Planchet replied.

"What do you mean, he was?" d'Artagnan gasped. "Has he had the good luck to escape?"
"Ah, Sir!" gasped Planchet in his turn. "If you call that good luck, then all is well. You should know that yesterday guards were sent to take him back to the Bastille."
"Yes, by God! I should know that, since I was the one who'd fetched him out."
"But it wasn't you who took him back, fortunately for him. Because if I'd seen you were part of the escort, believe me, Sir, I have too much respect for you to—" "Out with it, you animal! What happened?"
"Well! When the carriage carrying Sir Rochefort got to the Rue de la Ferronnerie, it was blocked by a crowd of citizens, who started muttering at the sight of the guards. The prisoner thought the time was right and started shouting for help. I happened to be in the crowd and recognised the voice of Sir Rochefort; after all, he was the one who got me appointed sergeant in the Piedmont Regiment. I shouted out that the prisoner was a friend of the Duke Beaufort, and then there was a riot. The crowd surrounded the horses and pulled down the escort. Meanwhile I got to the door and opened it, and Sir Rochefort jumped out and disappeared into the crowd. Unfortunately, just then a patrol came by, reinforced the guards, and charged us. I beat a retreat toward Rue Tiquetonne but they were right behind me, so I ducked into the house next door to this one. They surrounded and then searched it but in vain, as on the fifth floor I'd found a sympathetic person who hid me under a couple of mattresses. I stayed in my hiding place all night but when day broke I thought they might resume their search, so I scrambled out across the gutters looking for some unguarded way into another house. That's my story, Sir, upon my honour, and it'll be terrible if you disapprove of it."
"No, my faith," said d'Artagnan. "On the contrary, I'm very glad to hear Rochefort got away. But you realise, don't you, that if you fall into the hands of the king's men, you'll be hanged without delay?"
"By God, I know it!" said Planchet. "That's what I'm afraid of, and why I'm so glad I found you – because if you agree to help me escape, no one could do it better."
"True," said d'Artagnan, "and I ask nothing better, though I risk being stripped of my rank if anyone found out I'd given asylum to a rebel."
"Ah, Sir! You know I'd risk my life for you."

"You might even mention that you've already done so, Planchet, and more than once. I forget only those things I ought to forget – and that's something I'd rather remember. Sit down, then, and have a bite to eat, as I can see how you're making eyes at the remains of last night's supper."
"Thanks, Sir. Your neighbour's pantry wasn't very well stocked, and I haven't eaten since I had a slice of bread and jam at noon yesterday. I don't mind sweet things in their place but that was rather a light meal to serve as both dinner and supper."
"Poor lad!" said d'Artagnan. "Well, put yourself around that."

"Ah, Sir, you've saved my life twice," said Planchet.
And he sat down at the table, as happy with scraps as in the old days in the Rue des Fossoyeurs. D'Artagnan began to pace up and down, trying to figure out what sort of advantage he could wring out of the unexpected appearance of Planchet. Meanwhile, Planchet worked to make up for lost time. Finally, he gave that sigh of satisfaction that shows when a hungry man is ready to take a break. "Tell me," said d'Artagnan, who thought it was time to see what he could learn, "do you know where Athos is?"

"No, Sir," Planchet replied.
"The devil! What about Porthos?"
"Him neither."
"Two devils! And Aramis?"
"Nor him."
"Three devils! Curse it all!"
"But," said Planchet slyly, "I know where Bazin is."
"What! You know how to find Bazin?"
"Yes, Sir."
"And where is he?"
"At Notre Dame."
"And what is he doing at Notre Dame?"
"He's a beadle."
"Bazin is a beadle at Notre Dame? Are you sure?"
"Absolutely: I saw him and spoke with him."
"He must know how to find his master."
"Without a doubt."
D'Artagnan thought for a moment, then took up his cloak and sword and prepared to go out. "Sir," said Planchet with a lamentable air, "you're not going to abandon me, are you? You're my only hope!"
"Oh, they won't look for you here," said d'Artagnan.
"Yes but if you leave," said the prudent Planchet, "the folk of this house, who didn't see me come in with you, will think I'm a thief."
"Good point," said d'Artagnan. "Let's see – can you speak like a provincial?"

"I can do better than that, Sir," said Planchet, "I even know another language: I can speak Flemish."

"Where the devil did you learn that?"

"In Artois, where we fought for two years. Listen: Goeden morgen, mynheer! Ith ben begeeray te weeten the gesond bects omstand."

"What does that mean?"

"Good morning, Sir! Be as kind as to tell me how you're feeling."

"You call that a language?" said d'Artagnan. "Never mind, that'll do perfectly."

D'Artagnan went to the door, called for the houseboy, and told him to ask the fair Madeleine to come up. "What are you doing, Sir?" Planchet said. "You're going to reveal our secret to a woman?"

"Don't worry, this one won't tip our hand." At that moment the hostess entered. She came in smiling expectantly, thinking to find only d'Artagnan but upon seeing Planchet, she stopped short, astonished.

"My dear hostess," said d'Artagnan, "may I present your brother, who's just arrived from Flanders, here to spend a few days in my service."

"My brother!" said the hostess, even more astonished.

"Say hello to your sister, Master Peter."

"Vilkom, Zuster!" said Planchet.

"Goeden day, Broer!" replied the bewildered hostess.

"Here's the situation," said d'Artagnan. "Sir is your brother, just come from Amsterdam, whom maybe you don't know but I do. Get him dressed properly while I'm out, and when I return in, say, an hour, present him to me. Since I can refuse you nothing, I'll take him into my service on your recommendation, although he doesn't speak a word of French. Got that?"

"I've got enough of it to see what you're after, and that's all I need," Madeleine said.

"You're a precious gem, dear hostess and I leave it to you." Whereupon with a wink to Planchet, d'Artagnan went out to go to Notre Dame.

The Differing Effects of a Half-Pistole When Bestowed upon a Beadle & a Choirboy

D'Artagnan crossed the Pont Neuf, congratulating himself on having found Planchet, because though it might seem as if he was doing the good fellow a favour, it was really Planchet who was helping him. At the moment, nothing could be more useful than to have a brave and intelligent lackey. It's true that Planchet probably couldn't stay in his service for long but after hiding in his home that had saved his life, or nearly so, when he returned to his home in Rue des Lombards, Planchet would still be in d'Artagnan's debt. D'Artagnan wasn't sorry to have friends among the bourgeoisie when they were preparing to make war on the Court. He would have an agent in the enemy's camp, and for a man as shrewd as d'Artagnan the smallest advantage could lead to great results. So, it was in this frame of mind, pleased with his chance and how he'd seized it, that d'Artagnan arrived at Notre Dame. He mounted the steps, entered the church, and addressing a sacristan who was sweeping the vestibule, asked him if he knew Sir Bazin. "Sir Bazin the beadle?" said the sacristan.

"Himself."

"He's assisting at mass over there, in the Chapel of the Virgin."

D'Artagnan sighed with relief, for despite what Planchet had told him, he'd secretly feared he'd never find Bazin. But now he had hold of one end of the string, and just needed to follow it to the other. He knelt in the front of the chapel so as not to lose sight of his man. Fortunately, it was Low Mass, and ending soon. D'Artagnan, who'd forgotten all his prayers, and had neglected to take up a prayer book, used the time to take a good look at Bazin. It must be said, Bazin wore his vestments with majesty and beatitude. He had arrived at what was, as we know, the height of his ambitions, and the silver-chased verge he held up was as honourable to him as the commander's baton that Condé threw – or didn't throw – into the enemy's lines at the Battle of Fribourg. His physique had undergone a change perfectly suited to his vestments, in that he was as round as the halo of a saint. Every angle had disappeared from his face: he still had a nose but his cheeks had expanded to absorb the rest of his features, smoothing his chin into his throat. This swelling had nearly shut his eyes. His forehead, down to the wrinkles just above his eyes, was covered by his hair that was cropped in ecclesiastical bangs. But Bazin's forehead, even when visible, had never been more than an inch and a half high. The officiating priest finished the mass as d'Artagnan completed his survey: he pronounced the sacramental words and withdrew, giving his benediction – which everyone received kneeling, to d'Artagnan's astonishment. But then he recognised the celebrant as the coadjutor himself, the famous Jean-François de Gondy who was currying favour with the devout among the populace, sensing the political moment. It was to feed this popularity that from time to time he led the morning masses that were usually attended by just a few commoners. D'Artagnan knelt like the others, received his blessing, and made the sign of the cross – but as Bazin passed humbly by, walking last with his eyes raised to heaven, d'Artagnan tugged at the hem of his robe. Bazin looked down and jumped as if he'd seen a snake. "Sir d'Artagnan!" he cried. "Vade retro, Satanas!"

D'Artagnan laughed. "So, my dear Bazin, is that how you receive an old friend?"

"Sir," Bazin replied, "A Christian's true friends are those who help him to salvation, not those who tempt him away."

"I don't understand you, Bazin," d'Artagnan said. "I fail to see how I can be any bar to your salvation."

"You forget, Sir," replied Bazin, "how you almost destroyed that of my master – that thanks to you he was nearly damned forever by staying a musketeer, when his vocation so clearly drew him to the Church."

"My dear Bazin," d'Artagnan said, "you can see, by where you've met me, that I'm a changed man. Age brings reverence – and as I'm sure your master is well on his way to salvation, just tell me where he is so I can get his advice on how to achieve my own."

"Say rather to drag him back with you into the world. Fortunately," Bazin added, "I don't know where he is, and since we're in a holy place, I wouldn't dare tell a lie."

"What?" cried d'Artagnan, crushed by disappointment. "You don't know where Aramis is?"

"First of all," said Bazin, "Aramis was his name of perdition. In Aramis one finds Simara, the name of a demon – but fortunately for him, he's left that name behind him forever."

"Right," said d'Artagnan, determined to show patience, "it's not Aramis I'm looking for, it's the Abbot d'Herblay. Come, my dear Bazin, tell me how to find him."

"Didn't you hear me say, Sir d'Artagnan, that I don't know?"

"Oh, I heard you say it; it's just impossible for me to believe it."

"It's the truth, Sir, the good Lord's honest truth."

D'Artagnan could see he wasn't going to get anything out of Bazin. He was obviously lying but was firm and persistent about sticking to it. "Very well, Bazin!" d'Artagnan said. "Since you don't know where your master is, we'll say no more about it. But let's part friends; here's a half-pistole to drink to my health."

"I do not drink, Sir," said Bazin, majestically pushing away the officer's hand. "Such things are for the laity."

"Incorruptible too!" murmured d'Artagnan. "Really, I'm off my game."

And since d'Artagnan, distracted by his thoughts, had let go of Bazin's hem, the beadle took advantage of his release to retreat to the sacristy, not thinking himself safe until he'd closed the door behind him. D'Artagnan stayed where he was, thinking, his eyes fixed on the door that had put a barrier between him and Bazin, when he felt a fingertip touch him lightly on the shoulder. He turned and was about to exclaim in surprise, when the one whose finger had touched him brought that finger to his lips to enjoin silence. So, he lowered his voice and said, "You, here, my dear Rochefort!"

"Quiet!" said Rochefort. "Did you know I was free?"

"I heard it first-hand."

"From who?"

"From Planchet."

"Planchet? How do you mean?"

"He was the one who freed you."

"So that was Planchet! I thought he looked familiar. Which just goes to show that no good deed is ever wasted."

"And what are you doing here?"

"I came to thank God for my joyous deliverance," said Rochefort.

"I know that can't be all. What else?"

"And then to ask for orders from the coadjutor, to see if there's some way we can outrage Mazarin."

"You're a bad egg, and you're going to end up back in the Bastille."

"Oh, don't be too sure about that! I'm enjoying this fresh air entirely too much. In fact," said Rochefort, taking a deep breath, "I'm of a mind to take a walk in the country, a tour of the provinces."

"Really!" said d'Artagnan. "I've had the same thought."

"Ah. And without prying, can one ask where you're going?"

"To look for my friends."

"Which friends?"

"The ones you asked me about yesterday."

"What, Athos, Porthos, and Aramis?"

"Yes."

"On your honour?"

"What's so surprising about that?"

"Oh, nothing. It's funny, that's all. And on whose behalf are you looking for them?"

"You can't have any doubts about that."

"True enough."

"Unfortunately, I have no idea where they are."

"And no way to find out? Just wait a week, and I'll tell you myself."

"A week is too long. I must find them within three days."

"Three days! That isn't long," said Rochefort, "and France is large."

"Never mind, you know the word must. We can do a lot once must is invoked."

"And how will you start your search?"

"I'm on it."

"Good luck, then!"

"And you, bon voyage!"

"Maybe we'll meet each other on the road."

"Not likely."

"Who knows? Chance is capricious."

"Goodbye."

"Au revoir. And by the way, if Mazarin happens to mention me, tell him I said he'll soon see if, as he says, I'm too old for action."

Then Rochefort went off with one of those diabolical smiles that, once upon a time, had made d'Artagnan shudder. But d'Artagnan watched him go without anxiety, smiling on his part with a touch of that melancholy peculiar to him. "Go, old demon," he said to himself. "Do as you will, it doesn't matter to me – for there's no second Constance in the world!"

Turning, d'Artagnan saw that Bazin, having removed his ecclesiastical garb, was talking with the sacristan d'Artagnan had spoken with upon entering the church. Bazin was waving his short little arms around in lively gestures, probably, thought d'Artagnan, warning the lad against him in future. He took advantage of the two churchmen's preoccupation to slip out of the cathedral and take up a post on the corner of the Rue des Canettes from which he could watch the door unnoticed. Five minutes later d'Artagnan saw Bazin appear on the steps. He looked all around to make sure he wasn't observed but didn't see our officer, hidden around the corner of a house fifty paces away. Reassured, he set off along Rue Notre Dame. D'Artagnan darted from his hiding place and caught up just in time to see him turn down Rue de la Juiverie and then, on Rue de la Calandre, enter a boarding house of honest appearance. Our officer had no doubt it was the home of the worthy beadle. D'Artagnan was careful to keep his distance; if the house didn't have a concierge, there'd be no one to speak to, and if it did, she'd already have been warned. Instead he went into a small tavern on the corner of Rue Saint-Éloi and Rue de la Calandre, where he ordered a hippocras. That drink would take a good half hour to prepare, giving d'Artagnan plenty of time to watch Bazin's house without arousing suspicion. In the tavern, he noticed a young lad, aged twelve or so, whom he thought he recognised from having seen him twenty minutes earlier dressed as a chorister. He spoke with him, and as the apprentice sub-deacon had nothing to hide, d'Artagnan learned that he served from six to nine in the morning as a choir boy, and then from nine till midnight as a tavern boy. As he was talking to the lad, a horse, saddled and bridled, was led up to Bazin's front door, and a moment later, Bazin came down. "Look!" said the lad. "There goes our beadle, on his way again."

"And where is he off to?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Dame – blessed if I know!"

"There's a half-pistole in it," d'Artagnan said, "if you can find out."

"For me?" said the lad, eyes sparkling. "Oh, I'll find out where he's going. It won't be hard. You're not kidding?"

"No, faith of an officer. Look – here's the half-pistole."

And he displayed the corrupting coin but kept hold of it. "I'll ask him."

"That's the best way not to get the answer," said d'Artagnan. "Wait till he's gone, then ask around, see what people know. Until then, your half-pistole waits here."

And he put it back in his pocket. "I get it," said the lad, with that smirk unique to the gamins of Paris. "We'll wait, then."

They didn't have to wait long. Five minutes later, Bazin set off at a trot, slapping the withers of his horse with an umbrella. Bazin had always had the habit of using an umbrella as a riding crop. He'd scarcely turned the corner of the Rue de la Juiverie before the tavern boy was off like a bloodhound on his trail. D'Artagnan sat back down at his table, certain that within ten minutes he'd know just what he wanted to know. Indeed, the boy returned in even less time than that. "Well?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Well," the young lad said, "I found out a thing or two."

"So, where's he going?"

"I still get the half-pistole?"

"Oh, yes – but talk to me first."

"Let me see it again. I want to make sure it's the real thing."

"Here it is."

"Master host!" the boy said. "Sir here wants some change."

The innkeeper took the half-pistole and gave the boy its change – which he put into his own pocket. D'Artagnan watched this little game, chuckling, then said, "So where did he go?"

"He went to Noisy."

"How do you know that?"

"Ah, for the love of God, it didn't take long to figure that out. I recognised the horse as belonging to the butcher, who occasionally hires it out to Sir Bazin. I didn't think the butcher would hire out his horse without asking where Sir Bazin would be going with it – not that he'd be likely to go far."

"And he told you Sir Bazin..."

"Was going to Noisy. It's the usual thing, he goes there two or three times a week."

"And do you know Noisy?"

"I should, my nurse was from there."

"Is there a monastery in Noisy?"

"A famous one, a Jesuit monastery."

"Well, that's it, then," said d'Artagnan.

"So, you're satisfied?"

"Entirely. What do they call you?"

"Friquet."

D'Artagnan took out his notebook and wrote down the lad's name and the tavern's address. "So, Sir Officer," the tavern boy said, "Might there be a way to earn more half-pistoles?"

"Could be," said d'Artagnan. And since he'd learned what he wanted to know, he paid for the hippocras that he hadn't drunk yet, and marched on back to Rue Tiquetonne.

In Which d'Artagnan finds himself on the Crupper of Planchet Seeking Aramis

Returning home, d'Artagnan found a man standing by the fireplace; it was Planchet but a Planchet so different, thanks to the old clothes left behind by the vanished husband, that he hardly recognised him. Madeleine had just presented him to all the houseboys. Planchet then addressed d'Artagnan in some lovely Flemish, the officer replied in some made-up gabble, and the bargain was concluded: Madeleine's brother had entered d'Artagnan's service. D'Artagnan's course was clear: he didn't want to arrive in Noisy during the day for fear of being recognised but it was only three or four leagues from Paris, on the road to Meaux, so he had some time ahead of him. He spent the first part of it in taking a substantial lunch that can be a liability for head work but a useful precaution when one has work for the body. Then he changed his outfit, as he thought the uniform of a lieutenant of musketeers might inspire distrust. Finally, he got out the best and longest of his swords, one he'd relied upon back in the old days. About two o'clock he had a couple of horses saddled, and then, followed by Planchet, he rode toward the La Villette gate. The house next door to the Hôtel de La Chevrete was still undergoing an intensive search. A league and a half outside Paris, d'Artagnan, seeing that in his impatience he'd still left too soon, stopped at an inn to breathe the horses. The bar was full of suspicious characters who gave them ugly looks and seemed to be organising some sort of nocturnal expedition. A man wrapped in a cloak appeared at the door but seeing a stranger within, he just gestured to two of the drinkers, who got up and went out to talk with him. As for d'Artagnan, he approached the lady of the house, breezily praised her honey, some horrible swill from Montreuil, and plied her with questions about Noisy. He learned there were two buildings of note in the village, one belonging to the Archbishop of Paris, now in use by his niece, the Duchess de Longueville, the other a monastery managed by the worthy fathers of the Jesuits, and there was no way to mistake one for the other. At four o'clock, d'Artagnan resumed his journey, marching on foot because he didn't want to arrive before nightfall. But walking while leading a horse, on a grey winter's day, across a featureless landscape, one has nothing better to do, as La Fontaine says of the hare in his hole, than to think. And so d'Artagnan thought. Planchet did too; but as we'll see, their thoughts were not the same. A word from the inn's hostess had steered d'Artagnan's thoughts in a particular direction, and that word was the name of Madam de Longueville. Indeed, Madam de Longueville was a lot to think about, as she was among the greatest ladies of the kingdom, and one of the reigning beauties of the Court. Wedded young in a loveless marriage to the old Duke Longueville, she'd had an affair with Coligny, who'd been killed on her account by the Duke Guise in a duel on the Place Royale. Following that had been a spate of rumours that she was entirely too close to her brother, the Prince de Condé, talk that had scandalized the more timorous souls at Court but their friendship had warped into a deep and abiding hatred. Now, it was said, she was involved in a political liaison with the Prince de Marcillac, son of the old Duke La Rochefoucauld, whom she was seducing into becoming an enemy of the Duke Condé, her brother. D'Artagnan thought about all of this. He thought of how, at the Louvre, he'd often seen the radiant and dazzling Madam de Longueville passing before him. He thought about Aramis, who with no more virtues than d'Artagnan, had formerly been the lover of Madam de Chevreuse, who'd been to the previous reign what Madam de Longueville was to this one. And he asked himself why there were people in the world who could get what they wanted, could satisfy political ambition or desire, while there were others who, by random chance, or some flaw in their natures, never got more than halfway to their hopes. He was just facing up to the idea that, despite all his wits, finesse, and skill, he was probably one of these latter people, when Planchet caught up to him and said, "I'll bet, Sir, that you're thinking what I'm thinking."

"I doubt that, Planchet," said d'Artagnan, smiling. "But what are you thinking?"

"I'm thinking, Sir, about those ugly customers we saw drinking at the inn where we stopped."

"Planchet the ever prudent!"

"It's my instinct, Sir."

"Well, then! What do your instincts tell you in this situation?"

"Sir, my instincts told me those thugs were gathered at that inn for some sort of bad business. I was just thinking about that while I was back in a dark corner of the stable, and a man wrapped in a cloak came in, followed by two other men."

"Oh ho!" d'Artagnan said, as Planchet's story matched what he'd seen himself. "And then?"

"One of the men said, 'He's sure to be at Noisy, or be coming tonight, because I recognised his servant.' 'Are you sure?' said the man in the cloak. 'Yes, my Prince.'"

"My Prince?" d'Artagnan interrupted.

"Yes, 'my Prince.' But listen further: 'If he's really there, what should we do?' asked the other man. 'What should you do?' said the prince. 'Yes. He's a swordsman and won't be easily taken.' 'But you'll take him, just the same – and make sure you take him alive. Do you have rope to bind him and a gag for his mouth?' 'We have all that.' 'Pay close attention, because he'll probably be disguised as a cavalier.' 'Oh, yes, My Lord, never fear.' 'Besides, I'll be there to make certain.' 'And you assure us that the law ...' 'I'll answer for everything,' the prince said. 'All right, we'll do our best.' And with that, they left the stable."

"Well," said d'Artagnan, "what's that matter to us? That nasty sort of affair happens every day."

"How do you know we're not the targets of it?"

"Us, the targets? Why?"

"Dame! Think of what they said: 'I recognised his servant,' which could apply to me."

"Do you think?"

"And the other one said, 'He's sure to be at Noisy, or be coming tonight.' That could apply to you."

"And so?"

"So, the prince said, 'Pay close attention, because he'll probably be disguised as a cavalier' – which is pretty clear, since you're dressed as a cavalier rather than an officer of musketeers. What do you think of that?"

"Alas, my dear Planchet!" sighed d'Artagnan. "It's been some time since princes wanted to have me murdered. But those days are gone! Rest assured, these people aren't after us."

"Sir is certain?"

"Quite certain."

"All right, then – I won't mention it again." Planchet resumed his place in d'Artagnan's wake, with that sublime confidence he'd always had in his master, and which fifteen years of separation had done nothing to diminish.

They rode on for another league before Planchet approached d'Artagnan again. "Sir," he said.

"Well?"

"Look, Sir, over that way," said Planchet. "I think I can see shadows passing by in the twilight. Listen, isn't that the sound of horses' hooves?"

"Not a chance," said d'Artagnan, "the ground is soaked from the rain. But now that you mention it, I do seem to see something." And he stopped to look and listen. "If their horses hear ours, they'll neigh."

And just as he said it, the neighing of a horse came to their ears. "Those are our men, riding cross-country," he said. "But it's no business of ours; let's continue."

And they went on their way. Half an hour later, around eight-thirty or nine o'clock, they reached the first houses of Noisy. As was usual in the country, everyone was already in bed, and not a light could be seen in the village. D'Artagnan and Planchet continued on their course. Now to their right and left the sharp silhouettes of roofs stood out against the dark grey sky. Occasionally an awakened dog barked from behind a door, or a startled cat darted from the middle of the street to hide in a woodpile, out of which its frightened eyes glinted like carbuncles. These were the only living creatures that seemed to inhabit the village. In the middle of the town, overlooking the main square, rose a dark mass between two streets, in front of which ancient lime trees spread their bony boughs. D'Artagnan carefully examined this building that showed a light in only one window. "This," he said to Planchet, "must be the château of the archbishop, current home of the beautiful Madam Longueville. But where is the monastery?"

"The monastery is at the far end of the village," Planchet said. "I know it."

"Well," d'Artagnan said, "trot over there, Planchet, while I tighten my horse's girth, and tell me if there are any lighted windows at the Jesuits' place."

Planchet obeyed, heading off into the darkness while d'Artagnan dismounted to adjust his horse's tack. After five minutes, Planchet returned. "Sir, there's only one lighted window on the side that faces the fields."

"Hmm!" said d'Artagnan. "If I were a Frondeur, I'd knock here at the palace if I were looking for a night's lodging. If I were a monk, I'd knock over there to find myself a good dinner. But since we're us, I think we might be stuck between the château and the monastery and have to sleep on the hard ground, dying of thirst and hunger."

"Yes," said Planchet, "like Buridan's ass. But instead, let's pick one or the other."

"Hush!" d'Artagnan said. "The only window with a light in it just went out."

"Do you hear something, Sir?" said Planchet.

In fact, there was a sudden noise like the sound of an approaching hurricane and then two troops of riders, a dozen men apiece came racing up the two streets that bordered the château, surrounding d'Artagnan and Planchet. "Yeah!" said d'Artagnan, drawing his sword and stepping behind his horse, as Planchet did the same. "Were you right all the time? Is it really us they're after?"

"Here he is! We got him!" cried the equestrians closing in around d'Artagnan, waving their swords.

"Don't let him escape," a voice called loudly.

"Don't worry, My Lord!"

D'Artagnan thought it was high time for him to join the discussion. "Whoa, Gentlemen!" he said in his Gascon accent. "What are you doing? What do you want?"

"You'll find out!" cried the equestrians.

"Wait, stop!" shouted the one addressed as my Lord. "Stop, or it's your heads! That's not his voice."

"Oh that, Gentlemen!" said d'Artagnan. "Has madness come to Noisy? Anyone who ventures too close had better watch out – my sword is long and will take you apart."

The leader approached. "What are you doing here?" he said in a haughty voice accustomed to command.

"What about yourself?" said d'Artagnan.

"Mind your manners, or things won't go well. My name is my secret but I still insist on the respect due to my rank."

"I'm sure if I was leading an ambush, I'd want to keep my name a secret, too," said d'Artagnan, "but I'm just travelling with my servant, so I've nothing to hide."

"Enough, enough! Who are you, then?"

"I'll tell you my name so you'll know how to find me, whether Sir or My Lord, gentleman or prince," said our Gascon, who didn't wish to appear to give in to a threat. "Have you heard of Sir d'Artagnan?" "Lieutenant of the King's Musketeers?" said the voice.

"That's the one."

"Of course."

"Well!" the Gascon continued. "Have you heard he has a firm wrist and a sharp blade?"

"Are you Sir d'Artagnan?"

"That's me."

"So, are you here to defend ... him?"

"Him? Who?"

"The one we seek."

"I thought I was in Noisy," d'Artagnan said, "not the Land of Mysteries."

"Answer me!" said the same haughty voice. "Whom do you await beneath these windows? Did you come to Noisy to defend him?"

"I'm not waiting for anyone," said d'Artagnan, losing his patience. "I'm not here to defend anyone but myself – but that, I'm warning you, I'm more than ready to do."

"All right," said the voice. "Be on your way, then."

"Be on my way!" said d'Artagnan, who wasn't about to leave. "I don't think so. I'm tired, and so is my horse. Unless you've got supper and a bed for us, we're going nowhere."

"Varlet!"

"Sir!" said d'Artagnan. "Watch your language, if you please. Insult me again, and whether you're a marquis or a duke, a prince or a king, I'll spill your guts. Do you hear me?"

"Here now," said the leader. "That's a Gascon talking, and no doubt about it. He's not who we're after; we've missed it for tonight, so let's go. Master d'Artagnan," he said, raising his voice, "we'll meet again."

"That'll be bad luck for you," scoffed the Gascon, "because it will be daylight and you'll be alone."

"Fine, fine!" said the voice. "Let's go, Gentlemen!"

And the troop, muttering and growling, disappeared into the darkness toward Paris. D'Artagnan and Planchet stayed on the defensive for a moment but as the noise died away, they sheathed their swords. "You see, fool?" said d'Artagnan quietly to Planchet. "It wasn't us they wanted."

"But who, then?" asked Planchet.

"My faith! I don't know, and I don't care. I just want to get to that Jesuit monastery. Mount up, and let's go knock on their door. What the devil! They won't eat us."

And d'Artagnan remounted. Planchet did the same but then an unexpected weight fell on his horse's withers. "Whoa, Sir!" Planchet cried. "There's a man on my crupper!"

D'Artagnan turned and saw two forms on Planchet's horse. "The Devil is after us!" he cried, drawing his sword and preparing to impale the newcomer. "No, my dear d'Artagnan," said the latter. "It isn't the Devil – it's me, Aramis. To the gallop, Planchet, and when you reach the end of the village, bear left." So Planchet galloped, carrying Aramis behind him, followed by d'Artagnan who began to think he was trapped in a fantastic and ridiculous dream.

180 The Abbot d'Herblay

At the end of the village Planchet bore left as Aramis ordered and then stopped beneath the monastery's single lighted window. Aramis jumped down and clapped three times. At once the window opened and a rope ladder rolled down. "My dear d'Artagnan," said Aramis, "if you'd care to climb up, I'd be delighted to receive you."

"Oh that," said d'Artagnan. "So, this is how you get home?"

"Well, yes, after nine o'clock," said Aramis. "For the love of God, the monastery rules are quite strict."

"Pardon me, old friend," said d'Artagnan, "but did you swear for the love of God?"

"Did I?" said Aramis, laughing. "It's possible. You can't imagine the bad habits one learns in these cursed monasteries. It's the wicked ways of these churchmen among whom I'm forced to live! Aren't you going to climb up?"

"Go ahead. I'm right behind you."

"All right but in the words of the old cardinal to the late king, 'Only to show you the way, Sire.'"

And Aramis went briskly up the ladder, arriving at the window in a moment. D'Artagnan followed but less quickly. Clearly this means of entrance was not as familiar to him as to his friend. "I do beg your pardon," said Aramis, noting his careful climb. "This is good enough for me but if I'd had the honour of knowing of your visit, I'd have brought out the gardener's ladder."

"Sir," said Planchet, as d'Artagnan neared the top, "that's fine for Sir Aramis, and even for you, and I might manage it as well – but our two horses can't climb a ladder."

"Take them under that shed, my friend," said Aramis, pointing Planchet toward a sort of shack that stood on the edge of the fields. "You'll find straw and oats for them there."

"But what about me?"

"Come back under the window, clap three times, and we'll send down some food. Rest easy. Morbleu, it's not as if we'd let you die of hunger!"

Then Aramis pulled up the ladder and shut the window. D'Artagnan was looking around the room. Never had he seen a chamber so warlike, and yet so elegant. There were trophy stands in each corner displaying swords of all sorts, and four large paintings representing, armed and armoured for battle, Cardinal Richelieu, Cardinal Lorraine, Cardinal La Valette, and the Archbishop of Bordeaux. Nor did the rest of the furnishings bespeak the abode of an abbot: the hangings were damask, the carpets from Alençon, and the bed especially seemed like that of a fine lady, with lace trim and counterpane. It was hardly the home of a man who'd sworn to gain heaven by abstinence and mortification. "You're looking over my den," said Aramis. "Ah, my dear, my apologies but what would you have? They gave me a cell fit for a monk. What is it you're looking for?"

"I'm looking for whoever unrolled the ladder. I don't see anybody but ladders don't unroll themselves."

"No, it was Bazin."

"Ah ha!" said d'Artagnan.

"But Sir Bazin," continued Aramis, "is well trained. When he saw I wasn't returning alone, he discreetly retired. Have a seat, my dear, and let's talk."

Aramis pushed a chair toward d'Artagnan, who dropped gratefully into it. "You'll dine with me, I hope?" asked Aramis.

"Yes, of course," said d'Artagnan, "and with pleasure. I must admit, the ride has given me the devil of an appetite."

"Alas, my poor friend," said Aramis, "we can offer only meagre fare, as we didn't expect you."

"Are you threatening me, as you did at Crèvecœur, with an omelette and tetragons, as I think you called the spinach?"

"Oh, no," said Aramis, "by the grace of God and Bazin, I hope we can find something better than that in the pantry of our worthy Jesuit fathers. Bazin, my friend! Come here."

The door opened and Bazin appeared but when he saw d'Artagnan he gave a gasp that sounded much like a cry of despair. "My dear Bazin," said d'Artagnan, "I was delighted to see you tell a lie with such aplomb, especially in church."

"Sir," Bazin said, "I've learned from our worthy Jesuit fathers that it's permissible to state a falsehood when one's intentions are good."

"Fine, fine, Bazin but d'Artagnan is dying of hunger," Aramis said. "Give us the best dinner you can find, and above all, the best honey."

Bazin bowed obediently, gave a great sigh, and left. D'Artagnan turned his eyes from the bedchamber to its owner, from the fine furnishings to their owner's fine apparel, and said, "Now that we're alone, my dear Aramis, tell me: where the devil did you drop from when you landed behind Planchet?"

"Eh, God," said Aramis, "from heaven, of course!"

"From heaven?" said d'Artagnan, shaking his head. "You don't look like someone who came from there any more than you look like someone who's on his way there."

"My dear," said Aramis, with an air of self-satisfaction d'Artagnan had never seen when he was a musketeer, "if I didn't come from Heaven, I came at least from Paradise that is close enough."

"At last the great debate is settled," said d'Artagnan. "Up till now the sages had never been able to agree on the location of Paradise. Some said it was on Mount Ararat; others said somewhere between the Tigris and the Euphrates; but it seems it wasn't nearly so remote. Paradise is in Noisy-le-Sec, on the site of the château of the Archbishop of Paris, and one enters not by the door but by the window. From it one descends not the marble steps of a peristyle but the boughs of a lime tree and the angel who guards it with a flaming sword isn't called Gabriel but the far more earthly Prince Marcillac."

Aramis laughed. "You were always such a jolly companion, my dear," he said, "and your witty Gascon humour hasn't left you. Yes, there's something in what you say – so long as you don't think that means Madam de Longueville and I are lovers."

"Plague take me if I do!" said d'Artagnan. "After having been in love so long with Madam de Chevreuse, you'd hardly take up with her mortal enemy."

"Yes, quite so," said Aramis, with a casual air. "Alas, my poor duchess, I loved her well. To be fair, she did well by us but what would you have? She was exiled from France. He was a hard man to dice against, that damned cardinal!" He glared at the portrait of the former minister. "He'd ordered her confined to the Château de Loches – though I swear he'd rather have had her head, as he did with Chalais, Montmorency, and Cinq-Mars. She escaped that place, fled disguised as a man, along with her maid, that poor Kitty. I even heard a story that, in some village or other, she asked a curate for hospitality, and he, taking her for a cavalier, offered to share the only bed he had with her. She had an amazing way of wearing men's garb and carrying it off, that dear Marie – I know only one other woman who wears it so well. They even wrote a verse about it: Laboissière, please do tell ... do you know it?"

"I don't. Sing it, old friend." Aramis began again, in his most cavalier tone:

*Laboissière, please do tell
Don't I seem like a man?
My faith, you ride well
Better even than we can
Among the shining halberds
Head held up, she rides out
Past a regiment of guards
Just like a cadet, no doubt.*

"Bravo!" said d'Artagnan. "You always did sing beautifully, my dear Aramis. I see that preaching the mass hasn't spoiled your voice."

"My dear," said Aramis, "when I was a musketeer, I stood guard as little as possible – and now that I'm an abbot, I say as few masses as I can. But back to my poor duchess."

"Which one? The Duchess de Chevreuse, or the Duchess de Longueville?"

"My dear, I already told you there's nothing between me and the Duchess de Longueville – a little flirtation, perhaps but no more. No, I was speaking of the Duchess de Chevreuse. Have you seen her since her return from Brussels, after the death of the old king?"

"Indeed I did, and she was still very beautiful."

"Yes," said Aramis. "I saw her then as well. I gave her excellent advice, to which she paid absolutely no attention. I did my best to persuade her that Mazarin was now the queen's lover but she refused to believe it, saying she knew Anne of Austria, and the queen was too proud to fall for such a fop. She joined the Duke Beaufort's cabal, and then the fop arrested Beaufort and exiled Madam de Chevreuse all over again."

"But you know she's since gotten permission to return," said d'Artagnan.

"Yes, she's back, and is bound to do something else foolish."

"But maybe this time she'll follow your advice."

"Oh, this time I haven't seen her," said Aramis. "She is much changed."

"Not like you, Aramis, for you never change. You still have your handsome black hair, that elegant figure, and those beautiful hands, like a lady's, really – hands well suited to a prelate."

"Yes," said Aramis, "I do what I can to take care of myself. But it's hard, my dear, as I'm getting old – I'm nearly thirty-seven."

"Listen, 'my dear,'" said d'Artagnan with a smile, "since we're back together, let's agree on one thing: what age we shall be for the future."

"What do you mean?" said Aramis.

"I mean that I used to be younger than you by two or three years," d'Artagnan replied, "but unless I miscalculate, I'm now forty years old."

"Really!" said Aramis. "Then I must be the one who's miscalculated, my dear, because you've always been an admirable mathematician. So, by your reckoning, I must be ... forty-three! Double devils! Don't tell them at the Hôtel de Rambouillet, it would ruin me."

"Don't worry," said d'Artagnan, "I never go there."

"But damn me," cried Aramis, "where is that animal Bazin? Hey, Bazin, you clown! We're dying of hunger and thirst here."

Bazin entered at just that moment, both hands raised to heaven, each holding a bottle. "Finally!" said Aramis. "What took you so long?"

"I'm here, Sir," said Bazin. "It took me a while to climb all those stairs..."

"This is what comes of being a beadle," Aramis interrupted, "and wasting valuable time reading your breviary. I warn you that if you spend so much time polishing the relics in the chapel that you forget to polish my sword, I'll make a bonfire of all your breviaries and pictures of saints and roast you over it."

Bazin, shocked, made the sign of the cross with the bottle he held in his right hand. As for d'Artagnan, he was so surprised by the manner and tone of the Abbot d'Herblay compared to that of Aramis the Musketeer, he just stared. Bazin quickly covered the table with a damask tablecloth, and then brought out such an array of sweetmeats, tasty morsels, and perfumed dainties that d'Artagnan was astonished. "So, this is what you have when you're not expecting anyone?"

"Oh," said Aramis, "we can always scare up a snack. But I'd heard you were looking for me."

"From who?"

"From Master Bazin, of course, who took you for the Devil, my dear, and rushed to warn me of the peril to my soul if I risked the society of an officer of musketeers."

"Oh, Sir!" moaned Bazin, wringing his hands.

"Enough hypocrisy! You know I don't like it. You'd be better off opening the window and lowering down a loaf, a chicken, and a bottle to your friend Planchet, who's been clapping his hands down below for nearly an hour."

Planchet, having fed and watered the horses, was in fact waiting under the window, where he'd repeated the specified signal two or three times. Bazin obeyed, tying the three designated items to a rope and lowering them to Planchet, who, quite satisfied, immediately retired to the shed. "And now, let us eat," said Aramis.

The two friends sat down at the table, and Aramis began to slice up chicken, partridges, and ham with skill and dash. "Plague," said d'Artagnan, "you eat well here!"

"Yes, tolerably well. I have an exemption from Rome for fast-days that the coadjutor got me on account of my health, and I have Lafollone's former chef as cook. Remember Lafollone? He was that crony of the old cardinal who was a famous gourmand, and always prayed after dinner, 'My God, grant me the grace to properly digest that which I've eaten so well.'"

"That didn't keep him from dying of indigestion," d'Artagnan laughed.

"What would you have?" Aramis shrugged. "No one can escape his destiny!"

D'Artagnan said, "I hope you won't mind the indelicate question I'm about to ask."

"Ask away – you know that between us, nothing is too delicate."

"So, are you rich, now?"

"Oh, my God, no! I make about twelve thousand livres a year, plus a small annuity of a thousand crowns granted me by the Prince de Condé."

"And how do you earn these twelve thousand livres?" said d'Artagnan. "From your poetry?"

"No, I gave up poetry, except for the occasional epigram, love sonnet, or drinking song. No, my dear, I write sermons."

"You make money from sermons?"

"Ah but they're excellent sermons, you see! Or so they tell me."

"And do you preach them?"

"No, I sell them."

"To whom?"

"To those of my fellow churchmen who wish to be known as great orators!"

"Really? And you haven't been tempted to find such glory for yourself?"

"I tried it, my dear but it's just not my forte. If I'm in the pulpit, and a pretty woman happens to look at me, I look back; and if she smiles, I smile too. And there goes the sermon! Instead of warning about the torments of hell, I speak of the joys of paradise. That exact thing happened to me one day in the Church of Saint-Louis in the Marais. A cavalier laughed and mocked me, and I interrupted my sermon to call him a fool. Some of the congregation went outside to gather rocks to stone me but I spoke so persuasively to the rest that when the others returned, they ended up stoning the cavalier instead of me. Of course, he showed up at my house the next day with a challenge, thinking I was an abbot like other abbots."

"And what came of this challenge?" said d'Artagnan, holding his sides from laughing.

"What came of it was a rendezvous the following night in the Place Royale. For the love of God! I think you know something about that."

"Would that by any chance be the 'insolent dog' I helped you as second against?" d'Artagnan asked.

"Exactly. You saw how that turned out."

"Was he killed?"

"I don't know. But in any case, I gave him absolution in articulo mortis. It is sufficient to kill the body with slaying the soul."

Bazin made a gesture of despair that indicated that while he might approve the theory, he deplored the tone of its expression. "Bazin, my friend, you overlook the fact that I can see you in the mirror, and that I forbade all such signs of approval or disapproval. So, you will do us the favour of serving us some Spanish honey, and then retire. Besides, my friend d'Artagnan has a secret he wishes to share with me. Isn't that so, d'Artagnan?" D'Artagnan nodded, and Bazin withdrew, after placing some Spanish honey on the table. The two friends, left alone, remained silent in each other's presence. Each of them, when he thought he wasn't observed, risked a glance at the other. Aramis pretended to savour his honey, while d'Artagnan considered how to begin. It was Aramis who was first to break the silence.

181
None of the 2

"What are you thinking about, d'Artagnan," asked Aramis, "and why does that thought make you smile?"

"I was thinking that when you were a musketeer you were always acting the abbot, and now that you're an abbot, you behave like a musketeer."

"It's true," said Aramis, laughing. "Man is a strange animal, compounded of contrasts – as you know, my dear d'Artagnan. Since becoming an abbot, I dream of nothing but battles."

"That's clear from your furnishings and decor. I've never seen so many different styles of rapiers. Do you still fence well?"

"As well as I used to – maybe even better. I do nothing else all day."

"And with whom do you spar?"

"Oh, we have an excellent master of arms."

"What, here?"

"Yes, here, in this very monastery, my dear. A Jesuit monastery has everything."

"Then you would have killed Sir de Marcillac if he'd come after you alone, instead of with a troop of twenty?"

"Certainly," said Aramis, "and even with his troop of twenty, if I could have drawn steel before I was recognised."

"God help me," muttered d'Artagnan. "I think he's become more of a Gascon than I am." Then, aloud: "Well, then, Aramis, you were wondering why I was looking for you?"

"No, I didn't ask," said Aramis slyly, "but I expect you'll tell me anyway."

"Well, I've come to offer you a way to slay Sir de Marcillac, if that would please you, prince though he is."

"Well, well, well," said Aramis. "That's an idea, that is."

"And I invite you to take advantage of it. Let's see! With your abbacy worth a thousand crowns, and the twelve thousand livres you make selling sermons – are you rich? Be honest."

"Rich? I'm as poor as Job. Turn this place upside down if you like but you won't find more than a hundred pistoles in it."

"Plague, a hundred pistoles?" d'Artagnan said to himself. "And he calls that being poor as Job? If I had that, I'd feel rich as Croesus." Then, aloud: "Are you ambitious?"

"As ambitious as Caesar."

"Well, then! I offer you the chance to be rich, powerful, and able to do whatever you like."

The shadow of a cloud passed over Aramis's brow as quick as that over the corn in August – but quick as it was, d'Artagnan saw it. "Go on," said Aramis.

“After one more question. Are you involved in politics?”

A light flashed in Aramis’s eyes, quick as the shadow that had passed over his brow – but d’Artagnan saw that too. “No,” said Aramis.

“Then you should be open to every side, since you have no master but God,” said the Gascon, laughing.

“Possibly.”

“Aramis, do you sometimes dream of those days of our youth, laughing, drinking, and fighting?”

“Yes, of course, and often missed them. It was a happy time, delectable tempus!”

“Well, my friend, those happy times can come again. I’ve been given a mission to find my old companions, and I wanted to start with you, who was the heart and soul of our little band.”

Aramis’s bow was almost too courteous. “Me, go back into politics?” he sighed, and leaned loosely back in his chair. “But dear d’Artagnan, you see how comfortable and easy my life is now. In the past, we both suffered from the ingratitude of the great!”

“True enough,” said d’Artagnan, “but perhaps the great repent of their ingratitude.”

“If so,” said Aramis, “that’d be a change indeed. However, for every sin, a penance. But you’re right about one thing: if one’s of a mind to meddle in affairs of state, now would be the time to do it.”

“And how would you know – you, who have nothing to do with politics?”

“My God! How could I not? I live in a world devoted to it. When we talk of poetry or love, who is there but Sir Sarasin, the poetical friend of Sir de Conti? Or Sir Voiture who’s allied with the coadjutor? Or Sir de Bois-Robert, who, since he’s no longer with Cardinal Richelieu, is with no one or everyone? You see, there’s no escaping politics.”

“No doubt about that,” said d’Artagnan.

“And don’t take what I say as the chatter of some little abbot who just repeats what he’s heard,” said Aramis. “I’m well aware that Cardinal Mazarin is worried about recent turns of events. It seems his decrees aren’t regarded with the same respect as those of our old nemesis, the late cardinal, whose portrait you see here. Because despite all we said and did to thwart him, you must agree, my dear, that he was a great man.”

“No argument from me on that, friend Aramis. It was he who made me an officer.”

“My instincts at first were entirely in favour of Cardinal Mazarin. Such a minister is rarely popular but his brilliance was such that he seemed likely to triumph over his enemies, if only by fear that, in my opinion, is often better than love.”

D’Artagnan nodded to indicate his approval of this rather dubious maxim. “That,” Aramis continued, “was my first instinct – but since I know so little about such matters, I really couldn’t trust my own opinion, so I humbly inquired further to ascertain the true situation. And well, my dear friend...”

“Well, what?” d’Artagnan asked.

“Well!” said Aramis. “Though it mortifies my pride, I had to admit I’d been wrong.”

“Really?”

“Yes! I inquired further, as I said, and was told by people of all ranks, people who ought to know, that Mazarin was far from the brilliant man I’d taken him for.”

“Bah!” said d’Artagnan.

“No. He is a man from nowhere, of no family, a mere servant of Cardinal Bentivoglio who got ahead by scheming. He’s an upstart, a parvenu, who for France will never be more than a mere figurehead. Oh, he’ll make himself a pile of gold, empty the king’s treasury, pay to himself all the salaries Cardinal Richelieu shared out to everyone else – but he’ll never put the law into the hands of the strongest, the noblest, or the most honourable. He appears, in manners and heart, to be less a gentleman than a sort of buffoon, a Pulcinello or Pantaloon. But you’re the one who knows him, not me.”

“Well,” said d’Artagnan, “I admit there’s some truth to what you say.”

“Why, you fill me with pride, my dear. To think that I, someone with just a touch of insight, could discern things as clearly as you, who are a man of the Court.”

“But what you say applies to him personally, and not to his faction and its resources.”

“That’s true. He has the queen on his side.”

“And that’s something, I should think.”

“But it’s not like having ... the king.”

“Who’s still a child!”

“A child who will be an adult in four years.”

“But this is the present.”

“Yes, it’s not yet the future. But even in the present, Mazarin’s neither the Parliament nor the people on his side – that is, the money – nor does he have the nobility and the princes – that’s, the swords.”

D’Artagnan scratched at his ear. He had to admit to himself that Aramis’s summary was both thorough and undeniable. “You see, my poor friend, that I still have my wits about me, as I used to. But maybe it’s wrong for me to be so open and candid about the matter, since you seem to lean toward Mazarin.”

“What, me?” cried d’Artagnan. “Not at all!”

“You were speaking of a mission.”

“Did I say a mission? Sometimes I pick the wrong word. No, I think as you do: all is confusion. Well, then – let’s throw the feather into the wind, follow where the wind takes it, and resume our life of adventures. We were four brave cavaliers, four hearts bound as one. Let’s rejoice! It’s not our hearts that have divided us, just time and fortune. This time, time is with us – and it’s time to win something greater than a diamond.”

“You’re right, d’Artagnan – as always,” said Aramis, “and the proof is that I’ve had the same idea. But you know me, ever anxious, imagining trouble. I was thinking that, the way things are today, we’d need allies. And then one came to me, speaking about our prowess in former days, and very persuasively too. I’ll tell you frankly: I’m talking about the coadjutor.”

“Sir de Gondy, the cardinal’s enemy!” cried d’Artagnan.

“No – the king’s friend,” said Aramis. “The king’s friend, do you hear? And I desire to serve the king – which is, after all, the duty of a gentleman.”

“But ... but the king is with Mazarin!”

“By fate but not by his will; not by the urgings of his heart. The poor child is caught in the snare of his own enemies.”

“Oh that! But, my dear Aramis, what you propose leads to nothing less than civil war.”

“War indeed ... for the king.”

“But the king will be at the head of Mazarin’s army.”

“But his heart will be with the army commanded by Sir de Beaufort.”

“Sir de Beaufort? He’s locked up in Vincennes.”

“Did I say Sir de Beaufort?” said Aramis. “It could be anyone. Say Sir de Beaufort; say Sir Prince de Condé.”

“But Sir Prince is committed to the army of the cardinal.”

“Ah, er, yes!” said Aramis. “Of course! Though there have been certain ... discussions. However, if not Sir Prince, say Sir de Gondy...”

“But Sir de Gondy wants to be a cardinal – he’s asked for his red hat.”

“And cardinals can’t be generals?” said Aramis. “Look around you. Here are four cardinals who commanded armies just as well as Gentlemen de Guébriant and de Gassion.”

“Oh but really, a humpbacked general?”

“When he’s clad in armour, no one will notice his hump. Didn’t Alexander have a limp, and wasn’t Hannibal half blind?”

“And you see advantages to allying with this party?” asked d’Artagnan.

“I see the protection of powerful princes.”

“Who are proscribed by the government.”

“Balanced out by the Parliament and the rioters.”

“But for this to work out ... the king would have to be separated from his mother.”

“Hmm. That’d happen.”

“Not likely!” said d’Artagnan, returning to his first conviction. “Think, Aramis, I appeal to you – you know Anne of Austria as well as I. Would she ever forget that her son is her safety and her anchor, that her life and fortunes are entirely bound up with his? If she broke with Mazarin she would have to follow her son and go over to the side of the princes – but you know there are ... reasons ... why she’ll never abandon Mazarin.”

“You’re probably right,” Aramis sighed, “but I just can’t join him.”

“With him, all right,” said d’Artagnan, “but what about with me?”

“With nobody, I’m afraid. I’m a priest – what do I have to do with politics? I just read my breviary. I keep to my small circle of chatty abbots and witty women, and the more noise there is in public affairs, the less notice will be taken of my private life. I’m doing wonderfully well on my own, dear friend, and the less I meddle, the better off I’ll be.”

“Well, all right, then,” said d’Artagnan. “I can’t argue with your philosophy. I don’t know what devil stung me and made me ambitious. After all, my position keeps me fed, and with the retirement of poor old Sir de Tréville, I may yet be made captain that comes with a very pretty marshal’s baton for a cadet from Gascony. If I’m in need of adventures, I can always accept Porthos’s invitation and go hunt on his lands. Where are Porthos’s lands, by the way?”

“You don’t know? Well, I do. He has ten leagues of woods, hills, and dales – he’s the Lord of Peaks and Plains and contends for his feudal rights with the Bishop of Noyon.”

“Well,” d’Artagnan said to himself, “at last we’ve got something I needed to know: Porthos is in Picardy.” Then aloud: “And has he resumed his old name of du Vallon?”

“Yes, and he’s added to it de Bracieux that used to be a barony, by my faith!”

“So Porthos is finally a baron!”

“I don’t doubt it. His ‘Baroness Porthos’ is particularly impressive!”

And the two friends laughed. “So,” continued d’Artagnan, “you’ll have nothing to do with Mazarin?”

“Nor you with the princes?”

“I’m afraid not. All right then, we’ll keep to ourselves and remain friends, neither Cardinalists nor Frondeurs.”

“Yes,” said Aramis. “Just musketeers.”

“Even with the priest’s collar?” said d’Artagnan.

“Especially with the priest’s collar,” said Aramis. “That’s what makes it so charming!”

“Very well, then – goodbye,” said d’Artagnan.

“I won’t keep you, my dear,” said Aramis, “because I know where you’d have to sleep, and I can’t see you spending the night in the shed with Planchet.”

“Eh, I’m barely three leagues from Paris, the horses are rested, and in just over an hour I’ll be home.” And d’Artagnan poured out two last glasses of honey. “To our old days!” he said.

“Yes,” said Aramis. “Sadly, those days are behind us. Tempus fugit irreparable...”

“Bah!” said d’Artagnan. “They may yet return. If you want me, I’m in the Rue Tiquetonne, Hôtel de La Chevrete.”

“And I’m in the Monastery of the Jesuits: by the door from six in the morning until eight at night, and by the window from eight at night until six in the morning.”

“Goodbye, my friend.”

“Oh, I’m not leaving you yet! Let me see you out.”

And he took up his sword and cloak. “He wants to make sure I’m out of the way,” said d’Artagnan to himself.

Aramis whistled for Bazin but Bazin was sleeping in the antechamber over the remains of his supper, and Aramis had to shake him by the ear to wake him. Bazin stretched out his arms, rubbed his eyes, and curled back up again. “Come, come, Master Sleeper,” said Aramis, “rouse yourself.”

"But Sir," said Bazin, yawning enough to break his jaw, "the ladder is still at the window."

"Get the gardener's ladder. Didn't you see the trouble d'Artagnan had getting up? He'll need help getting down."

D'Artagnan was about to assure Aramis that he could get down on his own, when he had an idea that silenced him. Bazin sighed heavily and went to fetch the ladder. A few moments later, a good, solid wooden ladder was placed against the windowsill. "That's more like it," said d'Artagnan. "Why, even a woman could go up and down a ladder like that."

That brought a sharp look from Aramis, who seemed to wonder what he meant but d'Artagnan gave him his most naïve smile. And then he put his foot on the top rung of the ladder and climbed down. A moment later he was on the ground. Bazin was still at the window. "One moment," said Aramis. "I'll join you." Both down, the two walked toward the shed. At their approach Planchet came out, holding the horses by their bridles. "Excellent!" said Aramis. "Here's a servant who's active and alert – not like that lazy Bazin, who's good for nothing since he became a beadle. Follow us, Planchet, until we reach the outskirts of the village."

And the two friends rode through the village, talking of this and that, until, at the last house: "On your way then, dear friend," said Aramis. "Follow your fate: Dame Fortune smiles on you, and don't let her escape, for she's a lady, and must be treated accordingly. As for me, I remain here, in humility and leisure. Goodbye!"

"So, you're sure," said d'Artagnan, "that what I had to offer you is of no interest?"

"On the contrary, it would appeal to me strongly if I were anybody but who I am," said Aramis. "I'm a bundle of contradictions: what I hate one day, I love another, and vice versa. Unlike you, I can't settle on anything like a fixed plan."

"You are such a liar," d'Artagnan said to himself. "Of all of us, you're the one who knows best how to set a goal and stalk it by secret steps."

"Farewell, my dear," Aramis continued. "Thank you for your good intentions toward me, and most of all for those happy memories that your visit has reawakened."

They embraced. Planchet was already mounted; d'Artagnan climbed into his own saddle, then shook Aramis's hand one last time. The riders spurred their horses and rode off toward Paris. Aramis remained standing in the middle of the street until he'd lost sight of them at the curve of the road. But about two hundred paces beyond it, d'Artagnan stopped short, jumped down, and threw his bridle to Planchet. He took his pistols from their saddle holsters and thrust them through his belt. "What's wrong, Sir?" said Planchet, taken aback.

"What's wrong," said d'Artagnan, "is that no matter how sly he is, I won't be his dupe. Just don't move – wait right here by the side of the road until I come back."

With these words, d'Artagnan jumped the ditch by the side of the road and set off across the fields to circle around the village. He had noticed that the acreage between the house occupied by Madam de Longueville and the Jesuit monastery was mainly empty space enclosed by a thick hedge. An hour before he might have had a hard time finding this hedge but since then the moon had risen, and though it was sometimes obscured by clouds, it still shone brightly enough for him to find his way. D'Artagnan found the hedge and hunkered down behind it. As he'd passed the large château described earlier, he'd noticed that the same single window was once again lit. He smiled, convinced that Aramis had not yet returned home, and that when he did, it would not be alone. Indeed, after a moment he heard footsteps approaching, and voices speaking low. At the corner of the hedgerow, the footsteps stopped. D'Artagnan dropped to one knee and did his best to merge with the hedge. At that moment two figures came into view – two men, to d'Artagnan's astonishment. But his astonishment faded when one spoke in a soft and harmonious voice; for one of the two men was a woman garbed as a cavalier. "Don't worry, dear René," said the soft voice. "That'll not happen again. While waiting, I discovered a passage from the cellar that goes out under the street. You just have to raise a paving stone to find your way in."

"Oh!" said a second voice that d'Artagnan recognised as that of Aramis. "I swear to you, Princess, that if our reputations didn't depend on these subterfuges, I'd rather risk my life..."

"Yes, yes, I know you're as brave and adventurous as any man in the world – but you don't belong just to me, you belong to our whole faction. So be careful."

"I shall always obey, Madam," said Aramis, "when commanded by a voice as sweet as yours."

He kissed her hand tenderly. "Ah!" cried the sweet-voiced cavalier.

"What?" asked Aramis.

"Can't you see? The wind has blown off my hat!"

Aramis leapt after the fugitive felt. D'Artagnan took advantage of the confusion to find himself a less dense spot in the hedge from whence he could get a better look at the impostor cavalier. Just at that moment the moon, as inquisitive, perhaps, as our officer, came out from behind a cloud, and in the sudden clarity d'Artagnan recognised the blue eyes, golden hair, and noble features of the Duchess de Longueville. As the two went on their way toward the Jesuit monastery, d'Artagnan returned, laughing, to where he'd left Planchet. "Good!" said d'Artagnan, brushing off his knees. "Now, Aramis, I see you clearly: you're a Frondeur, and you're the lover of Madam de Longueville."

182

Sir Porthos du Vallon de Bracieux de Pierrefonds

Thanks to what he'd learned from Aramis, d'Artagnan, who already knew that Porthos's family name was du Vallon, of an uncertain domain, had learned that he was also called de Bracieux, and that from Bracieux he was suing the neighbouring Bishop of Noyon. So, it was near Noyon that he needed to seek this estate, in other words, somewhere between the Île-de-France and Picardy. His route was quickly decided upon: he would go to Dammartin, where the road forks, one branch toward Soissons, and the other to Compiègne. At the fork he would ask about Bracieux, and the answer would determine whether he went left or right. Planchet, still worried about repercussions from his escapade in Paris, declared he would follow d'Artagnan to the end of the world, whether he went right or left. D'Artagnan thought maybe Planchet should notify his wife of his intentions, or at least tell her he still lived but Planchet wisely replied that his wife wouldn't die of anxiety from not knowing his whereabouts, while he, wary of her sharp tongue, might die of anxiety if she did know them. This made enough sense to d'Artagnan that he insisted no further, so at about eight the next evening, as the fog began to thicken in the streets, he left the Hôtel de La Chevette and, followed by Planchet, went out of the capital by Port Saint-Denis. By midnight the two travellers were in Dammartin. It was too late to make inquiries: the host of the Cygne de la Croix inn had already gone to bed. D'Artagnan put off his questions till the following day. The next morning, he sent for the host but he was one of those sly Normans who never answer yes or no, unwilling to commit themselves by giving a straight answer. Eventually d'Artagnan divined from the host's equivocations that the road to the right was the one to follow, and he resumed his journey based on this doubtful information. By nine in the morning he'd reached Nanteuil, where he stopped for lunch. This time the host was a frank and honest Picard who, recognising Planchet as a compatriot, made no fuss about providing the information desired. The domain of Bracieux was just a few leagues from Villers-Cotterêts. D'Artagnan knew that town from three or four visits with the Court, because at that time Villers-Cotterêts was a royal château. So, he made his way there and went to the Golden Dolphin, the inn where he usually stayed. There he learned what he wanted to know. The Bracieux estate was indeed about four leagues from the town but he wouldn't find Porthos there. Porthos had been in a legal brawl with the Bishop of Noyon about the domain of Pierrefonds that bordered his, and Porthos, tiring of a lawsuit that he didn't understand anyway, had settled it by simply buying the estate, thereby adding Pierrefonds to his list of noble titles. He now answered to the resounding name of du Vallon de Bracieux de Pierrefonds and had taken up residence in his newest home. Porthos was apparently collecting titles and wouldn't stop until he was Marquis de Carabas. D'Artagnan had to wait to continue until the following day, as the horses had just ridden ten leagues and were tired. He could have rented others, perhaps but there was a great forest to pass through, and Planchet, it will be remembered, didn't like riding through woods at night. Another thing Planchet didn't like was starting out in the morning with an empty stomach, so upon waking, d'Artagnan found his breakfast already prepared. He couldn't exactly complain about this delay, so he sat down to table, and Planchet, resuming his former humble position, felt no more shame eating d'Artagnan's scraps than Madam de Motteville and Madam de Fargis did eating the leftovers of Anne of Austria. So d'Artagnan didn't take the road until after eight o'clock. There was no mistaking it: he had only to follow the road from Villers-Cotterêt toward Compiègne, and once through the woods, take the first right. It was a beautiful spring morning, the birds singing in the tall trees, and broad sunbeams angling through the clearings like curtains of golden gauze. Elsewhere, the light scarcely penetrated the thick canopy of leaves, and the trunks of the old oaks grew so close together that the leaping squirrels dwelled in eternal shade. Dawn had released from the foliage the natural perfume of herbs, flowers, and leaves that delighted the heart. D'Artagnan, sick of the stench of Paris, thought to himself that when one bore three names all stitched together, and owned such woods, it must be like living in Paradise. He shook his head and said, "If I were Porthos, and d'Artagnan came to me with a proposal such as the one I bear, I know what I'd tell d'Artagnan."

As for Planchet, he wasn't thinking; he was digesting. As they emerged from the woods d'Artagnan saw the side road he'd been told of, and down the road the towers of an immense feudal castle. "Hmm," he murmured. "I think I recall that this castle belonged to an ancient branch of the Orléans family. Can Porthos have purchased it from the Duke Longueville?"

"My faith, Sir," said Planchet, "here's a domain indeed. If all this belongs to Sir Porthos, my compliments to him."

"Plague take it," said d'Artagnan, "don't call him Porthos, or even du Vallon; address him as de Bracieux or de Pierrefonds, or you'll spoil my mission." As they approached the castle that had first caught his eye, d'Artagnan realised that it couldn't be his friend's estate: the towers, though as solid as if built yesterday, were abandoned and emptied, as open to the sky as if some giant had split them with an axe. Farther along, at the end of the road, d'Artagnan found himself gazing down into a beautiful valley, at the bottom of which slept a lovely lake. Houses were scattered along its shores, humble dwellings roofed with tile or thatch, all deferring as to a sovereign lord to an omate château, built early in the reign of Henry IV and surmounted by stately weathervanes. This time, d'Artagnan had no doubt but that he was gazing upon the home of Porthos. The road led straight to this handsome château that was to the feudal castle what a fop of the Duke d'Enghien's circle was to an armoured knight of the reign of Charles VII. D'Artagnan put his horse into a trot and hastened down the road, followed by Planchet grimly matching his master's gait. After a few minutes' ride, d'Artagnan found himself at the end of a carriageway lined with poplars that led to an iron gate with gilded points and crossbars. Halfway down this avenue was a sort of lord dressed in green, his clothes as gilded as the gate, and mounted on a sturdy hack. He was attended by a pair of liveried footmen and was receiving the respectful homage of a dozen or so peasants. "Ah ha!" said d'Artagnan to himself. "Can that be the Lord du Vallon de Bracieux de Pierrefonds? If so, my God, he's shrunken since he gave up the name of Porthos!"

"That can't be him," said Planchet who'd asked himself the same question. "Sir Porthos was well over six feet tall, and that man's no more than five and a half."

"Maybe," said d'Artagnan, "but look at the way they to bow to him."

And with these words, d'Artagnan spurred his horse toward the hack and its respected rider. As d'Artagnan approached, he began to realise who it was. "God, Sir!" said Planchet, who was coming to the same conclusion. "Is that who I think it is?"

At this exclamation, the mounted man turned with slow dignity and a lofty air, and the two travellers could see, displayed in all their splendour, the round eyes, ruddy complexion, and smug smile of Mousqueton. Indeed, it was Mousqueton – Mousqueton, grown gloriously portly – Mousqueton who, recognising d'Artagnan, unlike that hypocrite Bazin, slipped off his steed and humbly approached the officer, hat in hand, so that the homage of the assembled crowd was transferred to this new sun that eclipsed the old. "Sir d'Artagnan, Sir d'Artagnan," repeated Mousqueton, his enormous cheeks quivering with joy, "Sir d'Artagnan! Oh, what joy this will be to my Lord and master du Vallon de Bracieux de Pierrefonds!"

"My good Mousqueton! Is your master here then?"

"You are within his domains."

"In which you are so splendid, so blooming, so enlarged!" continued d'Artagnan, listing the changes good fortune had wrought upon he who once had been always so hungry.

"Yes, Sir," said Mousqueton, "I'm doing pretty well, thank God!"

"But have you nothing to say to your friend Planchet?"

"My friend Planchet! Oh, Planchet, are you here, too?" cried Mousqueton, with open arms and tears in his eyes.

"In person," replied Planchet. "But I was wondering if you'd become too proud to notice me."

"Too proud to notice an old friend! Never, Planchet. If you wondered that, you don't know your Mousqueton."

"Then well met!" said Planchet, jumping down from his horse and throwing his arms around Mousqueton. "You're not like that wretch Bazin, who scarcely seemed to know me, and left me cooling my heels for two hours in a shed."

And Planchet and Mousqueton embraced with such emotion, the onlookers assumed Planchet must be some lord in disguise, so well was he received by their hero Mousqueton. "And now, Sir," said Mousqueton, when he'd pried himself away from Planchet, who'd tried to embrace him tightly enough to touch hands behind his back but failed, "now let me take my leave of you, for I don't want my master to hear of your arrival from anyone but me. He would never forgive me for not warning him you were coming."

"So, your master, my old friend, hasn't forgotten me?" said d'Artagnan, careful not to call him by either his former name of Porthos or his cascade of new names.

"Forget! Him?" cried Mousqueton. "Hardly a day passes that we don't expect to hear that you've been made a marshal or promoted to replace Sir Gassion or Sir Bassompierre." D'Artagnan allowed his lips to curve into one of those rare melancholy smiles that still rose from the depths of his heart despite the disappointment of years. "And you, hayseeds," said Mousqueton to the locals, "stay near Sir Count d'Artagnan and escort him in honour, while I prepare my Lord for his arrival."

Planchet, still nimble, leapt back on his horse, while Mousqueton, with the aid of two fawning peasants, remounted his own, then cantered off up the tree-lined avenue at a rate that said more about the strength of his mount's back than of its legs. "Now that's more like it," said d'Artagnan. "No mystery, no cloaked figures, no politics here: just honest laughter and cries of joy. Everyone seems well-fed and happy, and even nature itself seems to celebrate, as if the trees, instead of growing leaves and flowers, had sprouted red and green ribbons."

"As for me," said Planchet, "I fancy I smell a delicious roast, and imagine the cooking staff lining up to bow as we pass. Ah, Sir – what a chef Sir Pierrefonds must have, considering how he loved to eat when he was just Sir Porthos!"

"Stop that," said d'Artagnan, "you're frightening me. If the reality is as rich as the appearance, I'm done for. A man in Paradise will scarcely leave it, and I'll fail with him as I failed with Aramis."

D'Artagnan finds Porthos & learns that Money cannot buy Happiness

D'Artagnan rode through the gate and found himself in front of the château. When he saw, on the porch, the silhouette of a giant, he immediately dismounted and hurried forward. Say what you will about d'Artagnan, his heart beat with joy at the sight of this tall and martial figure, the profile of a brave and good friend. He ran to Porthos and rushed into his arms. All the servants, ranged in a circle at a respectful distance, looked on with humble curiosity. Mousqueton, in the front rank, dabbed at his eyes – the poor man hadn't stopped weeping for joy since he'd first recognised d'Artagnan and Planchet. Porthos took his friend by the arm. "Ah, what joy to see you again, dear d'Artagnan!" he cried in a voice that had turned from baritone to bass. "So you haven't forgotten me then?"

"Forget you! Ah, my dear du Vallon, does one forget the finest days of his youth, his devoted friends and the perils they faced together? Seeing you brings every moment of our old friendship rushing back to me."

"Yes, yes," said Porthos, trying to give his moustache the rakish twist it had lost in his seclusion, "yes, we did a thing or two back in those days, when we gave the poor old cardinal such a hard time." And he gave a great sigh – which d'Artagnan noted. "In any case," continued Porthos, in a troubled tone, "welcome, dear friend. You'll help me regain my old high spirits. Tomorrow we'll hunt the hare across my fields that are excellent, or chase the deer in my woods that are also excellent. I have four hounds I believe are the quickest in the province, and a full pack nearly as good, the equal of any for twenty miles around."

And Porthos sighed a second time. "Oh ho!" d'Artagnan muttered. "Is my brave gentleman less happy than he seems?" Then, aloud: "But first, present me to Madam du Vallon, because I remember that handsome letter of invitation you sent me, at the bottom of which she kindly added a few lines."

At this, a third sigh from Porthos. "I lost Madam du Vallon two years ago," he said, "and I'm still wounded by it. That's why I left my Château du Vallon near Corbeil to come and live on my estate of Bracieux, a change that led me to buy this domain of Pierrefonds. Poor Madam du Vallon," continued Porthos, with a grimace of regret, "she's a woman of many moods but she eventually got used to me and my little ways."

"So, you're wealthy and unencumbered," said d'Artagnan.

"True, alas!" sighed Porthos. "I'm a widower with an income of forty thousand livres. Let's have breakfast, shall we?"

"The sooner the better," said d'Artagnan. "The morning air gave me an appetite."

"Yes," said Porthos, "I have excellent air."

They went into the château that was gilded from top to bottom: the cornices were gilt, the mouldings were gilt, even the wooden chairs shone with gold paint.

A table stood waiting, attended by servants. "You see?" said Porthos. "This is how I do things."

"Plague," said d'Artagnan, "my compliments to you. The king does no better."

"Yes," said Porthos, "I heard Sir de Mazarin doesn't feed him properly. Try this cutlet, d'Artagnan – it's mutton from my own sheep."

"I congratulate you," said d'Artagnan. "You've very tender sheep."

"Yes, they're fed in my meadows that are excellent."

"I'll have a bit more."

"No, instead try some of this rabbit from a hare killed yesterday in my warrens."

"Dame! What is that rare flavour?" said d'Artagnan. "Do you feed them on wild thyme?"

"And tell me what you think of this honey," said Porthos. "Isn't it excellent?"

"It's quite charming."

"It's from my own vineyards."

"Really!"

"Yes, from that south-facing slope on that excellent hill. It gives me twenty hogsheads."

"That's a truly fine vintage, that is!"

And Porthos sighed for the fifth time – d'Artagnan had been counting them. "Oh that!" he said. "Something's eating you, old friend. Are you suffering? Is it your health?"

"My health is quite excellent, better than ever. I could kill an ox with a single punch."

"Family troubles, perhaps..."

"Family! No, fortunately, I'm the only one of my clan left in this world."

"Then why these great sighs?"

"My friend," said Porthos, "no one is aware of this but I'll tell it to you: I'm not happy."

"You, not happy, Porthos! You, who have a château, with meadows, hills, and woods, and an income of forty thousand livres – you aren't happy?"

"My friend, I have all this, it's true – but in the middle of it, I'm all alone."

"Oh, I see – you're surrounded by bumpkins and rabble who are beneath you."

Porthos paled slightly and emptied a great glass of the vintage from his vineyard. "No," he said, "on the contrary, I'm surrounded by gentry who trace their lines back to Pharamond, Charlemagne, or at worst Hugues Capet. At first, since I was the newcomer, I made advances to them but as you know, my dear Madam du Vallon..." Porthos stopped, at a loss. "Madam du Vallon," he continued, "had a dubious background – her first husband, as I'm sure you remember, d'Artagnan, was a mere attorney. They said she was ... nauseating. Nauseating! At such a word, I might slay thirty thousand. As it happens, I killed only two, and though that silenced the rest, it didn't make me their friend. So, I'm an outcast; I live alone, I'm bored, and it eats at me."

D'Artagnan smiled – here was the chink in the armour, and he readied his blow. "But," he said, "now your wife is no longer a liability, and you're on your own."

"Yes but you know, not being of the ancient nobility like the Coucy, who were content to be lords, or the Rohans, who disdained to be dukes, all these people hereabout, these viscounts and counts, they all have precedence over me – at church, at ceremonies, everywhere – and I have nothing to say about it. Ah, if only I were..."

"A baron?" said d'Artagnan, finishing his friend's sentence. "Is that it?"

"Ah!" cried Porthos, his face lighting up. "If only I were a baron!"

He's hooked, thought d'Artagnan. Now to land him. Then, aloud: "Well, old friend, that title is exactly what I've come here today to bring you."

Porthos jumped up in a bound that shook the room. Two or three bottles trembled, fell from the table and broke. Planchet started to clean up, as Mousqueton ran in. "My Lord needs something?" he asked.

Porthos just waved him toward the broken bottles. "I'm glad this brave fellow is still with you," said d'Artagnan.

"He is my steward," said Porthos. Then raising his voice: "He's just an old rascal who's made good, as you can see but," and he lowered his voice again, "he wouldn't leave me for the world."

And he calls you my Lord, d'Artagnan thought, smiling to himself.

"You can go now, Mouston," said Porthos.

"You call him Mouston? You've abbreviated his name?"

"Yes," said Porthos, "his old name savoured of the enlisted man a league off. But we were talking business, I think, when he came in."

"Quite so," said d'Artagnan, "and we can't be too careful. Your people might suspect something, and there could be spies even here in the country. You realise, Porthos that these are serious matters."

"Plague!" said Porthos. "All right, let's take a walk in my park to aid our digestion."

"Gladly."

And as both had breakfasted well, they took a stroll into the gardens, down beautiful lanes of chestnuts and lime trees, thirty acres at least, among shrubbery and brushy thickets, where fat rabbits chased each other through the grass and between the bushes. "My faith," said d'Artagnan, "your park is like everything else of yours. If there are as many fish in your ponds as there are rabbits in your warrens, you must be a happy man, Porthos – assuming you still have a taste for hunting and fishing."

"I leave the fishing to Mousqueton, as that's a pursuit for commoners. I do still hunt sometimes – that is to say, when I'm bored, I'll take Gredinet, my favourite dog, bring my gun, sit on one of my marble benches, and take shots at the rabbits."

"That sounds like fun!" said d'Artagnan.

"Yes," said Porthos, "What fun!"

And he sighed again but d'Artagnan had quit counting. "And good old Gredinet," Porthos added, "fetches the rabbits himself and carries them right to the cook in the kitchen."

"A fine animal indeed!" said d'Artagnan.

"But enough about Gredinet – you can have him if you want him, for I tire of hunting," said Porthos. "Let's get back to that business you mentioned."

"Certainly," said d'Artagnan, "but I warn you, old friend, it's the kind of business that means changing your life."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean getting back into hamess, picking up your sword, and resuming your adventures, maybe taking some knocks along the way, like in the old days."

"The devil you say!" said Porthos.

"Oh, I know it would be a shock. You've been spoiled by the good life, old friend, and may not have the iron wrist and the dashing moves that once put fear into the Cardinal's Guards."

"Bah! My wrist is still solid," said Porthos, extending a hand like a shoulder of mutton.

"All the better."

"So, we're called to war?"

"We are, by God!"

"And against who?"

"Do you follow politics, old friend?"

"Me? Not in the least."

"Do you favour Mazarin or the princes?"

"I don't favour anybody."

"Which is to say you favour yourself. So much the better, Porthos, given the business that's ahead of us. Well, to be frank, I must say that I've come from the cardinal."

That title resonated with Porthos, as if it were still 1640 and they were speaking of the old cardinal. "Oh, ho!" he said. "So, His Eminence wants me?"

"His Eminence desires you to join his service."

"And who told him about me?"

"Rochefort. Remember him?"

"For the love of God, yes! He's the one who gave us so much trouble back when we were riding the roads, the one you stuck a sword into three times over. He had it coming too."

"But did you know he's now one of our friends?" said d'Artagnan.

"He is? I didn't know that. And he's forgiven us?"

"Say, rather, that I've forgiven him," said d'Artagnan.

Porthos couldn't quite comprehend this but it will be remembered that comprehension wasn't his strong suit. "So you say," he continued, "the Count Rochefort spoke of me to the cardinal?"

"Him, and the queen."
"The queen?"
"To inspire confidence, she even handed him that famous diamond you remember, the one I sold to Sir Des Essarts but which, somehow, returned to her possession."
"But it seems to me she would have done better to give it to you," said Porthos. "That's just common sense."
"I'm with you," said d'Artagnan, "but you know how it is! Kings and queens have their caprices. In the end, since they're the ones with the power and honour, the ones who distribute titles and wealth, we devote ourselves to them."
"Yes, that's who we devote ourselves to!" said Porthos. "So right now, you're devoted to...?"
"The king, the queen, and the cardinal – and I've answered to them for your loyalty."
"And you said you've obtained certain conditions for me?"
"Magnificent conditions, old friend, magnificent! You already have money, right? An income of forty thousand livres, you said?"
Porthos bridled. "Yes but one can never have too much money. Madam du Vallon left my affairs in a tangle it would take a genius to sort out, and, well, I'm no genius. I barely get by from day to day."
He's afraid I'm here to borrow money from him, thought d'Artagnan. "Ah, old friend," he said aloud, "so much the better if you're hard up!"
"How so?" said Porthos.
"Because His Eminence is prepared to reward you with whatever you wish: land, money, and titles."
"Ah!" said Porthos, opening his eyes wide at that final word.
"Under the old cardinal," continued d'Artagnan, "we never found a way to make our fortunes, though the opportunity was there. Not that that matters much to you, who have forty thousand livres, and seem like the happiest man on earth." Porthos sighed. "However," d'Artagnan continued, "despite your forty thousand livres, or even because of them, it seems to me a little noble's coronet would look well on your carriage door. Eh?"
"It would," said Porthos.
"Then, old friend, reach for it – it's at the end of your sword! To each our own: your goal's a title, and mine is money. I need enough to rebuild the estate of D'Artagnan – which my ancestors, impoverished by the Crusades, let fall into ruin – and buy some thirty acres around it. That will do it for me; with that I'll retire."
"And I," said Porthos, "I want to be ... a baron."
"And so you shall."
"Have you thought to propose this to our other friends?" asked Porthos.
"In fact, I've seen Aramis."
"And what does he want? To be a bishop?"
"Aramis, well," said d'Artagnan, who didn't want to disappoint Porthos, "Aramis, if you can imagine it, has become a monk and a Jesuit. He lives like a bear in a cave, renouncing the world and thinking only of salvation. I couldn't persuade him out of it."
"Too bad," said Porthos. "He had brains, that one. And Athos?"
"I haven't seen him yet but I'll look him up after I leave you. Do you know where I can find him?"
"Near Blois, on a small estate he inherited, I'm not sure from who."
"What's it called?"
"Bragelonne. It's hard to understand – here's Athos, who was as noble as an emperor, yet all he inherits are mere counties. And what's he going to do with all these counties? The Count of La Fère and the Count de Bragelonne? Eh?"
"It's a shame he has no children," said d'Artagnan.
"Hmmm!" said Porthos. "I heard he'd adopted a young man who looks quite a bit like him."
"Athos, our Athos, who was as virtuous as Scipio? Have you seen this lad?"
"No."
"Well, perhaps I'll bring back news of him. But I fear the worst, for Athos's fondness for honey has probably ruined him."
"Yes," said Porthos, "it's true, he did drink a lot."
"And then, he was the eldest of us," said d'Artagnan.
"By just a few years," said Porthos. "It was his dark moods that made him seem old."
"Yes, that's so. Well, if Athos joins us, so much the better. If he doesn't, it'll be just us! We're as good as a dozen other men."
"Yes," said Porthos, smiling at the memory their former exploits, "but the four of us would have been as good as thirty-six! Especially if the business will be as dangerous as you say."
"Dangerous for recruits, maybe but not for us."
"How long will it take?"
"Dame! Perhaps three or four years."
"Will there be much fighting?"
"I hope so."
"The more the better!" cried Porthos. "You have no idea, my friend, how creaky my old bones have become since I've been down here! Sometimes, on Sundays, coming home from mass, I ride through my neighbours' fields just to see if I can scare up a quarrel but nothing doing. They've either learned to respect me or, more likely, learned to fear me. So they let me tramp down their clover with my dogs, nobody says boo, and I come home more bored than ever. At least, you say, they're getting up to some mischief in Paris?"
"Oh, it's charming, old friend – no more edicts against duelling, no Cardinal's Guards, no pesky Jussacs or other bloodhounds meddling with us, by God! In the streets, in the taverns, everywhere, you just ask, 'Are you a Frondeur?' Then you draw your sword, and nothing more is said about it. Why, Sir de Guise killed Sir de Coligny right there in the Place Royale, and nothing came of it."
"That does sound good," said Porthos.
"And before long," continued d'Artagnan, "it'll be pitched battles, cannon fire, you name it!"
"I've decided then."
"You're committed?"
"Count me in. I'll cut and thrust for this Mazarin. But you swear..."
"What?"
"That I'll be made a baron."
"For the love of God!" said d'Artagnan. "It's as good as done. You'll have your barony. I'll answer for that." And on that promise, Porthos who never doubted his friend's word, walked back with him to his château.

184
If Porthos was Unhappy with his Situation, Mousqueton was not

While returning to the château, as Porthos enjoyed his golden dreams of a barony, d'Artagnan reflected on the flaws in human nature, ever dissatisfied with what it had, always yearning for what it had not. In Porthos's place, d'Artagnan would have been the happiest man on earth but Porthos was miserable because he was missing – what, exactly? Five little letters to place before all his names, and a coronet to paint on the doors of his carriage. "Will I spend my whole life," d'Artagnan said to himself, "looking left, right, and centre without ever seeing the face of a person who's completely happy?" In the midst of these philosophical musings Providence saw fit to contradict him. Just after Porthos left him to go give orders to the cook, d'Artagnan saw Mousqueton approaching. The brave fellow's expression but for the slightest shadow, like a passing summer cloud, seemed to be that of man who'd found perfect happiness. "Now here's what I was looking for," said d'Artagnan. "It's a shame the poor boy doesn't know why I'm here."
Mousqueton hovered at a slight distance. D'Artagnan sat on a marble bench and beckoned him to approach. "Sir," said Mousqueton, taking advantage of the privilege, "I have a favour to ask you."
"Speak, my friend," said d'Artagnan.
"I'm afraid that if I do, you'll think prosperity has spoiled me."
"I certainly think it's made you happy."
"As happy as can be – but you could make me even happier."
"Just ask. If I can do it, I will."
"Oh, Sir, if only you would."
"So?"
"Sir, the favour I have to ask is that you call me not Mousqueton but Mouston. Since I've had the honour to be my Lord's steward, I've been known by the latter name that is more dignified and commands respect from my subordinates. You know, Sir, how important it is for the servants to respect one."
D'Artagnan smiled; while Porthos added to his names, Mousqueton shortened his. "Well, Sir?" said Mousqueton, trembling.
"Well, then: Mouston it is," said d'Artagnan. "And don't worry, I won't forget. In fact, if it makes you happy, I'll stop calling you boy as well."
"Oh!" cried Mousqueton, flushing with joy. "If you'll do me this honour, Sir, I'll be grateful all my life ... if it's not asking too much?"
"Alas!" said d'Artagnan to himself. "It's little enough to do for him, considering the unexpected trouble I'm about to bring this poor devil who's received me so well."
"Will Sir be staying with us long?" asked Mousqueton whose face, restored to its former serenity, bloomed like a peony.
"I'm leaving tomorrow, my friend," said d'Artagnan.
"Ah, Sir!" said Mousqueton. "So, you only came to visit us in order to leave us with more regrets?"
"I'm afraid so," d'Artagnan said but so low that Mousqueton who was retiring behind a bower, didn't hear it. D'Artagnan's heart might have been like old leather but at this it was touched with remorse. He didn't regret enticing Porthos onto a road that put his life and fortune at risk, because Porthos would willingly put everything on the line for the title of baron – but as for Mousqueton, who desired nothing more than to be addressed as Mouston, wasn't it cruel to snatch him away from his delicious life of abundance?
That idea was still gnawing at him when Porthos reappeared. "To dinner!" said Porthos.
"To dinner? Already?" said d'Artagnan. "What time is it?"
"Eh? Why, it's already past one o'clock."
"Porthos, your home is a paradise in which time is forgotten. I'll come but I'm not hungry yet."
"Come, then – if you can't eat, you can always drink. That's one of the maxims of poor Athos that I remember when I'm bored."
D'Artagnan, whose brash Gascon nature needed little in the way of drink, didn't seem as committed to Athos's axiom as his friend but nonetheless did what he could to keep up with his host. However, while watching Porthos eating and drinking with such gusto, the thought of Mousqueton returned to his mind – all the more because Mousqueton, though he didn't wait at their table that would have been beneath his new position, nonetheless appeared frequently at the door, and marked his gratitude to d'Artagnan by sending in honey of a superior age and vintage. So, when they reached dessert, and at a sign from d'Artagnan, Porthos had dismissed his servants and they were alone, d'Artagnan said, "Porthos, who will accompany you on our campaign?"
"Why, Mouston, of course," replied Porthos.
That was a blow to d'Artagnan; already he imagined the benevolent smile of the steward twisted into a painful grimace. "Oh?" he said. "Mouston's no longer in the first blush of youth, you know. Plus, he's grown very ... substantial. Perhaps he's lost the habit of active service."
"I'm aware of it," said Porthos. "But I'm used to him. And besides, he'd never leave me – he's too attached for that."

How blind's self-love! D'Artagnan thought.

"Besides, don't you still have your old lackey in your service?" asked Porthos. "That good, that honest, that intelligent ... what do you call him?"

"Planchet. Yes, he's back with me but he's no longer a lackey."

"What is he then?"

"Well, with that sixteen hundred livres he earned at the siege of La Rochelle by carrying our letter to Lord de Winter – you remember that – he opened a small confectioner's shop in the Rue des Lombards."

"Oh, so he's a confectioner in the Rue des Lombards! ...Then why is he with you?"

"He got involved in some escapades and is afraid of being found out."

And the musketeer related to his friend how he had once again found Planchet. "Well!" said Porthos. "If you'd told me that one day Planchet would save old Rochefort and you'd hide him as a result..."

"You never would have believed it. But what would you have? Things happen, and men change."

"That's true about everything," said Porthos, "except for honey that never changes except for the better. Taste some of this – it's a Spanish vintage called sherry that I learned about from our friend Athos."

Just then, the steward came in to consult his master on the matter of the next day's menu, and the planning for a hunt. "Tell me, Mouston," said Porthos, "are my weapons in good order?"

D'Artagnan began drumming his fingers on the table to hide his embarrassment. "Your ... weapons, My Lord?" asked Mousqueton. "What weapons?"

"Eh, for the love of God! My equipment!"

"Which equipment?"

"My wartime equipment."

"Of course, My Lord. At least, I think so."

"Well, make sure of it, and do whatever's necessary. Which is my fastest horse in a sprint?"

"Vulcan."

"And for stamina?"

"Bayard."

"Which horse do you prefer?"

"I like Rustaud, My Lord – she's a good animal, and we get along well."

"She's strong, isn't she?"

"A Normand crossed with a Mecklenburg who can go all day and all night."

"That's settled, then. Get those three animals ready, tend to my arms, and see to your own – you'll need a brace of pistols and a hunting knife."

"Are we travelling then, My Lord?" asked Mousqueton anxiously.

D'Artagnan, who'd been drumming his fingers at random, began to beat out a quick march. "Better than that, Mouston!" replied Porthos.

"We're going on an expedition, Sir?" said the steward whose cheeks of rose paled into lilies.

"We're rejoining the service, Mouston!" replied Porthos, trying once more to give his moustache its old military curl.

These words were scarcely spoken before Mousqueton was stricken with a tremor that set his fat cheeks atremble. He looked at d'Artagnan with such an indescribable air of tender reproach the officer could hardly bear it. He reeled, and said, in a choked voice, "Rejoining the service? The service of the king?"

"More or less. We're going on campaign and can expect all kinds of adventures."

This last word struck Mousqueton like a thunderbolt. It was the terrible days of the past that made the days of the present so sweet. "Oh, my God! What's this I hear?" said Mousqueton with a look of desperate appeal aimed at d'Artagnan.

"What would you have, Mouston?" said d'Artagnan. "A man's destiny..."

Despite the care d'Artagnan had taken to use the right name, for Mousqueton it was a blow to the heart, and he was so dismayed he fled from the room, forgetting to close the door. "Ah, good Mousqueton, your joy is at an end," said Porthos in the same tone that Don Quixote used when asking Sancho Panza to saddle his pony for one last campaign.

Left thus alone, the two friends talked about the future and built castles in the air. The fine honey Mousqueton had served them went to their heads, showing d'Artagnan a rosy prospect of doubloons and pistoles, and Porthos a ducal title and the cordon bleu of the Order of Saint-Esprit. When the servants came in to show them to bed, they were both asleep with their heads on the table. Morning came, and Mousqueton was somewhat consoled to hear from d'Artagnan that their campaign would likely be on the battlefield of Paris, well within reach of the Château du Vallon that was near Corbeil; of Bracieux that was near Melun; and of Pierrefonds that was between Compiègne and Villers-Cotterêts. "But it seems to me," Mousqueton said shyly, "in the old days..."

"Oh, nowadays we don't make war the old-fashioned way," said d'Artagnan. "Today it's all a political affair. Ask Planchet."

Mousqueton went to pump his old friend for information, who confirmed what d'Artagnan had told him – though he added that, in this war, those taken prisoner risked being hanged. "Plague take it," said Mousqueton. "I think I preferred the Siege of La Rochelle."

As to Porthos visit his woods, hills, ponds, admire his pack of greyhounds, the faithful Gredinet, and all else he possessed after helping his guest hunt down a buck, and after three more sumptuous meals, he asked for final instructions from d'Artagnan, who had to be on his way. "Let's see," said the musketeer, "I need four days to get from here to Blois, a day or so there, then three or four more to get back to Paris. You should gather your equipment and leave here a week from today; meet me in Rue Tiquetonne, at the Hôtel de la Chevrete, or wait there for me until I return."

"Excellent!" said Porthos.

"I'm off on my errand to see Athos," said d'Artagnan, "hopeless though it may be. I imagine he's pretty far gone by this time but we must be loyal to our friends."

"It might distract me from my boredom if I went with you," said Porthos.

"It might," said d'Artagnan, "and you'd be welcome but then you wouldn't have time to make your preparations."

"That's true," said Porthos. "Go, then, and good luck to you. As for me, I'm eager to get to it."

"Marvelous!" said d'Artagnan.

Porthos escorted him to the farthest limit of the domain of Pierrefonds, where they said goodbye. "Well," d'Artagnan said, as he took the road to Villers-Cotterêts, "at least I won't be alone. Porthos is as mighty as ever. If Athos joins us, well then! The three of us will laugh at Friar Aramis and his little dalliances." At Villers-Cotterêts he wrote to the cardinal:

My Lord, I already have one recruit to offer to Your Eminence, and this one is worth twenty other men. I'm off to Blois to see the Count of La Fère, at his estate of Bragelonne near that city.

And with that, he took the road to Blois, chatting along the way with Planchet, who was a fine companion for a long journey.

185 The Angelic Youth

They had a long way to go but d'Artagnan wasn't concerned: his horses were rested and well fed from their stay in the lavish stables of the Lord de Bracieux. He therefore set out with confidence on his four or five days' journey, accompanied by the faithful Planchet. As we said, to ease the tedium of the journey, the two men rode side by side, talking away the miles. D'Artagnan had gradually lost the air of a master, and Planchet had long left that of a servant. He was a shrewd fellow, and since reinventing himself as a bourgeois, he'd missed the freedom of the highway as well as the conversation and company of gentlemen. He knew he had a measure of both courage and wit, and rubbing elbows all day with dull common folk didn't satisfy him. Thus, with the man he still called master, he soon rose to the role of confidant. D'Artagnan hadn't opened his heart to anyone for years, and the two found that they got along very well indeed. For Planchet was no vulgar clod: he was a man of good judgement who, without looking for trouble, wasn't afraid of hard knocks, as d'Artagnan had had the opportunity to see for himself. He'd been a soldier, and a career under arms brings out the best in a man. Moreover, though d'Artagnan had helped Planchet, Planchet was more than a little useful to d'Artagnan. So they were on a friendly and nearly equal footing by the time they arrived in the region of Blois. Along the way, d'Artagnan, shaking his head, repeatedly went back to the idea that obsessed him: "I know this errand to recruit Athos is useless but I owe it to my old friend to try, for he once had the stuff in him to be the most generous and noble of men."

"Yes, Sir Athos was a true, proud gentleman!" said Planchet.

"Wasn't he, though?" replied d'Artagnan.

"Strewing coins as the sky rained hail," continued Planchet, "and handling his sword with a royal air. Do you remember, Sir, that duel with the English at the Luxembourg paddock? Ah, how noble and magnificent Sir Athos was that day, when he told his opponent, 'You demanded I reveal my name to you, Sir – which is too bad for you, for now I must kill you!' I was nearby and I heard him. Those were his words, verbatim. And just as he said, Sir, he touched his opponent only once, and he fell dead without as much as a gasp. Yes, Sir, I repeat – there was a true gentleman."

"Yes," said d'Artagnan, "that's true as the gospel but all those qualities were overshadowed by a single fault."

"Oh, I remember how well he liked to drink," said Planchet, "or rather, that he just drank. But he didn't drink like others do. His eyes revealed nothing as he brought the glass to his lips. Truly, never was silence so eloquent. To me, it seemed he was saying to himself, 'Come, liquor, and wash away my sorrows.' And how he could crack the stem of a glass or knock the neck off a bottle! No one could do it like he could."

"Well, that's the sad reality we're facing today," continued d'Artagnan. "That noble gentleman with the proud gaze, that handsome cavalier so brilliant under arms that one was amazed he bore a simple sword rather than a marshal's baton – ah! He'll have decayed into a bent old man with watering eyes and a red nose. We'll find him lying in the yard, watching us approach with dull eyes, maybe not even recognising us. As God is my witness, Planchet, I'd turn tail rather than face such a sorry spectacle if I weren't bound to pay my respects to the shade of the glorious Count of La Fère that was, whom we all loved so well."

Planchet hung his head and didn't say a word; it was plain to see he shared his master's fears. "And then," resumed d'Artagnan, "to see him in infirmity, for Athos is old now, and in misery, because he's probably neglected what little property he had, and his wretched lackey Grimaud, more mute and drunken even than his master ... ah, Planchet, it rends my heart."

"I can almost see them before me, staggering and stammering," said Planchet in a piteous tone.

"I must confess, my greatest fear," said d'Artagnan, "is that Athos will accept my proposition in a moment of drunken belligerence. That would be bad luck for me and Porthos, and a real embarrassment – but the first time he goes on a drunken binge, we'll just leave him behind. When he comes around later, he'll understand."

"In any event, Sir," said Planchet, "we'll soon know the truth, because I think those high walls ahead, dyed red in the sunset, are the walls of Blois."

"Probably," replied d'Artagnan, "and those crenellations and sharply turned turrets I see off to the left resemble what I've heard about Chambord."

"Shall we go into the town?"

"Yes, to get information."

"Sir, as a confectioner, let me advise you that we must try some of those tasty little Blaisois pôts de crème I've heard so much about but have never been able to find in Paris."

"Then try them we shall, never fear!" said d'Artagnan.

Just then a heavy oxcart, laden with lumber from the nearby woods for the docks on the Loire, turned out of a rutted path onto the travellers' road. A drover walked alongside, waving a long pole with a nail in its end with which he spurred his slow team. "Hey, there, friend!" cried Planchet to the drover.

"What can I do for you, Gentlemen?" said the peasant, in that pure accent of the lands of the Loire that would shame the proudest scholars of the Place de la Sorbonne or the Rue de l'Université.

"We're looking for the house of Sir Count of La Fère," said d'Artagnan. "Do you know anyone of that name among the local gentry?"

Upon hearing this name, the peasant removed his hat and replied, "Gentlemen, this timber I'm carting is from his woods; I fell it in his grove and carry it to his château."

D'Artagnan asked no further questions of this man, reluctant to hear another confirm the fears he'd shared with Planchet. "His château," he said to himself, "his château. Ah, I get it! Athos may be failing but he's still proud, so like Porthos, he's forcing his peasants to title him My Lord, and to call this shack the château. Athos always had a heavy hand with the servants, especially when he was drunk."

The oxen were slow; d'Artagnan and Planchet, following the cart from behind, began to get impatient. "Does this path go anywhere else?" d'Artagnan asked the drover. "Can we follow it without taking a wrong turn?"

"My God, yes, Sir! Don't tire yourself by following beasts as slow as mine. Go ahead half a league and you'll see a château on the right – you can't see it from here because of that row of poplars. But that's not Bragelonne, that's La Vallière. Go three musket-shots beyond and you'll see a large white house with slate roofs, built on a knoll and shaded by some big sycamores. That's the château of Sir Count of La Fère."

"And is this half-a-league very long?" asked d'Artagnan as in our beautiful country of France, there are leagues and there are leagues.

"Ten minutes' ride and no longer, Sir, with a horse like yours."

D'Artagnan thanked the drover and spurred ahead but then, still troubled by what he expected to find of the man he'd once so loved, who had contributed so much to his manhood by his advice and aristocratic example, he gradually dropped to a walk and rode onward slowly, head sunk on his chest. Planchet was also giving some thought to their encounter with the peasant. Never, not in Normandy, nor in Franche-Count, nor in Artois, nor in his own Picardy, had he ever encountered villagers with such self-possession, easy manners, and refined speech. He was tempted to take the drover for some gentleman in disguise, perhaps a rebel who for political reasons had disguised himself. Soon they turned a corner and beheld the Château de La Vallière, just as the drover had told the travellers. A quarter mile beyond that they found the white house framed in sycamores, massive old trees that spring had frosted with a flurry of flowers. At this sight, the usually unemotional d'Artagnan felt a strange lurch in the bottom of his heart, so strong are the currents that flow from the memories of youth. Planchet, not subject to the same feelings, was surprised to see his master so agitated, and glanced back and forth from d'Artagnan to the house. The musketeer rode a few steps forward and then stopped before a gate, wrought in iron in the elegance that marked the restrained taste of the time. Beyond the gate were some neatly kept vegetable gardens, and a spacious courtyard where servants in various liveries stood holding several fine riding mounts, as well as two country horses hitched to a carriage. "There must be some mistake, or that peasant misled us," said d'Artagnan. "This can't be where Athos lives. My God! Has he died, and his property been inherited by what's-his-name? Dismount, Planchet, and go inquire; I confess I don't have the courage to do it myself."

Planchet got down. "You can add," said d'Artagnan, "that a passing gentleman wishes to have the honour of paying his respects to the Count of La Fère – and if you're happy with their answer, you can say it's me."

Planchet, leading his horse by the bridle, approached the gate and rang the bell. Immediately a servant, white-haired but erect despite his age, came forward to receive Planchet. "Is this the home of the Count of La Fère?" asked Planchet.

"Yes, Sir, that it is," said the servant, who wore no livery.

"A nobleman retired from the service, right?"

"That's right."

"And who had a lackey named Grimaud?" asked Planchet who didn't think one could have too much information with his usual caution.

"Sir Grimaud is away from the château at the moment," said the servant, suspiciously giving Planchet the once-over, as he wasn't used to such interrogation.

"Then," Planchet cried happily, "that's the same Count of La Fère we're looking for. Please admit me so I can announce my master, one of his old friends who has come to pay his respects to Sir Count."

"Why didn't you say so before?" said the servant, unlocking the gate. "But your master, where is he?"

"He's coming; he's right behind me."

The servant swung open the gate and led in Planchet, who beckoned to d'Artagnan. The musketeer, heart pounding harder than ever, rode into the courtyard. As Planchet stepped onto the porch, he heard a voice from within the parlour that said, "Well, where is this gentleman, and why haven't you brought him in?"

This voice, when it reached d'Artagnan, awoke in his heart a thousand feelings, a thousand memories he'd forgotten. He jumped from his horse and ran to catch up with Planchet, who, smiling, advanced toward the master of the house.

"But I know this fellow," said Athos, appearing in the doorway.

"Yes, indeed, Sir Count, you know me, and I know you as well. It's Planchet, Sir, Planchet, you know..." But he choked up and could say no more.

"What! Planchet!" cried Athos. "Is Sir d'Artagnan with you?"

"I'm here, my friend!" said d'Artagnan, nearly overcome. "Athos – I'm here."

At these words a visible emotion flushed the handsome visage and calm features of Athos. He took two quick steps toward d'Artagnan, looked in his face with eyes filled with feeling, and then hugged him tenderly. D'Artagnan, all his fears banished, embraced him in his turn with tears in his eyes. Athos then took him by the hand, pressed it between his own, and led him into the salon, where several people were gathered. Everyone stood. "I have the honour to present," said Athos, "the Knight d'Artagnan, Lieutenant of the King's Musketeers, a very devoted friend, and one of the bravest and most congenial gentlemen I've ever known."

D'Artagnan, according to custom, received the compliments of those present, gave them his best in return, and then joined their circle. As the conversation was resumed, he began to examine Athos. Strange thing! Athos had scarcely aged at all. His wondrous eyes, freed from redness and no longer buried in dark circles, seemed larger and more liquid than ever; his face, a trifle elongated, had gained in majesty what it had lost in feverish intensity; his hands, long, fine, and strong, were set like gemstones in lace cuffs, like hands by Titian or Van Dyck. He was less heavy than formerly, though his shoulders told of uncommon strength; his long black hair, just sprinkled with grey, fell elegantly to his shoulders in a natural wave. His voice was as strong and precise as it had been at twenty-five, and his beautiful teeth, white and sound, gave an inexpressible charm to his smile. Meanwhile the count's guests, who had perceived by the faltering of the conversation that the two friends were eager to be left alone, began, with the courtly manners of a former time, to find excuses for their departure – taking one's leave being a matter to handle with grace and care, important to those graceful and careful enough to handle it properly. But then there came a great clamour of dogs barking in the courtyard and several people said at the same time, "Ah, Raoul's returned."

Athos, at the name of Raoul, glanced at d'Artagnan, as if to see if it inspired curiosity or attention in him. But d'Artagnan was still recovering from his astonishment and noticed nothing. So, it was without expectation that he turned to see a handsome young man of fifteen enter the room, dressed simply but in perfect taste, gracefully doffing a hat adorned with long red plumes. But something about this newcomer struck him unexpectedly hard, and his mind awoke to a sudden flood of new ideas that, taking shape, began to provide an explanation for the changes in Athos that until then had seemed so inexplicable. For there was a strong resemblance between the young man and the noble count, a resemblance that might explain the mystery of his regeneration. Suddenly alert, d'Artagnan watched and listened. "So, you've returned, Raoul?" said the count.

"Yes, Sir," replied the young man respectfully, "and the task you assigned me is completed."

"But what's wrong, Raoul?" said Athos, suddenly all solicitude. "You're pale – you're agitated."

"It's just that, Sir," the young man replied, "an accident has happened to our little neighbour."

"To Miss de La Vallière?"* Athos said quickly.

"What happened?" asked several voices.

"She was walking with Dame Marceline in the grove where the loggers were trimming their trees, and I was riding by and saw her and stopped. She saw me as well, from the top of a pile of logs, and jumped down to run to me, and – well – her foot came down wrong, and she fell and couldn't get up again. It looked to me like she sprained her ankle."

"God save her!" said Athos. "And her mother, Madam de Saint-Rémy, has she been told?"

"No, Sir, Madam de Saint-Rémy is in Blois with the Duchess d'Orléans. I'm afraid the first aid measures seemed rather clumsy, and ran to you to ask your advice."

"Send immediately to Blois, Raoul – or rather, mount up and go yourself." Raoul bowed. "But where is Louise now?" asked the count.

"I brought her here, Sir, and left her with Charlot's wife, who's bathing her ankle in ice water."

With this explanation, the guests needed no further excuses, and got up to take their leave of Athos – all but the old Duke Barbé who was an ancient friend of the house of La Vallière, and went to see Louise, who was crying but, upon seeing Raoul, immediately wiped her lovely eyes and smiled. The duke offered to take little Louise to Blois in his carriage. "You're wise, Sir," said Athos, "that's the fastest way to get her to her mother. As for you, Raoul, I fear you've acted foolishly, and this is all your fault."

"Oh, no! No, Sir, I swear!" cried the girl, while the young man grew pale at the thought that he might be responsible for the accident.

"Oh, Sir, I assure you..." Raoul said brokenly.

"You're going to Blois nonetheless," the count continued, more kindly. "Make your excuses, and mine, to Madam de Saint-Rémy, and then return." The colour returned to the young man's cheeks. After a glance at the count for approval, he lifted in his strong arms the little girl, who smiled and laid her head on his shoulder, and gently bore her to the carriage. Then, jumping onto his horse with the ease and elegance of a born horseman, after saluting Athos and d'Artagnan, he trotted quickly off next to the door of the carriage, looking constantly in through the window.

186

The Château of Bragelonne

Throughout this scene, d'Artagnan looked on with a bewildered expression, mouth almost gaping. Almost nothing here had accorded with his expectations, and he was mute with astonishment. Athos took his arm and led him into the garden. "While they're preparing our dinner," he said, smiling, "I imagine you won't mind if I shed some light on all these perplexing mysteries?"

"True, Sir Count," said d'Artagnan who was gradually falling back under the influence of Athos's commanding superiority.

Athos regarded him with a sweet smile. "Then first of all, my dear d'Artagnan," he said, "we'll have no more of this 'Sir Count.' If I called you Knight, it was only to introduce you to my guests, so they would know your quality. But for you, d'Artagnan, I hope I shall always be Athos, your old friend and companion. Or do you prefer the ceremonial because you love me less than formerly?"

"May God forbid!" said the Gascon with one of those bursts of youthful loyalty found so rarely in those who've matured.

"Then it's back to our old habits – and for starters, let's be honest with each other. Any surprises here?"

"Plenty."

"But what astonishes you most," smiled Athos, "is me – confess it."

"I do confess it."

"I'm still youthful, aren't I? I still seem much the same, despite my forty-nine years?"

"On the contrary," said d'Artagnan, ready to be completely honest. "You're not much like your old self at all."

"Ah! I understand," said Athos, colouring slightly. "Everything comes to an end, d'Artagnan, including folly."

"And your fortunes have improved, it seems to me. You're admirably housed – this is your estate, I take it."

"Yes, a very modest domain – you remember, I told you I'd had a small inheritance when I left the service."

"You have a park, horses, servants..."

Athos smiled. "A park of about twenty acres," he said, "twenty acres that are mostly vegetable gardens and pasture. I have exactly two horses, not counting my valet's old nag. My servants consist mostly of four farm dogs, two greyhounds, and a retriever. Yet I don't keep this grand pack for myself."

He smiled. "Yes, I understand," said d'Artagnan. "It's for the young man – for Raoul."

And d'Artagnan looked at Athos with a sudden smile. "You have guessed it, my friend!" said Athos.

"And this young man is your adopted son – your relative, perhaps? Ah but you've changed, Athos!"

"This young man's, d'Artagnan," Athos replied calmly, "an orphan abandoned by his mother with a poor country curate. I've fed and raised him."

"Then he must be quite attached to you?"

"I believe he ... loves me like a father."

"But is grateful more than anything?"

"Oh, the gratitude is entirely reciprocated," said Athos. "I owe him quite as much as he owes me – even more, in fact, though I wouldn't tell him that."

"What do you mean?" asked the musketeer, astonished.

"I mean that, God be thanked, he is responsible for the changes you see in me. I was wasting away like a poor lonely tree on eroding ground; it took a deep affection to get me to take root in life once more. A mistress? I was too old. Friends? I no longer had you. Well! This child helped me find what I'd lost. If I didn't have the heart to live for myself, I found it in living for him. Lessons are fine for teaching a child, d'Artagnan but a good example is better. I had to become his example. What vices I had, I corrected; what virtues I lacked, I pretended to have. I may be mistaken but I think Raoul will become as complete a gentleman as one can in our degraded times."

D'Artagnan looked at Athos with increasing admiration. They walked along a cool, shady avenue, through which filtered the slanting rays of the setting sun. One of these golden beams caught Athos in profile, and his face seemed as radiant as the calm evening light that played upon it. Unbidden, the idea of Milady came into d'Artagnan's mind. "And so, you're happy?" he asked his friend. The watchful eye of Athos seemed to penetrate d'Artagnan's heart and read his very thoughts. "As happy as a creature of God is permitted to be on this earth. But finish your thought, d'Artagnan, for I sense there is more."

"Athos, you're awful – no one can hide anything from you," d'Artagnan said. "And, yes ... I wanted to ask if you're ever haunted by a feeling of horror, a feeling something like..."

"Like remorse?" Athos finished. "Yes – and no. Not remorse, because that woman, I believe, deserved the punishment she suffered. No remorse, because if we'd let her live, she would have undoubtedly continued on her path of destruction. But that doesn't mean, friend, that I'm convinced we had the right to do what we did. Perhaps all bloodshed requires expiation. She made hers; perhaps it is up to us to accomplish our own."

"I have sometimes had the same thought, Athos."

"That woman – she had a son, did she not?"

"Yes."

"Have you ever heard anything about him?"

"Never."

"He must be around twenty-three now," Athos mused. "I often think of that young man, d'Artagnan."

"How strange! I'd forgotten all about him."

Athos smiled sadly. "And Lord de Winter, have you had any news of him?"

"I'd heard he was greatly in favour with King Charles I."

"He's followed the royal fortune that goes ill these days. See, d'Artagnan?" continued Athos. "It all comes back to what I was just speaking of. That king's spilled Strafford's blood and bloodshed calls for more. And the queen?"

"Which queen?"

"Madam Henriette of England, the daughter of Henry IV."

"She's lodged in the Louvre, as you know."

"Where she's given almost nothing, isn't she? During last winter's storms, her daughter was ill, it was said, and forced to shiver in bed for lack of firewood. Can you imagine that?" Athos huffed. "The daughter of Henry IV freezing for lack of a few sticks of wood! If only she'd asked one of us for hospitality when first she came, instead of Mazarin. She'd have wanted for nothing."

"Do you know her, then, Athos?"

"No but my mother saw her as an infant. Have I ever mentioned that my mother was maid of honour to Marie de Médicis?"

"No. You never spoke of such things, Athos."

"Ah, my God – well, you see," said Athos, "the right opportunity never presented itself."

"Porthos never waited for the right opportunity," said d'Artagnan with a smile.

"Each to his nature, d'Artagnan. Porthos has excellent qualities, despite a touch of vanity. Have you seen him?"

"I left him five days ago," said d'Artagnan.

He then recounted, with all the verve of his Gascon sense of humour, the magnificence of Porthos in his Château de Pierrefonds – and while lampooning his friend, he worked in two or three jests at the expense of Sir Mouston. "I sometimes wonder," replied Athos, smiling with a gaiety that recalled their good old days, "How it was that we four random souls formed a friendship so loyal it still binds us after twenty years of separation. Friendship grows deep roots in honest hearts, d'Artagnan. It's only the wicked who deny the bonds of friendship, because they can't understand it. And Aramis?"

"I saw him, too," said d'Artagnan, "but he seemed ... cold."

"So, you've seen Aramis as well," said Athos, giving d'Artagnan a penetrating look. "But this is practically a pilgrimage, friend – you're visiting the Stations of Friendship, as the poets would say."

"I guess so," said d'Artagnan, embarrassed.

"Aramis, you know, is naturally cold," continued Athos, "and is always caught up in the intrigues of the ladies."

"I believe he's involved in a very complicated one at the moment," said d'Artagnan.

Athos made no reply. He's not even curious about it, thought d'Artagnan.

Athos suddenly changed the subject. "There, you see?" he said, pointing out to d'Artagnan that they were almost back at the château. "An hour's walk, and you've seen my entire domain."

"Everything is charming, and shows the touch of a real gentleman," replied d'Artagnan.

Just then came the sound of a horse's hooves. "That will be Raoul returning," said Athos. "We'll hear the news about that poor little girl."

Indeed, the young man appeared at the gate and rode into the courtyard, covered with dust. He leapt from his horse and handed the reins to a groom, then came and bowed to the count and d'Artagnan.

"Lad," Athos said, resting his hand on d'Artagnan's shoulder, "this is the Knight d'Artagnan, of whom you've often heard me speak, Raoul."

"Sir," said the young man, bowing to him even more deeply, "Sir Count mentions your name whenever he wants an example of a generous and intrepid gentleman."

This little compliment didn't fail to move d'Artagnan, who felt his heart gently stirred. He held out a hand to Raoul, saying, "My young friend, every virtue attributed to me really derives from the count, as he was my education in all things. It's not his fault if I took so little advantage of his lessons but it looks to me like you won't miss a thing. I like your look, Raoul, and your words have touched me."

Athos was thoroughly delighted; he regarded d'Artagnan with real affection, and gave Raoul one of those rare, heartfelt smiles that children are so proud to receive, when they get them. "Now," said d'Artagnan to himself, who'd missed nothing of this exchange, "now I'm certain of it."

"Well!" said Athos. "I hope that accident will have no ill results."

"We don't know anything yet, Sir – the doctor can't tell due to the swelling. But he's afraid there might be a damaged nerve."

"And you didn't think you ought to remain longer with Madam de Saint-Rémy?"

"I was afraid I wouldn't be back in time for your supper, Sir," said Raoul, "and you might be kept waiting."

At that moment a little boy, half peasant, half servant, appeared to announce that supper was served. Athos led his guest into a simple dining room but with doors that opened on one side out into the garden, and on the other into a greenhouse blooming with flowers. D'Artagnan glanced at the table setting; the dishes were splendid, and he knew they must be family heirlooms. On the sideboard was a superb silver ewer, so fine that d'Artagnan stopped to look at it. "Ah but this is divinely made!" he said.

"Yes," replied Athos. "It's a masterpiece by a great Florentine artist named Benvenuto Cellini."

"And what battle is represented on it?"

"The Battle of Marignano. It shows the moment when one of my ancestors gave his sword to King François I, who had just broken his. That was the occasion for which Enguerrand de La Fère, my grandfather, was made a Knight of Saint Michael. Fifteen years later, the king – who hadn't forgotten that he'd fought for three more hours with the unbreakable sword of his friend Enguerrand – made him a gift of this ewer, and another sword that you might have seen in my home, a nice example of the jeweller's art. That was a time of giants," said Athos. "We are dwarfs, these days, beside those men. Let's sit down, d'Artagnan, and dine. As to that," said Athos to the small servant who'd just served the soup, "please call for Charlot."

The child went out, and a moment later, the servant who had met the two travellers at the gate came in. "My dear Charlot," said Athos, "so long as he's here, I commend to your care Sir d'Artagnan's servant, the good Planchet. He is fond of good honey, and you have the key to the cellars. Moreover, as he's slept often on the hard ground, he'll appreciate a good bed. See to it, please."

Charlot bowed and left. "Charlot is a good man," said the count, "who's served me for eighteen years."

"You think of everything," said d'Artagnan, "and I thank you on Planchet's behalf, friend Athos."

The young man blinked at this name, and looked carefully at the count to make sure it was he whom d'Artagnan addressed with it. "A strange-sounding name, isn't it, Raoul?" said Athos, smiling. "It was my nom de guerre while Sir d'Artagnan, two brave friends, and I were fighting at the Siege of La Rochelle under the late cardinal and under Sir de Bassompierre, who has also passed on. Sir here still calls me that in the name of friendship, and every time I hear it, it gladdens my heart."

"It was a famous name indeed," said d'Artagnan, "and one day received triumphal honours."

"What do you mean, Sir?" asked Raoul with youthful curiosity.

"I have no idea what he's talking about," said Athos.

"Have you forgotten the Saint-Gervais bastion, Athos and the napkin that three bullet holes made a battle flag? My memory's better than yours – I recall every detail and I'll tell you about it, young man."

And he told Raoul the story of the battle of the bastion, just as Athos had told him the tale of his grandfather. Listening to this story, the young man thought he heard unfolding one of the exploits recounted by Tasso or Ariosto, a tale of the glorious age of chivalry. "But what d'Artagnan hasn't told you, Raoul," said Athos in his turn, "is that he was one of the finest swordsmen of his time: arm of iron, wrist of steel, with eyes of flame that missed nothing his opponent might try. He was but eighteen years old – three years older than you, Raoul – when I first saw him in action, and that against proven fighters."

"And Sir d'Artagnan was victorious?" asked the young man, whose shining eyes begged for more details.

"I might have killed one," said d'Artagnan, to Athos's inquiring look. "As to the other, I either disarmed or wounded him, I can't remember which."

"You wounded him. Oh, you were a tough customer."

"Eh, I haven't lost it," said d'Artagnan, with his smug Gascon laugh. "The other day, in fact..."

But a look from Athos silenced him. "You know, Raoul," said Athos, "you may think yourself a fine swordsman but such vanity can lead to a cruel disappointment. I want you to understand how dangerous a man is when he unites coolness and agility, and I can never offer you a more striking example than this. Tomorrow, if you ask Sir d'Artagnan very politely for a fencing lesson, and if he's not too tired, he might oblige you."

"Plague, Athos, you're a fine teacher yourself, especially regarding the qualities you attribute to me. Just today, Planchet mentioned that famous duel in the stable yard of the Luxembourg, versus Lord de Winter and his companions. Ah, young man," continued d'Artagnan, "somewhere around here must be the sword that I often called the finest blade in the realm."

"Bah! I've lost my touch while raising this child," said Athos.

"There're hands that never lose their touch," said d'Artagnan, "and just convey that touch to others." The young man would have liked to draw out this conversation all evening long but Athos told him their guest had travelled far and needed rest. D'Artagnan protested but Athos insisted that Raoul show him to his room. Athos followed, to make sure the stories of their younger days didn't continue, and brought the pleasant evening to a close with a friendly hand shake and a wish that the musketeer should have a good night.

D'Artagnan went to bed, not so much to sleep as to be alone, and think about what he'd seen and heard that evening. As he was good-natured and had had from first acquaintance with Athos an immediate liking that had ripened into sincere friendship, he was delighted to find him a strong man of acute intelligence rather than the drunken brute he'd expected to see, sleeping off some binge on a dunghill. He accepted without resentment Athos's superior qualities where they exceeded his own, instead of feeling the jealousy and pique that would have tainted a less generous nature, and in short felt a sincere and loyal joy that gave him hope for the outcome of his plans and proposals. However, it seemed to him that Athos had been less than frank and forthcoming with him on several points. Who was this young man who so resembled him, whom he claimed to have adopted? What was behind his return to the life of the world, and the exaggerated sobriety d'Artagnan had noticed at supper? And though it might seem insignificant, the absence of his servant Grimaud, whom Athos previously couldn't do without, had been left unexplained despite several opportunities, a lapse that worried d'Artagnan. It seemed he didn't have his friend's full confidence, or that Athos was bound by some secret obligation, and might even have been warned in advance about his visit. He couldn't help thinking of Rochefort, and what he'd told him at Notre Dame. Could Rochefort have warned Athos that d'Artagnan was coming? D'Artagnan had no time to waste on puzzling this all out. He resolved to find the answers to these questions on the following day. However, he also thought that it's best to ride cautiously over unknown terrain, and he probably should take several days in scouting out this new Athos to account for his changed ways and habits. If he could gain the confidence of the naïve young Raoul, perhaps by fencing or going hunting with him, he might be able to find out what he needed to know to connect the new Athos with the Athos of times past. It ought to be easy, if the trusting frankness of his teacher was reflected in the heart and mind of the student. But d'Artagnan was wary of overplaying his hand with the young man by making an awkward interrogation, as he knew that one false move would be enough to uncover his manoeuvres to the eyes of Athos. Further, it must be said that d'Artagnan, though ready to employ finesse against sly Aramis, or take advantage of Porthos's vanity, was unwilling to try deceit on the noble and forthright Athos. It seemed to him that, while he might be able to outfox Aramis and Porthos in matters of diplomacy, he had no such chance with Athos. "Ah, why isn't silent old Grimaud here?" d'Artagnan mused. "His silence would have told me a lot, for never was anyone so eloquent in his silence as Grimaud!" Meanwhile, the daytime activity of the estate gradually wound down: he heard doors and shutters being closed, movement ceased, and the sound of dogs barking to each other across the fields slowed and then stopped. Finally, around midnight a nightingale that had been singing in a nearby grove trailed off and fell asleep. The only noise remaining in the château was a monotonous pacing from the room below his own that he supposed must be the bedchamber of Athos. He's walking and thinking, d'Artagnan thought but about what? It's impossible to know. All one can guess is that it must be important to him. Eventually even this sound ceased, and he assumed Athos had gone to bed. In the silence, fatigue crept up on d'Artagnan; he closed his eyes in his turn, and almost immediately fell asleep. D'Artagnan never needed much sleep. Dawn had scarcely gilded his curtains before he jumped out of bed and opened the windows. Through them he thought he saw someone prowling furtively and quietly across the stable yard. D'Artagnan had a habit of paying attention to everything that might be useful, so he silently watched the prowler until he recognised the garnet coat and dark hair of Raoul. The young man, for it was indeed Raoul, opened the stable door and brought out the bay horse he'd ridden the day before, and saddled and bridled it with as much speed and skill as an expert groom. Then he led the beast down the path to the garden, opened a small side gate that let out onto a trail, drew the horse outside, closed the gate behind, and mounted and rode off. Over the top of the wall d'Artagnan saw him fly by like an arrow, bending down under the overhanging branches of the maples and flowering acacias. D'Artagnan had noted the day before that that was the road to Blois. "Ah ha!" said the Gascon. "Here's a young gallant who doesn't share Athos's disdain for the fair sex. He's not going hunting, as he took neither arms nor dogs; he's not been sent with a message, because he's sneaking away. Is it me he's hiding from, or his father? ... Because I'm sure the count must be his father. For God's sake! I'll learn the answer, because I'll bring it up with Athos himself." The sun rose, and all the sounds d'Artagnan had heard grow silent the night before began successively to return, one after another: the birds in the branches, the dogs in the barn, the sheep in the field, even the boats on the Loire seemed to come alive, rocking at their moorings or bearing away with the current. To avoid disturbing anyone, d'Artagnan remained quietly at his window until he heard all the château's doors and shutters being thrown open. Then he combed back his hair, gave his moustache a final twist, brushed the edge of his hat against the sleeve of his coat, and went downstairs. He was on the last step of the bottom flight when he saw Athos outside in the garden, bent over the ground like a man looking for a lost coin. "Hello," said d'Artagnan.

"Hello, friend. Did you have a good night?"

"Very good, just like the supper that sent me there, and your reception before that. But what are you looking at with such care? Have you become a tulip fancier?"

"Don't mock, my friend. Living in the country, our tastes change, and we come to love all the beautiful things that God's gaze draws forth from the earth, and which we disdain in the cities. I was just looking at these irises planted by the pond that are bent and broken. I have the clumsiest gardeners in the world – they bring the horses out to water them, and walk them across the flowerbed."

D'Artagnan smiled. "Really? Is that what you think?" And he led his friend along the path, where other plants were similarly crushed. "Looks like there are more this way, Athos."

"But yes! Also freshly broken?"

"Just as fresh." said d'Artagnan.

"Who went this way this morning?" Athos wondered anxiously. "Has a horse escaped the stable?"

"Unlikely," said d'Artagnan, "since the hoof-prints are equal and regular."

"Where's Raoul?" cried Athos. "Why haven't I seen him?"

"Easy, now!" said d'Artagnan, putting a finger to his smiling lips.

"What's he done?" asked Athos. D'Artagnan related what he'd seen, while carefully watching his host's expression. "Ah! I guess it all now," said Athos, with a slight shrug of his shoulders. "The poor boy has gone to Blois."

"To do what?"

"Eh, my God! To ask after the little girl, La Vallière. You recall, the child who sprained her ankle yesterday."

"You think so?" said d'Artagnan, incredulous.

"I not only think so, I'm sure of it," said Athos. "Haven't you noticed that Raoul is in love?"

"With whom? That seven-year-old child?"

"Friend, at Raoul's age, the heart is so full, it must overflow upon something, whether dream or reality. Well, his love for her is half of one and half the other."

"You're kidding me. That little girl?"

"Didn't you see her? She's the prettiest little thing in all the world: silver-blond hair, blue eyes adoring and mischievous at the same time."

"But what do you think of this feeling?"

"I don't oppose it, though I smile and gently make fun of Raoul. But a young heart's needs are so urgent, their feelings of yearning and melancholy so sweet and so sad, it often seems very much like true love. I remember when I was Raoul's age I fell in love with a Greek statue that good King Henry IV had given my father, and thought I'd go mad with grief when I was told that the story of Pygmalion was only a fable."

"A folly of idleness. You don't keep Raoul busy enough, so he fills the time in his own way."

"True enough. I've thought of moving away."

"Good idea."

"No doubt – but it would break his heart, and he'd suffer as much as if it were true love. For three or four years, since he himself was a child, he's admired and then adored this little doll, and if we stay here, it will ripen into true love. These youngsters share their dreams all day long and make plans as if they were lovers who were twenty years old. For a while, this made La Vallière's parents smile but now I think they're beginning to frown."

"Childishness! Raoul just needs something to distract him. Get him away from here soon, or, Morbleu, you'll never make a man of him!"

"I think," said Athos, "I'll send him to Paris."

"Ah!" said d'Artagnan. He thought this was his cue to begin his attack. "If you want," he said, "I think we'd make a career for this young man."

"Ah!" said Athos in his turn.

"I want to consult you on a certain matter I've been thinking about."

"Say on."

"Do you think it might be time to rejoin the service?"

"But haven't you been in the service all along, d'Artagnan?"

"No but listen: I mean active service. Aren't you tempted sometimes to return to our old life? I believe there are serious rewards to be gained and you could relive the exploits of our youth along with me and Porthos."

"So, you're making me an actual proposition!" said Athos.

"Honest and true."

"To take the field again?"

"Yes."

"Who for and who against?" asked Athos, fixing his clear and benevolent gaze on the Gascon.

"The devil! You come right to the point."

"And I hit what I aim at. Listen carefully, d'Artagnan. There is only one person, or rather one cause that a man like me can serve: that of the king."

"But of course," said the musketeer.

"Yes – but hear this," Athos said seriously. "If by the king's cause you mean that of Sir de Mazarin, we cease to understand each other."

"I didn't exactly say that," replied the Gascon, embarrassed.

"Come, d'Artagnan," said Athos, "no games. These little evasions tell me everything. Nobody likes to admit it when they're recruiting for Mazarin – they act sad and uncomfortable and won't look one in the eye."

"Oh, Athos!" said d'Artagnan.

"Oh, you know I don't mean you, who are a gem of courage and honesty," said Athos. "I'm talking about the cronies of this petty Italian intriguer who tries to wear a crown he stole off a pillow, this knave who calls his party the king's party, while daring to imprison royal princes – though he doesn't dare to execute them, as did our cardinal, the great cardinal. This skinflint, who weighs his golden crowns and pays only with the clipped coins, keeping the whole ones for himself. This buffoon whom we hear mistreats the queen, and prepares for civil war just to protect his stolen sources of income. Is this the master you propose I should serve? No, thank you!"

"You're fierier than you used to be, by God!" said d'Artagnan. "The years have warmed your blood instead of cooling it. So, you think this is the master I want you to serve?" And he thought: Devil take me if I'll spill our secrets to someone so set against us.

"If not that, friend," said Athos, "and then what do you propose?"

"My God! A simple alliance! You while away the time on your estate and seem happy in your golden daydream. Porthos has maybe fifty or sixty thousand livres of income, while Aramis has fifteen Duchesses who vie for the attention of the prelate, as they once did for the musketeer, and lives like a spoiled child. But me – what am I in this world? I've worn my breastplate and buff coat for twenty years, clinging to my paltry rank, without advance, retreat, or risk. In short, I'm dead. Well! When I think the time has come to resurrect myself, you all tell me, 'Don't serve that man! He's a knave! A buffoon! A petty tyrant! An Italian!' And I agree with you but so what? Find me a better master or show me where I can make a real living." Athos reflected for a few seconds and understood d'Artagnan's position – he'd pressed too far too fast, and now tried to draw back to hide his hand. But he saw clearly that the musketeer's initial proposals were in earnest and would have been developed further if he'd lent them a sympathetic ear. "Very well, then," he said to himself, "d'Artagnan is for Mazarin." From that moment, he conducted himself with extreme caution. On his side, d'Artagnan played a closer game as well. "But it seems to me you have a definite plan," Athos continued.

"Certainly. I wanted to take counsel of all three of you in order to find a common approach, since if we act on our own we'll always be incomplete."

"True enough. You spoke of Porthos – has he decided to seek for his fortune? It seems to me he has fortune enough."

"No doubt about it but man is so constituted that whatever he has, he wants something more."

"And what does Porthos want?"

"To be a baron."

"Oh, right, I'd forgotten," said Athos, laughing.

You'd forgotten? D'Artagnan thought. And when had you learned it? Are you in contact with Aramis? Ah, if I knew that, it'd explain everything. The conversation ended there, for just then Raoul came in. Athos had intended to scold him but the young man looked so stricken he didn't have the heart, and just asked him what had happened. "Has your little neighbour grown worse?" d'Artagnan said.

"Ah, Sir!" said Raoul, almost choking with grief. "The fall was serious, and though there may be no deformity, the doctor fears she'll limp for the rest of her life."

"Oh! How terrible!" said Athos.

D'Artagnan had had a joke on the tip of his tongue but seeing how hard Athos took this news, he swallowed it. "Ah, Sir, I'm so wretched!" replied Raoul. "This terrible event is all my fault."

"Yours, Raoul? How?" asked Athos.

"But yes! Wasn't she coming to me when she jumped off the top of that woodpile?"

"There's only one recourse, Raoul: you'll have to marry her in expiation," said d'Artagnan.

"Oh, Sir, you're joking about genuine pain," said Raoul. "It isn't right."

And Raoul, who wanted to be alone with his tears, returned to his room, where he remained until dinnertime. The mutual admiration of the two friends wasn't injured in the least by the morning's skirmish, and they dined with good appetite, glancing from time to time at poor Raoul who, with moist eyes and a heavy heart, ate hardly anything. As they were finishing their meal, two letters arrived that Athos read with close attention, starting several times despite himself. D'Artagnan, who watched him reading these letters from across the table, and whose eyesight was keen, swore to himself that he recognised on one the compact handwriting of Aramis, and on the other the long, looping hand of a woman. "Come," said d'Artagnan to Raoul, seeing that Athos wished to be alone to think about these letters or respond to them, "let's go spar a bit in the armoury. It will distract you."

The young man looked at Athos, who replied with a nod of assent. They went to the room on the ground floor, where they found foils, masks, gloves, plastrons, and all the other accessories of fencing. Fifteen minutes later Athos came in. "Well?" he said.

"He has your moves down already, Athos," said d'Artagnan. "If he only had your cool, I'd have nothing but praise for him..."

As for the young man, he was a trifle ashamed. He'd managed to touch d'Artagnan no more than a couple of times, on the arm and thigh, while the musketeer had buttoned him twenty times full on the body. At that moment, Charlot came in bearing an urgent letter for d'Artagnan that had just come by messenger. Now it was Athos's turn to watch from the corner of his eye as d'Artagnan read. The musketeer read the letter with no visible sign of emotion, other than a curt nod when he reached the end. "See here, my friend," he said, "this is the service for you, and no wonder you've had enough of it. Sir de Tréville has fallen ill, and the company can't do without me, so my leave is at its end."

"You're returning to Paris?" asked Athos sharply.

"Yes, by God!" said d'Artagnan. "Why don't you come yourself?"

Athos coloured slightly and replied, "If I come to town, it will please me to look you up."

"Whoa, Planchet!" cried d'Artagnan from the door. "We leave in ten minutes; make sure the horses get oats." Then, turning to Athos: "My visit here just doesn't feel complete. It seems a shame to leave without once greeting good old Grimaud."

"Grimaud?" said Athos. "I'm surprised it took you this long to ask me about him. I lent him to a friend of mine."

"Someone who will understand his signs and gestures?" said d'Artagnan.

"I hope so," said Athos.

The two friends embraced warmly. D'Artagnan pressed Raoul's hand, and made Athos promise to visit him if he came to Paris and write to him if he didn't. He mounted his horse; Planchet, ever correct, was already in the saddle. D'Artagnan smiled at Raoul. "Why don't you ride along with me? I'm going right past Blois."

Raoul glanced at Athos, who restrained him with a subtle gesture. "Sorry, Sir," the young man replied, "I'll stay here with Sir Count."

"In that case, farewell to both of you, my good friends," said d'Artagnan, pressing their hands one last time, "and God guard you! ... As we used to say when we took our leave in the time of the late cardinal."

Athos waved his hand, Raoul bowed, and d'Artagnan and Planchet rode off. The count followed them with his eyes, his hand resting on the shoulder of the young man, whose height almost equalled his own. But as soon as they were out of sight, he turned to Raoul and said, "We leave this evening for Paris."

"What! Why?" said the young man, turning pale.

"You may go and tender my farewell, and yours, to Madam de Saint-Rémy. I'll expect you back by seven." The young man bowed, his expression a mixture of grief and gratitude, and went off to go saddle his horse. As for d'Artagnan, as soon as they were out of sight, he drew the letter from his pocket and reread it:

Return with all speed to Paris.

– J.M.

"This letter is rather curt," murmured d'Artagnan, "and if it didn't have a postscript, I might pretend I'd never received it – but fortunately it does have a postscript." And he reread the postscript that made up for the letter's brevity:

P.S.: Call on the royal treasurer in Blois, tell him your name and show him this letter, and he will issue you two hundred pistoles.

"That changes things," d'Artagnan said. "When the cardinal writes like that, then I like his style. Come, Planchet, we'll pay a visit to the royal treasurer, and then spur on."

"To Paris, Sir?"

"To Paris." And they put their horses into a trot.

188
Sir Beaufort

Here are the events that had necessitated d'Artagnan's sudden return to Paris. One evening when Mazarin, as usual, was on his way to the queen's suite after everyone else had retired, and was passing near the guardroom, one door of which opened onto his antechamber, he heard loud voices. Wishing to know what the soldiers were talking about, he approached in his usual stealthy manner, pushed the door open slightly, and peeked in. The guards were having a heated discussion. "Well, I assure you," said one of them, "if Coysel predicted something, it's as good as already happened. I've heard it said that he's not just an astrologer but an actual magician."

"If he's one of your friends, then watch what you're saying, plague take it! You'll do him an injury."

"What do you mean?"

"You're liable to get him arrested."

"Bah! Nobody burns witches anymore."

"No? It seems to me it hasn't been that long since the late cardinal burned Urbain Grandier. I ought to know – I was on duty at the stake and saw him roasted."

"Oh, Grandier wasn't a sorcerer, he was a scholar that is another thing entirely. He didn't predict the future, he studied the lessons of the past – which can be much worse, if you learn the wrong things."

Mazarin nodded in agreement – but he wanted to know what prediction they were talking about, so he continued to eavesdrop. "I don't say Coysel isn't a wizard," the second guard replied, "but I do say that if you announce your prediction in advance, that's a sure way to see it thwarted."

"Why?"

"Listen, if we're fencing, and I tell you, 'I'm going to give you a straight thrust, then a thrust en second,' then naturally you'll parry. Well, if Coysel said loud enough for the cardinal to hear, 'Before a certain date, a certain prisoner will escape,' it's obvious the cardinal will then take precautions to make sure the prisoner does not escape."

"Eh? My God," said a third guard, who'd appeared to be asleep on a bench but who'd actually not missed a word of the conversation, "my God, do you think a man can escape his destiny? If it's written in the stars that the Duke Beaufort will escape, then Beaufort will escape, and all the cardinal's precautions won't stop him."

Mazarin started. He was Italian – in other words, superstitious. He went in, and the guards, seeing him, halted their conversation. "What did you say, gentlemen?" he said in a silky voice. "You said Monsieur de Beaufort had escaped, I think?"

"Oh, no, my Lord!" said the second soldier, surprised. "He's still under guard. It's just said that he will escape."

"Who said that?"

"Come, repeat your story, Saint-Laurent," said the soldier, turning toward the tale-teller.

"My Lord," said the first guard, "I merely told these gentlemen what I've heard of the prediction of a man named Coysel who claims that, no matter how well he's guarded, Monsieur de Beaufort will escape by Pentecost."

"And this Coysel, is he a dreamer, a fool?" asked the cardinal, still smiling.

"Not at all," said the guard, sticking to his story. "He's predicted many things that have come to pass, such as that the queen would give birth to a son, that Coligny would be killed in his duel with the Duke de Guise, and that the coadjutor will be made a cardinal. Well, Coligny was killed, and the queen not only had a son but two years later she had another."

"Yes," said Mazarin, "but the coadjutor is not yet a cardinal."

"No, my Lord," said the guard, "but he will be."

Mazarin made a face that said, He doesn't have that cardinal's hat yet. Then he added, "So you think, my friend that Sir Beaufort will escape?"

"No doubt about it, My Lord," said the soldier. "If Your Eminence offered to give me Monsieur de Chavigny's* job as warden of the Château de Vincennes, I wouldn't take it. Now, the day after Pentecost, that would be another story."

There is nothing more convincing than conviction; it's persuasive even to sceptics, and far from being a sceptic, Mazarin, as we've said, was superstitious. He turned and went thoughtfully on his way.

"The tightwad!" said the guard on the bench. "He pretended not to believe in your magician, Saint-Laurent, so he wouldn't have to tip you for the warning. But as soon as he's back in his study he'll be profiting from your prediction."

In fact, instead of continuing on to the queen's chambers, Mazarin did return to his study, where, summoning Bernouin, he gave orders that on the morrow, at dawn, he should send for the officer in charge of Monsieur de Beaufort, and that Mazarin should be awakened as soon as the officer arrived. Without knowing it, the guard had touched the cardinal in a sore spot. For five years Beaufort had been in prison but not a day passed that the cardinal didn't think that he might escape. One couldn't expect to keep the grandson of Henry IV in prison all his life, especially when that grandson of Henry IV was scarcely thirty years old. But if he did escape, what hatred, forged in captivity, would he bear for his captor, the man who had taken the rich, brave, and splendid Beaufort – loved by women, feared by men – and stolen the best years of his life by clapping him in prison?

Already, Mazarin had doubled the watch around Beaufort – but he was like the miser in the fable who could sleep only with his treasure in sight. Often, he awoke in the night with a start, dreaming of Beaufort's escape. Then he would send to inquire after him, and each time was pained to hear that the prisoner still gamed, drank, and sang cheerfully – but while gaming, drinking, and singing, he would pause now and then to vow that Mazarin would pay dearly for all the pleasures he was forced to take in Vincennes instead of in freedom. Such thoughts haunted the minister during his sleep that night, and when Bernouin entered his room to wake him at seven the next morning, his first words were, "Eh? What is it? Has Monsieur de Beaufort escaped from Vincennes?"

"I think not, My Lord," said Bernouin, whose professional calm never left him, "but in any case, we'll soon know all the latest, because the officer you sent for, La Ramée,* has arrived from Vincennes and is awaiting Your Eminence's orders."

"Bring him in," said Mazarin, arranging his pillows so as to receive him sitting in bed.

The officer entered. He was a large, portly man, good-looking, with an air of ease that worried Mazarin. "This buffoon seems less than clever," he murmured.

La Ramée stood silently in the doorway. "Come in, Monsieur!" said Mazarin.

The officer obeyed. "Do you know what they're saying here?" continued the cardinal.

"No, your Eminence."

"Well! They're saying that Monsieur de Beaufort is going to escape from Vincennes – in fact, it's as good as done."

The officer gaped in surprise. He squinted and wrinkled his nose, as if trying to scent the joke in what His Eminence was telling him, then opened his eyes wide and burst out laughing, the flesh all over his large figure shaking with hilarity. Mazarin was secretly delighted by this disrespectful display but maintained his grave expression. When La Ramée had had a good laugh and was wiping his eyes, the officer thought it was time to explain his inappropriate mirth. "Escape, My Lord!" he said. "Escape! Is Your Eminence not aware of Monsieur de Beaufort's situation?"

"I know he's in the dungeon at Vincennes."

"Yes, my Lord, in a room with walls seven feet thick, and iron crossbars on the windows as thick as my arm."

"Sir," said Mazarin, "with patience one can bore through walls, and a watch spring can saw through a bar."

"But my Lord should know that he has eight guards at all times, four in the antechamber and four in his room, and these guards never leave him."

"But he leaves his room to go out and play tennis!"

"Well, yes, my Lord, for the prisoners must exercise. However, if Your Eminence commands, exercise will be forbidden."

"No need of that," said Mazarin, who didn't want to be too hard on the prisoner for fear of how vindictive he'd be if he ever did escape. "But I must ask with whom he plays tennis."

"Sir, he plays with the officer of the guards, or with me, or with the other prisoners."

"But doesn't that sometimes take him near the walls?"

"Has Your Eminence seen our walls? There's a sixty-foot drop from the parapet, and I doubt whether Monsieur de Beaufort is so weary of life that he's willing to risk breaking his neck by jumping down."

"Hmm!" said the cardinal, who began to be reassured. "So, you think, then, my dear Sir La Ramée...?"

"I think that unless Monsieur de Beaufort finds a way to change into a bird, I can answer for him."

"Beware of overconfidence!" Mazarin replied. "Monsieur de Beaufort told the guards who escorted him to Vincennes that he'd often thought he might be imprisoned and had devised forty methods of escaping from it."

"My Lord, if even one of those forty methods had been any good, he'd have been gone a long time ago."

"Come now," muttered Mazarin, "he's not as stupid as I thought."

"Besides, my Lord forgets that Sir de Chavigny is the governor of Vincennes," continued La Ramée, "and Monsieur de Chavigny is no friend to the Duke Beaufort."

"Yes but Monsieur de Chavigny is away."

"He may be away but I'm still there."

"And when you're away as well?"

"Oh, when I'm away, I have an assistant who hopes to become a royal officer, and who, I assure you, is a most vigilant guard. He's been with me for three weeks now, and my only complaint is that he's too hard on the prisoner."

"And who is this Cerberus?" asked the cardinal.

"A certain Monsieur Grimaud, my Lord."

"And what did he do before he came to Vincennes?"

"The one who recommended him said he was a country man who'd gotten into some kind of terrible trouble and hoped to find safety inside a royal uniform."

"And who recommended him?"

"The Duke Grammont's steward."

"So, you think he's reliable?"

"As reliable as I am, my Lord."

"Is he a chatterer, this fellow?"

"Lord, no! At first, I thought he must be a mute, as he spoke and answered only with signs but it seems that's just how his former master trained him."

"Well, then, my dear Monsieur La Ramée, tell him that if he makes a good and faithful guard, we'll overlook his problems in the provinces – we'll put a proper uniform on him, and put a few pistoles in its pockets so he can drink to the health of the king."

Mazarin was big on promises – quite the opposite of Monsieur Grimaud, who spoke little but did much, as La Ramée had boasted. The cardinal peppered La Ramée with a shower of further questions about the prisoner, how he was fed, lodged, and furnished but the latter's answers were so satisfactory that by the time he was dismissed, the cardinal was almost reassured. By then it was nine in the morning, so the cardinal got up, perfumed and dressed himself, and went to the queen to tell her what had kept him. The queen, who feared Sir Beaufort no less than the cardinal, and was nearly as superstitious as he was, made him repeat word for word all La Ramée's promises and the praise he'd heaped on his assistant. When he was finished, she said, "If only we had such a Grimaud shadowing every prince!"

"Patience," said Mazarin, with his Italian smile, "that may come in time. Meanwhile..."

"Meanwhile? What?"

"I'll take certain precautions." And with that, he went off to write the order commanding d'Artagnan's return.

189

How the Duke of Beaufort amused himself in the Dungeon of Vincennes

That prisoner so feared by the cardinal, whose potential escape preoccupied the entire Court, had no idea how often they thought about him at the Royal Palace. He recognised the futility of trying to escape, so he kept himself busy by devising new ways to outrage or insult Mazarin. He had even tried writing satirical verses but had soon given up, as heaven hadn't granted him the gift of poetry – in fact he had a great deal of difficulty expressing himself in simple prose. As Baron de Blot, the great satirist of the age, had said about Beaufort:

*In a fight he shines, he thunders!
A cannon on the loose!
But when he thinks, he blunders
And we take him for a goose
Even Gaston, when he talks
Can manage how to speak
Beaufort's tongue just balks
Much as Gaston's arm is weak!*

So this prisoner confined himself to insults and curses. The Duke Beaufort was the grandson of Henry IV and his mistress Gabrielle d'Estrées – as strong, as brave, as proud, and above all, as Gascon as his grandfather, though far less literate. For a while, after the death of King Louis XIII, he'd been the queen's confidant, the leading favourite at Court – until he'd had to give way to Mazarin and found himself reduced to second place. He'd had the bad judgement to be angry at this demotion, and even worse to complain loudly about it, so the queen – and by the queen, we mean Mazarin – had had him arrested and taken to Vincennes by that same Guitaut we met at the beginning of our story, and whom we'll meet again later. Thereafter the queen and Mazarin were freed from his person and his pretensions, and he troubled them no more, popular prince though he was. For five years he'd lived in a small chamber in the dungeon of the royal castle of Vincennes. This period of incarceration that might have taught wisdom to someone other than Beaufort, had passed over his head without making any impression on him. It might have occurred to someone else that if he hadn't offended the cardinal, insulted the other princes, and made no effort to create a following, except, as the Cardinal de Retz said, for a few sad and sorry dreamers, he might have been at liberty for the last five years, or at least had some defenders. But such thoughts never even occurred to the duke, whose long imprisonment had only served to make him more petulant, and every report about him that reached His Eminence just reaffirmed the cardinal's decision to imprison him. After failing at poetry, Beaufort decided to try painting. He made sketches of the cardinal with charcoal but as his artistic talent was mediocre and the likenesses didn't much resemble their subject, to make it clear who they were supposed to represent, he titled them all, "Ritratto dell'Illustrissimo Facchino Mazarini." [The Portrait of the Illustrious Porter Mazarin]

Chavigny, warned about this, visited the duke and begged him to take up another hobby, or at least to leave his portraits untitled. But Sir de Beaufort, like many prisoners, took great pleasure in juvenile acts of defiance, and the next day, the walls of Beaufort's room were covered in portraits with prominent titles. Chavigny was informed about these additional portraits that were all done in profile, as Beaufort wasn't good at full faces. One day, while Sir de Beaufort was playing tennis, Chavigny had the portraits sponged off and the walls whitewashed. Beaufort thanked Chavigny for giving him so much clean drawing space and made each wall a new gallery dedicated to some aspect of the life of Cardinal Mazarin. The first gallery represented the Illustrious Scoundrel Mazarin being soundly thrashed by Cardinal Bentivoglio, in whose service he'd begun his career. In the second, the Illustrious Scoundrel was playing the part of the wounded Ignatius Loyola in the tragedy of that name. The third showed the Scoundrel stealing the portfolio of prime minister from Chavigny, who'd thought he was going to have it. In the fourth, the Scoundrel was refusing to give clean sheets to La Porte, the valet of young Louis XIV, saying that clean sheets once per season was often enough for a King of France. These compositions, large and rather complicated, were beyond the prisoner's ability to depict in detail, so he contented himself with simply drawing their frames and lettering out their long titles. But these frames and titles were enough to provoke Sir de Chavigny, who sent word to Beaufort that if he didn't give up these artistic projects, he would be denied their means of execution. Beaufort replied that since he'd been denied the opportunity to have a career in arms, and couldn't be a Bayard or a Trivulce, then he would be a Michelangelo or a Raphael. One day while Beaufort was taking a promenade in the prison yard, his fireplace was swept clean of coal and cinders, so that when he returned there was nothing he could use as a charcoal pencil. Beaufort swore, ranting and raving that they were trying to kill him with cold and damp, the way they'd killed Puylaurens, Marshal Ornano, and the younger Vendome – but Chavigny replied that Beaufort had only to give his word to make no more drawings, and he could have all the firewood he wanted. Sir de Beaufort refused to give his word and went without heat for the rest of the winter. Furthermore, on another day while the prisoner was out upon returning he found the room once again whitewashed and without a trace of his frescos. Sir de Beaufort then bought from one of his guards a dog named Pistachio. As there was no rule against a prisoner having a dog, Chavigny didn't oppose the creature's change of master. Beaufort then spent many quiet hours with this dog, and though it was suspected he was training Pistachio, no one knew what he was training it to do. One day, when Pistachio's training was considered complete, Beaufort invited Chavigny and all the officers of Vincennes to a grand performance in his chamber. The guests arrived to find the room lit with every candle Beaufort could get. The performance then began. The prisoner, with a piece of plaster pried from the wall, had drawn a long white line representing a rope on the floor down the middle of the room. Pistachio, at his master's command, placed himself on the line, stood up on his hind legs, and holding a stick used to beat clothes between his forepaws, began to follow the line, with all the balancing contortions of a tight-rope walker. After three times walking the length of the line back and forth, he gave the stick to Sir de Beaufort, then walked the line again without the stick for balance. The intelligent animal was lauded with applause. The performance had three acts; the first completed, it moved on to the second: telling time. The audience was asked what time it was. Sir de Chavigny showed his watch to Pistachio; the time was half past six. Pistachio raised and lowered his paw six times; on the seventh, he left it in the air. It was as clear as could be and was better than a sundial – for as everyone knows, a sundial tells time only when the sun shines. Next, the dog was asked to show who the finest jailer in all the prisons of France was. Pistachio went three times around in a circle, then laid down in the most respectful way at the feet of Chavigny. The governor pretended to enjoy the joke, laughing just enough to show his teeth. When he'd finished laughing, he gnawed his lip and began to frown. Finally, Beaufort put this difficult question to Pistachio: Who was the world's greatest thief? Pistachio went all around the room but didn't stop at anyone, then went to the door, where he scratched at the panel and whined. "See, Gentlemen," said the prince, "this clever animal, not finding what I asked for, wants to look elsewhere. But don't worry, you'll get his answer. Pistachio, my friend, come here." The dog obeyed. "Is the world's greatest thief Le Camus, the king's secretary, who came to Paris with only twenty livres, and now has ten million?"

The dog shook his head no. "Is it Superintendent d'Émery," continued the prince, "who gave his son Sir Thoré, upon his marriage, three hundred thousand livres and a mansion near the Tuileries compared to which the Louvre is a shack?"

The dog shook his head no.

"Not him, eh?" said the prince. "Now listen carefully: is it, by any chance, the Illustrious Scoundrel Mazarini of Piscina then?"

The dog nodded wildly, raising and lowering his head nine or ten times. "You see, Gentlemen," said Beaufort to the officers, who this time didn't dare to laugh, "The Illustrious Scoundrel Mazarini is the world's greatest thief – at least, according to Pistachio."

And then it was time for the third and final act. "Gentlemen," said the Duke Beaufort into the sudden silence, "you all remember how the Duke Guise had all the dogs of Paris trained to jump for Miss de Pons when he declared her the fairest of the fair! Well, Gentlemen, that was nothing, because the animals didn't know the dissidence" – he meant difference but Sir de Beaufort often chose the wrong word – "between those they were to jump for, and those they weren't. Now Pistachio will show you how superior he is to his canine colleagues. Sir de Chavigny, be so kind as to lend me your cane."

Chavigny handed his walking stick to Beaufort, who held it horizontally one foot above the floor. "Pistachio, my friend," Beaufort said, "oblige me by jumping for Madam de Montbazon."

Everyone laughed, because it was well known that Madam de Montbazon had been Beaufort's mistress at the time of his arrest. Pistachio didn't hesitate and jumped happily over the cane. "But," said Chavigny, "it seems to me Pistachio does no more than the other dogs did when they jumped for Miss de Pons."

"Wait for it," said the prince. He raised the cane by six inches. "Now, Pistachio, jump for the queen."

The dog jumped respectfully over the cane. The duke raised the cane six more inches. "Now, Pistachio, jump for the king."

The dog was game, and despite the height of the cane, leapt lightly over it. "And now, pay attention," said the duke, lowering the cane nearly to the floor. "Pistachio, my friend, jump for the Illustrious Scoundrel Mazarini of Piscina."

The dog turned his back on the cane. "What's this, then?" said Sir de Beaufort, going around the animal from its back to its front. He presented the cane again. "Jump, Sir Pistachio." But Pistachio again turned around and put his back to the cane. Sir de Beaufort once more stepped in front of the dog and repeated his command – but this time Pistachio lost his patience, seized the cane with his teeth, snatched it from the prince, and chewed it to splinters. Beaufort pried the cane's pieces from the dog's jaws, and then solemnly presented them to Chavigny with his sincerest regrets. He was sorry but the performance was over – however, if they would return in three months for another session, Pistachio would regale them with a new set of tricks. Three days later, Pistachio was found poisoned. They searched for the poisoner but as may be imagined, the culprit was never identified. Sir de Beaufort buried the dog, over which he placed this epitaph:

Here lies Pistachio, One of the Smartest Dogs Who Ever Lived

This broke none of the prison rules, so Sir de Chavigny had nothing to complain about. But then the duke spread the word that in poisoning his dog, they were just testing concoctions to try on him – and one day, after dinner, he went to bed crying out that he had cramps, and Mazarin had had him poisoned. When news of this latest trick reached the cardinal, he was alarmed. The dungeon of Vincennes was notoriously unhealthy: Madam de Rambouillet had quipped that the chamber wherein Puylaurens, Marshal Omano, and Grand Prior Vendome had died was worth its weight in arsenic, and the phrase had become a watchword. Mazarin ordered that the prisoner be served no food or honey that hadn’t been tested. That’s when La Ramée had been appointed to serve near the duke as his taster. However, Chavigny wasn’t satisfied with the death of the innocent Pistachio, and hadn’t yet pardoned the duke’s impertinence. Sir de Chavigny was a creature of the late cardinal – some even said he was his son – and knew a few of the old tyrant’s tricks. He deliberately began to provoke Sir de Beaufort: he removed what he had left of iron knives and silver forks, replacing them with silver knives and wooden forks; when Beaufort complained, Chavigny replied that as the cardinal had recently told Madam de Vendome that her son was in prison for life, he was afraid this terrible news might result in a suicide attempt. Two weeks later, Beaufort found two rows of saplings newly planted along the path to the tennis court; when he asked about them, he was told they were intended to provide shade for him far into the future. Finally, one morning the gardener came to say that they were planting asparagus shoots for him that everyone knows take years to mature – five back in those days, though in our time advances in gardening have gotten it down to four. These provocations drove Beaufort into a fury. The duke thought it was time to start employing his forty methods of escape, starting with the simplest, and an attempt to corrupt La Ramée. But as La Ramée had invested fifteen hundred crowns in purchasing his office, he stuck to his duty, and instead of succumbing to the attempted bribe, went and reported it to Chavigny. The governor immediately put eight men in the prince’s rooms, doubled the guard, and tripled the sentries. From that moment, the prince went everywhere like one of those theatrical kings who’s always followed by a chorus, four men before and four men behind, not counting the door-wardens who trailed the rest. At first Beaufort laughed off this increased security, saying, “It amuses and diversifies me” (he meant diverts). “Besides,” he added, “when I tire of these additional honours bestowed on me, I still have thirty-nine other methods.” But living in a crowd began to wear upon him. He got through the first six months of it on sheer bluster but eventually, seeing eight other men sit down whenever he sat, rise when he got up, and stop wherever he stopped, his mood darkened, and he began to count the days. This new persecution provoked a resurgence of his hate for Mazarin. The prince began to swear from morning till night, vowing he’d make mince pie of Mazarin’s ears. This was alarming; the cardinal, who heard everything that happened in Vincennes, pulled his biretta down over his ears. One day Beaufort assembled all his guards and, despite his notorious speech issues, regaled them with this oratory that had obviously been prepared in advance: “Gentlemen, if you continue to tolerate the grandson of good King Henry IV being subjected to gross insults and ignobility” – he meant ignominies – “then by the belly of the Grey Saint, as my grandfather used to swear! I was nearly the ruler of Paris – did you know that? Once I was charged with guarding the king and Sir for an entire day, and the queen flattered me and said I was the most honest man in the kingdom. Gentlemen, I say to you now: take me outside! With you as my bodyguard, I’ll go to the Louvre, twist Mazarin’s neck for him, and appoint you all officers with fine pensions. By the belly of the Grey Saint! Forward, march!” But, as moving as that was, the eloquence of the grandson of Henry IV failed to touch their stony hearts, and no one budged. Seeing this, Beaufort told them they were all blackguards that made bitter enemies of the lot of them.

Sometimes when Sir de Chavigny came to see him that he did two or three times a week, the duke took advantage of the visit to threaten him. “What will you do, Sir,” he’d say, “when one day an army of Parisians appears, all armoured and bristling with muskets, come to liberate me?”

“My Lord,” answered Chavigny, bowing low, “as I have twenty artillery pieces on my ramparts, and thirty thousand rounds in my magazines, I’d do my best to cannonade them.”

“Yes but after you’d fired off your thirty thousand rounds, they would take the dungeon, and once the dungeon was taken I’d be forced to let them hang you – for which I’d be very sorry, I’m sure.” And in his turn the prince bowed profoundly and politely to Chavigny. “But I, My Lord,” continued Chavigny, “when the first of the rabble burst in through my posterns, or clambered over my wall, would be forced, to my very great regret, to personally kill you with my own hands, as you have been placed in my particular care, not to be given up dead or alive.”

And once again he saluted His Highness. “Yes,” continued the duke, “but since those brave citizens won’t have come here without first taking the time to hang Sir Guilio Mazarini, you would do well to keep your hands off of me, for fear of the Parisians tying you to four horses and quartering you in your own courtyard – which is even less pleasant than hanging, as those things go.”

These exchanges of pleasantries could go on for ten, fifteen, or even twenty minutes but they always ended the same way, with Chavigny turning toward the door and shouting, “Whoa! La Ramée!”

La Ramée would come in. “La Ramée,” Chavigny would say, “I commend Sir de Beaufort to your care. Treat him with the respect due to his name and rank, and don’t let him out of your sight for a moment.” Then he would retire, saluting Beaufort with such ironical politeness that it threw the duke into a blue fury. La Ramée had therefore become the prince’s virtual twin, his eternal guardian and second shadow – but it must be said that La Ramée, that bon vivant, free liver, jolly drinking companion, fine tennis player, and all-around good fellow, had only one real fault as far as Beaufort was concerned, that of being incorruptible. Instead of being tiresome, he’d become for the prince a genuine diversion. Unfortunately, La Ramée couldn’t say the same about the prince, and though he valued the honour of being locked up with such an important prisoner, the pleasure of living cheek-by-jowl with the grandson of Henry IV didn’t compensate for almost never seeing his family. He might have had the good fortune to be an officer of the king but he was also a devoted father and husband. La Ramée adored his wife and children, and though he could see them occasionally from the top of the wall, when to give him some familial consolation they would take a walk along the other side of the moat, it was far too little for him. La Ramée felt that his jovial good humour that he regarded as the basis of his good health – though in truth it was probably the reverse – was at risk of being lost to so rigorous a routine. This belief only grew stronger when, the relationship between Beaufort and Chavigny having soured to hatred, Chavigny stopped visiting the prince. La Ramée then felt the burden of his responsibility weighing on him – so when, as mentioned earlier, he was in search of some relief, he found it in the recommendation of Marshal Grammont’s steward that he take on an underling. He immediately brought up the idea with Sir de Chavigny, who said he had no objection provided the new subordinate suited him. We’ll spare our readers a detailed portrait of Grimaud, since if they remember him from the preceding works in this series, they’ll recall his estimable character that was unchanged except for being twenty years older. The years had made him only more taciturn and stoic – though, considering the role he was to enact, Athos had given him full permission to speak. But by then Grimaud had hardly said a word for a dozen years or more, and so prolonged a habit becomes second nature.

190 Grimaud assumes his Post

Grimaud brought all these fine qualities with him to his interview at the dungeon of Vincennes. Sir de Chavigny prided himself on having an infallible eye for character that if true would have been an argument for him really being the son of Cardinal Richelieu, as the persistent story had it. So, he carefully examined the applicant, noting with approval his narrowed eyebrows, thin lips, hooked nose, and sharp cheekbones, all of which recommended him. He addressed Grimaud with twelve words; Grimaud replied with four. “Here’s an able lad, or I’m no judge of men,” Chavigny said to himself. “Go report to Sir La Ramée, and if you satisfy him, you satisfy me.”

Grimaud turned on his heel and went to subject himself to the more rigorous inspection of La Ramée, who was all the more meticulous because he knew Sir de Chavigny was relying on him, so he needed to be able to rely on Grimaud. Grimaud had just the qualities one would look for in a subordinate officer, so, after a thousand questions that received monosyllabic answers, La Ramée, fascinated by the man’s austere economy of words, rubbed his hands in satisfaction and signed Grimaud on. “Orders?” asked Grimaud.

“They are these: never leave our sole prisoner alone, confiscate all sharp implements, and don’t let him signal to outsiders or speak at length with his guards.”

“That’s all?” asked Grimaud.

“That will do for the moment,” replied La Ramée. “New circumstances, if any, will bring new orders.”

“Good,” replied Grimaud.

And he went in to join the Duke Beaufort. The duke was trying to comb out his hair and beard that he’d been growing out wild and untamed, to dismay Mazarin with reports of his general deterioration – but a few days earlier he thought he’d recognised, from the walls of the keep, the carriage of the lovely Madam de Montbazon, whose memory was so dear to him, and the thought of her carried more weight than thoughts of Mazarin. In hopes of seeing her again he’d decided to groom himself and had asked for a leaden comb that had been granted him. Beaufort had asked for a leaden comb because, like all blonds, his beard was a bit red, and he darkened it by passing a lead comb through it. Grimaud came in, saw the comb the prince had just set down on a table, bowed politely, and took it. The duke looked at this strange intruder with astonishment as the newcomer put the comb into his pocket. “What the hell?” cried the duke, “What are you doing, you clown?”

For an answer, Grimaud just bowed a second time. “Are you a mute?” the duke shouted. Grimaud shook his head. “What are you, then? Answer, I command you!”

“Guard,” replied Grimaud.

“A guard!” cried the duke. “Great. The only thing my situation lacked was this sinister lout. Whoa! La Ramée! Anyone!”

At this call, La Ramée came running – but unfortunately for the prince, La Ramée, counting on Grimaud to take his place, had been already halfway across the courtyard, and had to climb, wheezing, back up to the cell. “What is it, my Prince?” he asked.

“Who is this bandit who comes in, takes my comb, and puts it in his pocket?” Beaufort demanded.

“This is one of your guards, My Lord. He has many fine qualities that I’m sure you’ll come to appreciate as much as Sir de Chavigny and I do.”

“But why did he take my comb?”

“In fact,” said La Ramée, “why did you take My Lord’s comb?”

Grimaud took the comb from his pocket, pressed its teeth into his finger, showed the marks it made, and said a single word: “Sharp.”

“That’s ... true,” said La Ramée.

“What does this animal say?” demanded the duke.

“By royal order, My Lord may have no sharp implements.”

“Ah cà?” said the duke. “Are you crazy, La Ramée? But you gave me this comb yourself.”

“And I was wrong to do so, My Lord, because it was in contravention of my orders.”

The duke glared furiously at Grimaud who gave the comb to La Ramée. “I think I’m going to hate this clown,” the prince murmured. Indeed, there are no neutral feelings in prison: everything, people or practices, are loved or hated, sometimes with reason but more often by instinct. Now, for the simple reason that Grimaud at first blush had pleased Chavigny and La Ramée, his virtues in the eyes of the governor and the officer had become vices to Beaufort, and hated by him. On his side, Grimaud didn’t want to drive the prisoner into a fury on the very first day – for his purposes he needed, not an outburst of temper but a good, reliable, ongoing hatred. So, he withdrew when the four guards came in with the prince’s dinner. Meanwhile, the prince was eagerly contriving a new joke: he’d asked for crawfish for lunch the following day and had spent this day building a cute little gallows in the middle of his room upon which to hang them. The red colour of the boiled crawfish would leave no doubt about the target of this allusion; he would thus have the pleasure of hanging the cardinal in effigy, while imagining he was hanging him in reality – and nobody could reasonably complain about the hanging of a crawfish. The day was spent in happy preparation for the execution. One returns to childhood when imprisoned, and Beaufort had become more juvenile than ever. On his usual walk, he collected two or three small branches destined to play a role in his comedy, and after much searching, found a piece of broken glass, a discovery that pleased him no end. When he returned to his room, he began unravelling the threads of his handkerchief. None of these details escaped the sharp eyes of Officer Grimaud. The next morning the little gallows was complete, and set up in the middle of the room, where Sir de Beaufort finished trimming its wooden legs with his shard of glass. La Ramée watched with the curiosity of a father who’s always on the lookout for a new toy for his children, while the four guards slumped idly nearby with the bored air that, then as now, is the principal hallmark of the professional soldier. Grimaud came in just as the prince put down his shard of glass, interrupting his work of miniature carpentry to tie his handkerchief-threads into a noose. He gave Grimaud a dirty look that showed he hadn’t forgiven him for the day before but he was so preoccupied with his current project he paid him no further attention. But when he’d finished tying a sailor’s knot in one end of his string and a noose in the other, and examined the dish of crawfish in order to choose the most majestic, he turned back to pick up his piece of glass – and the shard of glass was gone. “Who took my piece of glass?” huffed the prince. Grimaud made a sign to show that he had. “What? You again! And why did you take it?”

“Yes,” asked La Ramée, “why did you take His Highness’s piece of glass?”

Grimaud, who was holding the fragment of glass, passed his fingertip across its edge, and said, “Sharp.”

“He’s quite right, My Lord,” said La Ramée. “The devil! This lad’s as sharp as that glass.”

“Sir Grimaud,” said the prince, “I warn you, for your own good, keep well out of reach of my hands.”

Grimaud bowed and withdrew to the far side of the room. “Tut-tut, My Lord, I’ll do it,” said La Ramée. “I’ll finish trimming your little gallows with my knife.”

“You?” said the duke, laughing.

“Yes, me. Don’t you want it to be finished properly?”

"I do!" said the duke. "Go to it, my dear La Ramée. In fact, it will be even funnier if you do it."

La Ramée, though not quite sure what the duke meant by that remark, went to work with his knife, trimming the gallows' legs to a nicety. "There," said the duke. "Now, scoop out a little hole in the sand of the floor under it, while I fetch the victim."

La Ramée knelt and dug a shallow depression. Meanwhile, the prince fitted the noose around his crawfish. Then, with a laugh, he set it swinging. La Ramée also laughed heartily, without quite knowing why, and the guards joined in with the chorus. Only Grimaud failed to laugh. He approached La Ramée, pointed to the crimson crawfish twisting on its thread, and said, "Cardinal!"

"Hanged by His Highness the Duke Beaufort," declared the prince, laughing louder than ever, "with the aid and assistance of Master Jacques-Chrysostom La Ramée, Officer Royal!"

La Ramée cried out in terror, rushed to the gallows, smashed it to bits, and threw the pieces out the window. In a frenzy, he was about to do the same to the crawfish, when Grimaud snatched it from him. "Good food," he said, and put it in his pocket. This so delighted the duke that he almost forgave Grimaud for the part he'd played in the scene. But over the course of the day, as he reflected on his new guard's behaviour and the problems it had caused him, his hatred returned. The story of the cardinal-crawfish hanging spread rapidly, to La Ramée's dismay – it was the talk of everyone within the dungeon, and even outside it. Chavigny, who in his heart hated the cardinal, shared the story with two or three of his closest friends, and they told it everywhere in town. Thus, Sir de Beaufort got two or three happy days out of the affair. Meanwhile, the duke had noticed that one of his guards had an amiable demeanour, compared to which the dour Grimaud only displeased him all the more. One morning he took the man aside and was having a pleasant private conversation with him when Grimaud came in. He saw what was going on, and then, respectfully approaching the guard and the prince, he took the guard by the arm. "What do you want now?" the duke asked sharply.

Grimaud walked the guard four paces away and showed him the door. "Let's go," he said.

The guard obeyed. "Agh!" cried the duke. "You're insufferable! You'll pay for this."

Grimaud bowed politely. "I'll crack your bones, Sir Spy!" cried the exasperated prince.

Grimaud backed away, still bowing. "I'll strangle you with my own hands!" continued the duke.

Grimaud retreated further, bowing again. "And I'll do it," said the prince, "no later than now!" – thinking that if it was worth doing, it might as well be done quickly.

So, he reached out for Grimaud, who merely pushed the guard outside and shut the door behind him. He turned back around just as the prince's hands closed around his neck like two iron tongs. But instead of crying out or defending himself, he simply smiled, brought his index finger slowly to his lips, and said a single word: "Hush!"

It was so strange to see Grimaud gesture, smile, and speak, that His Highness stopped short, astonished. Grimaud took advantage of the moment to reach into his vest and draw out a small envelope that wafted a charming perfume that it retained despite its long residence in Grimaud's pocket, and which he presented to the duke without a word. The duke, more and more astonished, let go of Grimaud, took the note, and seemed to recognise the handwriting. "From Madam de Montbazon?" he gasped. Grimaud nodded. The duke quickly tore open the envelope, gaping in amazement, and read the following:

My dear Duke,
You can rely entirely on the brave fellow who brings you this, as he's the servant of a gentleman who's on our side, as proven by twenty years of loyalty. This fellow agreed to enter the service of your warden and be locked up with you in Vincennes to help you get ready for your escape that we're preparing now. Your time of deliverance approaches! Have patience and fortitude, and remember that, no matter how much time has passed, your friends and allies still stand by you.
Ever yours, your affectionate,
MARIE DE MONTBAZON
P.S.: I sign my full name, because it would be the height of vanity to think that, after five years, you'd still recognise my initials.

The duke stood stunned for a moment. What he'd sought for in vain for five years – an aide and ally – had fallen suddenly from heaven when he least expected it. He looked at Grimaud in astonishment, and then returned to his letter and read it again. "Oh! My dear Marie," he murmured, when he'd finished. "So that was her I saw passing in her carriage! And somehow, she still thinks of me after five years of separation! Morbleu! Who'd have thought to find in her the consistency of Astraea?" Then, turning to Grimaud: "And you, my good fellow – so you've agreed to help us?"

Grimaud nodded. "And that's why you're here?"

Grimaud nodded again. "And to think I wanted to strangle you!" the duke cried. Grimaud smiled reassuringly. "But wait," said the duke. And he reached into his pocket. "No one shall say that such devotion to the grandson of Henry IV shall go unrewarded."

The Duke Beaufort searched his pockets with the best of intentions – but one of the precautions taken at Vincennes was to leave the prisoners no money. Grimaud, however, seeing the duke's disappointment, took from his own pocket a purse full of gold and presented it to him. "This is what you're looking for," he said.

The duke opened the purse and went to pour its contents into Grimaud's hands but Grimaud shook his head. "Thank you, My Lord," he said, drawing back, "but I've been paid."

The duke was surprised yet again. He held out his hand; Grimaud leaned forward and kissed it respectfully. The courtly manners of Athos had rubbed off on Grimaud.

"And now," asked the duke, "what do we do next?"

"It's eleven in the morning," Grimaud replied. "My Lord will please arrange a game of tennis with La Ramée for two o'clock. During the game knock two or three balls over the parapet and off the walls."

"Well, what then?"

"Then, My Lord will approach the wall and call down to a man working in the dry-moat to return them."

"Understood," said the duke.

Grimaud's face showed relief and satisfaction; he spoke so infrequently that so much conversation was difficult for him. He began to take his leave. "Oh that!" said the duke. "Is there nothing I can give you?"

"My Lord can make me a promise."

"Whatever you ask."

"It's that, when we escape, allow me to always lead the way – first of all because if My Lord is caught, the worst that can happen is a return to prison, whereas if I'm caught, the best that can happen is I'll be hanged."

"That's only fair," said the duke. "I'll do just as you say – faith of a gentleman."

"Now," said Grimaud, "I have one more thing to ask of My Lord: that he shall continue to detest me as before."

"I'll try," said the duke.

There was a knock on the door.

The duke thrust the letter into his pocket and threw himself onto his bed. Everyone knew that was his retreat when lost in the depths of boredom. Grimaud went to open the door; it was La Ramée returning from having visited the cardinal, in the scene previously described. La Ramée looked around inquiringly but seeing only the expected antipathy between the prisoner and his guardian, he smiled in satisfaction. Then, turning to Grimaud, he said, "Good, my friend – well done. I just put in a good word for you where it counts, and I hope that soon you'll be getting some good news."

Grimaud bowed in a grateful manner, and withdrew, as he usually did when his superior came in. "Well, My Lord!" La Ramée said with a jolly laugh. "Are you still sulking around that poor fellow?"

"Ah, it's you, La Ramée," said the duke. "My faith, it's about time you arrived. I'd thrown myself on the bed and turned my nose to the wall so as not to yield to the temptation to strangle that wretch Grimaud."

"I hardly think it was because he said something to offend Your Highness," chuckled La Ramée, trying to make a joke out of his subordinate's habitual silence.

"For the love of God, I should think not! He's like some mute Eastern monk. But I'm glad you're back, La Ramée, for I'm eager to see you."

"My Lord is too good," said La Ramée, flattered by the compliment.

"You see," continued the duke, "I'm feeling especially stiff and clumsy today, and thought you should have a chance to take advantage of it."

"Then perhaps a game of tennis?" said La Ramée, taking the hint.

"If you would be so good."

"I am My Lord's humble servant."

"My dear La Ramée," said the duke, "you're a most congenial fellow, and I'd almost stay here in Vincennes just for the pleasure of your company."

"My Lord," said La Ramée, "I think that wish would be fulfilled, if it were up to the cardinal."

"What do you mean? Have you seen him recently?"

"He sent for me this morning."

"Really! Did you talk about me?"

"What do you think I would talk to him about? You know, My Lord, you're his worst nightmare."

The duke smiled bitterly. "Ah, if only you'd accept my offers, La Ramée!"

"My Lord, we can talk all you like but in the end I must disappoint you."

"La Ramée, I've told you, and I repeat it, that I can make your fortune."

"With what? The moment you escape from prison, all your property will be confiscated."

"The moment I escape from prison, I'll be the master of Paris."

"Hush, please! You know I can't listen to that kind of talk. That's a fine thing to say to an officer of the king! I can see I'm going to need another Grimaud."

"All right, then, we'll drop it. So, you had a talk with the cardinal! You know what, La Ramée? The next time he invites you for a visit, let me dress up in your clothes and go in your place. I'll strangle him, and then give up and meekly return to prison – faith of a gentleman!"

"My Lord, I can see that I must call for Grimaud."

"No, I'm done. So, what did he talk about, that liar?"

"I'll pretend I heard 'friar' and ignore that, My Lord," La Ramée said slyly. "What did he tell me? He told me to keep an eye on you."

"Keep an eye on me? Why?" asked the duke, anxiously.

"Because an astrologer has predicted that you'll escape."

"Really? An astrologer spoke of me?"

Superstitious, the duke shuddered in spite of himself. "My God, yes! But these wretched magicians only say such things to disturb people, you know – word of honour."

"And what did you say about this to His Illustrious Eminence?"

"That if the astrologer in question was selling almanacs of his predictions, I wouldn't advise him to buy one."

"Why?"

"Because the only way you could escape would be to change into a finch or a wren and fly away."

"Isn't that the unfortunate truth. Let's go play a game of tennis, La Ramée."

"My Lord, I beg Your Highness's pardon but I must ask for a half an hour's delay."

"Why's that?"

"Because, though his birth isn't nearly as good as Your Highness's, My Lord Mazarin is so proud that he didn't invite me to stay to lunch."

"Well, then! Would you like to join me for lunch?"

"Not this time, My Lord! I must tell you there's a baker named Père Marteau whose shop is just across from the castle..."

"So?"

"So last week he sold his bakery to a chef from Paris, one to whom the doctors, it seems, recommended he take country air."

"Well? What does that matter to me?"

"Listen, My Lord – this new baker had in front of his shop such delights as would make your mouth water."

“Oh, you glutton.”

“Eh? My God, My Lord,” replied La Ramée, “one isn’t a glutton just because one likes to eat well. It’s the nature of Man to seek perfection in all things, including pies. Now, this beggar of a baker, when he saw me browsing his stall, came out all covered in flour and said, ‘Sir La Ramée, you must help me find customers among the prisoners. I bought this establishment from my predecessor because he assured me that he supplied the château but upon my honour, in the week since I’ve been here Sir de Chavigny hasn’t purchased so much as a tartelette.’

‘Well,’ I told him, ‘probably Sir de Chavigny is afraid your pastry isn’t any good.’

‘My pastry, no good? Well, then, Sir La Ramée, you shall be the judge of that, and this very minute.’

‘I can’t,’ I said to him, ‘I have to get back to the dungeon.’

‘Well, go on about your business,’ he said, ‘as you seem to be in a hurry but come back in half an hour.’

‘In half an hour?’

‘Yes. Have you had lunch?’

‘My faith, no.’

‘Well, there’ll be a pie here waiting for you, along with a bottle of old Burgundy ...’ So, you see, My Lord, inasmuch as I’m starving, I would like with Your Highness’s permission...”

La Ramée bowed. “Go on, then, you animal,” said the duke, “but take note that I, too, give you only half an hour.”

“Can I promise your business to Père Marteau’s successor, My Lord?”

“Yes, so long as he doesn’t put mushrooms in his meat pies. For you know,” added the prince, “the mushrooms of Vincennes forest are fatal to my family.” La Ramée nodded, though he didn’t understand the prince’s allusion, and went out. Within five minutes the duty officer came in, on the pretext of paying his respects to the prince and keeping him company but actually in accordance with the orders of the cardinal, who, as we’ve seen, had commanded that the prisoner be kept under close watch. But during the five minutes he’d had alone, the duke had reread the letter from Madam de Montbazon that assured him his friends had not forgotten him and were planning his escape. How? That he didn’t know yet but he promised himself he’d find out from Grimaud, despite his habitual silence. He admired him all the more now that he understood his conduct and realised that all the little persecutions he’d inflicted on the duke were to persuade the other guards of his hostility. This ruse had given the duke a high opinion of Grimaud’s intellect, and he decided to trust in him completely.

191

What Was Hidden in the Pies of the Successor of Father Marteau

Half an hour later La Ramée returned, glowing with the good cheer of a man who’s both eaten well and drunk well. He had found the pie delicious and the honey excellent. The weather was perfect for a tennis party. The Vincennes tennis court was a “long palm” green, that is, open rather than enclosed, so it would be easy for the duke to do what Grimaud had proposed and send a few balls over the edge and down into the dry-moat. However, as two o’clock – the designated time – had yet to strike, the duke wasn’t too awkward at first. But he arranged to lose the first few games that allowed him to get angry and behave as we do when that happens, making mistake after mistake. Then, once two o’clock struck, the prince’s balls began to go over the side and into the moat – to the delight of La Ramée, who scored fifteen points with each fault. Soon enough balls had gone over that they had too few to continue. La Ramée proposed to send someone down to the moat to collect them but the duke nonchalantly observed that that would be a waste of time, and approached the rampsarts that were, as the officer had noted, over fifty feet high. Looking down, he saw a man working in the little gardens kept by the peasants on the far side of the moat. “Hey there, friend!” cried the duke.

The man looked up, and the duke suppressed a gasp of surprise. This peasant, this supposed gardener, was Rochefort, whom the prince thought was still in the Bastille. “Hey, up there,” the man called. “What can I do for you?”

“Be so kind as to throw back our tennis balls,” said the duke. The gardener nodded, scrambled down into the moat, and began to toss back the lost balls that were picked up by La Ramée and the guards. One fell right at the feet of the duke, and as it was obviously intended for him, he put that one in his pocket. And then, giving the gardener a grateful wave, he returned to his game. But the duke continued to have a bad day, and his balls went every which way, instead of confining themselves to the court; a few even went back into the moat but as the gardener had gone, those weren’t returned. The duke declared himself ashamed of his clumsiness and declined to continue. La Ramée was delighted at having won such a victory over a prince of the blood. The prince returned to his cell and went to bed that is what he did nearly every day since they’d taken away his books. La Ramée gathered up the prince’s discarded clothes under the pretext that they were dusty and could use a good brushing but actually to make sure the prince wouldn’t go anywhere. He was a cautious man, that La Ramée. Fortunately, the prince had had time to hide the tennis ball under his pillow. As soon as the door was closed, the duke tore open the ball’s outer covering, using his teeth since they’d taken away every sharp implement, except for silver knives that bent rather than cut. Under the skin of the ball was a letter that read as follows:

My Lord, your friends watch over you, and the time of your liberation draws near. Order a pie for the day after tomorrow from the new pastry chef who has purchased the bake shop, and who is none other than Noirmont, your steward. Be careful to open the pie only when you are alone. I think you’ll be pleased with what it contains. The ever-devoted servant of Your Highness, in the Bastille or out, Count ROCHEFORT

P.S.: Your Highness can rely on Grimaud for everything – he’s intelligent and utterly dedicated.

Beaufort, who’d been allowed to have a fire again since he’d given up painting, burned the letter – as he did, though more regretfully, with the letter from Madam Montabazon. He was going to do the same to the ball when it occurred to him that it might be useful for sending Rochefort a reply. He was alert that was just as well, because all this activity drew the attention of La Ramée, who came into the cell. “My Lord needs something?” he asked.

“I felt a chill,” replied the duke, “and lit a fire so I could warm up. The dungeons of Vincennes, you know, are renowned for their frigidity. We could keep ice in here, and even harvest saltpetre. As Madam de Rambouillet said, the cells where Puylaurens, Ornano, and my uncle the Grand Prior of Vendome died are worth their weight in arsenic.”

And the duke lay down again, covertly stuffing the ball under his pillow. La Ramée smiled sadly. He was a good man at heart, had become fond of his illustrious prisoner, and would have been sorry if anything unfortunate happened to him. And the terrible fates of the duke’s three predecessors were incontestable. “My Lord,” he said, “please don’t indulge in such thoughts. Ideas like those are far more fatal than saltpetre.”

“You, at least, are a charming fellow,” said the duke. “If I could eat pies and drink Burgundy, like you do, at the shop of Père Marteau’s successor, I’d be happier.”

“In fact, My Lord,” said La Ramée, “he stocks a proud honey, and his pastries should be famous.”

“It certainly wouldn’t be hard for his cellar and kitchen to be better than those of Sir de Chavigny,” said the duke.

“Well, My Lord,” said La Ramée, falling into the trap, “what prevents you from trying them? Besides, I promised you a sample.”

“You’re right,” said the duke. “If I have to stay here forever, as Mazarin was kind enough to let me hear he intends, I’ll need a distraction for my old age, and might as well become a gourmand.”

“My Lord,” said La Ramée, “take my advice, and don’t wait for old age to begin.”

“Good,” Beaufort said to himself. “Every man, to tempt his heart and soul from heavenly grace, must be susceptible to one of the seven deadly sins – if not two. It seems that La Ramée’s temptation is gluttony. We’ll take advantage of that.” Then, aloud: “Well, my dear La Ramée, shall we make a party of it then, the day after tomorrow?”

“Yes, My Lord – that’s the day of Pentecost.”

“Then will you read me a lesson on that day?”

“In what?”

“In gourmandising!”

“Willingly, My Lord.”

“But let’s make it a private lesson. We’ll send the guards to eat in Chavigny’s mess hall while we dine here, at your direction.”

“Hmmm!” said La Ramée. It was an attractive prospect – but La Ramée, who was as canny as the cardinal had surmised, was an old hand at spotting prisoners’ tricks. Beaufort had said he had forty ways to escape from prison – might not this tempting dinner be concealing one of them?

So, he thought about it for a moment but considered that as he would be ordering the food, honey, no powder would taint the food, and no drug could be mixed in the honey. As to getting him drunk, the duke ought to know better than that. And then an idea occurred to him that settled the matter. The duke had followed La Ramée’s internal monologue by the worried expression on his guardian’s face – but then that expression cleared. “Well,” asked the duke, “shall we do it?”

“Yes, My Lord – on one condition.”

“Which is?”

“That Grimaud shall serve at our table.”

Nothing could suit the prince better but he had enough self-control to frown and grimace. “To the devil with your Grimaud!” he cried. “He’ll spoil all our fun.”

“I’ll order him to stand behind Your Highness and not say a word, so that, with a little imagination, it will seem like he’s leagues away.”

“I see very clearly how it is,” said the duke. “You don’t trust me.”

“My Lord, the day after tomorrow is Pentecost.”

“Well, what’s that to me? Do you think the Holy Spirit is going to descend like a tongue of fire to blast open the doors of my prison?”

“No, My Lord – but I remember what that damned magician predicted.”

“What did he predict?”

“That Your Highness would be free from Vincennes by the day of Pentecost.”

“And you believe what such charlatans say? Folly!”

“Me, I care no more than this,” said La Ramée, snapping his fingers. “It’s My Lord Mazarin who cares – he’s an Italian, and superstitious.”

The duke shrugged. “Well,” he said, pretending to a resigned good humour, “I can accept your Grimaud, for the sake of the thing but nobody other than him. I put you in charge of everything: you order the entire dinner but it must include one of those divine meat pies you mentioned. You can tell Père Marteau’s successor that if he does well, he can depend on me as a customer for the rest of my stay in prison, and even after I’m released.”

“You still think you’re going to get out?” said La Ramée.

“Dame, yes!” replied the prince. “If only at the death of Mazarin, who’s fifteen years older than I. Though it’s true,” he added with a smile, “that in Vincennes we age faster than those outside.”

“My Lord,” said La Ramée, “consider your dinner ordered.”

“And do you think I’ll be an apt pupil?”

“If you’re willing to learn, My Lord,” replied La Ramée.

“And if you have enough time to teach me,” muttered the duke.

“What was that, My Lord?” asked La Ramée.

“My Lord says don’t spare the cardinal’s purse, since he seems determined to continue to board and lodge me.”

On his way out, La Ramée paused at the door. “Who should My Lord like me to send in?”

“Anyone you like, except that Grimaud.”

“The Officer of the Guard, then?”

“With his chessboard.”

“Done.”

And La Ramée went out. The Officer of the Guard came in, and five minutes later Beaufort seemed deeply engrossed in the sublime combinations that lead to checkmate. What a singular thing is the mind, and what profound alterations a sign, a word, or a hope can cause in it! The duke had been five years in prison but a look back made those five years, however slowly they’d passed, seem shorter than the forty-eight hours that now separated him from the time set for his escape. It was the details that worried him. How would this escape be effected? What would be hidden in the mysterious pie? Which friends were waiting for him? How could he still have allies after five years in prison?

It seemed he was a very privileged prince indeed. To his astonishment, it seemed that his former friends – and most extraordinarily, his mistress – still remembered him. It’s true she might not have been scrupulously faithful to him the entire time but she hadn’t forgotten him, and that was a lot. This was more than enough for the duke to think about, and even distracted him on the tennis court, and as La Ramée had schooled him before, the next time he schooled him again. But at least these defeats kept him busy, and soon enough it was evening, with only three hours to go until bed. Then the night would come, and with it sleep. Or so the duke thought. But sleep is a capricious deity that stays away just when it’s most devoutly desired. The duke was awake well into the middle of the night, tossing and turning on his mattress like Saint Lawrence on his martyr’s grille. Finally, he fell asleep. And then, before the arrival of day, he had fantastic dreams: he grew wings, and naturally wanted to fly, and at first his wings fully supported him. But when he reached a certain height, this support suddenly failed, his wings were broken, and he plummeted toward a bottomless abyss. He awoke in a sweat, trembling as if he really had tumbled from the sky. Then he fell asleep again to wander into a maze of dreams, each wilder than the last, and though his eyes were closed, his mind was turned toward a single goal: escape, always escape. He found an underground passage that would take him out of Vincennes, and followed it, Grimaud marching before him lantern in hand ... but gradually the passage narrowed, and though the duke persevered, it finally became so narrow he could go no farther, no matter how he tried to squeeze through. The walls seemed to close in and press on him, yet he could still see in the distance Grimaud with his lantern, who continued to walk forward, and though he tried to call for help, he was gripped so tightly he couldn’t utter a single word. Then, from behind him, he could hear the footsteps of his pursuers, growing ever closer, and he knew that if they caught him, he would never escape. The enveloping walls seemed in league with his enemies, holding him when he needed to flee. He heard the voice of La Ramée, and then saw him, laughing, stretching out a hand to shake his shoulder, awakening him in the low, vaulted room where Marshal Ornano, and Puylaurens, and his uncle Vendome had all perished. There, in the floor, were their three graves, with a fourth yawning open, awaiting his own corpse. That woke him, and thereafter the duke tried as hard to stay awake as he had to fall asleep, so that when La Ramée entered in the morning, he found him so pale and tired that he asked if he were sick. “Indeed,” said one of the guards who had stayed in the prince’s room but had been unable to sleep due to a toothache, “My Lord had a restless night, and in his dreams called out for help two or three times.”

“What’s wrong, My Lord?” asked La Ramée.

“What’s wrong, fool,” said the duke, “is that all your silly talk about escape turned my brain, so that I dreamed about escaping, only in doing so I fell and broke my neck.”

La Ramée laughed. “You see, My Lord,” he said, “this is a warning from heaven, and I hope My Lord will never be so reckless as to act out his dream.”

“You’re right, my dear La Ramée,” said the duke, wiping the sweat from his brow. “From now on, I’ll dream of nothing but food and drink.”

“Hush!” said La Ramée.

He then sent the guards away, one by one, on various pretexts, until they were alone. “Well?” asked the duke.

“Well!” said La Ramée. “Your dinner’s been ordered.”

“Ah!” said the prince. “And what will it consist of, Sir Major-domo?”

“My Lord promised to trust me on that.”

“Will there be a pie?”

“As tall as a tower!”

“Baked by Père Marteau’s successor?”

“It’s all arranged.”

“And you told him it was for me?”

“I told him.”

“What did he say?”

“That he would do his best to please Your Highness.”

“The time is coming!” said the duke, rubbing his hands.

“Plague, My Lord!” said La Ramée. “You are tending toward gluttony! In five years, I haven’t seen you look as cheerful as you do now.”

The duke saw he’d been careless – but suddenly, as if he’d been listening at the door and realised it was time for a diversion, Grimaud came in and gestured to La Ramée that he had something to tell him. La Ramée approached Grimaud, who spoke to him in a low voice. This gave the duke time to get hold of himself. “I have forbidden this man,” he said, “to come in here without my permission.”

“My Lord,” said La Ramée, “you must forgive him, as I’m the one who summoned him.”

“And why did you do that, since you know it displeases me?”

“My Lord should remember what we agreed about who will serve us this famous dinner,” said La Ramée. “Did my Lord forget about the dinner?”

“No but I’d forgotten about Sir Grimaud.”

“My Lord knows that we can’t have the dinner without him.”

“Very well, do as you please.”

“Come here, boy,” said La Ramée, “and listen to what I have to tell you.” Grimaud approached, wearing his most sullen expression. La Ramée continued, “My Lord does me the honour of dining in private with him tomorrow.”

Grimaud made a gesture to indicate he didn’t see what that had to do with him. “It does, in fact, have to do with you,” said La Ramée, “as you will have the honour of serving us – and no matter how hungry and thirsty we may be, afterward there’s bound to be something left in the dishes and bottles for you.”

Grimaud bowed gratefully. “And now, My Lord,” said La Ramée, “I must beg Your Highness’s pardon but it seems Sir de Chavigny is going away for a few days, and before leaving he has some orders to give me.”

The duke tried to catch Grimaud’s eye but Grimaud might as well have been blind. “Then go,” the duke said to La Ramée, “but come back as soon as you can.”

“My Lord wants to get revenge for yesterday’s game of tennis?”

Grimaud gave a near-imperceptible nod. “Yes,” said the duke, “and beware, my dear La Ramée, for one day is not like another, and I’ve decided to play to win.”

La Ramée went out; Grimaud watched him without so much as moving a muscle; then, when he saw the door was closed, he quickly drew a pencil and sheet of paper from his pocket. “Write, My Lord,” he said.

“And what should I write?”

Grimaud pointed a finger and dictated: “‘Everything is ready for tomorrow night. Be on watch from seven o’clock till nine and have two horses ready; we’ll come down from over the first window of the gallery.’”

“And what else?”

“What else, My Lord?” said Grimaud, surprised. “After that, sign it.”

“And that’s it?”

“What more needs to be said, My Lord?” said Grimaud who was concise to the point of austerity.

The duke signed it. “Now,” said Grimaud, “does My Lord still have the ball?”

“What ball?”

“The one that contained the letter.”

“Ah, yes – I thought it might come in handy. Here it is.”

And the duke took the ball from under his pillow and gave it to Grimaud. Grimaud smiled as pleasantly as he could. “Well?” asked the duke.

“Well, My Lord,” said Grimaud, “I’ll sew this letter up into the ball, and then, when playing tennis, you’ll send the ball over into the dry-moat.”

“But mightn’t it be lost?”

“Rest assured, My Lord, someone will be there to pick it up.”

“A gardener?” asked the duke. Grimaud nodded. “The same one as before?” Grimaud nodded again. “The Count Rochefort then?” Grimaud nodded a third time. “But see here,” said the duke, “give me at least some details on how we’re going to escape.”

“I’m not allowed to say,” Grimaud replied, “before the time comes.”

“Who will be waiting for me on the other side of the moat?”

“I don’t know, My Lord.”

“But at least tell me what’s going to be in this famous pie, or I’m going to go mad.”

“My Lord,” said Grimaud, “it will contain two poniards, a rope ladder, and a choke-pear.”

“Well ... now I understand.”

“My Lord will see that they’ve thought of everything.”

“We will take the poniards and the rope,” said the duke.

“And we’ll feed the choke-pear to La Ramée,” said Grimaud.

“My dear Grimaud,” said the duke, “you don’t speak often but to be fair, when you do, you speak words of gold.”

Around the same time these escape plans were being hatched between the Duke Beaufort and Grimaud, two men on horseback, followed by a pair of lackeys, entered Paris by the Rue du Faubourg Saint-Marcel. These two men were the Count of La Fère and the Viscount of Bragelonne. It was the first time the young man had come to Paris. The capital was an old friend to Athos but he wasn’t showing it off to best advantage by bringing Raoul in by that route. Indeed, the ugliest village in the Touraine was better looking than Paris when entered from the direction of Blois. So, it must be said, to the shame of the great city, that it made a poor first impression on the young man. Athos was nonchalant and serene, as always. Arriving in the Saint-Médard district, the count, who served as his companion’s guide through the great maze, took the Rue des Postes to l’Estrapade, the Fossés Saint-Michel, and finally Vaugirard. At the corner of the Rue Férou, they turned down that short street. In the middle of the block, Athos looked up, smiling, and pointed out a common row house to the young man. “There, Raoul,” he said, “is a house where I passed seven of the sweetest – and cruellest – years of my life.”

The young man smiled back and gave the house a respectful salute. The admiration he had for his guardian showed itself in everything he did. As for Athos, Raoul was not only the centre of his life but other than his memories of his old regiment, the single object of his affection, so deep and profound was the count’s love for him. The travellers stopped in the Rue du Vieux-Colombier at the sign of the Green Fox. Athos was an old customer of this inn, having gone there a hundred times with his friends but twenty years had made many changes in the establishment, starting with the hosts. The travellers turned their horses over to the stable boys, and as they were animals of a noble race, they ordered the steeds be treated with the greatest of care: fed with the finest straw and oats, after which their chests and legs were to be rubbed down with warm honey. After all, they’d ridden twenty leagues that day. Having first attended to their mounts, as all true equestrians must, they then asked for two rooms for themselves. “Wash up and dress to look your best, Raoul,” said Athos. “I’m going to present you to someone.”

“Today, Sir?” asked the young man.

“In half an hour.”

The young man bowed. More tired than Athos, who seemed a man of iron, he might have preferred a dip in that River Seine of which he’d heard so much, though he was certain it couldn’t compare to his Loire, followed by a fall into bed – but the Count of La Fère had spoken, so his only thought was to obey. “Be thorough, Raoul,” added Athos. “I would like you to look handsome.”

“I hope, Sir,” said the young man with a smile, “that you’re not introducing me to a prospective bride. You know my commitments to Louise.”

Athos smiled back. “No, don’t worry,” he said, “though I am presenting you to a lady.”

“A lady?” asked Raoul.

“Yes, and I hope you’ll like her.”

The young man looked uneasily at the count but seeing Athos’s smile he was reassured. “And how old is she?” asked the Viscount of Bragelonne.

“My dear Raoul, learn once and for all that that is a question you never ask,” said Athos. “If you can tell a lady’s age from her face, there’s no point in asking, and if you can’t, to ask is indiscreet.”

“Is she beautiful?”

“Sixteen years ago, she was considered not only the prettiest but the most graceful woman in France.”

This response completely reassured the viscount. Athos couldn’t have any intentions for him toward a woman considered the prettiest and most graceful in France in the year before he was born. He retired to his room, and with the vanity that comes with youth, applied himself to Athos’s instructions to look as well as he could. With what nature had given him, this was no hard thing. When he returned, Athos received him with that fatherly smile he used to bestow on d’Artagnan but which was now reserved for Raoul with an even deeper tenderness. Athos inspected his feet, hands, and hair, those three signs of class. His black hair was parted and long, as was worn at the time, and fell in curls framing his tanned face. Grey suede gloves that matched his hat covered his fine and elegant hands, while his boots that matched both hat and gloves, were tapered and as petite as those of a child of ten. “Well,” he murmured, “if she’s not proud of him, she’s a hard woman to please.”

It was three in the afternoon, a suitable time to pay a visit. The two travellers followed the Rue de Grenelle to the Rue des Rosiers, turned onto Rue Saint-Dominique, and stopped at a majestic mansion facing the Jacobins, its gate surmounted by the arms of de Luynes. “This is it,” said Athos. He entered the hôtel with the assurance that persuaded the Swiss Guard that he had the right to do so. He climbed the main staircase and addressing a footman in full livery, asked if the Duchess de Chevreuse was receiving and if so, would she receive the Count of La Fère?

The servant returned a moment later and said that, though the Duchess de Chevreuse did not have the honour of knowing the Count of La Fère, she invited him to please come in. Athos followed the footman, who led him through a long series of apartments to a parlour, where he stopped before a closed door. Athos gestured to the Viscount of Bragelonne to wait where he was. The footman opened the door and announced the Count of La Fère. Madam de Chevreuse, so often mentioned in The Three Musketeers without actually having been brought on stage, was still a very beautiful woman. Indeed, though she was at this time forty-four or forty-five, she seemed still in the prime of her thirties, with lovely blond hair, and large, bright, intelligent eyes that had so often been opened in intrigue and closed in love. She retained her nymph-like figure, and from behind still seemed to be the young woman of 1623 who had jumped the moat of the Tuileries with Anne of Austria, a folly that had deprived the crown of an heir. In most ways, she was still the same wild creature who’d thrown herself into love affairs with such passion and originality that it became a hallmark of her descendants. She was in a little boudoir with a window overlooking a garden. This room, decorated in the mode made fashionable by Madam de Rambouillet in her famous hôtel, was hung in blue damask with pink flowers and golden trim. It was daring for a lady of the duchess’s age to receive visitors in such a boudoir, especially in her current posture, stretched out on a chaise longue with her head against the tapestry. She was holding a book half-open, her arm resting on a cushion. At the footman’s announcement, she rose on one arm and cocked her head curiously. Athos appeared. He was dressed in dark purple velvet with similar trim, embellished with silver aiguillettes. His simple cloak bore no gold trim, and a single violet feather adorned his black felt hat. He wore tall boots of black leather, and at his belt hung that sword with a magnificent hilt so often admired by Porthos when Athos lived in Rue Férou but which he’d never consented to lend to him. Splendid white lace erupted from the collar of his shirt and bedecked the tops of his boots. There was in this man, though completely unknown to Madam de Chevreuse, such an air of high nobility, that she half rose and graciously beckoned him to take a seat beside her. Athos bowed and obeyed. The footman was about to withdraw but Athos made a gesture that restrained him. “Madam,” he said to the duchess, “I had the audacity to present myself at your hôtel without having been introduced to you – successfully, since you deigned to receive me. I now ask the favour of a half hour’s interview.”

“Granted, Sir,” said the duchess with her most gracious smile.

“But that’s not all, Madam. It’s presumptuous, I know but I further request that our interview be a private one, as I keenly desire not to be interrupted.”

“I am at home to no one,” the duchess told the footman. “You may go.” The footman went out. There was a moment of silence, during which these two embodiments of the nobility sized each other up, without embarrassment on either side. The duchess was the first to break the silence. “Well, Sir,” she said with a smile, “can’t you see I await you with impatience?”

“While I, Madam,” replied Athos, “regard you with admiration.”

“Sir,” said the duchess, “you must excuse me but I long to learn with whom I’m speaking. You have the undeniable air of a courtier, yet I’ve never seen you at Court. Have you been in the Bastille, and just been released?”

“No, Madam,” Athos replied with a smile, “though I may be on my way there.”

“Ah! In that case, introduce yourself quickly, and then go away,” the duchess said playfully, in a charming tone. “I am already quite compromised enough without you making it worse.”

“Who am I, Madam? They announced my name: the Count of La Fère, a name unknown to you. I once bore another that you might have heard, though you’ve certainly forgotten it by now.”

“Tell me, Sir.”

“In former times,” said the Count of La Fère, “I was known as Athos.”

The duchess’s eyes widened in astonishment. It was obvious that name still meant something to her, though it wasn’t clear what. “Athos?” she said. “Wait, wait …!”

She pressed both hands to her forehead as if to marshal in her memories a colourful crowd of people and events. “Shall I give you a hint, Madam?” smiled Athos.

“But yes,” said the duchess, head in a whirl, “please do.”

“This Athos was affiliated with three young King’s Musketeers who went by the names of d’Artagnan, Porthos, and…”

Athos paused. “And Aramis,” gasped the duchess.

“And Aramis, that’s it,” said Athos. “So, you haven’t quite forgotten his name?”

“No,” she said, “no, my poor Aramis! Such a lovely gentleman – elegant, discreet, a writer of pretty verses. I think he turned out badly,” she added.

“Very badly: he became an abbot.”

“Ah! What a shame!” said the duchess, flipping her fan carelessly, “My thanks, sir, truly.”

“For what, Madam?”

“For reviving that memory, a pleasant recollection of my youth.”

“Will you permit me, then,” said Athos, “to revive another one?”

“Is it connected with the former?”

“Yes … and no.”

“Well, my faith,” said Madam de Chevreuse, “for a man like you I’d risk anything.”

Athos bowed. “Aramis,” he continued, “was connected with a young seamstress of Tours.”

“A young seamstress of Tours?”

“Yes, a sort of cousin of his, called Marie Michon.”

“Ah, I recall her,” said the duchess. “During the Siege of La Rochelle, she was the one who wrote to try to foil that plot against poor Buckingham.”

“Exactly,” said Athos. “Will you allow me to speak of her?”

Madam de Chevreuse gave Athos a long look. “Yes,” she said, “so long as you don’t speak ill of her.”

“That would make me an ingrate,” said Athos, “and I regard ingratitude not as a fault or a crime but as a sin that is far worse.”

“You, ungrateful to Marie Michon, Sir?” said the duchess, trying to read Athos’s eyes. “But how could that be? You never knew her personally.”

“Eh, Madam! Who knows?” said Athos. “There’s a proverb that says it’s only mountains that never meet, and proverbs are often based in truth.”

“Then go on, Sir, go on!” the duchess said brightly. “You can’t imagine how diverting this all is.”

“Since you encourage me,” said Athos, “I will continue. This cousin of Aramis, this Marie Michon, despite her modest rank, had knowledge of the highest degree, and called the grandest ladies of the Court her friends. Even the queen, proud though she is, in her dual capacity of Austrian and Spaniard – even she called her sister.”

“Alas,” said Madam de Chevreuse, with a tiny sigh and a twitch of her eyebrows, “things are much changed since that time.”

“But at that time the queen was in the right,” continued Athos, “for this seamstress was devoted to her, so much so that she served as an intermediary with the queen’s brother, the King of Spain.”

“An act that nowadays,” said the duchess, “is considered treason.”

“And so,” continued Athos, “the cardinal – the true cardinal – resolved one morning to arrest poor Marie Michon and confine her in the Château de Loches. Fortunately, such an act could not be prepared entirely in secrecy, and in any event, Marie Michon was ready: if she was ever menaced with real danger, the queen was to send her a prayer-book bound in green velvet.”

“Quite so, Sir! You are well informed.”

“One morning that green-bound book was brought to her by the Prince de Marillac. There was no time to lose. Fortunately, Marie Michon and a servant of hers, named Kitty, looked extremely well when dressed in men’s clothes. The prince brought Marie Michon a cavalier’s ensemble, and a lackey’s outfit for Kitty, as well as two excellent horses. Quickly, the two fugitives left Tours, headed for Spain – travelling by back roads to avoid the highways, starting at every sound, and begging for hospitality wherever they couldn’t find an inn.”

“In truth, that’s just how it happened!” cried the duchess, clapping her hands together. “But it’s very curious…”

She paused. “I need not follow the fugitives to the end of their journey,” said Athos. “No, Madam, for my tale I need take them only as far as a town in Limousine between Tulle and Angouleme, a little village called Roche-l’Abeille.”

Madam de Chevreuse gasped in surprise and looked at Athos with an expression of such astonishment that it made the old musketeer smile. “Hear me, Madam,” he continued, “for what I have yet to say is even stranger than what has gone before.”

“Sir,” said the duchess, “I think you must be a sorcerer. I’ll listen but in truth … never mind. Go on.”

“The ride that day had been long and tiring; it was October eleventh, getting cold, the village had neither inn nor château, and the peasants’ houses looked poor and dirty. Marie Michon had the tastes of the highborn, she was accustomed to fine linen and clean lodging, so she decided to ask for hospitality from the village priest.”

Athos paused. “Oh, continue!” said the duchess. “I warn you that now I expect to hear everything.”

“The travellers knocked at the door; it was late; the priest, already in bed, called out for them to enter. They found the door unlocked and opened it – they don’t lock their doors out in the villages. A lamp was burning in the priest’s house. Marie Michon, the most charming cavalier in the world, opened the door, put in her head, and requested hospitality for the night. ‘Willingly, my young cavalier,’ said the priest. ‘You can have half the bedchamber and whatever’s left of my supper.’ The two travellers consulted for a moment; the priest heard them laugh, and then the master – or rather the mistress – replied, ‘Thank you, Sir Curate, we accept.’

‘Then come in,’ he said, ‘eat up, and make as little noise as you can, because I also travelled all day and won’t be sorry to get a good night’s sleep.’”

Madam de Chevreuse went from surprise to astonishment and on to stupefaction, gaping at Athos, who wore an expression impossible to describe; she seemed to want to say something but held her tongue, for fear of missing a single word. Finally, she said, “And … after?”

“After?” said Athos. “Ah! That’s the hardest part to tell.”

“Tell it! Tell it! I’m the kind of person you can say anything to. Besides, it’s not about me, it’s about this Miss Michon.”

“Ah! Just so,” said Athos. “Well! Marie Michon had supper with her servant, and afterward, in accordance with the permission she’d been granted, she went into her host’s bedroom, while Kitty made herself comfortable on a chair in the room where they’d eaten.”

“Really, Sir,” said Madam de Chevreuse, “unless you’re the Devil himself, I don’t know how you can know all these details.”

“She was a charming woman, Marie Michon,” said Athos, “one of those wild creatures that recognises no limits, a being born to damn those of us who do. It occurred to her that, since her host was a priest, it would be amusing to give him a happy memory to cherish in his old age – and on her part, she would have the droll recollection of having tempted a curate to perdition.”

“Count,” said the duchess, “on my word of honour, you give me chills.”

“Alas for the chastity of the poor curate, he was no St. Ambrose,” said Athos, “and as I said, Marie Michon was an adorable creature.”

“Sir,” cried the duchess, seizing Athos’s hands, “tell me immediately how you come to know all these details, or I will call for a monk from the Augustinian convent and have you exorcised!”

Athos laughed. “It’s easily explained, Madam. A cavalier, himself charged with an important mission, had stopped at the rectory just an hour earlier to beg hospitality of the priest, who had just been called away to attend to a dying congregant, leaving his house and village overnight. The man of God, who trusted his guest, as he was clearly a gentleman, had left him his house, dinner, and bed. So, it was this guest of the curate whom Marie Michon had asked for hospitality.”

“And this cavalier, this guest, this gentleman who came before was…?”

"Myself, the Count of La Fère," said Athos, rising and bowing respectfully to the duchess. The duchess was stunned for a moment, and then burst into laughter. "Oh, my faith!" she said. "That's hilarious! For once, little Marie Michon got more than she expected. Sit down, dear Count, and finish your story."

"Now I become the villain of the piece, Madam. As I told you, I was travelling on an important mission; early the next morning I silently left the bedroom, leaving my charming companion asleep. In the front room her servant rested her head in an armchair, still slumbering like her mistress. I was struck by her pretty face; I approached and recognised her as that little Kitty whom our friend Aramis had found a place for. Then I realised the charming cavalier must be..."

"Marie Michon!" the duchess quickly interrupted.

"...Marie Michon," said Athos. "So, I left the house and went to the barn, where I found my horse saddled and my lackey ready, and we rode away."

"And you never returned to this village?" asked Madam de Chevreuse pointedly.

"I did, Madam – a year later."

"Well?"

"Well! I stopped to visit that good curate. I found him very concerned about something that greatly mystified him. A week before he'd been left a small cradle bearing a charming little boy three months old, along with a purse of gold and a note that said only: 11 October 1633."

"That was the date of this strange adventure," said Madam de Chevreuse.

"Yes but that told the curate nothing, other than reminding him he'd spent that night with a dying congregant, for Marie Michon had left the rectory before he returned."

"You should know, Sir, that when Marie Michon returned to France in 1643, she sought news of this child that, as a fugitive, she hadn't been able to keep – but which, finally having returned to Paris, she wanted to raise as her own."

"And what did the curate say?" asked Athos.

"That a nobleman he didn't know had volunteered to raise the child, had guaranteed his future, and taken him when he went."

"And that was true."

"Ah, I understand now! You were that nobleman – you are his father!"

"Hush! Not so loud, Madam – he's waiting outside."

"He's here!" cried Madam de Chevreuse, jumping up eagerly. "He's here, my son – I mean the son of Marie Michon – here! I must see him this instant!"

"Take care, Madam," Athos interrupted. "He knows the identity of neither his father nor his mother."

"You kept the secret, and then you brought him to me, thinking how happy I'd be. Oh! Thank you, Sir! Thank you!" cried the duchess, seizing his hand and carrying it to her lips. "Thank you! You have a noble heart."

"I brought him to you," said Athos, gently withdrawing his hand, "so that you in your turn can do something for him, Madam. So far, I've watched over his education, and I think I've made a proper gentleman of him – but the time has come when I'm forced to take up arms again and resume the dangerous career of partisan. Tomorrow I join an adventurous exploit in which I may be killed – and then he will no longer be able to depend on me to see that he finds his proper place in the world."

"Rest easy as to that!" said the duchess. "Unfortunately, I don't have much political leverage at the moment but what I have is at his disposal. As to his title and fortune..."

"I have provided for that, Madam, never fear; I've given him the domain of Bragelonne as inheritance that grants him the title of viscount and an income of ten thousand livres."

"Upon my soul, Sir," said the duchess, "you are a true gentleman! But I'm eager to see our young viscount. Where is he?"

"Outside, in the parlour; I'll bring him in, if you wish."

Athos started toward the door but Madam de Chevreuse stopped him. "Is he handsome?" she asked.

Athos smiled. "He resembles his mother," he said. Then he opened the door and beckoned to the young man, who appeared in the doorway. Madam de Chevreuse couldn't contain her cry of joy at the sight of such a charming young cavalier, who exceeded all the expectations even her pride had conceived. "Come in, Viscount," said Athos. "Madam Duchess de Chevreuse permits you to kiss her hand."

The young man approached with uncovered head and a shy smile, dropped to one knee, and kissed the hand of the duchess. "Sir Count," he said, turning to Athos, "were you hoping not to unnerve me by telling me madam was a duchess? Surely this is the queen!"

"No, Viscount," said Madam de Chevreuse, taking his hand in turn and making him sit beside her, and then looking at him with eyes sparkling with joy. "No, unfortunately, I'm not the queen – for if I were, I'd be able to give you what you deserve right away. But never mind, such as I am, I'll do what I can. Now," she added, scarcely able to keep from embracing him, "what career do you hope to pursue?"

Athos, still standing, regarded them both with an expression of unspeakable happiness. "Well, Madam," said the young man, in a voice both sweet and resonant, "it seems to me the only career for a gentleman is that of arms. Sir Count raised me, I believe, with the intention that I'd be a soldier, and allowed me to hope that in Paris he would introduce me to someone who could give me a recommendation, perhaps even to the Prince de Condé."

"Yes, I understand, and it would become a young soldier like you to serve under a general like him but I don't stand very well with the prince, thanks to the way my stepmother, Madam de Montbazon, has quarrelled with his sister Madam de Longueville ... but maybe the Prince de Marillac – yes! See here, Count, that's it! The Prince de Marillac is an old friend of mine; he will recommend our young soldier to Madam de Longueville, who will give him a letter for her brother Condé. He loves her too tenderly not to grant everything she asks for."

"Excellent! That would be marvellous," said the count. "Only dare I request it be done with dispatch? I have reasons for wishing the viscount gone from Paris by tomorrow night."

"Do you wish it known this is done at your behest, Count?"

"It might be best for the time being if his name were not connected with mine."

"Oh, Sir!" cried the young man.

"You know, Bragelonne," said the count, "that I never do anything without a reason."

"Yes, Sir," replied the young man. "I know how wise you are, and I'll obey you as I always do."

"Well, then, Count, allow me," said the duchess. "I'll send for the Prince de Marillac, who fortunately is in Paris right now, and I won't give up until the matter is accomplished."

"Very good, Madam Duchess – a thousand thanks. I myself have several errands to run today, and upon my return at about, say, six o'clock, I'll expect to meet the viscount at our lodgings."

"What are your plans for the evening?"

"We go to visit the Abbot Scarron,* for whom I have a letter, and where I expect to meet a friend of mine."

"Very well," said the duchess. "This will take only a moment, so don't leave my parlour until I return."

Athos bowed to Madam de Chevreuse and prepared to leave the room. "Really, Sir Count?" laughed the duchess. "Are we so formal in leaving our old friends?"

"Ah!" murmured Athos, kissing her hand. "If I'd only known sooner that Marie Michon was such a charming creature ...!" And he withdrew with a sigh.

193
The Abbot Scarron

There was, in the Rue des Tournelles, an address known to all the coachmen and sedan-chair porters of Paris – and yet that address was the home of neither a nobleman nor a banker. No one went there to dine, to play cards, or to dance. Nonetheless, it was a magnet for all the high society of Paris. This was the house of little Abbot Scarron. There, at the house of this witty abbot, everyone went to laugh and to talk. There, everyone heard the latest news, and that news was instantly recounted, dissected, analysed, and turned into epigrams or satirical verse. Everyone wanted to spend an evening's hour with little Scarron, to hear what was being said, and what he had to say about it. Everyone longed to get in a word or two of their own – and if those words were clever, they were welcome. This little Abbot Scarron – who was an abbot because he possessed an abbacy, not because he'd actually taken orders – had once been one of the most fashionable clerics of Le Mans, where he'd resided. One day during Carnival, he'd wanted to bless his city with a jest they'd always remember, so he'd had his valet coat him in honey, and then, having torn open his feather bed, he'd rolled in it, becoming hilariously grotesque. He then went from door to door, visiting all his friends in this bizarre attire; the citizens were first amazed, and then offended; people insulted him, children threw stones, and he was forced to flee to escape the attacks. As soon as he fled, everyone pursued; reviled, harried, and hunted on all sides, Scarron had had no recourse but to jump into the river to escape. He swam like a fish but the water was icy cold, and when he finally pulled himself out of it, his limbs were crippled for life. Every known means had been tried to restore the use of his limbs but he suffered so much pain from the treatments he'd dismissed his doctors, saying he preferred the malady. He relocated to Paris, where his reputation for wit was already established. There he had made an elaborate wheelchair of his own invention – and one day, in that chair, he visited Queen Anne of Austria, and the regent, charmed by his wit and wisdom, asked if she could grant him a title.

"Yes, your Majesty," Scarron had replied, "in that regard I have a singular ambition."

"And what is that?" asked Anne of Austria.

"To be known as your patient," replied the Abbot.

And thereafter Scarron had been appointed "The Queen's Patient," with an annual income of fifteen hundred livres.

From that moment Scarron, with no fears for the future, had led a joyous life on his carefully spent salary. One day, however, an emissary from Cardinal Mazarin had called to tell him that it was a mistake for him to receive the coadjutor, Sir de Gondy, at his salon. "And why is that?" Scarron had asked. "Isn't he a man of good birth?"

"Indeed, for the love of God!"

"Congenial?"

"Undoubtedly."

"Spiritual?"

"He might, unfortunately, show a bit too much spirit."

"Even so," said Scarron, "why do you want me to stop receiving such a man?"

"Because he has improper ideas."

"Really? And who says so?"

"The cardinal."

"What?" said Scarron. "I should continue to receive Sir Gilles Despréaux, who doesn't like me but I should stop receiving Sir Coadjuteur because someone else doesn't like him? Impossible!"

The conversation ended there, and Scarron, a contrarian at heart, had invited Sir de Gondy to visit as often as he liked. On the morning of the day at which we've arrived that was the first day of the new trimester, Scarron had sent his servant with his invoice to collect his salary for the quarter according to his custom – but his servant had been told, "The State's no more money for Sir Abbot Scarron."

When the servant brought this reply to Scarron, he was being visited by the Duke Longueville who offered to give him twice the salary that Mazarin had denied him but Scarron was too clever to accept it. Instead he made sure that, by four o'clock that afternoon, the entire city knew of the cardinal's refusal. As it was Thursday, the day the abbot received everyone, crowds of well-wishers came from across the city, all reviling the name of the cardinal. In the Rue Saint-Honoré Athos encountered two gentlemen he didn't know, on horseback and followed by lackeys just as he was, and headed in the same direction. One of them took his hat in his hand and said, "Can you believe, Sir, this cowardly Mazarin has cut off poor Scarron's pension?"

"That is absurd," said Athos, bowing to both cavaliers.

"We see you are an honest man, Sir," replied the gentleman who had spoken to Athos, "while this Mazarin is a living plague."

"Alas, Sir," replied Athos, "take care whom you say that to."

And they bowed and separated. "This event is well-timed for our visit this evening," Athos said to the viscount. "We will pay our compliments to this poor fellow."

"But who is this Sir Scarron who puts all Paris in an uproar?" asked Raoul. "Is he some disgraced minister?"

"My God, no, Viscount," replied Athos, "he's just a petty gentleman of wit and spirit who's made an enemy of the cardinal by writing some verses about him."

"Do gentlemen write verses?" Raoul asked naïvely. "I thought that was beneath them."

"It is, my dear Viscount," Athos replied, laughing, "when they write bad ones – but when they're good, it enhances them. Look at Sir Rotrou. However," continued Athos, in the tone of one who gives good advice, "on the whole I think it's better not to do it."

"But then," asked Raoul, "is this Sir Scarron a poet?"

"He is, Viscount, so beware what you say in his house – or better yet, confine yourself to nods, or just listen."

"Yes, Sir," Raoul replied.

"You'll see me talking quite a bit with a gentleman who's a friend of mine, the Abbot d'Herblay, about whom you've heard me speak."

"I remember, Sir."

"Approach us sometimes as if to speak to us but say nothing – and likewise, do not listen. This ruse will keep intruders from bothering us."

"Very well, Sir, I'll obey you to the letter."

Athos made two stops in Paris, then at seven turned them toward the Rue des Tournelles. The street was crowded with porters, horses, and footmen. Athos made his way through the press to the house that was his goal and entered, followed by the young man. Upon gaining the interior, the first person he noticed was Aramis, loitering near a unique wheelchair, wide and covered with a tapestry canopy, under which, fidgeting and wrapped in an embroidered blanket, was a small figure: a person young and cheerful, yet pale and weak but whose active eyes were lively, clever, and gracious. This was the Abbot Scarron, ever laughing, joking, complimenting, wincing with pain, and massaging his limbs with a little rod. Around this sort of rolling pavilion clustered a crowd of gentlemen and ladies. The room was well and simply furnished; fine curtains of silk embroidered with flowers, their bright colours now somewhat faded, framed the windows; the wall hangings were modest but tasteful. Two polite and well-dressed footmen served the distinguished guests. Seeing Athos, Aramis approached him, took him by the arm, and presented him to Scarron, who received him with both pleasure and respect, and gave a very pretty compliment to the viscount. Raoul was speechless, unready for this level of discourse, so he bowed with what grace he could muster. Athos received the compliments of several nobles to whom Aramis presented him, and then, the flurry of his entrance passed, the general conversation resumed. After four or five minutes that Raoul used to recover his self-possession and begin to size up the assembled company, the main door opened and a servant announced Miss Paulet. Athos tapped the viscount's shoulder. "Take note of this lady, Raoul," he said, "she's a historical figure – it was to visit her that King Henry IV was going when he was assassinated."

Raoul started; it seemed that every moment, these days, brought him face-to-face with history. Here was a lady, still young and beautiful, who had known Henry IV and had spoken to him. Everyone hastened to greet the newcomer, for she was never out of fashion. She was a tall and graceful figure, crowned by a head of glorious golden hair, such as Raphael loved to paint and Titian gave to all his Magdalene. This tawny hair, or perhaps the ascendancy she'd won over other women, was why she was known as the Lioness. Our beautiful ladies of today who aspire to this title should know that it comes to them, not from England, as they might think but from their august compatriot Miss Paulet. Amid the murmur that her arrival evoked on all sides, Miss Paulet went right up to Scarron. "Well then, my dear Abbot," she said in her serene voice, "Are you now in poverty? We heard all about it this afternoon, at Madam de Rambouillet's, from Sir de Grasse."

"Yes but we enrich the State thereby," said Scarron. "We must, after all, make sacrifices for our country."

"Sir Cardinal will spend that fifteen hundred livres on more pomades and perfumes," said Sir Ménage, a Frondeur whom Athos recognised as the gentlemen he'd met in Rue Saint-Honoré.

"But what will the Muse say?" replied Aramis in his voice of honey. "That Muse, who requires a golden mediocrity? After all, Si Virgilio puer aut tolerabile desit Hospitum, caderent omnes crinibus Hydri."

"Well said!" said Scarron, extending his hand to Miss Paulet. "But if I no longer have my Hydra, at least I have my Lioness."

Every word Scarron said that night seemed exquisite. Such is the privilege of persecution. Sir Ménage couldn't contain his praise. Miss Paulet went to assume her accustomed place – but before taking her seat, she stood in her grandeur and surveyed all those assembled, her eyes finally resting on Raoul. Athos smiled. "You've been noticed by Miss Paulet, Viscount; go and greet her. Presume to be nothing more than what you are, a French provincial – and don't dare to speak to her of Henry IV." Blushing, the viscount approached the Lioness, and joined the other nobles who clustered around her throne. The gathering now divided into two distinct groups: those who surrounded Sir Ménage, and those paying court to Miss Paulet. Scarron rolled from one to the other, manoeuvring his wheelchair in the press with as much skill as an experienced pilot steering a boat in a crowded harbour. "When shall we talk?" said Athos to Aramis.

"Shortly," came the reply. "The crowd isn't thick enough yet; we'd be noticed."

At that moment the door opened and the footman announced the coadjutor. At this title, everyone turned, for it belonged to one who was already on his way to becoming famous. Athos turned with the others. He knew the Abbot de Gondy only by name. He saw a small, dark man come in, awkward and short-sighted, clumsy in everything except drawing his sword or pistol; though he stumbled against a table and nearly knocked it over, there was nonetheless something fierce and proud in his expression. Miss Paulet offered him her hand, and Scarron rolled up to greet him from his chair. "Well!" said the coadjutor, upon seeing Scarron. "I hear you're in disgrace, Sir Abbot?"

It was the greeting of the hour and had already been said a hundred times that evening, so Scarron had to find a hundredth witty rejoinder but he replied without effort, "Cardinal Mazarin has been kind enough to think of me."

"Brilliant!" cried Ménage.

"But how will you continue to be able to receive us?" continued the coadjutor. "If your income dwindles to naught, I'll have to appoint you a canon of Notre Dame."

"Oh, no!" said Scarron. "I'd bring you into disgrace as well."

"Do you have any resources we're unaware of?"

"I'll just borrow from the queen."

"But Her Majesty has no income of her own," said Aramis. "Doesn't she live on the conjugal funds?"

The coadjutor turned with a smile and acknowledged Aramis with a friendly gesture. "Pardon me, my dear Abbot d'Herblay," he said, "but I see you're behind the times, and I must give you something to bring you up to date."

"What's that?" said Aramis.

"A hatband."

Everyone turned toward the coadjutor, who drew from his pocket a silk ribbon tied in a distinctive shape. "Ah!" said Scarron. "It's tied into a sling – a fronde!"

"Exactly," said the coadjutor. "Everything now must be done à la fronde. Miss Paulet, I have for you a fan à la fronde. I'll give you the name of my glover, d'Herblay – he makes gloves à la fronde. And for you, Scarron, my baker, who bakes excellent loaves à la fronde."

Aramis took the ribbon and tied it around his hat. Just then the door opened, and the footman announced, "Madam Duchess de Chevreuse!"

At this name, everyone rose. Scarron turned his chair toward the door. Raoul blushed. Athos gestured to Aramis, who withdrew into a window embrasure. Amidst the respectful compliments that greeted her entrance, the duchess seemed to be looking for something – or someone. Finally, her gaze lighted on Raoul, and her eyes sparkled. She saw Athos and looked thoughtful; and she saw Aramis by the window and started slightly behind her fan. "What's the latest?" she asked, as if to conceal the thoughts crossing her mind. "How is poor Voiture? Do you know, Scarron?"

"What? Is Voiture ill?" asked Ménage. "What ails him?"

"He played cards overlong without reminding his servant to bring him a change of shirts," said the coadjutor, "caught a terrible cold, and is dying."

"Where is he?"

"My God! At my place, where else? Think of it – he'd made a solemn vow to give up gambling but after three days he couldn't stand it anymore. He came to the archbishop's house to ask me to relieve him of his oath but I was out on business visiting our good Councillor Broussel. However, in my rooms Voiture found the Marquis de Luynes at a card table, shuffling and looking for an opponent. The marquis called him over but Voiture said he couldn't play until he'd been relieved of his sacred vow. Luynes engaged in my name to take the sin upon himself, so Voiture sat down at the table, played until he lost four hundred crowns, then took a chill and lay down, to rise no more."

"Is he in danger, our dear Voiture?" asked Aramis, half hidden by the window curtain.

"Alas! The great man," said Sir Ménage. "Perhaps this time we will lose him, deseret orbem."

"You pity him?" said Miss Paulet wryly. "On his deathbed he's surrounded by sultanas, like a Grand Turk! Madam de Saintot comes running with soothing soups, La Renaudot warms his sheets, and Madam de Rambouillet sends herbal tisanes."

"You wouldn't miss him, my dear Parthénie?" said Scarron, laughing.

"How unjust you are! Of course, I would. I'd happily say masses for the repose of his soul."

"It's not for nothing you're called the Lioness," said Madam de Chevreuse. "Your bite is as sharp as ever."

"But ... you speak ill of a poetic giant, Madam," said Raoul, hesitantly.

"He, a giant? Clearly, Viscount, as you said, you have just arrived from the provinces, and have never seen him. A giant? Why, he's scarcely five feet tall."

"Brava! Hear, hear!" said a tall man, dark and gaunt, with a bristling moustache and a long rapier at his side. "Brava, lovely Paulet! It's past time someone put that little Voiture in his place. I think I know more than a little about poetry, and I've always found his detestable."

"Who is that swashbuckler, Sir?" Raoul asked Athos.

"Sir de Scudéry."

"The author of Clelia and The Grand Cyrus?"

"Co-author, an honour he shares with his sister, Miss de Scudéry that imposing woman over there next to Sir Scarron."

Raoul turned and saw two figures who had just entered: an older lady, prim, stiff, and arid, who held herself near like a duenna or chaperone, next to a lovely young woman, frail and sad of demeanour, with luxurious black hair and thoughtful, violet eyes. Raoul vowed to himself not to leave the salon before he'd had a chance to speak to the beautiful young lady with violet eyes, who, to his mind, though she had no resemblance to her, recalled to him poor little Louise whom he'd left suffering at Château de La Vallière, and whom his encounters with high society had made him forget for a moment. Meanwhile, Aramis had approached the coadjutor, who without ceasing to smile had whispered a few words in his ear. Aramis, despite himself, started slightly in surprise. "Laugh with me," said Sir de Gondy. "We're being watched."

And he moved away toward Madam de Chevreuse, who had a lively circle gathered around her. Aramis pretended to laugh to throw off any curious listeners, then seeing that Athos had gone into the embrasure he'd left a minute before, tossed a few words left and right before moving to join him. There at the window they finally had their conversation, a quiet one but accented with many gestures. Raoul approached them, as Athos had requested. "Sir Abbot has been repeating one of Sir Voiture's rondeaus that I'd never heard," Athos said loudly. "It's quite charming."

Raoul stood near them awhile, pretending to listen, then went to join the group around the duchess that included Miss Paulet on one side and Miss de Scudéry on the other. "Well, as to me," the coadjutor was saying, "I don't share Sir de Scudéry's opinion. I think Sir Voiture is indeed a poet but solely of poetical ideas, without a touch of politics to them."

Meanwhile: "And so?" asked Athos.

"It's tomorrow," Aramis said quickly.

"At what time?"

"Six o'clock."

"And where?"

"At Saint-Mandé."

"Who told you this?"

"The Count Rochefort." A guest drew near. "Political ideas?" said Aramis aloud. "Our poor Voiture hasn't a one – on this I agree with Sir Coadjuteur. He's purely a poet."

"Oh, certainly – a prodigious poet," said Ménage. "And yet posterity, while admiring him, will surely reproach him for having too little regard for the laws of poetry. He simply murders the rules."

"Murders them, that's the word for it," said Sir de Scudéry.

"But admit that his letters are literary masterworks," said Madam de Chevreuse.

"Oh, in that regard," said Miss de Scudéry, "his fame is assured."

"True enough," replied Miss Paulet, "so long as he's being humourous; but as a serious epistolary writer he's pitiful, his words blunt, unadorned, and put quite badly – as you must agree."

"So long as you agree that at humour, he's inimitable."

"Inimitable? Certainly," said Sir de Scudéry, twisting his moustache, "for who would imitate comedy that's forced and jokes that are overfamiliar? For example, his 'Letter from a Carp to a Sturgeon.'" "And you know," said Ménage, "he gets all his best ideas eavesdropping at the Hôtel Rambouillet. Look at his Zélide and Alcidalis."

"As for me," said Aramis, approaching the circle and bowing respectfully to Madam de Chevreuse, "as for me, I find him too careless in his regard for those of high rank. He's frequently disrespectful of Madam la Princess, the Marshall d'Albret, Sir de Schomberg, and the queen herself."

"What, even the queen?" demanded Sir de Scudéry, advancing his right leg and assuming a belligerent pose. "Morbieu! That I hadn't heard. And how has he disrespected Her Majesty?"

"You haven't heard his piece, 'I Thought'?"

"No," said Madam de Chevreuse.

"No," said Miss de Scudéry.

"No," said Miss Paulet.

"Ah! In fact, I think the queen has shared it with only a few – but I have it from a reliable source."

"And you know it?"

"I could bring it to mind, I think."

"Let's have it! Let's have it!" said every voice.

"Here's how it came about," said Aramis. "Sir Voiture was in the queen's carriage, riding with her through the forest of Fontainebleau; he put on a look of deep thought that never fails to incite the queen to ask him what he's thinking about. And so, 'Of what are you thinking, Sir Voiture?' her Majesty asked. Voiture smiled, pretended to ponder for about five seconds so he would appear to be improvising, and replied:

“I thought – that Destiny,
After so much unearned misfortune,
Had finally crowned you
With glory, splendour, and fortune
“But before, when you suffered,
I think you were happier ...
I'll not say more beloved
Though that's what the rhyme calls for.”

Sir Ménage and Mesdemoiselles de Scudéry and Paulet shrugged, unimpressed. "Wait for it, wait for it," said Aramis. "There are two strophes."

"Oh, say rather two couplets," said Miss de Scudéry, "as this is at best a song."

“I thought – that poor Love,
Who always lent you his arms,
Is banished from your Court,
Without looks, bow, or charms –
“And for me, what's the use
Of thinking about you,
If you only abuse
Those who've served you so well?”

"Well, as to that last trait," said Madam de Chevreuse, "it might murder the laws of poetry but it's certainly the truth – as Madam de Hautefort and Madam de Sennecey would surely attest, not to mention Sir de Beaufort."

"Go on, go on," said Scarron, "that no longer concerns me, since as of this morning I'm no longer 'her patient.'"

"And the final couplet?" said Miss de Scudéry. "Let's have the final couplet."

"Here it is," said Aramis. "This one goes to the trouble of naming names, so no one has to guess:

“I thought – we who are poets,
Ideas tumbling in torment,
What, given your mood,
You would do in this moment,
“If you saw enter, in this place
The Duke of Buckingham,
Who would you sooner disgrace,
The duke or Père Vincent?”

At this final verse, there was a general cry of outrage at Voiture's impertinence. "Speaking for myself," said the girl with violet eyes, quietly, "I'm afraid I find these verses quite charming."

Raoul thought so as well; blushing, he approached Scarron and said, "Sir Scarron, do me the honour, if you please, to tell me who is this young lady whose opinion stands against that of this entire illustrious assembly."

"Oh ho, my young Viscount!" said Scarron. "I gather you wish to propose an alliance both offensive and defensive?"

Raoul blushed again. "I admit," he said, "I thought the verses very pretty."

"And so they are," said Scarron, "but hush! Between poets, we don't say such things."

"But I don't have the honour to be a poet," said Raoul, "so I ask you..."

"That's right – you wanted to know who the young lady is, no? She's the girl known as the Beautiful Indian."

"Excuse me, Sir," said Raoul, colouring, "but that doesn't tell me anything. Alas! I'm such a provincial."

"Which just means you're not infected yet with the wild nonsense we spew here from every mouth. All the better, young man, all the better! Don't try to understand it all, it's a waste of time – but when you grasp a bit more of it, we'll speak again."

"But forgive me, Sir," said Raoul, "and do please tell me who this person you call the Beautiful Indian is?"

"Oh, of course, she's one of the nicest people you could hope to meet: Miss Françoise d'Aubigné."

"D'Aubigné? Is she of the family of the famous 'Agrippa,' the friend of King Henry IV?"

"She's his granddaughter. She came here from Martinique that is why she's called the Beautiful Indian."

Raoul's eyes widened, and met the violet gaze of the young lady, who smiled. Everyone was still talking about Voiture. "Sir," Miss d'Aubigné said to Scarron, inserting herself into his conversation with the young viscount, "don't you admire these friends of poor Voiture? Listen to how they prick him even as they praise him. One denies him the possession of common sense, the next all talent for poetry, then any originality, or sense of humour, or independence, or ... why, good God! What has he left but celebrity?"

Scarron laughed, and Raoul joined in. The Beautiful Indian, astonished by the effect she'd achieved, looked down and resumed her air of innocence. Raoul said to himself, "This is a person of refined spirit."

Athos, still in the window embrasure, surveyed the entire scene with a disdainful smile on his lips. "Call over the Count of La Fère," Madam de Chevreuse said to the coadjutor. "I need to speak with him."

"Whereas I," said the coadjutor, "need it to be thought that I don't speak with him. I like and admire him, as I know at least something of his former adventures – but I shouldn't seem to know him until after tomorrow morning."

"Why after tomorrow morning?" asked Madam de Chevreuse.

"You'll know that tomorrow night!" said the coadjutor, laughing.

"Faith, my dear Gondy," said the duchess, "you always talk like it's the Apocalypse. Sir d'Herblay," she added, turning toward Aramis, "will you be my servant this evening?"

"Tonight, tomorrow, and forever, Duchess," said Aramis. "Command me."

"Well, then, fetch me the Count of La Fère. I want to talk to him."

Aramis went and brought back Athos. "Sir Count," said the duchess, giving Athos a letter, "here is that which I promised you. Our protégé will be well received."

"Madam," said Athos, "he is happy to be in your debt."

"You have nothing to envy him in that regard, for without you, I would never have known him," replied the wayward lady with an impish smile that recalled Marie Michon to both Aramis and Athos.

And with that, she rose and called for her carriage. Miss Paulet had already gone, and Miss de Scudéry was leaving. "Viscount," said Athos to Raoul, "follow Madam Duchess, and beg the favour of escorting her out – and as you do, be sure to thank her."

Meanwhile, the Beautiful Indian approached Scarron to take her leave of him. "What? Leaving already?" he said.

"But one of the last to go, as you see. If you hear news of Sir Voiture, and if it's good, please do me the favour of letting me know tomorrow."

"Oh but you know," said Scarron, "he may die."

"Do you mean it?" said the girl with violet eyes.

"Certainly, now that his panegyric is complete."

And they parted, laughing, the girl turning to give the poor paralytic a fond look, while the poor paralytic followed her out with a look of love. Gradually the groups broke up. Scarron pretended not to notice that some of his guests had had mysterious discussions, letters had arrived for others, and his party seemed to have an undercurrent that had nothing to do with literature despite all the noise devoted thereto. But what did that matter to Scarron?

He was already out of favour – as he'd said, as of that morning he was no longer the Queen's Patient. As to Raoul, he had indeed escorted the duchess to her carriage, where she gave him her hand to kiss – and then, in one of those wild caprices that made her so adorable, and so dangerous, she suddenly took him by his ears and kissed him on the forehead, intoning, "Viscount, by this kiss, and by my wishes, may you find happiness!"

Then she pushed him away and ordered the coachman to take her to the Hôtel de Luynes. The duchess favoured the young man with a final wave, the carriage rolled away, and Raoul went back inside, dazed.

Athos understood what had happened and smiled. "Come, Viscount," he said, "it's time we retired. You leave tomorrow for the army of Sir Prince, so sleep well on your last night in the city."

"I'm going to be a soldier?" said the young man. "Oh, Sir! I thank you with all my heart!"

"Goodbye, Count," said the Abbot d'Herblay. "I must return to my monastery."

"Goodbye, Abbot," said the coadjutor. "I preach tomorrow, and still have twenty texts to consult this evening."

"Goodbye, Gentlemen," said the count. "I'm so tired, I'm sure I'll spend the next twenty-four hours asleep."

The three men bowed, after exchanging a final look. Scarron watched them from the corner of his eye as they went out the doors of his salon. "And not a one of them will do what he said," he whispered with his simian smile. "But there they go, the brave gentlemen! And who knows? Perhaps they'll find a way to restore my pension ...! At least they can move their limbs, and that's more than enough. As for me, I have only language – but I'll try to show the world yet that that's something. Whoa! Champenois! It's striking eleven already; come and roll me to my bed ... Ah but in truth, that Demoiselle d'Aubigné is quite charming ....!" And with that, the poor paralytic disappeared into his bedroom, the door closed behind him, and the lights went out one by one in the salon on the Rue des Tournelles.

Day had barely broken when Athos arose and dressed; it was easy to see, from the pale traces insomnia had left on his face that he'd gone most of the night without sleep. No matter how firm and decisive he usually was, this morning there was something slow and irresolute about him. As a way of gaining time, he occupied himself with preparations for Raoul's departure. First, he inspected a sword that he drew from its oiled leather sheath and checked the grip to make sure it was well wrapped and the blade's tang was fixed firmly in the hilt. Then he threw into the bottom of the young man's luggage a small bag full of louis d'or, called Olivain, the lackey who'd come with him from Blois, placed the portmanteau before him, and made sure that it held everything a young man needs on campaign. Finally, after expending nearly an hour on these preparations, he opened the door to the viscount's room and quietly entered. The sun, already high, shone in through the wide-framed windows, because Raoul, returning late the night before, had neglected to close the curtains. He was still asleep, head resting gracefully on his arm, his long black hair half-covering his charming face, bedewed in the warmth with pearls of moisture that rolled down the dreaming youth's cheeks. Athos approached and, bent in an attitude of tender melancholy, watched for a time the sleeping young man with his smiling mouth and half-closed eyes, whose dreams should be sweet and his slumbers light, given the silent guardian angel who watched over him with care and affection. Gradually, in the presence of youth so rich and so pure, Athos was drawn into a reverie of his own youth, of half-formed memories that were more phantasms than thoughts. Between that past and this present stretched an abyss. But imagination is an angel's flight that darts back over the dark seas where our illusions were shipwrecked, past the rocks that shattered our happiness. He recalled how the first part of his own life had been destroyed by a woman; and thought with dread what an influence love can have over even the finest and strongest. Recalling all that he'd suffered, he foresaw all that Raoul might yet suffer, and the deep and tender compassion in his heart distilled itself into a single tear that dropped upon the young man. At that moment Raoul awoke from his cloudless dreams, showing none of the sadness or grief that afflicts some of those of sensitive spirit. His eyes rose to meet those of Athos, and he felt some of what was passing in the heart of this man who awaited his awakening, much as a lover awaits the awakening of his mistress, with a gaze expressing an infinite love. "You've been here, Sir?" he said with respect.

"Yes, Raoul, right here," said the count.
"And you didn't wake me?"

"I wanted to let you enjoy your last moments of sound sleep, my friend; you must be still weary from yesterday that extended so far into the night."

"Ah, Sir, you're so good to me!" said Raoul.

Athos smiled. "How do you feel?" he asked.

"Fine, Sir – fully recovered and refreshed."

"You're still growing," continued Athos, with a fatherly interest charming in such a mature man, "and at your age fatigue is doubly felt."

"Oh, please, Sir," said Raoul, shy at receiving so much attention. "Just give me a moment and I'll get dressed."

Athos called Olivain to assist, and in only ten minutes, with the military punctuality that Athos had passed on to his pupil, the young man was ready. "Now," the youth said to the servant, "let's prepare my luggage."

"Your luggage's already prepared," said Athos. "It's packed under my supervision and should lack for nothing. If the lackeys have followed my orders, your bags should already be placed on the horses."

"Everything has been done as Sir Count desired," said Olivain, "and the horses are ready."

"And I slept on," cried Raoul, "while you, Sir, attended to all these details! Oh, truly, you overwhelm me with kindness."

"So, you love me just a little? I hope so, at least," Athos replied in an almost tender tone.

"Oh, Sir!" cried Raoul, struggling to keep control of his emotions. "As God is my witness, I love and revere you."

"Make sure you don't forget anything," said Athos, pretending to look around to conceal his feelings.

"Of course, Sir," said Raoul.

The lackey approached Athos hesitantly, and whispered, "The viscount lacks a sword, as Sir Count had me take away the one he wore last night."

"It's all right," said Athos. "That's my business."

Raoul didn't seem to notice this exchange. He went toward the front door, glancing at the count every few seconds to see if the moment of parting had come but Athos seemed unmoved. Arriving on the steps, Raoul saw three horses. "Oh, Sir!" he cried, radiant. "You're going with me?"

"I'll ride with you part of the way," said Athos.

Joy shone in Raoul's eyes, and he sprang lightly onto his horse. Athos mounted more slowly, after whispering a few words to the lackey, who, instead of following immediately, went back into the house. Raoul, delighted to be in the count's company, noticed, or pretended to notice, nothing. The two gentlemen rode across the Pont Neuf, and then went along the quays, around what was then called Pepin's Pond, then past the walls of the Grand Châtelet. The lackey caught up to them as they turned onto Rue Saint-Denis. They rode in companionable silence. Raoul felt that the time of separation was approaching; the night before the count had given certain orders respecting the events of the day. He looked at the youth with undisguised tenderness, and from time to time let slip an affectionate remark, or some thoughtful and caring advice. After passing through the Saint-Denis gate, and climbing the heights past the monastery of the Récollets, Athos looked at the viscount's mount. "Take care, Raoul," he said. "Look! Your horse is already tired and foaming, while mine seems like it's just out of the stable. I've told you this often, as it's a common failure of equestrians: the way you tug on her mouth will harden her jaws, and if you do that too much, she won't respond as quickly as you might need her to. A rider's safety depends on his mount's prompt obedience. Remember, in a week you'll be riding, not around a track but on a battlefield."

Then quickly, to take the sting out of the observation, Athos continued, "Look there, Raoul – what a fine meadow for hunting partridge."

The young man appreciated the lesson, and even more the delicate way in which it was given. "I also noticed the other day," said Athos, "that when aiming a pistol, you extend your arm too far. The extra tension can interfere with your aim, so that out of a dozen shots you might miss three times."

"Whereas out of twelve shots you, Sir, would hit twelve times," replied Raoul, smiling.

"Because I bend my arm and rest my elbow on my other hand. Do you understand what I'm saying, Raoul?"

"Yes, Sir; I tried it myself after the last time you advised me, and it was a complete success."

"And then," said Athos, "when fencing, you charge your adversary too often. It's because you're young, I'm well aware – but the angle of the body when charging takes your sword out of line, and a level-headed opponent will stop you at the first step with a simple disengage, or even a stop-thrust."

"Yes, Sir, as you've done to me often enough – but not everyone has your courage and sangfroid."

"Now there's a cool breeze!" said Athos. "A reminder that winter is on its way. By the way, I must say, if you're going to shoot – and you will, as you're being sent to a young general who likes the smell of gunpowder – keep in mind that in an engagement, especially against other cavaliers, remember not to be the one who fires first. The first to fire rarely hits his man, and then he's disarmed himself in the face of an armed adversary. As your opponent fires, make your horse rear up – that manoeuvre has saved my life two or three times."

"If I can remember to do that, I will."

"What?" said Athos, "Are those poachers being placed under arrest over there? It seems so ... Another important thing, Raoul: if you're wounded during a charge, and fall from your horse, if you have the strength for it, try to get out of your regiment's line of advance – for if they fall back, you could get trampled. In any case, if you are injured, write me right away, or get someone to write for you. We veterans know how to deal with wounds," added Athos, smiling.

"Thank you, Sir," the young man answered with some emotion.

"Ah! And here we are at Saint-Denis," murmured Athos.

They had just arrived at the town gate, where two sentries stood on guard. One said to the other, "Here's another young gentleman on his way to join the army."

Athos turned toward them; everything that concerned Raoul, even indirectly, was important to him. "How do you know that?" he asked.

"By his martial air, Sir," said the sentry. "And he's the right age. This is the second one today."

"A young man like me has already passed this morning?" asked Raoul.

"Yes, my faith, with a haughty look and some fancy equipment – clearly the son of a family of rank."

"That sounds to me like he could be a companion for the road," said Raoul, as they continued on their way. "It's a shame that I missed him."

"You may yet join up with him, Raoul, after I have a talk with you here. What I have to say won't take long, and then perhaps you can catch up to your young gentleman."

"As you wish, Sir."

As they spoke they made their way through streets crowded for the coming festival of Pentecost and stopped in front of the old basilica within which first mass was being said. "Let's dismount here, Raoul," said Athos. "Olivain, give me that sword, and stay here to hold the horses."

Athos took the sword the lackey held out to him, and the two gentlemen went into the church. Athos offered some holy water to Raoul. In the hearts of some fathers is a tenderness like that for a lover. The young man touched Athos's hand, genuflected, and crossed himself. Athos spoke a word to one of the guards, who bowed and marched away toward the crypts. "Come, Raoul," said Athos, "let's follow this man."

The guard opened the Iron Gate to the royal tombs and stood on the top step while Athos and Raoul descended into the crypts. In a sepulchre at the bottom of the stairs burned a silver lamp and below this lamp rested a catafalque supported by an oaken stand, covered by a large cloak of purple velvet adorned with golden lilies. The sadness that seemed to pervade this majestic church had prepared the young man for this scene, and he descended, step by solemn step, to the sepulchre, where he uncovered his head and stood before the mortal remains of the last king who would be buried with his ancestors only when his successor came to take his place, and who until then remained here, seemingly to say to human pride, so easily exalted when upon a throne: "Dust of the earth, I await you!"

They stood a moment in silence. Then Athos raised his hand and pointing at the coffin, he said, "This is the catafalque of a man who was weak and lacked grandeur, and yet whose reign was full of important events. This king was guided by the ever-watchful mind of another man, who enlightened his liege the way this lamp illuminates his coffin. That man was the real king, Raoul; the other was a phantom into which he poured his soul. And yet, so powerful is the majesty of monarchy, that wise man doesn't have the honour to be buried at the feet of he for whose glory he expended his life. Remember, Raoul, that though that wise man served a little king, he by his devotion made his monarchy great. For there are two things within the palace of the Louvre: a king, who dies – and royalty that does not. That reign is passed, Raoul; that minister, so dreaded, so feared, so hated by his master, has gone to his grave, drawing after himself the king who didn't dare to survive alone, lest he should destroy his own great work – for a king only builds when he has God, or the spirit of God, near to him. Back then everyone regarded the death of the cardinal as a deliverance – just as I myself, as blind as my contemporaries, sometimes opposed the designs of that great man who held France in his hands, and who, clenching or opening them, choked it or gave it air as he willed. If I wasn't crushed, me and my friends, by his terrible wrath, then I was probably spared so I could tell you this today: Raoul, do not confuse the king with the monarchy. The king is only a man but the monarchy is the divine rule of God; if you are ever in doubt about which to serve, abandon the material incarnation in favour of the invisible principle – for the invisible principle is everything. Only God could make this principle tangible by incarnating it in a man. Raoul, I feel I can see your future, as if through a cloud. It's better than ours was, I think. Unlike us, who had a minister without a real king, you will have a king without a minister. You can serve, love, and respect such a king. If this king becomes a tyrant – for omnipotence is dizzying and can drive one to tyranny – then serve, love, and respect the monarchy, the infallible spirit of God upon earth, the celestial spark that makes this dust here so great and so holy that we, gentlemen of high rank as we are, are as nothing before this body at the foot of the staircase, just as this body itself is nothing before the throne of the Lord."

"As I love God, Sir," said Raoul, "I will respect the monarchy. I will serve the king, and I will try, even unto death, to live for the king, the monarchy, and God. Have I understood you correctly?"

Athos smiled. "You have a noble nature," he said. "Take, now, your sword."

Raoul went down on one knee.

"This sword was borne by my father, a gentleman loyal to the crown. I bore it in my turn, and did honour to him sometimes when the hilt was in my hand and the scabbard hung at my side. If your hand is not yet strong enough to wield it, Raoul, so much the better, as you will have more time to learn what to do when the time comes to draw it."

"Sir," said Raoul, receiving the sword from the hands of the count, "I owe everything to you – but this sword is the most precious gift you have given me. I shall bear it, I swear, as a grateful man."

And he put his lips to the hilt and kissed it respectfully.

"It is well," said Athos. "Rise, Viscount, and embrace me."

Raoul rose and fell with emotion into the arms of Athos. "Goodbye," murmured the count, his heart melting. "Goodbye, and think sometimes of me."

"Oh, forever and always!" cried the young man. "I swear to you, Sir, that at my end, your name will be the last name I speak, and my final thought will be the memory of you."

To hide his feelings, Athos climbed quickly back up the stairs, gave a gold coin to the tomb guardian, bowed before the altar, and went back out the entrance of the church, where he found Olivain waiting with the horses. "Olivain," he said, pointing to Raoul's baldric, "Tighten that belt's buckle, as the sword is hanging a bit low on it. Good. Now, you will accompany Sir Viscount until Grimaud joins you, at which time you'll leave the viscount. Do you hear, Raoul? Grimaud is a wise old servant full of courage and prudence; Grimaud will do well for you."

"Yes, Sir," said Raoul.

"Now to horse! I want to see how you ride."

Raoul obeyed. "Goodbye, Raoul!" said the count. "And fare you well, my dear child."

"Goodbye, Sir," said Raoul, "and farewell, my beloved protector!" Athos waved his hand, because he dared not speak, and Raoul rode away, his head uncovered in respect. Athos stood, motionless, watching him go until he disappeared around the corner of the street. Then the count tossed his horse's bridle to a peasant, slowly went back up the stairs, entered the church, knelt down in the darkest corner, and prayed.

195

1 of the Duke Beaufort's 40 Methods of Escape

The same time passed for the prisoner as for those working on his escape – but for the prisoner, it passed far more slowly. Unlike those men who eagerly commit to a dangerous enterprise and grow cooler and calmer as the time for action approaches, the Duke Beaufort, whose fiery courage was proverbial but who had been chained up for five years, now seemed to want to hurry the very hours themselves toward the designated time to break out. There was nothing for him now but the escape, other than those projects he planned for afterward – projects, it must be admitted, that in comparison had grown vague and uncertain, though the desire for revenge still choked his heart. Beaufort's escape would be a terrible blow to Sir de Chavigny, whom he hated due to the petty persecutions he'd suffered at his hands, and an even worse disaster for Mazarin, whom he loathed for the unforgivable insult of his imprisonment. (We note that Sir de Beaufort maintained a due proportion in his hatred of the governor and the minister, placing the master over his subordinate.) Seething in his prison, Beaufort, who knew so well the court of the Royal Palace, and the relationship between queen and cardinal, imagined to himself the dramatic reaction to the news, the cries that would echo from the minister's office to Anne of Austria's chambers: Beaufort has escaped! Repeating this to himself, Beaufort smiled softly, as though already out and breathing the open air of fields and forests, with a powerful horse galloping beneath him as he shouted aloud, "I'm free!"

But when he came out of his reverie he was still between four walls, no more than ten paces from where La Ramée sat twiddling his thumbs while outside in the antechamber the guards drank and laughed. The only thing that made this odious tableau bearable, so strange is the human mind, was the sullen face of Grimaud, whose features he had so hated at first but which now embodied all his hopes. To him, Grimaud was as handsome as Antinous. Needless to say, this was all a fancy of the prisoner's feverish imagination. Grimaud was the same as he'd always been. That was how he maintained the confidence of his superior, La Ramée, who now relied on him more than he did on himself, since, as we've said, La Ramée felt at heart a certain sympathy for Sir Beaufort. Also, the good La Ramée was looking forward to his private supper party with the prisoner. La Ramée had only one fault: he was a gourmand who loved a good pastry and adored an excellent honey. And the successor to Père Marteau had promised him a pie of pheasant instead of chicken, and Chambertin instead of the usual Macon vintage. All this, plus the company of this excellent prince of whom he'd grown fond, who played such clever tricks on Chavigny and made such droll jests about Mazarin, all this made Pentecost for La Ramée the most anticipated festival of the year. So, La Ramée awaited the hour of six o'clock with nearly as much impatience as the duke. In the morning he had occupied himself by double-checking the details, and, trusting only himself, had made a personal visit to Père Marteau's successor. His expectations were surpassed: he was shown a true colossus of a pie, its upper crust adorned with the Beaufort coat of arms – and though it was as yet empty, nearby were a prime pheasant and two partridges, neatly larded and perforated like pincushions. Then La Ramée's mouth had begun to water, and he returned to the duke's cell rubbing his hands together. To crown it all, as we said, Chavigny, trusting in La Ramée, had taken a little trip, leaving that morning after appointing La Ramée Deputy Governor of Vincennes Château. As for Grimaud, he just seemed more sullen than ever. In the morning, Beaufort had challenged La Ramée to a game of tennis, and at a sign from Grimaud recognised that he needed to pay close attention to everything that followed. Grimaud, leading the way, traced the path they were to follow that evening. The tennis court was in what was called the small courtyard of the château. It was usually deserted, only guarded by sentries when Beaufort was playing there, though given the height of the drop over the outside walls this seemed unnecessary. There were three doors to open before reaching the small courtyard. Each opened with a different key. Once they were in the small courtyard, Grimaud marched stiffly over to sit in a crenellation, his legs dangling outside the wall. It was clear that this was where he intended to tie the rope ladder. All of this pantomime, though quite clear to the Duke Beaufort, was of course unintelligible to La Ramée. The contest began. This time, Beaufort was on his game, and it seemed as if he could put the ball wherever he wanted. La Ramée was completely routed. Four of Beaufort's guards assisted in collecting the balls. When the game was over, Beaufort, after lightly mocking La Ramée for his clumsiness, offered the guards two Louis d'or to go and drink his health with their other comrades. The guards asked permission of La Ramée, and he granted it but only for the evening. Till then La Ramée had important details to take care of, and he wanted to make sure the prisoner didn't disappear while he ran his errands. Sir de Beaufort could hardly have arranged matters better if he'd done it himself. Finally, the clock struck six, and though seven was the hour set for dinner, the food was prepared and served. There on a sideboard stood the colossal pie bearing the arms of the duke, seemingly cooked to perfection, if one could judge by the golden colour of its flaky crust. The rest of the dinner matched its quality in every way. Everyone was impatient: the guards to go and drink, La Ramée to sit down and dine, and Sir de Beaufort to escape. Only Grimaud was unmoved; Athos had trained him well for this. There were moments when, looking at him, the Duke Beaufort wondered if he were not in a dream, if this marble figure was actually in his service, and would animate when the time came. La Ramée sent away the guards, commending them to drink the prince's health; then, when they were gone, he closed the doors, put the keys in his pocket, and beckoned the prince to the table with a look that said: Whenever My Lord desires.

The prince looked at Grimaud, and Grimaud looked at the clock: it was barely a quarter after six, and the escape was fixed for seven, so there were still three-quarters of an hour to pass. The prince, to gain fifteen minutes, pretended to be engrossed in reading, and asked to finish his chapter. La Ramée approached and looked over his shoulder to see what book so engaged the prince that he would delay sitting down to table when dinner was ready. It was Caesar's Commentaries that he himself, contrary to Chavigny's orders, had provided to the duke three days earlier. La Ramée promised himself not to contravene the dungeon's regulations again. Meanwhile, he uncorked the bottles, and surreptitiously sniffed the pie. At half past six, the duke rose and solemnly declared, "No doubt about it, Caesar was the greatest man of antiquity."

"You think so, My Lord?" said La Ramée.

"Yes."

"Well! As for me," said La Ramée, "I prefer Hannibal."

"Why's that, La Ramée?" asked the duke.

"Because he left behind no Commentaries," said La Ramée with his big smile.

The duke took the hint and sat down, gesturing for La Ramée to take the place opposite him. The officer didn't wait to be asked twice. Nothing is so expressive as the figure of a true gourmand sitting down to a fine dinner. As he received his bowl of soup from the hands of Grimaud, La Ramée's face beamed with an expression of perfect bliss. The duke looked at him with a smile. "By the belly of the Grey Saint, La Ramée!" he cried. "If you told me that somewhere in France, at this moment, there was a happier man, I wouldn't believe it!"

"And you would be right, My Lord," said La Ramée. "As for me, I confess that when I'm hungry, I know of no more pleasant sight than that of a well-laid table. And if on top of that he who presides over the table is the grandson of Henri the Great, then you'll understand, My Lord that the honour one receives doubles the pleasure one takes."

The prince bowed in acknowledgment, while a nearly imperceptible smile touched the face of Grimaud where he stood behind La Ramée. "My dear La Ramée," said the duke, "truly, you know how to turn a compliment."

"No, no, My Lord," said La Ramée, sincere and earnest, "no, truly, I say just what I think – there's no flattery in it."

"So, you really do like me?" asked the prince.

"So much so," said La Ramée, "that I'll be inconsolable on the day Your Highness leaves Vincennes."

"Saying that is a strange way of showing your affliction."

(The prince meant affection.) "Ah but My Lord, what would you do on the outside?" said La Ramée. "Some exploit that would embroil you with the Court and get you locked up in the Bastille instead of Vincennes. Chavigny is not very friendly, I admit," continued La Ramée, sipping a glass of Madeira, "but Sir de Tremblay is much worse."

"True enough!" said the duke, amused at the turn the conversation was taking and glancing at the clock whose hands moved painfully slowly.

"What do you expect from the brother of a Capuchin who studied in the school of Cardinal Richelieu? Ah, My Lord, believe me, it's a good thing that the queen, who's always favoured you, or so I'm told, had the good idea of sending you here instead, where you can promenade, play tennis in the fresh air, and eat well."

"Truly," said the duke, "to hear you, La Ramée, I'd have to be some sort of an ingrate to want to leave here."

"In fact, My Lord, to leave would be the height of ingratitude," said La Ramée. "But surely Your Highness isn't speaking seriously."

"Alas, I must confess," said the duke, "perhaps it's sheer folly but I still dream of escape."

"By one of your famous forty methods, My Lord?"

"But yes!" replied the duke.

"My Lord," said La Ramée, "so long as we're baring our souls, tell me of one of these forty methods Your Highness has concocted."

"With pleasure," said the duke. "Grimaud, bring me the pie."

"I'm listening," said La Ramée, leaning back in his chair, holding up his glass, and squinting at it through one eye in order to see the sun through its ruby liquid.

The duke glanced at the clock. In ten more minutes, it would strike seven. Grimaud brought the pie and placed it before the prince, who lifted his slim silver knife to slice it open but La Ramée, who feared the flimsy blade would mar the beautiful pastry, handed the duke his own knife that had a sturdy blade of iron. "Thanks, La Ramée," said the duke, taking the utensil.

"Well, my Lord," said the officer, "what is this famous method?"

"Should I tell you," replied the duke, "of the one I think the best of all, the one I've decided would actually work?"

"Yes, that one," said La Ramée.

"Very well!" said the duke, holding the pie plate with one hand while carving a circle in the pastry with the knife he held in the other. "First of all, I would have to have as a guardian a brave fellow like you, Sir La Ramée."

"Good!" said La Ramée. "As you see, you have him. What next, my Lord?"

"I would give him my regards." La Ramée bowed. "I said to myself," continued the prince, "that once I had watching me a good fellow like La Ramée, I would have a friend of mine, whom he doesn't know is my friend, advise him to hire as a subordinate a man who is secretly devoted to me, and will help prepare for my escape."

"Go on!" said La Ramée. "That's not bad."

"It isn't, is it?" said the prince. "For example, the servant of some brave gentleman who is opposed to Mazarin – as all true gentlemen must be."

"Hush, My Lord!" said La Ramée. "Don't bring politics into this."

"Once I have this servant near me," continued the duke, "assuming he's skilful enough to get and keep my guardian's confidence – then with his aid, I'll be able to get news from outside."

"Ah, yes!" said La Ramée. "But how would you get this news from outside?"

"Oh, nothing could be easier," said the Duke Beaufort. "For example, I could get it by playing tennis."

"By playing tennis?" asked La Ramée, beginning to pay closer attention to the duke's story.

"Yes, like this: I send a ball into the dry-moat, where a man collects it. The ball contains a letter; from the ramparts I request the man return it but in place of my ball he throws me a different one – one that, also, contains a letter. So, we've exchanged ideas, and no one's the wiser."

"The devil you say!" La Ramée replied, scratching his ear. "I'm glad you warned me of this – I'll keep a close eye on your ball collector." The duke smiled. "But," said La Ramée, "that's really no more than a means of correspondence."

"That's not nothing, it seems to me."

"It's not enough, though."

"Ah but how about this: suppose I tell my friends, 'Do you think that, at a given hour on a given day, you could be on the other side of the moat with two spare horses?'"

"What use is that?" said La Ramée, with some anxiety. "Unless those horses have wings to fly to the top of the wall to pick you up."

"Eh, my God," the prince casually said, "the horses don't need to fly to the top of the wall so long as I have a way to get down."

“Such as what?”

“Such as a rope ladder.”

“Yes but,” La Ramée said, trying to laugh, “A rope ladder can’t come up in a tennis ball.”

“No, it has to enter inside something else.”

“Inside something else! Such as...?”

“Oh, perhaps ... in a pie.”

“In a pie?” cried La Ramée.

“Sure. Suppose, for a moment, that my faithful butler, Noirmont, spent enough money to purchase the bakery of Père Marteau...”

“Well, what then?” asked La Ramée, trembling.

“What then? My La Ramée, a confirmed gourmand, sees his lovely pies that look so much better than their predecessors, and offers to get me a sample. I accept, provided that La Ramée shares this sample with me. For comfort and privacy, La Ramée dismisses the guards, keeping only Grimaud to serve us. Grimaud, naturally, is the servant recommended by my friend, secretly devoted to me and ready to assist in everything. The time of my escape is fixed for seven o’clock. And, well! As you can see, it’s very nearly seven...”

“And when it’s seven...?” continued La Ramée, sweat beading his forehead.

“When it’s seven,” replied the duke, suiting his actions to his words, “I cut the crust off the top of this giant pie. Within it I find two poniards, a rope ladder, and a choke-pear. I place the point of one poniard to La Ramée’s chest and I say, ‘My friend, I’m very sorry but if you make a move or cry out, you’re a dead man!’”

As we said, the duke’s words reflected his actions. The duke ended standing beside La Ramée, pressing the point of a poniard into his chest with such resolve that his threat couldn’t be doubted. Meanwhile Grimaud, still silent, drew out of the pie the second poniard, the rope ladder, and the choke-pear. La Ramée’s eyes followed the appearance of each of these objects with increasing terror.

“Oh, My Lord!” he cried, with such an expression of stupefaction that at any other time the prince would have laughed. “You wouldn’t have the heart to kill me!”

“No – unless you try to thwart my escape.”

“But, My Lord, if I let you escape, I’m a ruined man.”

“I’ll make sure you’re repaid the full value of your position.”

“Are you really determined to leave the dungeon?”

“For the love of God!”

“And nothing I can say will make you change your mind?”

“This evening, I shall be free.”

“And if I defend myself? If I cry out?”

“Faith of a gentleman: I’ll kill you.”

At that moment the clock struck seven.

“Seven o’clock,” said Grimaud who until then hadn’t said a word.

“Seven o’clock,” said the duke. “You see, I mustn’t be late.”

La Ramée, driven by conscience, made a small movement. The duke frowned, and the officer felt the point of the dagger penetrate his clothes and prick his flesh. “Enough, My Lord!” he said. “Enough. I’ll hold still.”

“We must hurry,” said the duke.

“My Lord, one final favour.”

“What? Speak quickly.”

“Tie me up, My Lord.”

“Tie you up? Why?”

“So no one will think I was your accomplice.”

“Tie his hands!” said Grimaud. “Not in front but behind.”

“But with what?” said the duke.

“With your belt, My Lord,” said La Ramée.

The duke unbuckled his belt and gave it to Grimaud, who bound La Ramée’s hands tightly behind him. “Now his feet,” said Grimaud.

La Ramée stretched out his legs; Grimaud tore a strip from the tablecloth and tied him with it. “Now my sword,” said La Ramée. “Tie its hilt onto the sheath.” The duke took a lacing from his breeches and bound the sword to its owner’s satisfaction. “Now,” said poor La Ramée, “the choke-pear – I insist upon it. Otherwise they’ll put me on trial because I didn’t scream for help. And my Lord – tightly.”

Grimaud prepared to fulfil the officer’s request but the man signalled that he had something more to say. “Speak,” said the duke.

“Please, my Lord,” said La Ramée, “don’t forget, if I get in trouble because of you, that I have a wife and four children.”

“Don’t worry ... tightly, Grimaud.” In a moment La Ramée was gagged and laid on the ground, and then two or three chairs were overturned to indicate there’d been a struggle. Grimaud collected all the officer’s keys from his pockets; the first opened the door of the cell they were in, then locked it behind them after they left. They went quickly along the gallery that led to the small courtyard. The three doors along the way were speedily unlocked and opened by Grimaud in an impressive display of dexterity. Finally, they arrived at the tennis court; it was completely deserted, unlit and unguarded. The duke ran to the wall and saw, across the moat, three cavaliers holding two spare horses. The duke, excited to see them, exchanged waves with them. Meanwhile, Grimaud attached the rope ladder – or rather, what passed for one, a ball of silk cord with a rung at each end. One rung was lodged in the embrasure, the other the climber was to place behind his legs as he unwound the cord in descending. “Go,” said the duke.

“Me first, my Lord?” asked Grimaud.

“Quite so,” said the duke. “If they catch me, I go back into prison; if they catch you, you hang.”

“Fair enough,” said Grimaud.

And immediately, setting himself astride the lower rung, he began his perilous descent. The duke watched him with eyes wide in helpless terror, as three-quarters of the way down the wall, the cord suddenly broke, and Grimaud fell heavily into the dry-moat. Though the duke cried out, Grimaud didn’t even groan – but he had to be badly injured, as he remained lying where he’d fallen. At once one of the waiting men dropped down into the moat and untangled Grimaud from the cord, after which the other two helped him up and out. “Come down, My Lord,” called the first man. “The drop at the end is only fifteen feet, and the grass here is soft.”

The duke was already on his way. His task was more difficult without the lower rung for support – he had to descend fully fifty feet solely by the strength of his arms and wrists. But the duke, as we’ve said, was nimble, athletic, and cool in the face of danger; in less than five minutes, he was at the end of the cord that as the waiting gentleman had told him was only fifteen feet from the ground. He took a breath, closed his eyes, and dropped, landing harmlessly on his feet. Immediately he turned and began to climb out of the moat, at the top of which he met the Count of Rochefort. The other two gentlemen were unknown to him. Grimaud, knocked out, was tied to his horse. “Gentlemen,” said the prince, “I’ll thank you later but right now there’s not a moment to lose. Let’s ride! And if you love me, ride hard!”

And he sprang onto his horse and put it into a gallop, drawing the fresh air deep into his chest, and shouting, with a joy impossible to describe, “Free! Free! FREE!”

196

A Timely Arrival & a Hasty Departure

At Blois, d’Artagnan collected the sum that Mazarin, to speed his return, had authorised to cover his immediate needs. It took an ordinary rider four days to travel from Blois to Paris. D’Artagnan arrived at the Saint-Denis gate at about four in the afternoon of the third day. Once he would have done it in two. We’ve already seen that Athos, who set out three hours after him, had arrived twenty-four hours ahead of him. But Planchet had lost the habit of these wild, forced rides, and d’Artagnan chided him for his softness. “What do you mean, Sir? We did forty leagues in three days! I think that’s pretty good for a confectioner.”

“Have you really become just a grocer, Planchet – and now that we’re reunited, are you seriously thinking of returning to vegetate in your grocery?”

“Humph,” said Planchet. “You’re the only one still pursuing such an overactive life. Look at Sir Athos, now – does he spend his time seeking out strenuous adventures? No, he lives like a gentleman farmer, a true country lord. The tranquil life, Sir, is the only life.”

“Hypocrite!” said d’Artagnan. “We’re almost back to Paris, where there’s a rope and a scaffold waiting for you and your ‘tranquil life!’”

Indeed, as they were speaking the travellers rode up to the barrier at the gate. As they were entering a neighbourhood where he thought he might be recognised, Planchet pulled down the brim of his hat. D’Artagnan twisted his moustache and remembered that Porthos should be awaiting him in Rue Tiquetonne. He’d been considering how to tempt him away from his green domain of Bracieux and the heroic kitchens of Pierrefonds. Turning the corner of the Rue Montmartre, he saw, in one of the windows of the Hôtel de la Chevette, Porthos dressed in a sky-blue doublet edged with silver embroidery, and yawning so as to nearly dislocate his jaw, while passers-by gazed with respectful admiration upon such a gentleman, so handsome, so wealthy, and so bored with his own wealth and grandeur. D’Artagnan and Planchet had scarcely turned the corner when Porthos spotted them. “Hey, d’Artagnan!” he called. “God be praised! It’s you at last.”

“And good afternoon to you, too, old comrade!” d’Artagnan replied.

A small crowd of idle onlookers gathered around the riders as the house grooms took their horses by the bridle but at a frown from d’Artagnan and a gesture from Planchet the busybodies dispersed, since they weren’t quite sure why they’d gathered in the first place. Meanwhile Porthos had come down to the doorstep. “Ah, my dear friend,” he said, “I see my horses have been hard put to it.”

“So true!” said d’Artagnan. “My heart breaks for these noble creatures.”

“I feel the same – they need a proper stable,” said Porthos. “If it wasn’t for the hostess here, who looks fine and knows a joke when she hears it,” he said, smugly preening, “I’d have sought lodging elsewhere.”

The fair Madeleine, who’d appeared behind him, stopped when she heard this and turned pale as death, for she thought it would be the scene with the Swiss Guard all over again – but to her amazement d’Artagnan didn’t frown, and instead of getting angry, he said to Porthos with a laugh, “Yes, dear friend, I understand that the air of the Rue Tiquetonne can’t compare to that of the valley of Pierrefonds but don’t worry – I’ve got better prospects ahead.”

“Really? When?”

“Very soon, I hope.”

“Ah! All the better!”

Porthos’s exclamation was followed by a deep groan that came from beyond the angle of the door. D’Artagnan, dismounting, saw the silhouette of the bulging belly of Mousqueton, whose sad mouth was the source of the complaint. “So, you, too, my poor Sir Mouston, have moved into this boarding house?” d’Artagnan asked in a tone equal parts compassion and mockery.

“Yes – and he finds the cooking terrible,” said Porthos.

“Well, then, why not do it himself, as he did at Chantilly?” said d’Artagnan.

“Ah, Sir, I don’t have here, as we did there, the ponds of Sir Prince, filled with lovely fish, or the forests of His Highness, where one could take such fine partridges. As for the cellar here, I’ve inspected it in detail, and it’s deeply disappointing.”

“Truly, Sir Mouston,” said d’Artagnan, “I would pity you, if I didn’t have more pressing business to attend to.”

Then, taking Porthos aside: “My dear du Vallon,” he said, “your outfit is splendid that is appropriate, as I’m about to present you to the cardinal.”

“Bah! Are you really?” said Porthos, his eyes widening.

“Yes, my friend.”

“An official presentation?”

"Does that worry you?"

"No but I admit I'm anxious."

"Oh, don't worry! It's not like you have to deal with the old cardinal – this one won't overwhelm you with his majesty."

"All the same, d'Artagnan – it's the Court, you know!"

"Oh, my friend, there's no real Court these days."

"But – the queen!"

"And as I was about to add, there is no queen. Anyway, we certainly won't see her."

"You say, then, that we're going from here to the Royal Palace?"

"Right away. Only, so we won't be late, I'm going to have to borrow one of your horses."

"As you like. There are four of them in your stables, all at your disposal."

"Oh, one will be good enough for the moment."

"Should we bring our servants?"

"Yes, it wouldn't hurt to bring Mousqueton with us. As for Planchet, he has reasons for not appearing at Court."

"Like what?"

"He did some deeds that put him at odds with His Eminence."

"Mouston," said Porthos, "saddle Vulcan and Bayard."

"And for myself, Sir, shall I take Rustaud?"

"No, we're going on a ceremonial visit, so take a more stylish horse, like Phoebus or Superb."

"Ah!" breathed Mousqueton with relief. "So, we're just paying a visit?"

"My God, yes, Mouston, no more than that. Only – just in case – put your pistols in your saddle holsters. I have mine, already loaded."

Mouston sighed; he knew all about the kind of ceremonial visits one made while armed to the teeth. "In fact, d'Artagnan," said Porthos, complacently surveying his old lackey, "you're right, Mouston will do nicely – he looks quite magnificent."

D'Artagnan smiled. "And you," said Porthos, "aren't you going to change into a fresh outfit?"

"No, I'm fine as I am."

"But you're filthy with sweat and dust, and your boots are quite muddy!"

"All of which testifies to how eagerly I obey the cardinal's orders."

Mousqueton came back with three horses, fully equipped. D'Artagnan remounted as if he'd just had a week's rest. "Oh, Planchet!" he said. "I'll need the long rapier..."

"As for me," said Porthos, displaying a small dress sword with a golden hilt, "I have my court sword."

"Take your rapier, old friend."

"Why's that?"

"I'm not sure – just trust me and take it."

"My rapier, Mouston," commanded Porthos.

"But that's combat equipment, Sir!" replied Mouston. "Are we going on campaign? If so, tell me now, so I can take appropriate precautions."

"You know how it is, Mouston," said d'Artagnan. "With us, it's always appropriate to take precautions. Or has your memory grown so dim, you've forgotten that we don't usually spend our evenings at balls and serenades?"

"You're right – I should have known better," said Mousqueton, quickly arming himself from head to foot. "...Alas!"

They rode off at a trot and arrived at the Royal Palace at a quarter past seven. The streets were crowded, as it was the day of Pentecost, and as they rode by the citizens looked with surprise at these two cavaliers, one so shiny and fresh he might have come right out of a box, and the other so dusty he seemed to have come from a battlefield. Mousqueton also attracted the attention of the onlookers, who said, as the novel Don Quixote was then in vogue, that he looked like Sancho who, having lost one master, had found two others. Arriving in the palace antechamber, d'Artagnan found himself in familiar territory, as the musketeers of his own company were on guard duty. He called over the audience-controller and showed him the cardinal's letter that ordered him to return without losing a second. The audience-controller bowed and went in to announce him to His Eminence. D'Artagnan turned toward Porthos, who seemed agitated and was ever so slightly trembling. He smiled, leaned up toward Porthos's ear, and said, "Take courage, my brave friend! We no longer brave the eye of an eagle, we're just dealing with a vulture. Stand as straight as you did at the Saint-Gervais bastion, and don't bow too deeply to this Italian; it will give him the wrong impression of your worth."

"Well, all right," said Porthos.

The audience-controller returned. "Enter, Gentlemen," he said. "His Eminence awaits you."

In fact, Mazarin was seated in his study, poring over a list of names of those receiving pensions and benefits to see who he might safely strike off. He watched d'Artagnan and Porthos enter from the corner of his eye, and though that eye had sparkled with satisfaction at the audience-controller's announcement, he now pretended not to notice them. "Ah, is that you, Sir Lieutenant?" he said, looking up. "You've shown great diligence, and your arrival is welcome."

"Thank you, My Lord. I've come at Your Eminence's orders, and brought with me one of my old friends, Sir du Vallon, who once disguised his nobility under the name of Porthos."

Porthos bowed to the cardinal. "A magnificent cavalier indeed," said Mazarin.

Porthos shook his head slightly, and gave his giant shoulders a modest shrug. "He's the mightiest sword in the realm, My Lord," said d'Artagnan, "though many who know it'll not inform you of it – or can't."

Porthos saluted d'Artagnan. Mazarin loved handsomely turned-out soldiers almost as much as Frederick of Prussia would in a later era. He took a moment to admire Porthos's sinewy hands, broad shoulders, and steady eye. It seemed to him that he had before him the means of salvation of his ministry and the kingdom, carved from muscle and bone. He remembered that there had once been four such impressive musketeers. "And your other two friends?" he asked.

Porthos opened his mouth, thinking it was time to get a word in but d'Artagnan quelled him with a twitch of his eye. "Our other friends are engaged at present but will join us later."

Mazarin coughed lightly. "And Sir here, freer than they, has volunteered to rejoin the service?"

"Yes, My Lord, and out of sheer devotion, for Sir de Bracieux is quite wealthy."

"Wealthy?" said Mazarin, repeating the single word that always got his attention.

"An annual income of fifty thousand livres," said Porthos, speaking for the first time.

"Out of sheer devotion," continued Mazarin, with his cunning smile. "Sheer devotion, eh?"

"Perhaps My Lord no longer believes in such a thing?" d'Artagnan asked.

"Do you, Sir Gascon?" said Mazarin, resting his elbows on his desk and his chin on his hands.

"Me?" said d'Artagnan. "I think 'Devotion' makes a fine baptismal name, so long as it's followed by something more earthly. Everyone starts out more or less devoted but devotion eventually needs a reward."

"So, your friend – for example. What would he like to have as a reward for his devotion?"

"Well, my Lord! My friend has three magnificent estates: Vallon at Corbeil, Bracieux near Soissons, and Pierrefonds in the Valois. And what he would like is to have one of these estates elevated to a barony."

"Is that all?" said Mazarin, eyes sparkling at the happy idea that he could reward Porthos's devotion without opening his purse. "Is that all? Well, the thing can be arranged."

"Me, a baron!" cried Porthos, taking a step forward.

"I told you so," said d'Artagnan, stopping him with a movement of his hand, "and My Lord confirms it."

"And you, Sir d'Artagnan – what do you want?"

"My Lord," said d'Artagnan, "in September it will be twenty years since Cardinal Richelieu made me a lieutenant."

"Indeed – and you'd like Cardinal Mazarin to make you a captain."

D'Artagnan bowed. "Well, that's not an impossibility! We'll see, Gentlemen, we'll see. Now, Sir du Vallon," said Mazarin, "which do you prefer: to serve in the city, or go out on campaign?"

Porthos opened his mouth to answer. "My Lord," said d'Artagnan, "like me, Sir du Vallon prefers extraordinary services, that is to say, those missions that others consider insane or impossible."

This little Gasconade did not displease Mazarin, and it started him thinking. "Maybe but I must confess I summoned you here for a more sedentary task. I'm anxious about ... here, now! What's that noise?"

A great clamour came from the antechamber, the office door opened suddenly, and a man covered in dust rushed in, shouting, "Sir Cardinal? Where's His Eminence?"

Mazarin recoiled, thinking it was an assassin, and took shelter behind his chair. D'Artagnan and Porthos moved to put themselves between the cardinal and the newcomer. "Eh, Sir!" said Mazarin.

"What are you doing, bursting in here and shouting like some crier in the markets?"

"My Lord," said the officer so reproached, "I must tell you what I have to report quickly and in confidence. I'm Poins, Officer of the Guards at the dungeon of Vincennes."

The officer was so pale and distraught that Mazarin, convinced he brought news of importance, waved d'Artagnan and Porthos aside to make way for the messenger. The two cavaliers withdrew into a corner of the office. "Speak, Sir, and quickly," said Mazarin. "What is it then?"

"Just this, My Lord," said the messenger. "Sir de Beaufort has escaped from the Château de Vincennes."

Mazarin uttered a cry and turned even paler than the messenger. He fell back into his chair in a near-faint. "Escaped!" he gasped. "Beaufort – escaped?"

"From the parapet, My Lord, I saw him riding away."

"And you didn't shoot him?"

"He was out of range."

"But Chavigny, what was he doing?"

"He was away."

"And La Ramée?"

"He was found tied and gagged in the prisoner's cell, near a fallen poniard."

"But what about his assistant?"

"He was the duke's accomplice and escaped with him."

Mazarin groaned. "My Lord," said d'Artagnan, taking a step toward the cardinal.

"What?" said Mazarin.

"It seems to me Your Eminence is losing precious time."

"What do you mean?"

"If Your Eminence will order the prisoner pursued, he might still be caught. France is large, and it's sixty leagues to the closest border."

"And who would go after him?" cried Mazarin.

"For the love of God! Me!"

"You would arrest him?"

"Why not?"

"You would take the Duke Beaufort from amidst his armed allies?"

"If My Lord ordered it, I'd arrest the Devil himself. I'd grab him by the horns and haul him in."

"Me, too," said Porthos.

"You too?" said Mazarin, astonished. "But the duke won't give up without a fierce fight."

"Well!" said d'Artagnan, his eyes afire. "A fight! It's been a while since we had a good fight, isn't it, Porthos?"

"To battle!" said Porthos.

"And you think you can catch him?"

"Yes, if we're better mounted than he is."

"Then take whatever troops you want with you and go."

"At your orders, My Lord."

"At my orders," said Mazarin, taking a sheet of paper and writing a few lines.

"Add, My Lord that we may confiscate any horses we need along the way."

"Yes, yes," said Mazarin. "On the king's service! Take whatever you need and go!"

"Very good, My Lord."

"Sir du Vallon," said Mazarin, "you'll find your barony just beyond the Duke Beaufort – all you have to do is catch him. As for you, Sir d'Artagnan, I make no promises but if you bring him back, dead or alive, you may ask for what you will."

"To horse, Porthos!" said d'Artagnan, taking his friend by the arm.

"I'm with you," replied Porthos, with his serene composure.

And they ran down the grand staircase, gathering up guards as they passed, shouting, "To horse! To horse!"

Ten men were quickly assembled. D'Artagnan and Porthos mounted up, the former on Vulcan and the latter on Bayard while Mousqueton straddled Phoebus. "Follow me!" shouted d'Artagnan.

"Let's ride," said Porthos.

And they dug their spurs into the flanks of their noble steeds and galloped up Rue Saint-Honoré like a raging storm. "Well, now, Sir Baron!" called d'Artagnan. "I promised you some exercise, didn't I?"

"You did, Sir Captain!" replied Porthos. They glanced behind: Mousqueton, sweating even more than his horse, was right behind them, followed at a gallop by the ten troopers. The citizens gazed in amazement from their doorsteps as their excited dogs barked and nipped at the cavaliers' heels. At the corner of the Saint-Jean cemetery, d'Artagnan's horse knocked down a pedestrian but their business was too pressing to stop. The galloping troop continued on its way as if the horses had wings. But alas! Every action, however small, has its consequences, and we'll see how this one nearly led to the fall of the monarchy.

197 The Highway of the King

Headed toward Vincennes, they galloped through the Faubourg Saint-Antoine and soon found themselves outside the city, riding through a wood and then into a village. The horses seemed to stretch out more with every step, their red nostrils roaring like blazing furnaces. D'Artagnan, working the spurs, led Porthos by no more than two feet. Mousqueton followed by two lengths. The troopers trailed in a scattering behind, depending on the virtues of their horses. Coming over a crest d'Artagnan saw a group of people clustered along the moat where the Château de Vincennes faces Saint-Maur. He realised that must be from whence the prisoner had fled, and that was where he'd find more information. He reached the group within five minutes, followed successively by his troopers. The folk who made up the group were completely engrossed. They stared at the cord that still hung from the parapet and ended, broken, twenty feet from the ground. They estimated the height of the drop and shared theories of the escape. Nervous sentries passed along the top of the wall, peering down anxiously. A squad of soldiers, commanded by a sergeant, arrived to drive the idlers away from where the duke had taken to horseback. D'Artagnan went straight up to the sergeant. "My Officer," said the sergeant, "you can't linger here."

"Your orders don't apply to me," said d'Artagnan. "Has anyone gone after the fugitives?"

"Yes, Officer but unfortunately the escapees were well mounted."

"How many were there?"

"Four healthy, and one injured, whom they took with them."

"Four!" said d'Artagnan, looking at Porthos. "Did you hear that, Baron? Only four!"

A happy smile lit Porthos's face. "And how much of a lead do they have?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Two hours and a quarter, Officer."

"Two hours and a quarter, that's nothing. We're well mounted, aren't we, Porthos?"

Porthos sighed at the thought of what was ahead for his poor horses.

"Very well," said d'Artagnan. "Now that direction did they go?"

"As to that, Officer, I'm not supposed to say."

D'Artagnan drew a paper from his pocket. "The king's orders," he said.

"Speak to the governor then."

"And where is the governor?"

"He's away."

Anger coloured d'Artagnan's face; his brow furrowed, his temples flushed. "You wretch!" he said to the sergeant. "Do you think you can toy with me? Just wait."

He unfolded the paper and held it up in front of the sergeant with one hand, while with the other he drew a pistol and cocked it. "The king's orders, I said. Look at this and answer me, or I'll blow out your brains! Which way did they go?"

The sergeant saw that d'Artagnan was serious. "The road to Vendome!" he said.

"By what gate did they leave?"

"The Saint-Maur gate."

"If you're lying to me, dog, you hang tomorrow," said d'Artagnan.

"And if you catch up to them, you'll never return to hang me," muttered the sergeant. D'Artagnan shrugged, beckoned to his troop, and spurred on. "This way, gentlemen!" he cried, pointing toward the gate that gave onto Saint-Maur. But now that the duke had escaped, the gatekeeper thought it prudent to lock the gate. He had to be persuaded in the same way as the sergeant that cost them ten more minutes. That final obstacle passed, the troop resumed its ride with the same haste. But the horses couldn't maintain that pace, and after an hour's gallop, three balked and halted; one fell. D'Artagnan didn't pause, or even turn his head. In his calm voice, Porthos reported the loss to him. "As long as the two of us get there," said d'Artagnan. "Against four, we're plenty."

"True," said Porthos. And he put the spurs to his horse. After two hours, the horses had gone twelve leagues without a pause; their legs began to tremble, the foam blown from their muzzles speckled their riders' doublets, and their sweat soaked the riders' breeches. "Let's rest a few minutes to let these poor creatures breathe," said Porthos.

"No – we ride them to death, if we must," d'Artagnan said. "Look! Fresh tracks. They're no more than a quarter of an hour ahead of us."

And in fact, by the last rays of the setting sun, they could see the road was freshly furrowed by horses' hooves. They rode on – but two leagues later Mousqueton's horse staggered and fell. "Oh, great!" said Porthos. "There's Phoebus burned out."

"The cardinal will pay you ten thousand pistoles."

"Right you are!" said Porthos. "I'm over it."

"Resume the pursuit, at the gallop!"

"We'll if we can." But in fact, d'Artagnan's horse refused to take another step; his breathing shuddered to a halt, and a final touch of the spur, instead of reviving him, made him fall. "The devil!" said Porthos. "That's the end of Vulcan."

"Mordieu!" cried d'Artagnan, pulling out his hair by the handful. "Have I hit a wall? Porthos – give me your horse. But wait, what the devil are you doing?"

"For the love of God! I'm falling," said Porthos, "or rather, it's Bayard who falls."

D'Artagnan assisting, Porthos tried to spur the horse back up but suddenly blood gushed from its nostrils. "Three down!" said Porthos. "It's all over."

At that moment a neighing was heard. "Hush!" said d'Artagnan.

"What is it?"

"I heard a horse."

"It's just our companions rejoining us."

"No," said d'Artagnan, "it's ahead of us."

"Oh? Well that's something else entirely," said Porthos.

And he listened in his turn, focusing on the direction d'Artagnan had indicated. "Sir," said Mousqueton, who, having abandoned his horse on the highway, had just walked up to rejoin his maser, "Sir, Phoebus couldn't handle another..."

"Hush there!" said Porthos.

And just then a second neigh was borne to them on the night breeze. "They're about five hundred paces ahead of us," said d'Artagnan.

"True, Sir," said Mousqueton, "and five hundred paces ahead of us there happens to be a small hunting lodge."

"Mousqueton, your pistols," said d'Artagnan.

"They're ready, Sir."

"Porthos, do you have yours?"

"I have them."

"Well," d'Artagnan said, drawing his own, "do you get it, Porthos?"

"Not so much."

"We're riding in the king's service."

"So?"

"So, in the king's service, we require those horses."

"Right," said Porthos.

"No more talk then. Let's do it!" All three advanced through the dark, silent as ghosts. At a bend in the road, they saw a light shining through the trees. "There's the house," said d'Artagnan quietly. "I'll go first – follow my lead, Porthos." They glided from tree to tree and moved to within twenty paces of the house unnoticed. From that distance, thanks to a lantern hanging from a shed, they could see four horses of the finest quality. A groom was tending to them; nearby were saddles and bridles. D'Artagnan made a sign to his companions to stay a few steps behind him, and then moved quickly forward. "I'm buying these horses," he said to the groom. The man turned around, surprised but made no reply. "Didn't you hear what I said, dolt?" snapped d'Artagnan.

"I heard it," said the groom.

"Why didn't you answer me?"

"Because these horses aren't for sale."

"Nonetheless, I'm buying them," said d'Artagnan.

And he reached out for the closest horse. His two companions came up and did the same. “But gentlemen!” cried the groom. “They just travelled six leagues and have been unsaddled barely half an hour.”

“Then they’re already warmed up,” said d’Artagnan. “Half an hour’s rest is plenty.” The groom called for help. A steward came out just as d’Artagnan and his companions were getting the saddles on the horses. The steward began to object loudly. “My dear fellow,” said d’Artagnan, “say one more word and I’ll blow your brains out.” And he showed him the barrel of a pistol that he immediately tucked back under his arm so he could continue his work.

“But, Sir,” said the steward, “don’t you realise these horses belong to Sir Montbazon?”

“All the better,” said d’Artagnan. “That explains their quality.”

“Sir,” said the steward, backing away toward the door of the house, “I warn you, I’ll call for my people.”

“And I’ll call for mine,” said d’Artagnan. “I’m a lieutenant of the King’s Musketeers with ten troopers coming up behind me. Can’t you hear them? Then we’ll see.” No one heard anything but the steward went quietly back inside. “Are you ready, Porthos?” said d’Artagnan.

“I’ve finished.”

“And you, Mouston?”

“Me too.”

“Then into the saddle, and ride.”

The three sprang onto their horses, just as the steward reappeared. “There they are!” he shouted. “Quick! The pistols and carbines!”

“Off we go, before there’s musketry!” said d’Artagnan.

And they spurred off like the wind. “Help!” bellowed the steward as the groom appeared from another building with some armed men.

“Careful! They’ll kill your horses!” cried d’Artagnan, laughing.

“Fire!” replied the steward.

Sudden lightning lit the road, followed by a detonation, then the sound of bullets whistling past the riders. “They shoot like peasants,” said Porthos. “Marksmanship isn’t what it was in Sir Richelieu’s time. Do you remember the road to Crèvecoeur, Mousqueton?”

“Ah, Sir, my right buttock sure remembers it!”

“Are you certain we’re on the right track, d’Artagnan?” asked Porthos.

“For the love of God! Didn’t you hear what he said?”

“What?”

“That these horses belong to Sir Montbazon.”

“What of it?”

“What of it? Sir Montbazon is the husband of Madam de Montbazon...”

“He must be, no?”

“And Madam de Montbazon is the mistress of Sir Beaufort.”

“Ah, I get it,” said Porthos. “She provided the relays.”

“Exactly.”

“And now we’re chasing the duke on the horses he just left behind.”

“My dear Porthos, you really do possess a rare intelligence,” said d’Artagnan, half serious and half jesting.

“Bah!” said Porthos. “You must take me as I am.”

They ran the horses for an hour, until they were white with foam and blood streamed from their flanks. “Hey! What’s that I see ahead?” said d’Artagnan.

“You’re lucky you can see anything on a night like this,” said Porthos.

“Sparks!”

“Yes!” said Mousqueton. “I saw them too.”

“Ah ha!” said Porthos. “Have we caught up to them?”

“Here we go – a dead horse,” said d’Artagnan, reining in his own horse as it shied. “It seems they’re also reaching the end of their breath.”

“I think I hear a troop of riders ahead,” said Porthos, bending forward over his horse’s mane.

“A troop? Impossible.”

“No, there are a lot of them.”

“All right, if you say so.”

“Here’s another horse!” said Porthos.

“Dead?”

“No, dying.”

“Saddled or unsaddled?”

“Saddled.”

“That’s them, then.”

“Courage! We have them.”

“But if they’re so many,” said Mousqueton, “we don’t have them, they have us.”

“Bah!” said d’Artagnan. “They’ll think they’re outnumbered, since they’re caught up – they’ll be afraid and scatter.”

“Right,” said Porthos.

“Ah! Look there,” cried d’Artagnan.

“Yes, more sparks – this time I saw them, too,” said Porthos.

“Forward!” d’Artagnan shouted. “Five minutes from now we’ll be laughing.” And they hurtled ahead. The horses, furious from pain and fatigue, flew up the dark highway, and ahead they began to see a dark mass moving against the horizon.

198
Encounter

They continued the chase for ten more minutes. Suddenly, two black blots detached themselves from the dark mass ahead, approached, grew, and assumed the silhouettes of two riders. “Uh-oh,” said d’Artagnan. “They’re coming to us.”

“Too bad for them,” said Porthos.

“Who’s that?” cried a hoarse voice.

The three riders dashed ahead without pause or reply, though from the approaching phantoms they heard the sound of swords being drawn and of pistols being cocked. “Reins in your teeth!” said d’Artagnan.

Porthos understood, and then he and d’Artagnan each drew a pistol left-handed and cocked it. “Who’s that?” the voice cried a second time. “Not one more step or you’re dead!”

“Bah!” replied Porthos, nearly choking on dust and chewing the reins as his horse was chewing his bit. “We’ve heard that before.”

At these words the two shadows reined up, barred the way, and starlight glinted from the barrels as they aimed their pistols. “Back off!” cried d’Artagnan. “Or it’s you who’ll be dead.”

Two pistol shots replied to this threat, and the shooters followed their shots so closely that they were upon their opponents a moment later. A third pistol cracked, fired at close range by d’Artagnan, and an enemy fell. As for Porthos, he struck his opponent with his sword so hard that, though the blade was turned, he sent the man tumbling ten paces from his horse. “Finish him, Mousqueton!” said Porthos. And he spurred forward to catch up to his friend, who had already resumed the pursuit. “Well?” said Porthos.

“Head shot,” shrugged d’Artagnan. “And you?”

“Just knocked him out of the saddle – but wait...”

They heard the crack of a carbine: it was Mousqueton, following his master’s orders as he passed. “Two down!” said d’Artagnan. “First trick to us.”

“Yes,” said Porthos, “but here come some more players.”

In fact, two more equestrians appeared to have detached from the main group and were hastening back to bar the road once more. This time d’Artagnan didn’t even wait for them to address him. “Make way!” he cried first. “Make way!”

“What are you after?” said a voice.

“The duke!” shouted Porthos and d’Artagnan with one voice.

The response was a burst of laughter but it ended in a whimper, as d’Artagnan ran the man through with his sword. At the same time two pistols boomed as Porthos and his adversary fired at each other. D’Artagnan turned and saw Porthos right behind him. “Bravo, Porthos!” he said to him. “Do you think you killed him?”

“I think I killed his horse,” said Porthos.

“Well, what would you have? You can’t hit the bull’s-eye every time – so long as you’re on the target, we can’t complain ... hey! For God’s sake! What’s wrong with my horse?”

“Your horse is done in,” said Porthos, reining in his own.

Indeed, d’Artagnan’s horse stumbled, fell to its knees, then groaned and lay down. It had been struck in the chest by his first opponent’s bullet. D’Artagnan’s curses were sharp enough to crack the sky.

“Does Sir need a horse?” said Mousqueton.

“By God! I’ll say,” cried d’Artagnan.

“Take this one,” said Mousqueton.

“How the devil do you have two horses?” said d’Artagnan, jumping on the second one.

“Their masters were dead, and I thought they might come in handy, so I took them.”

Meanwhile Porthos was reloading his pistols.

“Heads up!” said d’Artagnan. “Here come two more.”

“They keep coming like there’s no tomorrow,” said Porthos.

Indeed, two more riders were rapidly approaching. “Watch out, Sir!” said Mousqueton. “The one you unhorsed has gotten up.”

“Why didn’t you treat him like the first one?”

“I was busy rounding up the horses.”

A shot rang out and Mousqueton screamed in pain. “Ah, no, Sir! Not the other one! It’s like the road to Amiens all over again!”

Porthos turned and leapt like a lion on the dismounted rider, who tried to draw his sword but before it was out of its scabbard Porthos had cracked his head with such a blow from his pommel that he dropped like an ox under the butcher’s axe. Mousqueton, groaning, slid down from his horse, as his wound wouldn’t let him stay in the saddle. Watching the approaching riders, d’Artagnan had paused to reload his pistol, and discovered that his new horse had a carbine in a long saddle holster. “I’m back!” said Porthos. “Do we wait for them or charge?”

“We charge,” said d’Artagnan.

“We charge!” said Porthos.

They dug their spurs into their horses. The oncoming riders were no more than twenty paces from them. “In the king’s name!” cried d’Artagnan. “Let’s pass.”

“There’s no king here,” replied a dark, resonant voice that seemed to come from a cloud as the rider came wreathed in a mist of dust.

“And I say the king is everywhere,” said d’Artagnan.

“We’ll see,” said the same voice. Two shots rang out simultaneously, one from d’Artagnan, the other from Porthos’s adversary. D’Artagnan’s ball shot off his enemy’s hat, while the bullet from Porthos’s opponent tore out the throat of his horse that collapsed with a groan. “For the last time, where do you think you’re going?” said the same dark voice.

“To the Devil!” d’Artagnan replied.

“Fine! I’ll send you to him.” D’Artagnan saw him bring up the barrel of a musket; there was no time to reach for his holsters but he remembered some advice Athos had once given him and made his horse rear. The musket ball struck his mount in the belly. D’Artagnan felt his horse going down, and with marvellous agility he leapt off, landing safely. “What’s this?” said the same vibrant and mocking voice. “We’re not here to slaughter horses but men! Draw your sword, Sir! Draw your sword!”

And the man leapt down from his horse. “Let it be swords, then,” said d’Artagnan, “because the sword’s my business.”

In two bounds d’Artagnan was within reach of his opponent and felt his steel on his enemy’s. D’Artagnan, cool as ever, engaged him in fierce, his favourite guard. Meanwhile Porthos knelt, a pistol in each hand, behind his dying horse that writhed in convulsions of agony. But the mêlée was on between d’Artagnan and his opponent. D’Artagnan launched his usual fierce attack – but this time he met a strength and skill that gave him pause. He attacked twice in fourth, then stepped back but his adversary didn’t advance into the trap; d’Artagnan resumed his attack in fierce. Each lunged and parried twice but flying sparks were the only result. Finally, d’Artagnan thought he saw the opportunity to unleash his favourite feint; he lunged with finesse, drew his opponent’s point out of line, then remised like lightning, sure that he had him. The remise was parried. “God be with you!” he swore in his Gascon accent.

At this exclamation, his opponent sprang back and cocked his head, as if trying to see through the gloom. Meanwhile d’Artagnan, fearing a feint, fell into a defensive guard. “Take care,” said Porthos to his opponent. “I still have two loaded pistols.”

“Then I give you leave to shoot first,” his adversary replied.

Porthos fired, the flash lighting up the battlefield. At this sudden light, both fencers cried out. “Athos!” said d’Artagnan.

“D’Artagnan!” said Athos. Athos raised his sword’s point; d’Artagnan lowered his. “Aramis!” called Athos. “Don’t shoot.”

“Oh ho, is that you, Aramis?” said Porthos.

And he tossed away his second pistol. Aramis holstered his own pistol and sheathed his sword. “My son!” said Athos, extending his hand to d’Artagnan.

It was what he used to call d’Artagnan in the old days. “Athos,” said d’Artagnan, wringing his hands, “so you’re defending the duke? And here I’m, having sworn to take him dead or alive. Agh! I’m dishonoured.”

“Kill me then,” said Athos, lowering his guard, “if your honour requires my death.”

“Oh! Devil take me!” cried d’Artagnan. “There’s only one man in the world who could stop me and fate put him in my path. Gah! What am I going to tell the cardinal?”

“You will tell him, Sir,” said a voice that rang out over the battlefield, “that he sent against me the only two men who could beat four other cavaliers, fight the Count of La Fère and the Knight d’Herblay to a standstill, and then yield to fifty more.”

“The prince!” said Athos and Aramis, stepping aside to make way for the Duke Beaufort while d’Artagnan and Porthos took a step back.

“Fifty more!” muttered Porthos and d’Artagnan.

“Look around you, Gentlemen, if you doubt me,” said the duke. D’Artagnan and Porthos did look around and saw that they were surrounded by equestrians. “By the sound of the encounter,” said the duke, “I thought you must be twenty men. Fed up with fleeing, and ready for a little sword work, I turned back with my entire troop, to find you were only two.”

“Yes, My Lord,” said Athos, “but you were not in error, for these two are worth twenty.”

“Come, Gentlemen – surrender your swords,” said the duke.

“Our swords!” said d’Artagnan, raising his head and regaining his self-possession. “Our swords! Never!”

“Never!” said Porthos.

The riders began to close in. “One moment, My Lord,” said Athos. “A few words.”

He approached the prince, who leaned toward him and listened as he whispered. “Whatever you say, Count,” said the prince. “I’m too much in your debt to refuse your first request. Fall back, Gentlemen,” he said to his escort. “Gentlemen d’Artagnan and du Vallon, you’re free to go.”

The order was followed immediately, and d’Artagnan and Porthos found themselves at the centre of a widening circle. “Dismount now, d’Herblay,” said Athos, “and come with me.”

Aramis got down and approached Porthos, as Athos came up to d’Artagnan. The Four were thus reunited. “Friends,” said Athos, “are you still sorry you didn’t shed our blood?”

“No,” said d’Artagnan. “My only regret is to see us pitted against each other, when before we’d always been together. Alas! We’ll never succeed at anything again.”

“Never, my God. It’s over,” said Porthos.

“Well, then! Why don’t you join us?” said Aramis.

“Silence, d’Herblay,” said Athos. “Don’t make such a proposal to gentlemen such as these. If they’ve joined Mazarin’s faction, their honour is engaged, just as ours is to the side of the princes.”

“But meanwhile, we’re enemies,” said Porthos. “Blue blood! Who’d have thought it?”

D’Artagnan said nothing, just sighed. Athos looked at them, then took up their hands in his. “Gentlemen,” he said, “the matter is serious, and my heart suffers as if you’d pierced it through. Yes, it’s the sad truth that we are on opposite sides – but we haven’t declared war on each other. Perhaps we can come to an understanding. I believe a private conference is called for.”

“As for me, I agree,” said Aramis.

“Then I agree, as well,” d’Artagnan said proudly.

Porthos nodded in assent. “Let’s set a place of rendezvous,” continued Athos, “somewhere convenient to all, where we can state our positions and decide how we shall conduct ourselves vis-à-vis each other.”

“Fine!” said the other three.

“So, we’re agreed?”

“Entirely!”

“Well, then! Where shall it be?”

“How about the Place Royale?” asked d’Artagnan.

“In Paris?”

“Yes.”

Athos looked at Aramis, who nodded. “The Place Royale then!” said Athos.

“And when?”

“Tomorrow night, if that suits you.”

“You’ll be there?”

“Yes.”

“What time?”

“Would ten o’clock at night be convenient?”

“Perfectly so.”

“Then,” said Athos, “whether we settle on peace or war, friends, our personal honour, at least, will be satisfied.”

“Maybe so,” murmured d’Artagnan, “but our honour as soldiers is lost to us.”

“D’Artagnan,” said Athos gravely, “what wounds me more deeply is that circumstances have caused us to cross swords with each other. Yes,” he continued, shaking his head sorrowfully, “yes, as you said, evil times are upon us. Come, Aramis.”

“While we, Porthos,” said d’Artagnan, “must go back and confess our shame to the cardinal.”

“But be sure you mention,” shouted a voice that d’Artagnan recognised as the voice of Rochefort, “that I’m not yet too old to be a man of action!”

“Is there anything I can do for you, Gentlemen?” asked the prince.

“Bear witness that we did all we could, my Lord.”

“Rest easy, I’ll see to that. Goodbye, Gentlemen – I hope to meet you again sometime, perhaps in Paris, and then you may have your revenge.”

With these words, the duke waved to them in salute, put his horse into a gallop, and rode off, followed by his escort, who disappeared into the night, the sound of their hoof beats dwindling until it was lost. D’Artagnan and Porthos found themselves alone on the king’s highway, except for a man holding the bridles of two spare horses. They thought it was Mousqueton and approached him. “But who’s this?” cried d’Artagnan. “Is that you, Grimaud?”

“Grimaud!” said Porthos.

Grimaud just nodded to tell the two friends that they weren’t mistaken. “And whose horses are these?” asked d’Artagnan.

“Where do they come from?” asked Porthos.

“Sir Count of La Fère.”

“Athos, Athos,” murmured d’Artagnan. “The consummate gentleman! You really do think of everything.”

“And just in time!” said Porthos. “I was afraid we were going to have to walk.”

He climbed into the saddle. D’Artagnan did the same. “Well, now! So where are you off to, Grimaud? Are you leaving your master?”

“Yes,” said Grimaud. “I go to join the Viscount of Bragelonne with the army in Flanders.”

For a while they rode together in silence down the road back to Paris, until they suddenly heard groans that seemed to rise out of a ditch. “What’s that?” asked d’Artagnan.

“That,” said Porthos, “is Mousqueton.”

“Oh, yes, Sir, it’s me,” said a sad voice from a shadow by the side of the road.

Porthos rushed to his steward, to whom he was really quite attached. “Were you badly wounded, my dear Mouston?” he said.

“Mouston!” said Grimaud, eyes wide.

“No, Sir, I don’t think so – but I’m injured in an embarrassing way.”

“So, you can’t ride a horse?”

“No, Sir – and what am I to do?”

“Can you walk?”

“I’ll try, at least as far as the first house we come to.”

“What are we going to do?” said d’Artagnan. “We have to get back to Paris.”

“I’ll take care of Mousqueton,” said Grimaud.

“Thanks, that’s good of you, Grimaud!” said Porthos.

Grimaud dismounted and went to lend a hand to his old friend, who greeted him tearfully, though Grimaud wasn’t sure whether the tears were due to their reunion or his injury. As for d’Artagnan and Porthos, they rode silently back to Paris. Three hours later they were passed by a dusty courier, a messenger sent by the duke with a letter for the cardinal in which, as the prince had promised, he bore witness to the deeds of Porthos and d’Artagnan. Mazarin had already passed a miserable night before this letter arrived, in which the prince announced that he was free and ready to undertake a war to the death. The cardinal read it two or three times, then folded it, put it into his pocket, and said, “Though d’Artagnan has failed, what consoles me at least is that on his way he trampled Broussel.

That Gascon is a valuable man and serves me even in his clumsiness.” The cardinal was referring to the man whom d’Artagnan had knocked over in Paris at the corner of Saint-Jean who was none other than the worthy Councillor Broussel.

199
Pierre Broussel, the Good Councillor

But unfortunately for Cardinal Mazarin, and despite his malicious hopes, the worthy Councillor Broussel had not been exterminated. It was true, he had been quietly crossing Rue Saint-Honoré when d’Artagnan’s speeding steed had struck him in the shoulder and knocked him into the mud. As we said, at the time d’Artagnan hadn’t paid any attention to the event, not realising its significance. Besides, d’Artagnan shared the deep disdain that the nobility of that period, and especially the nobility of the sword, felt for the bourgeoisie. He paid no mind to the small man dressed in black, though he was the cause of the man’s misfortune. No one even heard him cry out until after the storm of armed cavaliers had thundered past; only then was the injury noticed. Passers-by ran up to the moaning man and asked him his name, title, and address; and when told that his name was Broussel, he was a councillor of parliament, and he lived in Rue Saint-Landry, an angry cry went up from the gathering crowd, a cry so terrible and threatening that the wounded man feared another hurricane was about to pass over him. “Broussel!” they cried. “Broussel, our dear father! He who defended our rights against Mazarin! Broussel, the friend of the people – trampled, nearly killed by those Cardinalist scoundrels! To arms! To arms!”

Within moments the crowd became an immense mob. They commandeered a passing carriage to convey the little councillor home but an outraged citizen said that, in the wounded man’s state, the movement of the coach would make him worse. The zealot proposed that the crowd carry him by hand, a proposal that was enthusiastically and unanimously accepted. No sooner said than done: the people lifted him, with gentle menace, and bore him away, the crowd like a grumbling giant in a fable lumbering along while cradling a dwarf in its arms. Broussel must have had some idea how attached the Parisians had become to him – after all, he hadn’t spent three years sowing the seeds of opposition to the cardinal without hoping to someday reap rewards in popularity. So, this demonstration made him pleased and proud but though it showed the extent of his power, the triumph was shadowed by anxiety. Already suffering from wounds and bruises, he feared at every corner to see the crowd confronted by a troop of guards or musketeers, who might charge his mob – and who then would be triumphant?

He couldn’t help recalling that whirlwind of cavaliers, that iron-hooved hurricane that had thrown him down so pitilessly. And so, he kept repeating, in a voice growing ever fainter, “Hurry, my children, make haste, for truly I am suffering.” But at each of these complaints, the cries and curses of those who bore him redoubled. They finally brought him, though not without further bumps and bruises, to Broussel’s own house. Those who had surged on ahead already filled the street, and his neighbours thronged their windows and doorways. At the window of his own house, above a narrow door, could be seen an old servant woman who cried out in dismay, beside another woman, also elderly, who wept copiously. These two, clearly upset, kept asking the crowd what had happened but received only confused and contradictory responses. But when the councillor, carried between eight men, was brought pale and apparently dying to the steps of his house, his lady, Goodwife Broussel, and her maid disappeared from the window to reappear at the door. There the maid, raising her arms to the sky, rushed down the stairs to her master, crying out, “Oh, my God! My God! If Friquet is here, send him for a surgeon!”

And Friquet, of course, was there. What gamin of Paris wouldn’t be?

Friquet had naturally taken advantage of the Pentecost holiday to ask his innkeeper for the day off, a request that couldn’t be refused, as it had been a condition of his employment that he needn’t work during the year’s four chief holidays. So Friquet was already at the head of the mob. It had occurred to him that probably he ought to fetch a surgeon but he found it more amusing to shout his head off, crying, “They’ve killed Sir Broussel! Broussel, the father of the people! Vive Sir Broussel!” This was much more fun than scouring the streets for a doctor just so he could say, “Come, Sir Surgeon, good Councillor Broussel needs you.”

Unfortunately for Friquet, who’d assumed a leading role in the procession, he had the imprudence to jump on the sill of the house’s ground floor window to exhort the crowd to greater outrage – and there his mother saw him and sent him to find a doctor. Then she took the councillor in her arms and tried to carry him inside but at the bottom of the stairs Broussel stood up and said he felt strong enough to make it on his own. He also asked Gervaise that was the name of his maid, to try to dismiss the crowd but Gervaise wasn’t listening. “Oh, my poor master!” she cried. “My dear master!”

“Yes, yes, Gervaise,” said Broussel, trying to calm her. “It’s nothing, really.”

“Nothing, when you are crushed, annihilated, destroyed!”

“No, no, really, it’s nothing,” said Broussel, “or almost nothing, anyway.”

“Nothing, and you covered in mud! Nothing, and you with blood in your hair! Ah, my God, my God, my poor master!”

“Hush, now!” said Broussel. “Hush!”

“But the blood, my God, the blood!” cried Gervaise. “A doctor! A doctor!”

“A doctor!” the crowd howled. “A surgeon! Councillor Broussel is dying! Mazarin has killed him!”

“Oh my God!” cried Broussel. “This is awful! This mob is going to burn down the house!”

“Then go up to the window to show them you’re all right, master!”

“A plague on that!” said Broussel. “That’s what kings do. Tell them I’m getting better, Gervaise – tell them I’m going to go, not to the window but to bed, and to please go away!”

“But why should they go away? They’re here to honour you!”

“Oh, can’t you see?” said Broussel, desperate. “They’ll honour me by getting me hanged! Now come on! My wife’s fainting dead away.”

“Broussel! Broussel!” cried the crowd. “Vive Broussel! A surgeon for Broussel!”

They made such a clamour that what Broussel feared came to pass: a platoon of guards appeared and began to clear the crowd from the street with their musket butts. At the first cry of “The guard! The guard!”

Broussel, trembling for fear they’d take him for the instigator of the riot, sought refuge by hiding under his bed. At the guards’ assault, the crowd crying for Broussel was forced to fall back, and old Gervaise was finally able to shut the front door. But the door was scarcely shut, with Gervaise on her way up to find her master, when it began to resound with knocking. Madam Broussel, ahead of Gervaise, found her husband by his shoes sticking out from under their bed, where he was shaking like a leaf. “Go see who’s knocking, Gervaise,” called Broussel, “and don’t open the door unless you have to.”

Gervaise took a look. “It’s Sir Blancmesnil, the president of parliament,” she said.

“Oh, no problem, then,” said Broussel. “Open up.”

“Well!” said the president, coming in. “What have they done to you, my dear Broussel? I hear you’re nearly assassinated!”

“In fact, it seems likely they were trying to kill me,” said Broussel so firmly it almost seemed stoic.

“My poor friend! Yes, though they started with you, they have to destroy all of us, and since they can’t defeat us en masse, they’ll try to take us one by one.”

“If I survive,” said Broussel, “I shall crush them, all of them, under the weight of my words!”

“You’ll recover,” said Blancmesnil, “and I don’t doubt you’ll make them pay dearly for this attack.”

Meanwhile Madam Broussel was crying, and Gervaise was in despair. “What’s this?” cried a handsome and burly young man as he rushed into the room. “My father, wounded?”

“He’s a victim of tyranny,” said Blancmesnil, “and yet a true Spartan.”

“Oh!” cried the young man, turning toward the door. “They’ll pay, whoever dared to touch you!”

“Jacques,” said the councillor, getting up, “for now, just go get a doctor.”

“I hear more cries from the people,” said the old woman. “Friquet has probably found one – no, wait, it’s a carriage.”

Blancmesnil looked out the window. “It’s the coadjutor!” he said.

“The coadjutor!” repeated Broussel. “My God! I must go down to meet him!”

And the councillor, forgetting his wounds, started to rush downstairs to meet Sir Gondy but Blancmesnil stopped him. “Well, my dear Broussel,” said the coadjutor, coming in, “what’s this we hear?

Tales of ambushes and assassinations! My doctor’s house was on the way, so I brought him with me. Ah, Hello, Sir Blancmesnil!”

“Oh, Sir,” said Broussel, “what thanks I owe you! It’s true, I was cruelly knocked down and trampled by the King’s Musketeers.”

“Say, rather, the musketeers of Cardinal Mazarin,” said the coadjutor. “But we’ll make him pay for this, never fear. Won’t we, Sir Blancmesnil?”

Blancmesnil was still bowing when the door was thrust open by the hands of a porter. He was followed by a footman in full livery, who loudly announced, “Sir Duke Longueville!”

“What?” cried Broussel, “The duke, here? What an honour for me! Ah, My Lord!”

“I come to decry the terrible fate suffered by our brave defender,” said the duke. “Are you wounded, my dear Councillor?”

“If I were, your visit would heal me, My Lord.”

“But you suffer, though?”

“A great deal,” said Broussel.

“I brought along my personal doctor,” said the duke. “May he come in?”

“How’s that?” said Broussel.

The duke motioned to his footman, who ushered in a man in black. “We both had the same idea, My Lord,” the coadjutor said.

The two doctors looked each other over. “Ah, is that you, Sir Coadjuteur?” said the duke. “The friends of the people all share the same goal.”

“I was alarmed by the clamour and came running – but I think the most important thing is for our doctors tend to our brave councillor.”

“What, in front of everyone?” said Broussel, intimidated.

“Why not? You’re a victim of tyranny, and in the name of justice, we must bear witness to your injuries.”

“Dear God, is that more shouting?” cried Madam Broussel.

“No, it’s applause,” said Blancmesnil, dashing to the window.

“What?” cried Broussel, pale as death. “What is it now?”

“It’s the livery of the Prince de Conti!”* cried Blancmesnil. “The Prince de Conti himself!”

The coadjutor and the Duke Longueville shared a look and tried not to laugh. The doctors had started to unbutton Broussel’s clothes but the councillor stopped them. At that moment the Prince de Conti came in. “Ah, Gentlemen!” the prince said, seeing the duke and the coadjutor. “You have anticipated me! But don’t blame me for being late, my dear Sir Broussel. When I heard about your accident, I thought you might need a doctor, so I went to get mine. How are you, and what’s the story of this assassination everyone’s talking about?”

Broussel tried to talk but words failed him; he was crushed by the weight of the honour done to him. “Come in, then, Doctor, and take a look,” said the Prince de Conti to a man in black who entered after him.

“Gentlemen,” said one of the first two doctors, “This isn’t an examination, it’s a consultation.”

“If you like,” said the prince. “Just reassure us about the condition of our dear councillor.”

The three doctors approached the bed, into which Broussel had retreated and pulled up the covers but despite his best efforts he was stripped and examined. They found no wounds but a bruise on the arm, and another on the thigh. The three doctors shared a significant look – never had three of the most learned physicians of the faculty of Paris been convened over such a trifle. “Well?” said the coadjutor.

“Well?” said the duke.

“Well?” said the prince.

“We hope that sir will never suffer an actual accident,” said one of the doctors. “We’ll be in the next room until you need us.”

“Broussel! How is Broussel?” shouted the people. “What’s the news about Broussel?”

The coadjutor stepped to the window. At the sight of him, the people fell silent.

“My friends,” he said, “have no fear. Sir Broussel is out of danger. However, his wounds are serious, and rest is required.”

Shouts of “Long live Broussel! Long live the coadjutor!” echoed down the street.

Sir Longueville was jealous and went to show himself at the window next. “Long live Sir Longueville!” someone obligingly cried.

"My friends," said the duke, waving, "go home in peace, and don't give our enemies the pleasure of suppressing a riot."

"Well said, Sir Duct!" said Broussel from his bed. "Now that was good, plain speaking."

"Friends and gentlemen of Paris!" said the Prince de Conti, taking his turn at the window to get his share of applause. "Sir Broussel has heard you! But he is in need of rest, and the clamour disturbs him."

"Long live the Prince de Conti!" shouted the crowd as the prince saluted them.

The three lords then took leave of the councillor, and the crowd that had gathered on Broussel's behalf became their escort. They all moved off toward the docks, still calling Broussel's name. The old maid, stupefied, regarded her master with admiration. The councillor had grown at least a foot in her eyes. "That's what it's like when a man serves his country with good conscience," said Broussel with satisfaction.

After an hour of deliberation, the doctors came out and bathed his bruises with salt and water. Meanwhile, the procession of carriages of the important and self-important kept coming. All day long the luminaries of the Fronde came to call on Broussel. "What a great triumph, Father!" said the young son who didn't quite grasp the real motive all these churchmen, lords, and princes had for visiting his injured parent.

"Alas, my dear Jacques!" said Broussel. "I fear this will be an expensive triumph and unless I'm wrong, even now Sir Mazarin is figuring out how to make us pay for it." Friquet finally returned at midnight, never having found a doctor.

4 Old Friends Prepare for a Council

"Well!" said Porthos, sitting in the courtyard of the Hôtel de La Chevette, as d'Artagnan returned from the Royal Palace with a grim expression. "So, he took it badly, my brave friend?"

"My faith, yes! Really, what an ugly beast that man can be. What are you eating there, Porthos?"

"As you see, I'm soaking a biscuit in a glass of Spanish honey. Give it a try."

"I will. Gimblou! A glass!"

The lad who enjoyed this euphonious name brought the requested glass, and d'Artagnan sat down next to his friend. "How did it go?"

"Dame! Well, of course, there are two ways to report a failure. I walked in, he looked at me sideways, I shrugged my shoulders and said, 'My Lord, we were outnumbered.' 'Yes,' he said, 'so I've heard – however, give me the details.' But you know, Porthos, I couldn't give him the details without naming our friends that would be a disaster."

"For the love of God!"

"My Lord,' I said, 'they were fifty, and we were two.' 'Indeed,' he said, 'but nonetheless I hear there was an exchange of pistol shots.' 'In fact, both sides burned some powder,' I said. 'And your swords saw the light of day?' 'Say, rather, the starlight, My Lord,' I replied."

"Oh that!" continued the cardinal. 'And I thought you're a Gascon.'

'I'm always a Gascon – when I succeed, my Lord.' That answer pleased him and he laughed. 'That will teach me, to give my guards better horses,' he said, 'for if they'd been able to keep up with you, and had done as well as you and your friend, you would have kept your promise to bring the duke back dead or alive.'"

"Well, that's not so bad," said Porthos.

"Eh, well, not so bad, maybe but not so well," said d'Artagnan. "My, how these biscuits soak up the honey! They're like sponges! Gimblou, another bottle."

The bottle came with a speed that showed what esteem d'Artagnan was held in the establishment. He continued, "I began to retire but he called me back. 'You had three horses killed from under you?' he asked me. 'Yes, My Lord,' I said. 'How much were they worth?'"

"A fine question, it speaks well of him," said Porthos.

"A thousand pistoles,' I said."

"A thousand pistoles!" said Porthos. "That's rather high! If he knows horseflesh, he'd have to haggle."

"I could tell he wanted to, the weasel, because he winced and gave me a look. But then he nodded, reached into a drawer, and pulled out some bearer bonds drawn on the Bank of Lyon."

"For a thousand pistoles?"

"Exactly, and not a sou more, the miser."

"And you have them?"

"Here they are."

"My faith! That seems quite proper," said Porthos.

"Proper! Is 'proper' good enough when lives were at risk, and when I've done him a huge favour?"

"A huge favour? What was that?"

"By our Lady! It seems I ran over a troublesome councillor of parliament."

"Really! Would that be the little man in black at the corner of the Saint-Jean cemetery?"

"That's the one. A troublemaker. Unfortunately, I merely knocked him down, and he'll recover to bedevil us again."

"And to think that I swerved to avoid him when I could have squashed him flat," said Porthos. "Now there's a lesson for next time."

"I should have had a bonus for that!"

"Well, to be fair, he wasn't totally crushed."

"Bah! Richelieu would have said, 'Here's five hundred crowns for running down that councillor!' But enough about that. What were your horses really worth, Porthos?"

"Ah, my friend, if poor Mousqueton were here, he could tell you, to the livre, denier, and sou."

"Whatever! So long as I was close."

"Well, Vulcan and Bayard cost me around two hundred pistoles apiece, while Phoebus was nearly a hundred and fifty, as I recall."

"So, we're four hundred and fifty pistoles to the good," said d'Artagnan, pleased.

"Yes," said Porthos, "but there's still the saddles and tack."

"For the love of God, that's true. How much was the tack?"

"Say, a hundred pistoles for all three..."

"All right, a hundred pistoles," said d'Artagnan. "That still leaves three hundred fifty more." Porthos nodded in agreement. "Let's give fifty pistoles to our hostess for our expenses, and divide the remaining three hundred," said d'Artagnan.

"Split it up," said Porthos.

"A paltry pay-out," murmured d'Artagnan, putting the bills in two piles.

"As usual!" said Porthos. "Did he say anything else?"

"What about?"

"Oh, well ... about me?"

"Ah, right!" said d'Artagnan, afraid of discouraging his friend by telling him the cardinal hadn't mentioned him. "Right! Uh, he said..."

"He said?" replied Porthos.

"Wait, I want to remember his exact words: he said, 'As to your friend, tell him he can sleep soundly.'"

"Good," said Porthos. "That tells me clear as day that he still intends to make me a baron."

At that moment nine o'clock sounded from the nearby church. D'Artagnan started. "Oh!" said Porthos. "There's nine striking now, and at ten, you remember, we've that rendezvous at the Place Royale."

"Bah! Don't mention it, Porthos!" snapped d'Artagnan, with an impatient gesture. "Don't remind me – that's what I've been sulking about since yesterday. I won't go."

"Not go? But why?" asked Porthos.

"Because it's too painful to meet with the two men who foiled our mission."

"Foiled? It was a draw," replied Porthos. "Neither side had the advantage – I still had a loaded pistol and you two were facing each other, sword in hand."

"Yes," said d'Artagnan. "But if there's a hidden scheme behind this rendezvous..."

"Oh, d'Artagnan, you don't believe that," Porthos said.

It was true – d'Artagnan didn't believe Athos was capable of anything underhanded but he was looking for an excuse not to go to the rendezvous. "We must go, or they'll think we're afraid," stated the superb Lord de Bracieux. "Really, dear friend, we faced fifty enemies on the king's highway – I think we can face two good friends in the Place Royale."

"Yes, yes, I know," said d'Artagnan, "but they took the side of the princes without warning us, and Athos and Aramis have toyed with me in an alarming manner. Last night we found out the truth; what's the point of going tonight to learn the same thing over again?"

"Do you really distrust them?" said Porthos.

"As to Aramis, ever since he became an abbot: yes. You can't imagine how changed he is. He sees us as obstacles on the road to his bishopric and could shove us aside without being any too sorry about it."

"Oh, well, Aramis, sure," said Porthos. "That wouldn't surprise me."

"Or Sir Beaufort might lay a trap to take us."

"Bah! He had us and let us go. But we'll be on our guard; we can arm ourselves and take Planchet with his carbine."

"Ha! Planchet's a Frondeur," said d'Artagnan.

"Damn all civil wars!" said Porthos. "We can't count on our friends, or even our lackeys. Ah, if only poor Mousqueton was here! There's one who will never abandon me."

"Yes, so long as you're still rich! But you know, old friend, it's not the civil wars that separate us, it's the fact that we're all twenty years older. The happy loyalty of youth has given way to the voice of self-interest, the spur of ambition, and the conceit of pride." He sighed. "Yes, you're right, we have to go, Porthos – but let's go well armed. If we don't go, it's true, they'll say we're afraid. Whoa! Planchet!"

Planchet appeared. "Saddle the horses and bring your carbine."

"But, Sir, who are we going up against?"

"We're not going up against anyone," said d'Artagnan. "It's just a simple precaution in case we're attacked."

"Do you know, Sir, that today they tried to assassinate good Councillor Broussel, the father of the people?"

"Is that so?" said d'Artagnan.

"Yes but the attempt was rebuffed, for he was borne home in the people's arms. Since yesterday his house is never empty. He was visited by Coadjutor de Gondy, by Sir Longueville, and by the Prince de Conti. Madam de Chevreuse and Madam de Vendome have signed his visitors' book, and whenever he gives the word..."

"Well? What happens when he 'gives the word'?" Planchet began to sing:

*The Fronde wind blows
So, let her in
I think it goes
Against Mazarin
If the Fronde wind blows
We'll let her in!*

"Now I understand," d'Artagnan said quietly to Porthos, "why Mazarin would have preferred it if I'd annihilated that councillor."

"So, you see, Sir," said Planchet, "that if it was for some mission like the one that injured Sir Broussel that you wanted me to bring my carbine..."

"No, nothing like that, don't worry. But where did you hear all these details?"

"Oh, from a good source, Sir – from Friquet."

"From Friquet?" said d'Artagnan. "I know that name."

"He's the son of Sir Broussel's maid, and one who, in a riot, I wouldn't mind having at my side."

"Isn't he also a choirboy at Notre Dame?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Yes, that's right – he's a protégé of Bazin."

"Of course," said d'Artagnan. "And he's pot boy at a tavern in Rue de la Calandre?"

"That's him. What business could you have with a street urchin?"

"He's already given me good information," said d'Artagnan, "and may give me better yet."

"What, to someone who nearly crushed his master?" said Porthos, in what was for him a low voice.

"And who will tell him that?"

"Good point."

At that very moment, Athos and Aramis were entering Paris through the Faubourg Saint-Antoine. They had rested on the road and were hurrying so as not to miss the rendezvous. Bazin was their only follower, since Grimaud, as may be recalled, had stayed behind to care for Mousqueton, and was then supposed to leave to rejoin the young Viscount of Bragelonne with the army in Flanders. "Now," said Athos, "we need to find an inn where we can change into our city clothes, store our pistols and rapiers, and disarm our lackey."

"Disarm? By no means, my dear Count – in this, you must allow me not only to disagree with you but to try to persuade you to my opinion."

"Why should I do that?"

"Because we're going to a rendezvous of war."

"What do you mean, Aramis?"

"I mean that the meeting in the Place Royale is nothing but the sequel to the encounter on the king's highway."

"What? But our friends..."

"Have become our most dangerous enemies, Athos. Believe me, they can't be trusted – especially by you."

"Oh but my dear d'Herblay ...!"

"How do you know d'Artagnan hasn't blamed his defeat on us, and warned the cardinal? How do you know the cardinal won't take advantage of this rendezvous to arrest us?"

"Oh, really, Aramis! Do you think d'Artagnan and Porthos would lend their hands to such treachery?"

"You're right, my dear Athos – between friends. But between enemies, it's a legitimate ruse." Athos crossed his arms and bowed his handsome head on his chest. "What do you expect, Athos?" said Aramis. "Men are like that, and they can't stay twenty years old forever. We've wounded d'Artagnan in the pride that spurs him on – you know it's true. He was defeated. Didn't you hear his despair on the highway? As for Porthos, his barony probably depended on the outcome of this affair. Well, he ran into us along the way, and won't be a baron anytime soon – unless his barony depends on what happens at tonight's meeting. We must take proper precautions, Athos."

"But what if they show up unarmed? How that will shame us, Aramis!"

"Oh, rest easy, my dear, that's not going to happen. Besides, we have an excuse: we had to travel, and we're outlawed rebels!"

"Us, to need an excuse! An excuse with d'Artagnan! An excuse with Porthos! Oh, Aramis, Aramis," said Athos, shaking his head sadly, "upon my soul, you make me the most wretched of men. You are disenchanting a heart that was not yet dead to friendship. I'd almost prefer you just wrench it from my chest. You do as you please, Aramis. As to me, I'll go unarmed."

"You'll do no such thing, because I won't let you. It's not just one man, not even Athos, not even the Count of La Fère you betray by such weakness – it's an entire faction to which you belong, and that relies on you."

"Have it your way, then," replied Athos sadly.

And so, it was settled. They had scarcely reached Rue du Pas-de-la-Mule, at the gates of the deserted square, when they saw three equestrians under the Place Royale's outer arcade at the entrance of Rue Sainte-Catherine. In front were d'Artagnan and Porthos wrapped in cloaks bulged out by their swords. Behind them came Planchet, carbine at his knee. Seeing d'Artagnan and Porthos, Athos and Aramis dismounted. D'Artagnan and Porthos did the same. D'Artagnan saw that Bazin, instead of holding the others' three horses, had tied them to rings on the arcades. He ordered Planchet to do the same. Then they advanced, two against two, followed by their lackeys, and met with polite bows. "Where shall we have our discussion, Gentlemen?" asked Athos who saw that several people had stopped to look at them as if expecting one of those famous duels still remembered by the people of Paris, and especially those living on the Place Royale.

"The gates are shut," said Aramis, "but if you gentlemen don't mind waiting a moment here under these trees, I'll get the keys to go in through the Hôtel de Rohan that should suit us perfectly."

D'Artagnan peered into the shadows of the Place, while Porthos considered the mansion's gates, and what might be behind them. "If you prefer somewhere else, Gentlemen," said Athos in his refined and persuasive voice, "just name it."

"This place, if Sir d'Herblay can get the key, will do just fine, I think."

Aramis went off, after warning Athos to stay out of range of d'Artagnan and Porthos but Athos only smiled disdainfully and moved closer to his old friends, who remained where they were. Meanwhile Aramis was knocking at the Hôtel de Rohan, and talking with a footman who said, "You swear it's no duel, Sir?"

"Upon this," said Aramis, offering him a Louis d'or.

"So, you won't swear, good Gentleman?" said the footman, shaking his head.

"Oh, who can be sure of anything?" said Aramis. "I tell you only that, at the moment, these gentlemen are our friends."

"He's right," intoned Athos, d'Artagnan, and Porthos.

D'Artagnan had overheard the entire conversation. "You see?" he whispered to Porthos.

"See what?"

"He wouldn't swear."

"Swear about what?"

"That man wanted Aramis to swear that we hadn't come to the Place Royale to fight."

"And Aramis wouldn't swear?"

"No."

"Then be on your guard."

Athos observed this whispered exchange. Aramis opened the gate and stepped back so d'Artagnan and Porthos could enter. The hilt of d'Artagnan's sword caught on the gate and pulled back his cloak, exposing his brace of pistols that gleamed in the moonlight. "You see?" said Aramis, touching Athos's shoulder with one hand and pointing with the other at the arsenal in d'Artagnan's belt. "Alas, yes!" said Athos, with a deep sigh. He went in third. Aramis entered last and closed the gate behind him. The two lackeys remained outside but they were suspicious of each other, and kept their distance.

201
The Place Royale

They walked silently toward the centre of the square but as they did the moon emerged from the clouds; this made them feel exposed, so they went under the lime trees, where the shade concealed them. Benches were placed here and there, and the four stopped before one of them. Athos gestured, and d'Artagnan and Porthos sat. Athos and Aramis remained standing. After a silent moment, during which they all began to feel embarrassed, Athos decided to begin the discussion. "Gentlemen," he said, "our presence at this rendezvous is proof of the power of our old friendship. No one is missing, so no one needs reproach himself."

"Listen, Count," said d'Artagnan, "instead of paying compliments we may or may not deserve, let's be open and forthright."

"I ask nothing better," said Athos. "I will be candid, so you may speak with all honesty. Do you have any issue to take with myself or the Abbot d'Herblay?"

"Yes," said d'Artagnan. "When I had the honour to speak with you at the Château de Bragelonne, I made proposals to you that you couldn't fail to understand – but instead of answering me as a friend, you treated me like a child. This friendship you boast about wasn't broken yesterday by our clash of swords but by your dissembling at your château."

"D'Artagnan!" said Athos in a tone of gentle reproach.

"You asked me to be frank," said d'Artagnan, "so there it is. Whenever you want to know what I think, I tell you. And I have the same complaint to make of you, Sir Abbot d'Herblay, as you abused me in the same fashion."

"Really, Sir, this is beyond strange," said Aramis. "You say you came to me to make proposals but did you? No, you sounded me out, that's all. And what did I tell you? That Mazarin was a buffoon, and that I wouldn't serve him. But that's all. Did I say I wouldn't serve someone else? On the contrary, I gave you to understand, it seems to me, that I favoured the party of the princes. We even joked, if I'm not mistaken, that the cardinal might very well send you to arrest me. Were you a man of his party? No doubt about it. Then why couldn't we be men of a different party? If you could have your secrets, then we could have ours – and if we kept quiet, all the better. It just proves we know how to keep a secret."

"I don't blame you for it, Sir," said d'Artagnan. "It's only because the Count of La Fère speaks of friendship that I consider your conduct."

"And what do you find?" asked Aramis haughtily.

The blood immediately went to d'Artagnan's head, and he stood and barked, "I find it worthy of a student of the Jesuits."

Seeing d'Artagnan stand, Porthos got up as well. All four now stood in threatening postures. Leaning toward d'Artagnan, Aramis dropped his hand toward his sword. Athos stopped him. "D'Artagnan," he said, "you come here tonight still furious about yesterday's encounter. I thought you had enough heart that a friendship of twenty years' standing would overcome a quarter-hour's injury to your pride. Come, tell me truly – do you have something to blame me for? If I'm at fault, d'Artagnan, I'll own that fault and confess it."

The soothing and sonorous voice of Athos had its old effect on d'Artagnan, calming him where the voice of Aramis that became sharp and shrill when angry, provoked him. He said to Athos, "I think, Count, that you had a confidence to share with me at the Château de Bragelonne, as sir here," he continued, pointing at Aramis, "had in his monastery. I hadn't yet committed to anything that might pit me against you. But just because I was discreet didn't mean you should take me for a fool. If I'd wanted to expose the difference between those Sir d'Herblay receives by rope and those who come by ladder, I could have."

"Where are you going with this?" cried Aramis, pale with anger at the thought that d'Artagnan might have spied him with Madam de Longueville.

"I go only where my own business takes me. I don't concern myself with things I shouldn't see – but I do hate hypocrites, and in that category I put musketeers who play at being abbots, and abbots who play at being musketeers. And sir here," he added, turning to Porthos, "agrees with me."

Porthos who hadn't uttered a word up to this point, just said, "Yes," and drew his sword.

Aramis leapt back and drew his own. D'Artagnan leaned forward, ready to attack or defend. But Athos stopped them, extending his hand with that supreme gesture of command that belonged only to him. He slowly drew his own sword with the other hand, and then broke it over his knee and threw the pieces down in front of him. Then he turned to Aramis and said, "Aramis, break your sword."

Aramis hesitated. "Do it," Athos said. Then, in a softer tone: "I wish it."

Aramis grew pale but overcame by the gesture, overwhelmed by the voice, he bent and broke his sword, and then crossed his arms and stood, quivering with rage. At this, d'Artagnan and Porthos stepped back. D'Artagnan kept his hand away from his sword, and Porthos returned his to its sheath. "Never," said Athos, slowly raising his right hand toward heaven, "never, I swear before God who sees and hears us in the solemnity of this night: never will my sword strike yours; never will my eye look upon you in anger; never will my heart beat toward you with hate. We have lived together, hated and loved together, poured out our blood together – and moreover, we are bound by what is perhaps a stronger bond than that of friendship, the bond of a shared crime. For together the four of us judged, condemned, and executed a human being that perhaps we had no right to send from this world, even if the world she seemed to belong to was Hell. D'Artagnan, I have always loved you like a son. Porthos, we slept side by side for ten years; Aramis is your brother as he is mine, for Aramis has loved you as I love you still and will always love you. What can Cardinal Mazarin be to us, who have defied the heart and the hand of a man like Richelieu? Who is this prince or that to us, who have steadied the crown on the head of a queen? D'Artagnan, I ask your pardon for having crossed swords with you yesterday, and Aramis does the same for Porthos. So now, hate me if you must but I assure you that despite your hatred, I will have nothing but friendship and esteem for you. Now repeat my words, Aramis – and afterward, if it's what they want, and what you want, part from our old friends forever."

For a moment there was a heavy silence that was broken by Aramis. "I swear," he said, with a calm brow and steady look but in a voice that trembled with emotion, "I swear I have no hatred against those who were my friends. Porthos, I regret having crossed swords with you. I swear for good and all that my blade will never threaten you again, and moreover, that even deep in my secret thoughts, I will bear you no hostility. Now come, Athos."

Athos made a move as if to withdraw. "Oh, no you don't! You're not going anywhere!" cried d'Artagnan, led by one of those irresistible impulses that betrayed the warmth of his heart and the honesty of his soul. "You're going nowhere, because I, too, have an oath to swear. I swear I would give the last drop of my blood, the last beat of my heart to keep the esteem of a man like you, Athos, and the friendship of a man like you, Aramis."

And he leapt into the embrace of Athos. "My son!" said Athos, pressing him to his heart.

"And I," said Porthos, "I swear nothing, because I'm choking. Damn it! If I had to fight you, I think I'd let you stab me through and through, because I never loved anyone so much in this world!"

And honest Porthos, bursting into tears, threw himself into Aramis's arms. "My friends," said Athos, "that's what I was hoping for, that's what I was expecting from two hearts like yours. I've said it and I repeat, our destinies are inextricably twined even when we go by different routes. I respect your judgement, d'Artagnan; I respect your conviction, Porthos; but though we fight for opposing sides, we must remain friends. Ministers, princes, even kings may pass by like storms, and civil war may drown everything in flames but will we withstand all that? I believe we will."

"Yes," said d'Artagnan, "we're fellow musketeers to the end, our single flag that famous bullet-riddled napkin of the Saint-Gervais bastion that the great cardinal had embroidered with three fleur-de-llys."

"Yes," said Aramis, "Cardinalist or Frondeur means nothing! In duels we are each other's seconds, in dangerous affairs we're devoted friends, and in revelry we're joyous companions!"

"And every time we meet in the fray," said Athos, "recall these words: the Place Royale! Then let us shift our swords to our left hands and reach out with our right, even in the midst of slaughter!"

"I just love the way you talk," said Porthos.

"You are the greatest of men," said d'Artagnan. "Next to us, you are a true giant."

Athos smiled with ineffable joy. "Then it is settled," he said. "Come, Gentlemen, your hands. Do you consider yourself Christians?"

"For the love of God!" said d'Artagnan.

"We will be so, at least on this occasion, to remain faithful to our oath," said Aramis.

"Ah, I'll swear by whatever you like," said Porthos, "even Mahomet! Devil take me if I've ever been as happy as I am now."

And the good Porthos wiped his still-moist eyes. "Does anyone have a cross?" asked Athos.

Porthos and d'Artagnan winced and shook their heads like men embarrassed by the amount of a tavern bill. But Aramis smiled and drew from his breast a cross glittering with diamonds, hanging from his neck by a string of pearls. "I've got one," he said.

"Good!" said Athos. "Now swear on this cross that, bejewelled though it is, is still a cross – swear we shall be united, forever and always. And may this oath bind not just ourselves but even our descendants. Does this oath suit you?"

"Yes!" they said with one voice.

"You dog!" d'Artagnan whispered to Aramis. "You've made us swear on the crucifix of a lady Frondeur!"

202 The Oise Ferry

We hope that the reader has not forgotten the young traveller we left on the road to Flanders. As Raoul, looking behind him, finally lost sight of his guardian, whom he'd left in front of the royal basilica, he spurred his horse onward to escape his sad thoughts, and to hide from Olivain their traces on his face. An hour's brisk ride soon dissipated the dark clouds that shadowed the young man's imagination. For Raoul, the unwonted pleasures of freedom – pleasures so sweet, even to those who have never known constraint – turned to gold heaven, earth, and especially that far horizon of life called the future. However, after several attempts at conversation with Olivain, he realised that days passed in that manner would be sadly long and dull, and he missed talking with the count. That voice, so mild, so engaging and persuasive, came back to him as he passed through towns that were new to him, places that would have come alive with the fascinating, and useful, information that would have been conveyed by Athos, that wisest and most amusing of guides. A different memory saddened Raoul when they reached the town of Louvres and he saw, half-hidden behind a screen of poplars, a small château that strongly reminded him of La Vallière. He stopped to gaze at it for almost ten minutes, and then resumed his journey with a sigh, not even answering Olivain's respectful question as to what had attracted his attention. The appearance of some objects plucks at the strings of memory, striking a chord can sometimes evoke a thread that, like Ariadne's, leads through a labyrinth of thoughts where we go astray, following shadows of the past. The sight of that château had sent Raoul fifty leagues to the west, back to the moment when he'd taken his leave of little Louise, and every landmark – a copse of oaks, a wind vane atop a slate roof – reminded him that instead of returning to his childhood friends, each step took him further from them, and that perhaps he had left them forever. Head hanging, heart heavy, he ordered Olivain to lead the horses to a little inn he saw about a musket-shot up the road. There he alighted, sat at a table under a beautiful stand of flowering chestnuts murmuring with a multitude of bees, and told Olivain to go to the host and get stationery, pen, and ink. Olivain went on his way, while Raoul sat, elbows on the table, gazing sightlessly across a charming landscape of green fields dotted with stands of trees, his hair slowly frosting as blossoms fluttered down to land unnoticed on his head. Raoul sat for several minutes, lost in his reveries, before he noticed a ruddy figure had entered his field of vision, white cap on his head, apron around his waist, towel on his arm, while offering him a pen and paper. "Ah ha!" said the apparition. "It's clear that all young gentlemen think alike, as it isn't a quarter of an hour since a young lord, well mounted like you, good looking and about your age, stopped before this grove and made me bring out this table and chair. He had dinner here with an older gent I took to be his tutor, and they ate a fine loaf of pâté without leaving behind a morsel, and drained a bottle of old Macon honey without leaving a drop – but fortunately we have more loaves and more bottles, and if Sir would like to order something..."

"No, my friend," said Raoul, smiling, "I thank you but right now all I need are the things I asked for – but if the ink is black and the pen good, I'm happy to pay the price of a bottle for the pen, and a loaf for the ink."

"Well, Sir, in that case," said the host, "I'll give the loaf and bottle to your servant and throw the pen and ink into the bargain."

"Do as you like," said Raoul who was unfamiliar with this ornament of society, the brand of innkeeper who when there were robbers on the highway, served them as guests, and when there were none, did their best to take their place. The host, satisfied with this response, put paper, ink, and pen on the table. As it happened, the pen was passable, and Raoul began to write. The host lingered for a moment, struck with involuntary admiration by that charming young face, at once so sweet and so serious. Beauty has power over everyone.

"He's not like that guest who just left," the host said to Olivain, who'd come to see if Raoul needed anything. "Your young master has no appetite."

"Sir had appetite enough three days ago but what can you do? He lost it the day before yesterday." Olivain and the host walked toward the inn, with Olivain, as usual with servants who are happy in their service, regaling the innkeeper with all his young master's virtues. Meanwhile, Raoul wrote:

Sir,
After four hours on the march, I pause to write you because I miss you at every moment – I keep turning my head to speak to you, as if you were still there. I was so dazed when I left, so distracted by the sadness of our separation, that I only feebly expressed all the gratitude and affection I feel for you. Please pardon me, Sir, for your heart is so generous, I'm sure you understood all that was happening in mine. Write to me, Sir, I beg you, as your advice is food and drink to me – and I admit, if I may, that I'm anxious, as it seemed to me you were preparing yourself for some sort of dangerous venture, something I didn't dare ask about, since you said nothing about it to me. Now that you're no longer near I'm afraid every minute of going wrong somehow. You have always been my guide and support, Sir, and today, I swear, I feel very alone. If you receive news from Blois, Sir, would you be so kind as to pass along anything about my little friend Miss de La Vallière, whose health, you'll remember, gave me some anxiety? Please understand, my dear Guardian, how precious to me are the memories of the time I spent with you. I hope you'll also think of me sometimes, and if you miss me and regret my absence, it will fill me with joy to know you appreciate the tiniest part of how I feel about you. Having finished his missive, Raoul felt better; he checked to make sure neither the host nor Olivain was looking, and then kissed the paper: a mute and touching gesture he hoped Athos would instinctively feel when he opened the letter. Meanwhile, Olivain emptied his bottle and ate his pâté, while the horses were also fed and watered. Raoul waved to the host, threw a crown on the table, mounted his horse, and at Senlis, dropped his letter in the mail. This brief rest enabled the riders and their horses to continue their journey without stopping. At Verberie, Raoul directed Olivain to ask about the young gentleman who preceded them; he was said to have passed not three-quarters of an hour earlier but he was well mounted, as the innkeeper had said, and was keeping a good pace. "Let's try to catch up to this gentleman," Raoul said to Olivain. "If he's going to the army like us, it'll be pleasant to have company."

It was four in the afternoon when Raoul arrived at Compiègne; he dined heartily, and again asked about the young gentleman who preceded him. He had also paused there at the Bell and Bottle Inn, the best in Compiègne but had continued on his way, saying he intended to sleep at Noyon. "Then we'll sleep in Noyon as well," said Raoul.

"Sir," said Olivain respectfully, "allow me to point out that we've already tired out our horses today. It would be better, I think, to spend the night here, and leave early in the morning tomorrow. Eighteen leagues are enough for a first day's ride."

"The Count of La Fère wants me to make haste and reach Sir Prince by the morning of the fourth day," Raoul replied. "If we push on to Noyon, that will be no longer a ride than those we made going from Blois to Paris. We'll arrive by eight, the horses will have all night to rest, and we'll be on the road again by five tomorrow morning."

Olivain didn't dare to oppose such determination but as he followed, he muttered through his teeth, "Go ahead, burn yourself out on the first day; tomorrow, instead of making twenty leagues, you'll do only ten, and then five the day after that, and you'll spend the fourth day in bed. These young folk are all such show-offs."

We can see that Olivain was not quite of the calibre of Planchet or Grimaud. Raoul was tired, in fact but he wished to test his strength, and raised on the principles of Athos, whom he was sure had spoken a thousand times of riding in twenty-five-league stages, he wanted to try to match his model. D'Artagnan as well, that man of iron who seemed made of nothing but nerve and muscle, had fired him with admiration. So, he kept pushing his horse's pace, despite Olivain's muttered commentary, following a charming little road that led to a ferry that he'd been assured would cut a league-long loop out of his route. Topping a crest, he saw before him the Oise River. A small troop of equestrians stood on the bank, preparing to embark on the ferry. Raoul had no doubt this was the gentleman and his escort; he uttered a cry but was too far away to be heard. Then, despite his horse's fatigue, he put it into a gallop but a dip in the terrain caused him to lose sight of the travellers, and when he reached the next crest, the ferry had already left the near bank and was crossing to the other side. Raoul, seeing he had no chance to catch the travellers in time, paused to wait for Olivain. Just then a cry seemed to come from the direction of the river: Raoul turned back toward it and, shading his eyes from the setting sun with his hand, called out, "Olivain! What's going on over there?"

A second cry came, more piercing than the first. "Oh, Sir!" Olivain said. "The ferry rope broke, and the boat is drifting. But is someone in the water? I can't tell."

"No doubt about it!" cried Raoul, squinting at the river against the glare from the sun. "A horse and its rider."

"They're sinking!" cried Olivain.

It was true: Raoul was certain an accident had occurred, and a man was drowning before his eyes. He slapped his horse on the withers, dug in his spurs, and the animal, inspired to move, galloped to the dock, leapt over the guardrail and plunged into the river, splashing waves of foam. "Sir!" cried Olivain. "Good God! What are you doing?"

Raoul guided his swimming horse toward the man in danger. It was a familiar exercise for the mount; raised on the banks of the Loire, it was at home in the water, and had crossed that river a thousand times. Athos, foreseeing the time when the viscount would be a soldier, had trained him in every eventuality. "My God!" spluttered Olivain desperately. "What would the count say if he saw you?"

"The count would do just as I'm doing," Raoul replied, pressing his horse forward.

"But but, what about me?" called Olivain, pacing back and forth along the bank. "How am I supposed to get across?"

"Jump in, faint-heart!" cried Raoul, still swimming. Then, addressing the traveller, who was struggling not twenty paces from him, he called, "Courage, Sir, courage! We're coming to help."

Olivain went forward, then back, made his horse rear, turned it away, and finally, stabbed to the heart by shame, rushed it into the river as Raoul had done while repeating, "I'm lost, I'm dead, I'm lost, I'm dead!"

Meanwhile the ferry boat drifted away, borne downstream by the current, and shouts were heard from the passengers. A grey-haired man had leapt into the river and was swimming strongly toward the drowning person but he made slow progress as he was swimming upstream. Raoul continued his efforts and was visibly gaining ground but the horse and rider were sinking right before his eyes; the horse had only his nostrils above water, and the rider, who'd dropped the reins, was extending his arms as he slipped deeper. Another moment and he would be gone. "Courage," cried Raoul, "courage!"

"Too late," murmured the young man. "Too ... late."

The water closed over his head and his voice was silenced. Raoul stood and jumped from his horse that he left to save itself, and in three or four strokes was near the gentleman. He immediately got hold of the horse's bridle and lifted its head from the water; the animal breathed more freely, and as if it understood that help had arrived, it redoubled its efforts. Raoul meanwhile grabbed one of the young man's hands and carried it to the horse's mane that the man clung to with the tenacity of the drowning. Sure that the cavalier wouldn't let go, Raoul turned his attention to the horse that he guided to the opposite bank by swimming alongside and talking to it in an encouraging tone. At last the animal stumbled into the shoals and set firm foot on the sand. "Saved!" cried the grey-haired man as he arrived on the horse's other side.

"Saved," the young gentleman murmured weakly, releasing the mane and slipping from the horse into Raoul's arms.

Raoul was only a few steps from shore; he carried the unconscious cavalier, laid him on the grass, loosened his collar, and undid the buttons of his doublet. A moment later, the grey-haired man joined him. Olivain finally managed to reach shore as well, after making the sign of the cross over and over again. The folks on the ferry were headed back upstream as best they could, poling their boat along the shallows. Gradually, thanks to the care of Raoul and the cavalier's elder companion, the bloom returned to the victim's pale cheeks. He opened his eyes and looked around wildly but soon focused on the one who'd saved him. "Ah, Sir, there you are!" he cried. "If not for you, I'd be dead twice over."

"But you're recovering, Sir, as you see," said Raoul, "and now we can both forego our next bath."

"Oh, Sir, how much we owe you!" cried the grey-haired man.

"Ah, there you are, good d'Arminges! I gave you a scare, didn't I? But it's your own fault: as my tutor, why didn't you teach me how to swim?"

"Oh, Sir Count," said the older man. "If you had a mischance, how could I ever face your father the marshal?"

"But how did the thing happen?" asked Raoul.

"Eh, Sir, that's easy to tell," said he who'd been addressed as count. "We were a third of the way across when the ferry rope broke. The boatmen shouted and grabbed for it, and my horse took fright and jumped into the water. I swim badly and didn't dare to let go; I froze, and instead of helping my horse I was hindering it. I was drowning as bravely as I could, when you arrived just in time to pull me from the water. And now, since you saved my life, we must be friends till death."

"Your servant, Sir, I assure you," said Raoul, bowing.

"I'm called the Count of Guiche,"<sup>78</sup> continued the cavalier. "My father is the Marshall de Grammont. And now that you know my name, will you do me the honour to tell me yours?"

"I'm the Viscount of Bragelonne," said Raoul, blushing because he was unable to name his father as the Count of Guiche had.

"Viscount, your look, your kindness, and your courage all appeal to me – and you have my gratitude. Let's embrace and be friends."

"Sir," said Raoul, hugging the count, "I love you with all my heart already, so I beg you to consider me your devoted friend."

"So, where are you off to, Viscount?" asked de Guiche.

"To the army of Sir Prince, Count."

"Why, so am I!" laughed the young man. "All the better! We'll share our first action under fire together."

"Indeed, you should be friends," said the tutor. "You're both young, and the same star doubtless shines on you both – you were fated to meet." The two young men smiled with the confidence of youth.

"And now," said the tutor, "you must change your clothes. Your lackey, whom I gave orders to when he came off the ferry, has gone ahead to the inn. Dry linen and warmed honey await us there – let's go." The young men had no objections to this plan – in fact, they found it excellent. So, they immediately mounted, and then paused to admire each other; for a fact, they were both elegant cavaliers, lithe and slender, with broad brows above noble faces, looks gentle but proud, smiles sincere and loyal. De Guiche had to be about eighteen but he was scarcely taller than Raoul, who was only 15. They reached out spontaneously and shook hands, and then, spurring their horses, rode along the river path to the nearby inn, one laughing and enjoying the life he'd almost lost, while the other thanked God that he'd lived long enough to do a deed that would make his guardian proud. As for Olivain, he was the only one his master's exploit had left entirely dissatisfied. As he rode along, wringing out his sleeves and cuffs, he was thinking that if they'd stopped in Compiegne, he would have been spared an accident he'd barely survived, as well as the influenza and rheumatism that was bound to follow.

203 Skirmish

Their stay at Noyon was short, though everyone got a good night's sleep. Raoul had asked to be awakened if Grimaud arrived but Grimaud never came. The horses, for their part, doubtless appreciated the abundant hay and eight hours of complete rest they got. The Count of Guiche was awakened at five in the morning by Raoul, who came in to wish him good day. They ate a quick breakfast, and by six o'clock had already ridden two leagues. Raoul found the young count's conversation fascinating, so he mainly listened as de Guiche talked. He'd been raised in Paris that Raoul had only seen once, and largely at Court that Raoul had never seen. His youthful follies as a page, and two duels he'd managed to have despite the royal edicts and the injunctions of his tutor, excited Raoul's admiration. Bragelonne had paid only the one visit to Sir Scarron, and he named to de Guiche the people he'd seen there. De Guiche knew everybody: Madam de Neuillan, Miss d'Aubigné, Miss de Scudéry, Miss Paulet, even Madam de Chevreuse. And he made fun of everyone – Raoul trembled, afraid he was going to joke about Madam de Chevreuse, for whom he felt a deep sympathy – but either instinctively or from affection for the duchess, de Guiche spoke only good of her. This made Raoul feel even friendlier toward the count. Next, they turned to the subject of love and gallantry – and here again, Bragelonne had more to hear than to say. So, he listened, and it seemed to him that despite the count's tales of three or four thinly veiled amorous adventures that de Guiche, like himself, was hiding a secret in his heart. De Guiche, as we've said, had been brought up at Court, and the intrigues of the royal courtiers were all open secrets to him. It was the same French Court of which Raoul had heard so much from the Count of La Fère – only it had changed quite a bit since the days when Athos had frequented it. The Count of Guiche's stories were thus entirely new to his travelling companion. With comments witty and irreverent, the young noble passed everyone in review: he recounted the former affairs of Madam de Longueville with Coligny, and of the latter's fatal duel over them at the Place Royale that madam watched secretly from behind window blinds; of her new affair with the Prince de Marcillac, a jealous man who wanted to kill his rivals, even the Abbot d'Herblay, her confessor; and the romance of the Prince of Wales with Prince Gaston's daughter, the Great Miss notorious at a later time for her secret marriage with Lauzun. Not even the queen was spared, and Cardinal Mazarin came in for his share of mockery as well. The entire day passed as if it were no more than an hour. The count's tutor, a gentleman, bon vivant, and a scholar to his teeth as the saying has it, often reminded Raoul of the erudition, wit, and soaring disdain of Athos – but without his grace, delicacy, and innate nobility. In those regards, no one compared to the Count of La Fère. The horses, managed more carefully than the day before, brought them by four o'clock to Arras. They were now approaching the theatre of war, and decided to spend the night in the town, as the Spaniards sometimes took advantage of darkness to mount raids to the very outskirts of Arras. The French army held a line from Pont-à-Marq to Valenciennes, centring on Douai. It was said Sir Prince himself was at Bethune. The enemy's line extended from Cassel to Courtray, and as there was no sort of rapine and pillage they wouldn't commit, the poor folk of the border counties had left their rural homes and taken refuge in the nearby walled cities. Arras was teeming with refugees. There was talk that a decisive battle was imminent, the prince having only manoeuvrer till then while waiting for reinforcements that had finally arrived. The young men congratulated themselves on coming at the right time. They supped together, and then shared a room. They were at the age of sudden friendships, and it seemed to them that they'd known each other since birth and would never find it possible to part. The evening was spent talking about war; the lackeys polished their weapons, while the young men loaded their pistols in case of a skirmish on the morrow. They awoke feeling apprehensive, both having dreamed they'd arrived at the army too late to take part in the battle. In the morning the rumour spread that the Prince de Condé had evacuated Bethune to fall back upon Carvin, while leaving a garrison in the former town. But this news couldn't be confirmed, so the young men decided to continue making their way toward Bethune, leaving the road, if necessary, to veer right toward Carvin. De Guiche's tutor was familiar with the area and proposed that they take a byway that crossed the country midway between the road to Lens and the road to Bethune. At Ablain they stopped to make inquiries and leave directions for Grimaud. They set off again at about seven o'clock. De Guiche, who was young and hot-blooded, said to Raoul, "Here we are then, three masters and three servants. Our valets are well armed, and your lackey seems stubborn enough."

"I've never seen him in a fight," said Raoul, "but he is a Breton, and that's something."

"Yes, indeed," de Guiche replied. "I'm sure he's fired a musket or two in his time. As for me, I have two reliable men who've been to war with my father, so we're six fighters in total. If we encounter a small troop of the enemy equal in number to ourselves, Raoul, or even superior – don't you think we should charge them?"

"By all means," the viscount replied.

"Whoa, young gentlemen! Hold on, there!" said the tutor, joining the conversation. "Virtue! And what of my instructions, Sir Count? Do you forget that I have orders to conduct you safely to Sir Prince? Once you reach the army, go get killed all you like – but I'm warning you that until then, in my capacity as superior officer, I'll order a retreat at the first sight of an enemy's plume."

De Guiche and Raoul glanced at each other from the corners of their eyes and smiled. The country became more wooded, and from time to time they met small fleeing groups of farmers, driving their cattle before them and carrying their most valuable goods on their backs or behind them in carts. They arrived at Ablain without any trouble. There they made inquiries and learned that Sir Prince had, in fact, left Bethune and was now between Cambrin and La Venchie. After leaving word for Grimaud, they continued on their way, taking a side road that led the little band after half an hour to the banks of a small stream that flowed into the Lys. It was lovely country, crossed by small wooded valleys as green as emeralds. Occasionally the trail they were following led through small woodlands; as they approached each wood, in case of ambush, the tutor sent the count's two servants ahead as a vanguard. The tutor and the two young men formed the corps of the army, with Olivain, alert and with his carbine on his knee, as the rear guard. Eventually, they found before them the thickest wood yet; a hundred paces from its verge, Sir d'Arminges took his usual precautions, sending the count's servants ahead as scouts. The lackeys had just disappeared under the eaves of the trees, the young men and the tutor laughing and chatting as they followed a hundred paces behind, when suddenly five or six musket shots rang out. The tutor called a halt, and the young men obeyed, reining in their horses. Just then they saw the two lackeys galloping back. The two young men, eager to hear about the musketry, spurred toward the lackeys. The tutor followed, lagging behind. "Were you stopped and chased?" shouted the young men.

"No," replied one of the lackeys. "We probably weren't even seen. The gunfire broke out a hundred paces ahead of us, in pretty much the thickest part of the wood, so we came back to ask for advice."

"My advice," said Sir d'Arminges, "and my orders, if necessary, are that we retreat. This could conceal an ambush."

The other lackey said, "I thought I saw some equestrians in yellow outfits sneaking along the banks of the creek."

"That's it," said the tutor. "We've run afoul of a party of Spaniards. Fall back, Gentlemen, fall back!"

The young men looked at each other inquisitively – and at that moment they heard a pistol shot, followed by two or three cries for help. The two young men reassured each other with a nod, and as the tutor turned his horse away, they both spurred forward. Raoul cried, "With me, Olivain!"

Meanwhile the Count of Guiche shouted, "Urbain and Blanchet! To me!"

And before the tutor could recover from his surprise, the little troop was already disappearing into the forest. As they spurred their horses forward, both young men drew their pistols. Within moments, they arrived near where the sounds had seemed to come from. They slowed their horses and advanced cautiously. "Hush!" said de Guiche. "Equestrians."

"Yes, I see three on horseback, and three who've dismounted."

"What are they doing? Can you see?"

"They seem to be searching a dead or wounded man."

"It's some cowardly assassination!" said de Guiche.

"They're soldiers, though," said Bragelonne.

"Yes but irregulars – in other words, highway robbers."

"Let's get them!" said Raoul.

"Let's get them!" repeated de Guiche.

"Gentlemen!" cried the poor tutor. "Gentlemen, in the name of heaven..."

But young men don't listen to such talk. They took off, each vying to get ahead of the other, and the only effect of the tutor's cries was to alert the Spaniards. Immediately the three mounted soldiers charged to meet the young men, while the other three finished looting the travellers – for the young men could now see there were two victims on the ground. At ten paces away, de Guiche fired first, and missed his man. The Spaniard charging Raoul fired in his turn, and Raoul felt a sting in his left arm like the stroke of a whip. When they closed to four paces, he fired, and the Spaniard, struck in the centre of his chest, threw out his arms and fell backward off his horse that turned and fled. At that moment Raoul saw through the powder smoke the barrel of a musket levelled at him. Athos's advice came to his mind, and quick as a flash he pulled his mount and reared it back, just as the gun went off. His horse jumped sideways, lost its footing, and fell, trapping Raoul's leg beneath it. The Spaniard leapt down, grabbing his musket by the barrel to crack Raoul's skull with its butt. Unfortunately, trapped as he was, Raoul could neither draw his sword from its sheath nor reach his other holster. He saw the heavy musket rise above his head and started to shut his eyes, when with a bound de Guiche arrived next to the Spaniard and put a pistol to his head. "Give up!" he said. "Or you're dead!"

The musket fell from the soldier's hands that he raised in surrender. De Guiche called over one of his lackeys, ordered him to guard the prisoner, and blow his brains out if he tried to escape, then leapt from his horse and approached Raoul. "My faith, Sir!" said Raoul, laughing, although his pallor betrayed the inevitable reaction to a first combat. "You pay your debts quickly, and no mistake! Without you," he added, repeating the count's own words, "I'd have been dead twice over."

"My opponent fled," said de Guiche, "so I was free to come to your aid. But are you seriously hurt? There's blood all over you."

"I think a bullet scratched me on the arm," said Raoul. "Help me get out from under my horse, and then nothing, I hope, will prevent us from continuing on our way."

Sir d'Arminges and Olivain had already dismounted, and together they worked to lift the horse that was struggling in agony. Raoul managed to get his foot out of the stirrup and his leg from under the horse, and a moment later he was standing, free. "Nothing broken?" asked de Guiche.

"My faith, no, thank heaven," replied Raoul. "But what happened to the poor victims waylaid by those wretches?"

"We arrived too late – they killed them, I think, and got away with their loot. My lackeys are guarding the bodies."

"Let's see if they still live, and need our help," said Raoul. "Olivain, we've inherited two horses but I've lost mine; give me yours, and take the best of the new ones." And they went to where the victims were lying.

204 The Monk

Two men were lying there. One was facedown, pierced by three bullets and drowned in a pool of his own blood, quite dead. The other, leaned up against a tree by the lackeys, had his eyes shut and his hands clasped in fervent prayer. A bullet had broken his thigh. The young men looked first at the corpse, and started, astonished. "He's a priest," said Bragelonne. "See his tonsure? Oh, those dogs! Raising their hands against a minister of God!"

"Come here, Sir," said Urbain, an aging veteran who'd soldiered under Cardinal Richelieu. "Over here. There's nothing you can do for the priest but maybe we can still save this one."

The wounded man smiled sadly. "Save me?" he said. "No – but you can help me to die."

"Are you also a priest?"

"No, Sir."

"Your unfortunate companion seemed to be a man of the Church," said Raoul.

"He was the Curate of Bethune, Sir; he was carrying his church's treasury and sacred vessels to safety, because Sir Prince abandoned our town yesterday, and the Spanish might occupy it tomorrow. He knew enemy troops were prowling the countryside, and the trip was perilous, so when no one else dared to accompany him, I offered to go."

"And those miserable dogs attacked you – those wretches shot a priest!"

"Gentlemen," said the wounded man, looking around him, "I'm in terrible pain but I wish you could get me to a house."

"Where you could recover?"

"No, where I can be confessed."

"Maybe you're not hurt as badly as you think," said Raoul.

"Trust me, Sir, there's no time to lose," said the wounded man. "The ball broke my thigh-bone and has lodged in my bowels."

"Are you a doctor?" asked de Guiche.

"No," said the dying man, "but I know something about wounds – and mine is mortal. So, try to get me somewhere I can find a priest, or get one and bring him here, and God will reward such a holy deed. Help save my soul, for my body is lost."

"You were undertaking a holy task. God won't abandon you."

"Gentlemen, in the name of heaven!" said the wounded man, gathering all his strength to try to get up. "Don't waste time in useless talk. Help me to get to the next village, or swear to me as you hope for salvation that you'll send me the first monk, curate, or priest you encounter. But what if no one dares do it, because they know the Spaniards are coming, and I die without absolution?" he added, in a tone of despair. "My God!" cried the wounded man with a terror that made the young men shudder. "You wouldn't allow that, would you? It would be too cruel!"

"Easy, Sir, easy," said de Guiche. "I swear we'll find you the consolation you need. Just point us toward a house where we can ask for help, or a village from which we can fetch a priest."

"Thank you, and may God reward you! There's an inn half a league along this road, and a league beyond that you'll find the village of Greney. Look for the curate but if he's not home, go to the Augustinian monastery on the far side of the town. Bring me a friar, a monk, or a curate – whoever, so long as he's received from Holy Church the power of absolution in articulo mortis."

"Sir d'Arminges," said de Guiche, "stay here with this poor man, and prepare to move him as gently as possible. Make a stretcher of our coats and some tree branches; two of our lackeys can carry him, with the third ready to switch out when one gets tired. The viscount and I will ride ahead to find a priest."

"Go, Sir Count," said the tutor, "but in heaven's name, don't take any risks!"

"Never fear. Besides, we're done for one day. You know the saying: Not twice the same."

"Don't lose heart, Sir," said Raoul to the wounded man. "We'll find what you need."

"God bless you, Gentlemen!" replied the dying man, in a tone of gratitude deep and profound.

And the two young men galloped off in the direction indicated, while the count's tutor oversaw the construction of a stretcher. Within ten minutes the young men found the inn. Raoul, without dismounting, called for the innkeeper, warned him a wounded man was being brought there, and asked him to prepare everything needed to treat him, including a bed, bandages, and lint. He also asked if there was a nearby doctor or surgeon who could be summoned, adding that he was willing to pay for a messenger. The innkeeper, addressed by two richly appointed young lords, promised to do everything they asked. Once they saw preparations were begun, the two cavaliers went on their way, spurring their horses toward Greney. They had ridden nearly a league, and had just sighted the village's first houses, whose red-tiled roofs stood out distinctly against the green of the surrounding trees, when they saw coming toward them, mounted on a mule, a poor monk wearing a broad hat and a grey woollen robe. They took him for an Augustinian friar; it seemed chance had sent them just what they needed. They cantered toward the monk. He was a man of twenty-two or twenty-three but ascetic habits seemed to have added years to his appearance. He was fair-skinned, with an unhealthy pallor tinged a bilious yellow. His short hair that extended from under his hat in a line across his forehead, was pale blond, and his eyes, though of a clear blue, seemed devoid of life. "Sir," said Raoul, with his usual politeness, "are you an ecclesiastic?"

"Why do you ask?" said the stranger, coldly impassive.

"To get an answer," said the Count of Guiche haughtily.

The stranger touched his heel to his mule and continued on his way. De Guiche turned his horse and blocked him. "Answer, Sir!" he said. "You were asked politely, and every question deserves an answer."

"I'm free, I think, to speak or not to speak to random people who decide to interrogate me on a whim."

De Guiche, with some difficulty, suppressed the urge to give the monk an immediate thrashing. "First of all," he said, making an effort to speak calmly, "we are not 'random people' – my friend here is the Viscount of Bragelonne, and I am the Count of Guiche. More importantly, we don't question you on a whim but because a man is dying nearby who needs the aid of the Church. If you're a priest, I demand, in the name of humanity, that you follow me to aid this man. If you're not – well, that's something else. But I warn you, in the cause of common courtesy which you seem to prefer to ignore, that further insolence will be punished."

The monk's face went from pale to livid, and he smiled so strangely that Raoul, who was watching him closely, felt something tighten around his heart. "He's some kind of Spanish or Flemish spy," he said, putting his hand on his pistol.

The monk's reply was a brief but menacing glare. "Well, Sir!" said de Guiche. "What do you have to say?"

"I am a priest, Gentlemen," said the young man.

And his face resumed its former passivity. "Then, my Father," said Raoul, leaving his pistol in its holster, and speaking with a respect he didn't feel in his heart, "if you're a priest, we offer you, as my friend said, an opportunity to fulfill your vows – there's a badly wounded man ahead in the next inn calling for the aid of a minister of the Lord. Our men are waiting there with him."

"I will go," said the monk.

And he dug his heels into his mule. "You'd better go, Sir," said de Guiche, "because our horses can catch your mule if you go anywhere else, and then, I swear to you, your trial will be a short one, and your execution quick, because we have rope and there are trees everywhere."

The monk's eyes flashed again but that was all; he just repeated, "I will go," and left.

"Let's follow him to make sure," said de Guiche.

"That's just what I was going to propose," said Bragelonne.

And the two young men rode slowly, matching their pace to the monk's and following about a pistol-shot behind. After five minutes the monk turned to see whether he was followed. "See that?" said Raoul. "We did the right thing."

"What a horrible face that monk has!" said the Count of Guiche.

"Appalling!" Raoul agreed. "That yellow hair, his dead eyes, and especially his expression, with those thin lips that disappear whenever he speaks."

"Yes," said de Guiche, who hadn't been as observant of these details as Raoul, who'd been looking while de Guiche was talking. "A strange face indeed – but these monks have such degrading habits. Their fasting makes them pale, they beat themselves, the hypocrites, and their eyes sink and grow dull from weeping for life's lost joys."

"At least the poor dying man will have his priest," Raoul said. "Though God knows, the penitent looks like he has a clearer conscience than the confessor. As for me, I confess I'm not used to seeing priests who look like this one."

"You aren't?" said de Guiche. "This is one of those wandering friars who go begging down the highway in hopes a benefice will fall from heaven. They're mostly foreigners: Scots, Irish, Danes – I've seen their like before."

"As hideous as this one?"

"No but pretty ugly, mostly."

"I feel bad for the dying man, having to receive consolation at the hands of such a friar!"

"Bah!" said de Guiche. "Absolution comes not from the confessor but from God. Nonetheless, I must say I'd rather die impenitent than have to spend my final minutes with the likes of him. You agree with me, don't you, Viscount? I saw you gripping the pommel of your pistol as if you wanted to crack it over his head."

"Yes, Count – it's a strange thing, and might surprise you but at the sight of that man I felt struck by a horror that's hard to describe. Have you ever been walking and almost stepped on a snake?"

"Never," said de Guiche.

"Well, that happened to me in the woods near Blois, and I can't forget the way it looked at me, its eyes dull as it reared back its head, tongue flickering. I stood stunned, frozen and fascinated, until the Count of La Fère..."

"Your father?" asked de Guiche.

"No, my guardian," replied Raoul, blushing.

"All right."

"Until the Count of La Fère said, 'Come, Bragelonne – draw your blade.' Then I drew, stepped toward the reptile, and cut it in two, just as it reared up, hissing, to strike at me. Well! I swear I felt exactly the same sensation at the sight of this fellow when he said, 'Why do you ask?' and glared at me."

"So, you're sorry you didn't cut him in half, as you did with your snake?"

"I almost wish I had," said Raoul.

At that moment they came in sight of the little inn, where they could see the procession bearing the wounded man just arriving. The tutor led the two lackeys who carried the dying man, while the third brought the horses. The young men spurred forward. "As you see, here comes the wounded man," said de Guiche as he passed the Augustinian friar. "Be so kind as to pick up your pace, Sir Monk."

Raoul, meanwhile, rode past, giving the friar as wide a berth as he could, looking aside in disgust. Thus, the young men arrived ahead of the confessor, rather than behind him. They went to meet the dying man to give him the good news. He rose slightly to look where they pointed, saw the monk approaching at the trot on his mule, and fell back again on his litter, his face glowing with joy. "Now," said the young count, "we did what we promised you, and are eager to get on to join the army of Sir Prince – so if we continue on our way, you'll excuse us, won't you, Sir? They say they're preparing for battle, and we'd hate to arrive a day late."

"Go, my young Lords," said the wounded man, "and may you be blessed for your piety. You have indeed done all you can do; I can only say once more, God bless you and those you hold dear!"

"Sir," de Guiche said to his tutor, "we're going to ride on ahead. You can catch up to us on the road to Cambrin."

The innkeeper was at the door; he'd prepared everything, bed, bandages, and lint, and had sent a groom to fetch a doctor from Lens, the nearest large town. "We'll do just as you asked," said the host, "but you, Sir," he continued, addressing Bragelonne, "won't you stop to have your wound tended to?"

"What, this wound? It's nothing," said the viscount. "It's time we got on to our next bivouac. But if a rider should stop and ask if you've seen a young man on a chestnut horse followed by a lackey, be so kind as to tell him that you've seen me, and that I plan to dine at Mazingarbe and sleep at Cambrin. That rider is my servant."

"Wouldn't it be better and more certain if I ask him his name and tell him yours?" replied the host.

"No harm in that," said Raoul. "My name is the Viscount of Bragelonne, and his is Grimaud."

At this moment the wounded man arrived from one direction, and the monk from the other; the two young men drew back to give room for the stretcher, while the monk got down from his mule, and ordered that it be taken to the stables without having its saddle removed. "Sir Monk," said de Guiche, "give that brave man a proper confession, and don't worry about your expenses or those of your mule – everything is covered."

"Thanks, Sir," said the monk with one of those false smiles that made Bragelonne shiver.

"Come, Count," said Raoul, repelled by the Augustinian. "Let's go. I feel a chill here."

"Thank you again, my fine young Lords," said the wounded man, "and remember me in your prayers."

"Rest easy!" said de Guiche, spurring along to catch up to Bragelonne who was already twenty paces ahead.

The stretcher, carried by the two lackeys, was borne into the inn. The host and his wife, who had joined him, watched from the staircase. The wounded man seemed to be in terrible pain but he seemed most concerned about whether the monk was following after him. At the sight of the pale and bloody man, the woman grasped her husband's arm. "What's the matter?" he asked her. "Are you ill?"

"No but look!" said the hostess.

"Dame!" said the innkeeper. "He's in bad shape."

"That's not what I mean," said the woman, trembling. "Don't you recognise him?"

"The wounded man? Wait a moment..."

"Ah! I see you do recognise him," the woman said, "because now you're as pale as I am."

"It's true!" cried the host. "Bad luck has come to our house – it's the old executioner of Bethune."

"The executioner of Bethune!" murmured the young monk, stopping short, his expression betraying the repugnance he felt for his penitent.

Sir d'Arminges, standing on the threshold, saw this hesitation. "Sir Monk," he said, "this man may have been an executioner but he is no less a man, so give him the final services he requires. It will make your labours all the more meritorious."

The monk didn't reply, just silently followed the two lackeys into the rear chamber, where they placed the dying man on a bed. Seeing the man of God approach the bedside, the lackeys went out, closing the door on the monk and the penitent. D'Arminges and Olivain were waiting for them outside; they mounted their horses, and all four trotted off after Raoul and his companion. They were just disappearing around a bend in the road when a new traveller arrived at the threshold of the inn. "What can I do for you, Sir?" asked the innkeeper, still pale and trembling from his fearful discovery.

The traveller made the gesture of a man drinking, and then dismounted, pointed to his horse, and pantomimed giving it a rubdown. "The devil!" the host said to himself. "It seems the man's a mute." He asked, "And where would you like to drink?"

"Here," said the traveller, pointing to a table.

"I was wrong," said the host to himself. "He's not a mute." So, he bowed and went to get a bottle of honey and some biscuits that he placed before his taciturn guest. "Would Sir like anything else?" he asked.

"I would," said the traveller.

"What does Sir wish?"

"To know if you've seen a young gentleman of fifteen riding a chestnut horse and followed by a lackey."

"The Viscount of Bragelonne?" said the host.

"Exactly."

"So, you're the one he called Sir Grimaud?"

The traveller nodded. "Well!" said the host. "You missed your young master by no more than a quarter of an hour. He plans to dine at Mazingarbe and sleep tonight at Cambrin."

"How far is Mazingarbe?"

"Two and a half leagues."

"Thank you."

Grimaud, certain now of rejoining his young master by the end of the day, relaxed, mopped his brow, and poured himself a glass of honey that he sipped silently. He had just set down his glass and was preparing to refill it when a terrible scream came from the back room where the monk and the dying man had gone. Grimaud leapt to his feet. "What was that?" he said. "Where was that scream from?"

"From the wounded man's room," said the host.

"What wounded man?" asked Grimaud.

"The old executioner of Bethune, who was ambushed by some Spaniards, then brought here to be confessed by an Augustinian friar. He must be suffering terribly."

"The old executioner of Bethune?" Grimaud muttered, calling up his memories. "A man of fifty-five to sixty, tall, strong, with a dark complexion, black hair and beard?"

"That's him, except his beard is grey and his hair is white. Do you know him?" asked the host.

"I met him once," said Grimaud, his expression darkening at the memory it recalled.

The hostess rushed up, trembling. "Did you hear that?" she asked her husband.

"Yes," the host replied, looking anxiously toward the door at the rear.

Just then there came a second cry, less loud than the first but followed by a long, extended groan. The three listeners shuddered. "We have to find out what's going on," said Grimaud.

"That sounded like a man being murdered," whispered the host.

"God!" said the woman, crossing herself.

Though Grimaud spoke slowly, he could act quickly. He rushed to the door of the back room and shook it by the knob but it was locked from within. "Open up!" cried the host. "Open up this instant, sir monk!" No one answered. "Open up, or I'll break down the door!" said Grimaud.

Silence. Grimaud looked around and spotted a crowbar in a corner of the common room. He went and grabbed it, and before the host could object, pried the door open. The back room was splattered with blood, a stream of which flowed from the mattress. The wounded man said nothing, for he was on the brink of death. The Augustinian friar had disappeared. "The monk!" cried the host. "Where's the monk?"

Grimaud rushed to the window that opened onto the courtyard. "He got out this way," he said.

"You think so?" said the host, thoroughly frightened. "Groom! See if the monk's mule is still in the stable!"

"The mule's gone!" the groom shouted back.

Grimaud frowned, while the host wrung his hands and looked around in dismay. His wife, terrified, didn't even dare to enter the room, and stood at the door. Grimaud approached the dying man, recognising his blunt, scarred features that brought back a terrible memory. Finally, after a moment of sad and silent contemplation, he said, "There's no doubt about it: it's him."

"Is he still alive?" asked the host.

Grimaud didn't reply, just opened the man's doublet to feel his heart, as the host came around to the other side. Suddenly both started back, the host uttering a cry of terror, while Grimaud turned pale. The blade of a dagger was buried to the hilt in the left side of the executioner's chest. "Run for help," said Grimaud. "I'll stay here with him." The host left the room in a hurry; as for his wife, she had fled when she heard her husband cry out.

205 The Absolution

Here's what had happened within the room. We've seen that it was not by his own will but rather against it that the monk attended the wounded man whose need had been forced upon him. Perhaps he'd thought to escape, if he got the chance – but he'd been prevented by the threats of the two gentlemen, and of their retainers, who'd apparently been given strict orders, as well as by the monk's own need to play the part of confessor convincingly. So, once he entered the room, he approached the wounded man's bedside. The executioner quickly looked the monk over, with the efficient glance of those who know they are dying and therefore have no time to lose. As he took in the figure of the one who was to give him consolation, he started in surprise and said, "You're very young, Father."

"Those who wear these robes are of no age," the monk replied drily.

"Please speak gently to me, Father," said the wounded man. "I need a friend in these final moments."

"Do you suffer much?" asked the monk.

"Yes – but in soul even more than in body."

"We shall save your soul," said the young man. "But tell me, were you really the executioner of Bethune, as these people say?"

"In a manner of speaking," the man replied quickly, doubtless fearing that the title of executioner would drive away the final blessing he needed. "At one time I was but I haven't been for fifteen years, since I sold the office. I still attend the executions but I don't strike the blow – not me!"

"But you feel horror at once having done so?"

The executioner gave a deep sigh. "As long as I swung the blade in the name of law and justice I could sleep soundly, as the responsibility was that of justice and the law – but since one terrible night when I served as an instrument of vengeance and raised my sword with hatred over one of God's creatures..."

The executioner stopped, shaking his head in despair. "Speak," said the monk who took a seat next to the bed, showing interest in the wounded man's strange story.

"Ah!" cried the dying man with the remorse of a long-buried grief that finally found expression. "After that, I renounced the savagery of the slayer's work, and tried to assuage my guilt by twenty years of good works. I've risked my life to aid those in peril and saved many lives to balance those I took. And that's not all: the money I made in the exercise of my vocation, I've given to the poor, to the Church, and to refugees fleeing persecution. All have pardoned me – some have even become my friends – but I believe that God has not pardoned me, because the memory of that execution pursues me when I sleep, and every night I see rising before me the spectre of that woman."

"A woman! So, it was a woman you murdered?" cried the monk.

"Now you say it, too!" cried the executioner. "You use the word that echoes in my ears: murder! I didn't execute her, I murdered her! I'm not an instrument of justice, I'm a murderer!"

And he closed his eyes with a groan. The monk must have feared the man would die before continuing, for he quickly said, "Go on, go on, I know nothing about it. When you've finished your story, then God – and I'll – judge."

"Oh! My Father," continued the executioner without opening his eyes, as if he feared by opening them to see some frightful object, "especially when it's nighttime, and I'm crossing a river, this terror I can't resist overwhelms me. My hands hang so heavy I can barely lift them, as if weighted by my heavy sword; the water turns the colour of blood, and all the voices of nature, the rustling of trees, the murmur of the wind, the lapping of the waves, all share a single voice, despairing and terrible, crying out to me, 'Let God's justice be done!'"

"Delirium!" muttered the monk, shaking his head.

The executioner opened his eyes, twisted toward the young man, and seized his arm. "Delirium?" he repeated. "Delirium, you say? No, not at all. Because it was in the night – because I threw her body in the river – because the words my remorse always repeats, those very words, it was / in my pride who spoke them. After having been an instrument of human justice, I believed I embodied God's justice."

"But, look here, how did it happen? Speak," said the monk.

"It was at night; a nobleman came to me; he showed me an order, and I followed him. Four other lords awaited us. They blindfolded me and took me with them. I had always reserved the right to refuse a job if what I was asked to do seemed unjust. We rode for five or six leagues, sombre, silent, almost without saying a word. Finally, we reached a small cottage, where through the window I could see a woman leaning on a table, and they said, 'This is who you must execute.'"

"Horrid!" said the monk. "And you obeyed?"

"But my dear Father, they said this woman's a monster who'd poisoned her second husband and then tried to murder his brother who's among the men who'd brought me. She'd just poisoned to death a young woman who's her rival and they said that before leaving England she had conspired at the assassination of the king's favourite."

"Buckingham?" cried the monk.

"Yes, Buckingham – that's the name."

"So, this woman was English?"

"No, she was French but she'd married in England."

The monk paled, wiped his forehead, got up, and locked the door from the inside. The executioner thought he was being abandoned and fell back moaning on the bed. "No, no, here I am," said the monk, returning quickly. "Continue – who were these men?"

"One was a foreigner – English, I think. The other four were French and wore the uniform of the King's Musketeers."

"Who were they?"

"I didn't know them. But the French lords called the Englishman milord."

"And this woman ... was she beautiful?"

"Young and beautiful! Oh, yes! I can still see her, kneeling at my feet as she prayed, her beautiful head thrown back. I've never been able to understand how I'd have taken such a head so beautiful, so pale."

The monk seemed agitated by a strange emotion. He trembled as if he wanted to ask a question but didn't dare. Finally, after a violent effort to control himself, he asked, "And the name of this woman?"

"I don't know. As I told you, they said she was twice married, once in France and once in England."

"And she was young, you say?"

"Twenty-five."

"Beautiful?"

"Ravishing."

"Blond hair?"

"Yes."

"She had full, flowing hair, didn't she? That fell to her shoulders?"

"Yes."

"Eyes large and expressive?"

"When she wanted them to be. Oh, yes, that was her."

"A voice of strange sweetness?"

"How ... how do you know?"

The executioner raised himself on his arm and stared, terrified, at the monk, who flushed. "And you killed her!" said the monk. "You served as the tool of those cowards who didn't dare to kill her themselves! Had you no pity for her youth, beauty, and helplessness? You killed her?"

"Alas!" said the executioner. "I told you, Father, that beneath her heavenly trappings this woman hid an infernal spirit, and when I saw her, when I remembered the evil she'd done to me..."

"To you? What could she have done to you? Tell me."

"She had seduced and run off with my brother, who was a priest; she had escaped with him from her convent."

"With your brother?"

"Yes – my brother was her first lover. She was the cause of my brother's death. Oh, Father, Father! Don't look at me like that! Am I guilty? Will I not be forgiven?"

The monk composed his face. "All right, all right, I will forgive you – if you tell me everything!"

"Yes!" cried the executioner. "Everything! Everything!"

"Then answer me: if she seduced your brother ... you said she seduced him, didn't you?"

"Yes."

"If she caused his death ... you said she caused his death?"

"Yes," repeated the executioner.

"Then, you must know her maiden name."

"Ah! My God, my God!" said the executioner. "I feel I'm dying. Absolution, Father! Absolution!"

"Say the name!" cried the monk. "Say the name, and I will give it."

"Her name ... ah, God pity me!" the executioner murmured.

And he fell back on the bed, pale, shivering, almost convulsing. "Her name!" repeated the monk, bending over the dying man as if to draw it out of him. "Her name! Speak, or no absolution!"

The dying man seemed to gather all his remaining strength. The monk's eyes glistened. "Anne de Breuil," the dying man murmured.

"Anne de Breuil!" cried the monk, straightening and raising his hands to heaven. "Anne de Breuil! That was the name, wasn't it?"

"Yes, that was her name – and now absolve me, for I'm dying."

"I, absolve you?" cried the priest, with a laugh that made the hair stand on the dying man's head. "I, absolve you? I am no priest!"

"You're not a priest!" cried the executioner. "But ... but what are you, then?"

"I shall tell you, wretch!"

"Oh, Lord – oh, my God!"

"I am John Francis de Winter!"

"I don't know you!" cried the executioner.

"Patience, patience, because you shall know me. I am John Francis de Winter," he repeated, "and that woman..."

"That woman?"

"Was my mother!"

The executioner gave a great and horrible scream, the first cry that was heard outside. Then he gibbered, "Oh, forgive me if not in the name of God, then your own – if not as a priest, then as her son."

"Forgive you!" cried the false monk. "Forgive you! God may do so but as for me – never!"

"Pity me," said the executioner, holding his hands out to him.

"No pity for those who'd no pity. Die without confession – in despair – and be damned!"

And drawing a dagger from his robes, he plunged it into the man's chest. "There!" he said. "That's my absolution!" It was then that those outside heard the second, quieter cry followed by a prolonged groan. The executioner who had half risen, fell back across the bed. As for the false monk, leaving the dagger in his victim, he ran to the window, opened it, jumped out onto the flowerbed, slipped into the stable, and took his mule out the back door. He led it to the nearest copse of trees, threw off his monk's robe, pulled a full cavalier's outfit from his saddle bags, donned it, and rode to the nearest posting-house. There he hired a horse and galloped off at full speed toward Paris.

206

Grimaud Speaks

The innkeeper had gone for help, his wife was outside praying, and Grimaud was left alone with the executioner. After a moment, the wounded man opened his eyes. "Save me!" he murmured. "Save me! O, my God, is there no friend in the world who'll help me live – or die?" With an effort, he lifted his hand to his chest, and felt the hilt of the dagger. "Oh," he said like one who suddenly remembers. And he dropped his arm back on the bed. "Take courage," said Grimaud. "We've sent for help."

"Who are you?" asked the wounded man, eyes widening as he looked at Grimaud.

"An old friend," said Grimaud.

"You?" The man tried to remember him, to recognise the features of the one speaking to him. "When did we meet? What happened then?"

"It was one night twenty years ago. My master brought you from Bethune to Armentieres."

"Yes, I remember you," said the executioner. "You were one of the four lackeys."

"That's right."

"How is it you're here?"

"I was passing on the road and stopped at this inn to rest my horse. They'd just informed me the old executioner of Bethune was here when we heard your cries. We tried to rush to your aid but had to break down the door."

"And the monk?" said the executioner. "Have you seen the monk?"

"What monk?"

"The monk who was locked in with me?"

"No, he's gone; it looks like he fled out the window. Is he the one who stabbed you?"

"Yes," said the executioner.

Grimaud turned as if to leave. "What are you going to do?" asked the wounded man.

"We have to go after him."

"If you do – take care!"

"Why?"

"This was his revenge upon me, and so this is my expiation. Now I hope God will forgive me."

"Explain," Grimaud said.

"That woman that you and your masters had me kill..."

"Milady?"

"Yes, Milady, that's what you called her."

"What did this monk have to do with Milady?"

"She was his mother."

Grimaud staggered and gazed at the dying man as if stunned. "His ... mother?" he repeated.

"Yes, his mother."

"So, he knows the secret of her death?"

"I took him for a monk and told him everything in confession."

"Woe!" cried Grimaud, sweat breaking out on his brow at the thought of the consequences of such a revelation. "You ... you gave him no names, I hope?"

"No names because I knew none except the maiden name of his mother that he recognised – but he knows that his uncle was one of the judges."

And with that, the executioner fell back, exhausted. Grimaud wanted to help him and reached out for the hilt of the dagger. "Don't touch it," said the executioner. "If you pull out the dagger, I'll die."

Grimaud froze, hand outstretched, then balled it into a fist and struck his forehead. "Ah! But if that man learns who the others were, my master is lost."

"Hurry, then! Go to him!" cried the executioner. "Warn your master, if he's still alive – and warn his friends. Believe me, my death won't be the end of his terrible vengeance."

"Where was he going?" asked Grimaud.

"To Paris."

"Where in Paris?"

"To track back two young gentlemen who passed on their way to the army, one of them – I heard his companion say his name – called the Viscount of Bragelonne."

"Was that the young man who brought the monk to you?"

"Yes."

Grimaud raised his eyes to heaven. "Then it's the will of God," he said.

"It must be," said the wounded man.

"This is terrifying," muttered Grimaud. "And yet that woman deserved her fate," he said aloud. "Don't you think so?"

"When one is dying," said the executioner, "the crimes of others seem tiny compared to one's own."

And he fell back, eyes closed in exhaustion. Grimaud was torn between a pity that forbade him to leave the man before help came, and the fear that commanded him to leave at once to bring this news to the Count of La Fère. He heard a noise in the corridor and saw the host returning with the surgeon, who had finally been found. They were followed by several busybodies, drawn by curiosity; news of the strange event had started to spread. The surgeon approached the dying man, who seemed unconscious. Shaking his head doubtfully, he said, "First we must draw the blade from his chest."

Grimaud remembered what the wounded man had said and looked away. The surgeon opened the man's doublet, tore a hole in his shirt, and laid his chest bare. The blade was buried to its hilt as we said. The surgeon took hold of the pommel and pulled; as he did so the wounded man opened his eyes in a startled stare. When the blade was pulled out, a bloody froth foamed from the executioner's mouth, and when he breathed, blood spurted from his wound. The dying man fixed his eyes on Grimaud with a strange expression, uttered a muffled groan, and died in an instant. Grimaud picked up the bloody dagger from where the surgeon had dropped it on the bedroom floor, horrifying everyone, and gestured for the host to follow him. He paid all the host's expenses with a generosity worthy of his master, and then mounted his horse. At first Grimaud had thought he should return immediately to Paris but then he remembered that his prolonged absence would make Raoul anxious – Raoul, who was only two leagues ahead of him, and could be caught in a quarter of an hour. He would explain everything to Raoul, then head back to Paris. He put his horse into a gallop and fifteen minutes later he pulled up at the Crowned Mule, the only inn at Mazingarbe. After a few words with the host, he knew he was in the right place. Raoul was dining with the Count of Guiche and his tutor but the grim adventure of the morning had left the young men in a sombre mood. This didn't dampen the cheer of Sir d'Arminges, whose greater experience made him more philosophical about such events. Suddenly the door opened and Grimaud appeared before them, pale, dusty, and still spattered with the dying man's blood. "Grimaud, my good Grimaud," cried Raoul. "Here you are at last! Excuse me, Gentlemen – he's not a servant, he's a friend." And rising and racing to him, he continued, "How is Sir Count? Have you seen him since we parted? Please tell me – but I also have much to tell you. In the last three days we've had many adventures ... but what's wrong? You're so pale. And blood! What's this blood?"

"You're right, he's all bloody," said de Guiche, rising. "Are you hurt, my friend?"

"No, Sir," said Grimaud, "the blood is not mine."

"Whose, then?" asked Raoul.

"It's the blood of that luckless man you left at the inn, and who died in my arms."

"That man died – in your arms! But do you know who he was?"

"Yes," said Grimaud.

"He was the old executioner of Bethune."

"I know it."

"How did you know?"

"I knew him ... before."

"And he's dead?"

"Yes."

The two young men gaped at each other. "What would you have, Gentlemen?" said d'Arminges. "Death is the universal law, and not even an executioner is exempt. From the moment I saw his wound, I figured he would die – and you know, that was his opinion too that was why he asked for a monk." At the word monk, Grimaud paled. "Come, sit down, eat!" said d'Arminges who did not allow sentiment to get in the way of a good meal like all men of that period and especially those of his maturity.

"Yes, Sir, you're right," said Raoul. "Come, Grimaud, call for what you need, get served, and after you've rested, we'll talk."

"No, Sir, no," said Grimaud. "I can't stop for a moment – I need to get back to Paris."

"What, you, go back to Paris? You're mistaken, it's Olivain who's going back – you're staying with me."

"On the contrary, it's Olivain who's staying, and I who am leaving. I came expressly to tell you that."

"But what's the reason for this change?"

"I can't tell you."

"Explain yourself."

"I can't explain."

"Come, is this some kind of joke?"

"Sir Viscount knows I never joke."

"Yes but I also know that the Count of La Fère said you would stay with me while Olivain went back to Paris. We will follow the orders of Sir Count."

"Not in this circumstance, Sir."

"Are you disobeying me, by any chance?"

"Yes, Sir – because I must."

"You persist then?"

"Yes, because I must. I'm going. Good luck, Sir Viscount."

Grimaud bowed and turned toward the door to leave. Raoul, angry and anxious at the same time, followed and grabbed him by the arm. "Grimaud!" Raoul cried. "I said you're staying!"

Grimaud faced him. "To do that would mean the death of Sir Count."

And again, he bowed and turned to leave. "Grimaud, my friend," said the viscount, "you can't go this way, leaving me dying of worry. Grimaud, speak, speak, in heaven's name!"

And Raoul, staggering, fell into a chair. "I can tell you only one thing, Sir, for the secret you demand isn't mine to share. You met a monk, didn't you?"

The two young men exchanged fearful glances. "Yes."

"You led him back to the wounded man?"

"Yes."

"Did you get a good look at him?"

"Yes."

"Enough that you'd recognise him if you met him again?"

"Yes, I swear it," said Raoul.

"And I, as well," said de Guiche.

"Well, if you ever meet him again," said Grimaud, "whether on the highway, on the street, in church, wherever – put your boot on him and crush him without pity or mercy, as you would a viper, a serpent, or a cobra. Crush him, and don't stop until you're sure he's dead; the lives of five men are in jeopardy so long as he lives."

And without adding another word, Grimaud took advantage of his audience's shock and terror to leave the premises. "Well, Count!" said Raoul, turning to de Guiche. "Didn't I tell you that monk reminded me of a snake?" A moment later they heard a horse gallop past in the street. Raoul ran to the window; it was Grimaud, returning down the road to Paris. He saluted the viscount, waved his hat, and disappeared around the corner. As he galloped Grimaud had two thoughts. The first was that, at the rate he was going, his horse wouldn't last ten leagues. The second was that he was out of money. But Grimaud's wits had been sharpened by his habitual silence: at the first relay he sold his horse and used the money to hire post-horses for the rest of the journey.

207
The Eve of the Battle

Raoul was roused from these sombre reflections by the innkeeper, who rushed into the common room shouting, "The Spaniards! The Spaniards!"

If true, this was serious enough to drive all other thoughts from their minds. The young men asked for confirmation and were told that the enemy was advancing by way of Houdin and Bethune. While Sir d'Arminges called for the horses that were feeding in preparation for departure, the young cavaliers went up to the inn's highest windows, from which they could see a full corps of infantry and cavalry on the horizon toward Hersin and Lens. This wasn't just a band of irregulars, this was a whole army. It seemed like a good idea to obey the wisdom of Sir d'Arminges this time and retreat. The young men ran back downstairs. Sir d'Arminges was already mounted, Olivain held the young men's horses while the Count of Guiche's lackeys guarded the Spanish prisoner between them, mounted on a nag they'd bought to bear him. As an added precaution, his hands had been tied. The little troop left at a trot on the road to Cambrin, where they expected to find the prince. But he'd moved the evening before, drawing back toward La Bassée in response to a false report that the enemy was crossing the Lys at Estaires. In fact, misled by this information, the prince had withdrawn his troops from Bethune and concentrated all his forces between Vieille-Chapelle and La Venthie, while he himself, after a reconnaissance ride along the line with the Marshall de Grammont, had just returned to his headquarters, where he interrogated the officers of his commands as to their situations. But no one had any positive news: for forty-eight hours there had been no contact with the enemy, who seemed to have vanished. Never does an enemy army seem so near and therefore as threatening as when it disappears completely. So, the prince's mood, unlike his usual habit, was sullen and anxious, when a duty officer entered and announced to the Marshall de Grammont that someone wanted to speak to him. The Duke Grammont glanced at the prince, who nodded, and the marshal went out. The prince followed him with his eyes, his gaze fixed on the door, and no one dared to speak for fear of interrupting his thoughts. Suddenly a distant thud trembled the air. The prince leapt up, extending his hand in the direction whence the sound came. He knew quite well what it was: cannon fire. Everyone else had risen as well. At that moment the door opened: "My Lord," said the Marshall de Grammont, radiant, "if Your Highness will permit, my son, the Count of Guiche, and his travelling companion, the Viscount of Bragelonne, can give him news of the enemy – for they've seen them."

"How's that?" the prince said eagerly. "If I'll permit it? I don't just permit it, I require it! Have them enter."

The marshal pushed in the two young men, who found themselves in front of the prince. "Speak, Gentlemen," said the prince, saluting them. "Talk first, and we'll exchange the usual compliments later. The most urgent thing now is to know where the enemy is and what he's doing."

It fell naturally to the Count of Guiche to do the talking – not only was he the older of the two youths but he'd already been presented to the prince by his father. Raoul had never seen the prince before but de Guiche had known him quite a while, so he was the one who told the prince what they'd observed from the inn at Mazingarbe. Meanwhile, Raoul was studying this young general, already so famous from the battles of Rocroi, Fribourg, and Nördlingen. Since the death of his father, Henri de Bourbon, Louis de Bourbon was Prince de Condé, and was nicknamed, according to the custom of the time, “Sir Prince.” He was a young man aged twenty-six or twenty-seven, eagle-eyed and hook-nosed – an agl' occhi grifani as Dante put it. He was of middle height, with long, flowing hair, and had all the qualities of a great general, being decisive, courageous, and quick-witted. This didn't prevent him from being at the same time a gentleman of elegance and spirit, so that besides the revolution he brought to warfare due to the new ideas that he embodied, he also led a social revolution in Paris among the young nobles of the Court, of whom he was the natural leader. These young courtiers were called the petit-maitres by the aging social lions of the previous reign, for whom Bassompierre, Bellegarde, and the Duke d'Angouleme had been the models. A few words from the Count of Guiche, along with the sound of the guns, enabled the prince to grasp the situation. The enemy had crossed the Lys at Saint-Venant was marching on Lens, doubtless intending to take the city and cut off the French army from France. They could hear closer cannon fire now, louder thumps drowning out the farther thunder, as French heavy guns began to reply to the Spanish and Lorrainer artillery. But how strong was this attack? Was it just a corps intended to create a diversion, or was it the entire army?

That was the prince's next question, to which de Guiche was unable to give a definitive response. It was the critical issue, the one for which the prince needed an exact and positive answer. By this time Raoul had gotten over his initial timidity, and approached the prince to say, “If my Lord will allow me to hazard a few words on the subject, I might be able to help.”

The prince turned, looked the young man over, and seemed to size him up at a glance. Seeing the youth was no more than fifteen, he smiled reassuringly. “Of course, Sir – speak,” he said, softening his commanding voice, as if addressing a woman.

Raoul said, blushing, “My Lord might want to interrogate our Spanish prisoner.”

“You took a Spanish prisoner?” the prince cried.

“Yes, My Lord.”

“Why, so we did,” added de Guiche. “I'd quite forgotten.”

“Don't be so modest – you're the one who took him,” Raoul said, smiling.

The old marshal turned toward the viscount, grateful for this praise of his son, while the prince called out, “This young man is right – bring in the prisoner.”

While they were marching him in, the prince took de Guiche aside and asked him how the prisoner had been taken, and who this young man was. The prince, returning to Raoul, said, “Sir, I know you have a letter of recommendation from my sister, Madam de Longueville but I see you prefer to recommend yourself by giving such good advice.”

“My Lord,” said Raoul, blushing, “I didn't wish to interrupt Your Highness's important conversations with my small affairs – but here's the letter.”

“Very well,” said the prince. “You can give it to me later. Here comes the prisoner, and right now that's the urgent thing.”

They brought in the Spanish irregular. He was a condottiere, one of those mercenaries who at that time were still selling themselves to anyone who could pay and give them free reign to pillage. Since his capture he hadn't said a word, so that even his captors didn't know his nationality. The prince regarded him with an air of disgust. “What country do you come from?” he asked.

The prisoner replied with a few words in a foreign language. “Hmm. Apparently, he's Spanish,” said the prince. “Do you speak Spanish, Grammont?”

“Not much, My Lord.”

“And I, not at all,” said the prince, laughing. “Gentlemen,” he said to his gathered staff, “does anyone speak Spanish who can act as an interpreter?”

“I do, my Lord,” said Raoul.

“Ah! So, you speak Spanish?”

“Well enough, I think, to serve Your Highness's purpose in this matter.”

All the while, the prisoner stood impassively, as if he had no idea what was being said. “My Lord desires to know your nationality,” Raoul said in the purest Castilian.

“Ich bin ein Deutscher,” replied the prisoner.

“What the devil did he say?” asked the prince. “What fresh gibberish is this?”

“He says he's a German, My Lord,” said Raoul. “But I don't believe it because his accent is bad, and his pronunciation is terrible.”

“So, you speak German, too?” asked the prince.

“Yes, My Lord,” Raoul said.

“Well enough to interrogate him in that language?”

“Yes, My Lord.”

“Question him then.”

Raoul began the interrogation, and the results supported his first opinion. The prisoner couldn't or wouldn't understand what Raoul was saying and Raoul in return, only poorly understood his responses that came in a mix of Flemish and Alsatian. But despite the prisoner's efforts to avoid being understood, Raoul identified the man's native accent. “Non siete Spagnuolo, non siete Tedesco, siete Italiano,” Raoul said. “You're neither Spanish nor German, you're Italian.”

The prisoner started and bit his lip. “Ah! I understood that perfectly,” said the Prince de Condé, “and since he's Italian, I'll continue the interrogation. Thank you, Viscount,” continued the prince, laughing.

“I appoint you from this moment to be my interpreter.”

But the prisoner was no more disposed to answer in Italian than in any other language; what he wanted was to evade giving answers. Thus, he knew nothing – not the number of the enemy, nor who commanded them, nor the direction of their movements. “Very well,” said the prince, who understood what was behind this pretended ignorance. “This man was caught plundering and murdering, and could have purchased his life by answering – but since he won't talk, take him out and shoot him.”

The prisoner turned pale, and the two soldiers who'd brought him each took an arm and led him to the door, while the prince, turning to the Marshall de Grammont, seemed already to have dismissed the matter from his mind. At the door, the prisoner tried to stop the soldiers, who, following their orders, tried to force him to continue. “Hold on,” said the prisoner in French. “I'm ready to talk, My Lord.”

“Oh ho!” said the prince, laughing. “I thought you might. I have a secret method for loosening tongues; young men, profit by my example for when your time comes to command.”

“But only on condition,” continued the prisoner, “that Your Highness swears to let me live.”

“By my faith as a gentleman,” said the prince.

“In that case, ask away, My Lord.”

“Where is the army crossing the Lys?”

“Between Saint-Venant and Aire.”

“Who is in command?”

“Count Fuensaldagna, General Beck, and the archduke in person.”

“How many men do they have?”

“Eighteen thousand men and thirty-six guns.”

“And their goal?”

“They march on Lens.”

“You see, Gentlemen!” said the prince, turning in triumph toward the Marshall de Grammont and the other officers.

“Yes, My Lord,” said the marshal. “You've gained all that human intelligence could learn.”

“Call back Le Plessis-Bellière, Villequier, and d'Erlac,” said the prince. “Recall all the troops that are south of the Lys and prepare them to march tonight; tomorrow in all probability, we attack the enemy.”

“But, my Lord,” said the Marshall de Grammont, “consider that even with all the troops we have available, it's no more than thirteen thousand men.”

“Sir Marshall,” said the prince, with that noble look that belonged only to him, “it's with small armies that we win the greatest battles.” Then, turning to the prisoner: “Take this man out and guard him carefully. His life depends on the information he's given us: if it's wrong, he's to be shot.” The prisoner was led away. “Count of Guiche,” said the prince, “it's been too long since you saw your father; stay close to him. Sir,” he continued, addressing Raoul, “if you're not too fatigued, follow me.”

“To the end of the world, My Lord!” cried Raoul, feeling for this young general who seemed to live up to his reputation, a genuine admiration.

The prince smiled; he despised flatterers but enjoyed being admired. “Well, Sir,” he said, “you're a good advisor – you've already proven that. Tomorrow we'll see how you behave in action.”

“And I, My Lord,” said the marshal, “what shall I do?”

“Stay here to receive the troops. I'll either come back to take command myself, or I'll send a courier to have them led to me. Twenty guards, well mounted, is all I'll need as escort.”

“That's not very many,” said the marshal.

“It's enough,” said the prince. “Have you a good horse, Sir Bragelonne?”

“Mine was killed this morning, My Lord, and for the time being I'm mounted on my lackey's.”

“Go to my stables and choose for yourself the horse that best suits you. No false modesty, take the horse that seems best to you. You may need it tonight, and you're sure to need it tomorrow.”

Raoul didn't wait to be told twice; he knew that with superiors, and especially when superiors were princes, the height of etiquette is to obey with question or delay. He went to the stables and chose an Andalusian dun, and then put on its saddle and bridle himself – for Athos had warned him that, in times of danger, he should never entrust that important task to anyone else. He then rejoined the prince, who had just that moment mounted his own horse. “Now, Sir,” he said to Raoul, “would you show me that letter of recommendation?”

Raoul handed the letter to the prince. “Stay with me, Sir,” the prince said to him.

The prince spurred on, wrapped the reins around his saddle's pommel, as he usually did when he wanted his hands free, unsealed Madam de Longueville's letter, and galloped up the road to Lens, accompanied by Raoul and followed by his small escort. Meanwhile, the messengers who were to recall the troops were riding off at full speed in all directions. The prince read the letter as he rode.

“Sir,” he said after a moment, “you are described in the best possible terms. The only thing I have to say is, from what little I've already seen and heard, I think even better of you than they do.”

Raoul bowed. However, at every step the little troop took toward Lens, the cannon fire seemed closer. The prince's gaze turned toward the thunder with the fierce concentration of a bird of prey. It was as if his eyes had the power to see through the barrier of trees that stretched before him toward the horizon. From time to time his nostrils dilated, as if seeking the scent of gun smoke, and he blew like a horse. Finally, they heard a gun thump so close that it was obvious they were less than a league from the fighting. As they rounded a bend, they saw ahead the little village of Aunay. The peasants were in a panic. The rumours of Spanish cruelty had everyone terrified; the women had already fled, retreating toward Vitry, leaving but few men behind. They ran at the sight of the prince, until one of them recognised him. “Ah, My Lord,” he said, “have you come to chase off those wretched Spaniards and thieving Lorrainers?”

“Yes,” said the prince, “if you'd be willing to serve as my guide.”

“Willingly, My Lord. Where would Your Highness like to go?”

“To some elevated spot where I can see Lens and its environs.”

“In that case, I'm your man.”

“I can trust you? You're a good Frenchman?”

“I was a soldier at Rocroi, My Lord.”

“Here,” said the prince, giving him his purse. “That's for Rocroi. Now, do you want a horse, or would you rather walk?”

“On foot, my Lord – I always served in the infantry. Besides, I intend to lead Your Highness by paths we'll have to pursue afoot.”

“Let's go,” said the prince, “there's no time to lose.” The veteran set off, running ahead of the prince's horse. A hundred paces outside the village, he took a small path that wound along the bottom of a pretty glen. For half a league they rode through the woods, with cannon fire so close that it seemed after each shot they could hear the whistling of the ball. Finally, they found a path that left the valley to climb the hillside. The peasant turned up this path, inviting the prince to follow him. The latter dismounted, ordered Raoul and one of his aides to do the same, told the others to stay behind but remain on the alert, and began to climb the path. After a few minutes they reached the ruins of an old château whose tumbled walls crowned a hilltop with a view of the surrounding region. A quarter-league away they could see Lens, and in front of Lens, the entire enemy army. At a single glance the prince surveyed the ground from Lens to Vimy. In an instant, the complete plan of the battle that was to save France the next day formed in his mind. He took a pencil, tore a page from his tablet, and wrote:

My dear Marshal,

In an hour Lens will be in the hands of the enemy. Come to me and bring the whole army with you. Meet me at Vendin, where I'll have orders for the troops' disposition. By tomorrow night we'll have retaken Lens and beaten the enemy.

Then turning toward Raoul, he said, "Go, Sir, at full speed to deliver this letter to Sir Grammont."

Raoul bowed, took the paper, ran back down the slope, jumped on his horse, and galloped off. Fifteen minutes later he reached the marshal. Some of the summoned troops had already arrived, and the rest were coming in from moment to moment. The Marshall de Grammont placed himself at the head of all the available infantry and cavalry and took the road to Vendin, leaving the Duke Châtillon to assemble and bring up the rest. All the artillery had arrived and was added to the march. It was seven in the evening when the marshal arrived at the rendezvous. The prince was there and waiting; as he'd foreseen, Lens had fallen into the enemy's hands shortly after Raoul's departure. The ending of the cannonade as good as announced this event. They waited for nightfall. As the darkness increased, the rest of the troops summoned by the prince gradually arrived. All had been ordered to march without beating drums or sounding trumpets. By nine o'clock full night had fallen, though a dim twilight still lit the plain. The French marched forward silently, the prince leading the column. Once they passed Aunay, the army could see Lens ahead: two or three houses were in flames, and distant shouts, denoting the agony of a town taken by assault, reached the soldiers' ears. The prince ordered the units into position. The Marshall de Grammont was to hold the far left, anchored on Méricourt; the Duke Châtillon commanded the centre; while the prince, commanding the right wing, formed his troops in front of Aunay. The next day's order of battle was to be based on the positions occupied during the night. Each unit would awaken on the ground from whence it would manoeuvre. The movements were executed in the most profound silence and with the greatest precision. By ten o'clock everyone was in position, and at half past ten the prince inspected the posts and gave the orders for the next day. Three instructions in particular were given to each commander, with orders that the troops were to obey them scrupulously. First, each unit in line should stay in contact with the units to its right and left, while maintaining a proper distance. Second, they were to advance at no faster than a walk. And third, they were to let the enemy fire first. The prince sent the Count of Guiche to join his father, keeping Bragelonne for himself – but the two young men asked to spend the night before the battle together, and their request was granted. A tent was raised for them near that of the marshal. Though the day had been long and tiring, neither was ready for sleep. The eve of battle is a sombre and serious time, even for old soldiers, let alone for two young men who would be seeing the terrible spectacle for the first time. On the eve of battle, the mind thinks of a thousand things forgotten or regretted. On the eve of battle, neighbours become friends and friends become brothers. It goes without saying that every feeling is exaggerated to the highest degree. And it seemed the young men had similar feelings, because each sat in his end of the tent and began to write a letter on his knee. The letters were long, at least four pages crammed with words, the writing growing successively smaller as the sheets were filled. Occasionally the young men looked up and smiled. Sensitive to each other's moods, they understood their feelings without saying anything. Their letters completed, each put his in a double envelope, so no one could see to whom the inner envelope was addressed until the outer was unsealed. Then they approached each other and exchanged their letters, smiling. "If I should suffer a mischance," said Bragelonne.

"If I should be killed," said de Guiche.

"Rest easy," they told each other. They embraced like brothers and then each wrapped himself in his cloak, lay down, and slept the deep and graceful sleep enjoyed by birds, flowers, and the young.

208 A Dinner as of Old

The second rendezvous of the former musketeers was not as tense and threatening as the first. With his usual clarity and perception, Athos had recognised that meeting around a dinner table would make everyone more amenable to agreement. His friends, sensitive to his current dignity and sobriety, hadn't dared to suggest a repeat of the revelry of former days at the Pomme-de-Pin or the Heretic, so he was first to propose that they meet around some well-provisioned table, where each could set aside reserve and be true to his own character, resuming that easy camaraderie they'd had when they were known as the Inseparables. This proposal was welcomed by everyone, especially d'Artagnan, who was eager to revisit the happy conviviality of his youth, as he felt that for far too long he'd had nothing but bad food and worse companionship. Porthos, on the verge of being made a baron, was delighted to have an opportunity to study the aristocratic manners of Athos and Aramis. Aramis wanted to hear the gossip from the Royal Palace from d'Artagnan and Porthos, and to stay on a good footing with friends as devoted as they, who formerly had supported his disputes with swords both ready and resolute. As for Athos, he was the only one who had nothing to gain from the others and was motivated solely by pure friendship and grandeur of soul. They'd all agreed to exchange addresses, and that when they needed to meet it would be at the sign of the Hermitage, a famous caterer in the Rue de la Monnaie. The first rendezvous was set for the following Wednesday, at eight in the evening. And so, on that day the four friends met at the appointed hour, each arriving on his own. Porthos came from trying out a new horse, d'Artagnan from his guard duty at the Louvre, Aramis from visiting one of his penitents in the neighbourhood, while Athos, who had taken up lodgings in Rue Guénégaud, was already nearby. Unexpectedly, they all arrived at the door of the Hermitage at the same time, Athos coming by way of the Pont Neuf, Porthos by the Rue du Roule, d'Artagnan by the Rue des Fossés-Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois, and Aramis by the Rue de Béthisy. The first words exchanged between the four friends, whose manners were somewhat reserved, were rather stiff and formal. As the meal began it was apparent that d'Artagnan was forcing himself to laugh, Athos to drink, Aramis to talk, and Porthos to stay silent. Athos, noticing this mutual embarrassment, adopted the speedy remedy of ordering four bottles of champagne. Hearing this order, delivered with Athos's usual calm command, the Gascon's face brightened, and Porthos looked pleased. Aramis was astounded: he knew that not only did Athos no longer drink but he even evinced a certain distaste for honey. This astonishment redoubled when Aramis saw Athos pour himself a glass and drink it down with all his former enthusiasm. D'Artagnan immediately filled and emptied his glass, while Porthos and Aramis clinked their goblets together. In what seemed like no time, the four bottles were empty. Conviviality reigned, and the four guests seemed ready to renounce all their private agendas. Athos's excellent prescription had dissolved all the clouds that darkened their hearts. The four friends began to rattle on like old times, finishing each other's sentences and leaning casually on the table in their favourite postures. It wasn't long before the dapper Aramis actually undid the top two buttons of his doublet that was Porthos's cue to open his entirely. Old battles, desperate journeys, and blows given and received were the early topics of conversation, followed by memories of the grim conflicts waged against the man who was now called the Great Cardinal. "My faith," said Aramis, laughing, "After these eulogies for the dead, shall we talk a bit about the living? I'd like to share some gossip about Mazarin. Is that allowed?"

"Always," said d'Artagnan, laughing in his turn. "Tell us your story, and we'll applaud it if it's good."

"There was a great prince with whom Mazarin sought an alliance," said Aramis. "The prince was invited by Mazarin to send him a list of the conditions under which he would honour the minister by allying with him. The prince, who was somewhat reluctant to deal with such an upstart, nonetheless compiled his list and sent it along. The list contained three provisions that Mazarin didn't like, so he offered the prince ten thousand crowns to drop them."

"Oh ho! The miser!" cried his three friends. "There wasn't much risk an offer that low would be accepted. What did the prince do?"

"The prince immediately sent Mazarin fifty thousand livres, begging him never to write to him again, and promising twenty thousand livres more if he'd agree never to speak with him as well. And what do you think Mazarin did?"

"He got angry?" said Athos.

"He beat the messenger?" said Porthos.

"He took the money?" said d'Artagnan.

"You guessed it, d'Artagnan," said Aramis.

And they all laughed so loudly that the host came over to see if they needed anything. He was afraid a fight was about to break out but eventually their hilarity died down. "Can we poke some fun at Sir Beaufort?" asked d'Artagnan. "I'm in just the mood."

"As you will," said Aramis, familiar enough with the Gascon's spirit to know he'd never give up on something he was determined to do.

"All right with you, Athos?" asked d'Artagnan.

"I vow, faith of a gentleman, that if it's funny, I'll laugh," said Athos.

"Then I'll begin," said d'Artagnan. "Sir Beaufort, talking one day with one of the friends of Sir Prince, told him that during the early quarrels between Mazarin and the Parliament he'd found himself in a dispute with Sir Chavigny, who'd attached himself to the new cardinal – so Beaufort, who held to the old ways, had cudgelled him soundly. This friend, who knew Sir Beaufort was rather free with his fists, wasn't a bit surprised, and related the tale to Sir Prince. The story spread rapidly, and soon everyone was snubbing Chavigny who wanted to know the reason for such coldness but no one would tell him. Finally, someone dared to say that everyone was surprised that a gentleman would allow himself to be cudgelled, even if Sir Beaufort was a prince. 'And who said the prince had cudgelled me?' asked Chavigny.

'The prince himself,' the friend replied.

"Chavigny went back to the source and found the person to whom the prince made the remarks, who swore on his honour that's what he'd heard. In despair at this defamation, Chavigny, who couldn't understand it, declared he'd rather die than put up with it. So, he sent two emissaries to the prince to inquire if he really had said that he'd cudgelled Sir Chavigny. 'I said it, and I repeat it,' said the prince, 'because it's the truth.'

'My Lord,' said one of Chavigny's emissaries, 'permit me to say to Your Highness that blows from a gentleman degrade the giver more than the receiver. King Louis XIII was unwilling to have gentlemen as his valets de chambre because he wanted the right to beat his valets.'

""Wait,' asked Sir Beaufort, surprised, 'what's all this talk of beating, and who was beaten?'

""But it was you, My Lord, who boasted of having beaten ...'

""Who?'

""Sir Chavigny.'

""Me?'

""Did you not cudgel Sir Chavigny, or so at least you said, My Lord?'

""Yes.'

""Well, he denies it.'

""Ha!' said the prince. 'I cudgelled him so well, I can give you the exact words,' said Sir Beaufort with all the majesty he could muster. 'I said, "My dear Chavigny, I implore you not to heed this clown of a Mazarin.'"

""Oh, no, My Lord – now I get it,' said the second emissary. 'You meant you were cajoling him.'

""Cudgelling, cajoling, what's the difference?' said the prince. 'Really, our wordsmiths are such peasants! Or is that pedants?'"

Everyone laughed at the blundering speech of Sir Beaufort, whose malapropisms were becoming proverbial, and all agreed that factionalism should be banished from their friendly rendezvous: d'Artagnan and Porthos could mock the princes, and Athos and Aramis could cudgel Mazarin. "My faith," said d'Artagnan to his two friends, "I assure you, you've got good reason to want to hammer Mazarin, as he certainly has it in for you."

"Bah! Really?" said Athos. "If I thought that clown knew me by name, I'd go and get re-baptised. Knows me, does he?"

"He not only knows you by name, he knows you by your deeds. He knows two gentlemen were particularly responsible for helping Sir Beaufort escape, and I'm warning you, he's actively looking for you."

"For me? Who told him?"

"I did."

"What, you?"

"Yes, he sent for me this morning specifically to ask if I had any information."

"About those two gentlemen?"

"Yes."

"And what did you tell him?"

"That I didn't know who they were yet but I was having dinner with two people who might tell me."

"That's what you said!" laughed Porthos, a broad smile spread across his face. "Bravo! But doesn't that frighten you, Athos?"

"No," said Athos, "it's not Mazarin looking for me that I fear."

"Oh?" said Aramis. "Tell me then what you do fear."

"Nothing – at the moment, at least."

"And in the past?" said Porthos.

"Ah, as to the past ... well, that's another thing," said Athos, with a sigh. "In the past, and in the future..."

"Are you afraid for young Raoul?" asked Aramis.

"Bah! No one dies in his first action," said d'Artagnan.

"Nor in the second," said Aramis.

"Nor in the third," said Porthos. "At least, none of our kind do, and the proof is that here we are."

"No," said Athos, "it's not Raoul that most worries me, because he'll conduct himself, I hope, like a gentleman, and if he is killed, well then! He'll die bravely. But you know, if anything did happen to him, well..." Athos drew a hand across his pale forehead.

"Well?" asked Aramis.

"Well! I would regard such a misfortune as ... an expiation."

"Ah!" said d'Artagnan. "I know what you're saying."

"As do I," said Aramis. "But don't think about that, Athos – the past is the past."

"I don't get it," said Porthos.

"The affair at Armentieres," said d'Artagnan.

"What affair at Armentieres?" said Porthos.

"... Milady..."

"Oh, right!" said Porthos. "I'd quite forgotten that."

Athos gave him a grave look. "You'd forgotten that, Porthos?"

"My faith, yes," said Porthos. "It was a long time ago."

"So, the matter doesn't weigh on your conscience?"

"Well ... no!" said Porthos.

"What about you, Aramis?"

"It does sometimes occur to me," said Aramis. "It's a case of conscience that's not completely unambiguous."

"And you, d'Artagnan?"

"I confess that when my mind dwells on that terrible affair, I think mainly about the icy corpse of poor Madam Bonacieux. Yes, yes," he murmured, "I have a thousand regrets for the victim but none for her murderer."

Athos shook his head doubtfully. "Consider," said Aramis, "that if you admit divine justice affects the events of this world, then that woman was punished by God. We were His instruments, that's all."

"But what about free will, Aramis?"

"How does a judge do it? He has free will and condemns without fear. What about the executioner? His arms swing the blade, yet he strikes without remorse."

"The executioner..." murmured Athos.

He appeared to start at the recollection. "I know it's dreadful," said d'Artagnan, "but when I think that we've killed English, Spanish, Huguenot rebels, even Frenchmen, whose only crime was to meet us in battle and be too slow coming on guard, I'm not going to apologise for my part in that woman's murder – word of honour!"

"As for me," said Porthos, "now that you bring it to mind, Athos, I can still see the scene as if it were in front of me: Milady was there where you are" – Athos turned pale – "I was standing where d'Artagnan is. I had at my side a sword that cut like a Damascus blade ... you remember it, Aramis, because you named it Balizarde, right? Well! I swear to the three of you that if it hadn't been for the executioner of Bethune – it was Bethune, wasn't it? By my faith, if it wasn't for him, I'd have cut off that monster's head myself in a heartbeat, or even quicker. She was a wicked woman."

"And, really," said Aramis, with that casually philosophical tone he'd assumed since joining the Church, a calculating philosophy in which there was more atheistic logic than trust in God, "why think of all this now? What's done is done. We'll confess this act in our final hour, and God will decide whether it was a crime, a minor misdeed, or a meritorious service. You ask, do I repent of it? My faith, no. On my honour and on the cross, I only regret the fact that she was a woman."

"The one good point of it all," said d'Artagnan, "is that there's no trace of the deed."

"She had a son," said Athos.

"Yes, I know – so you told me," said d'Artagnan, "but who knows what's become of him? Dead the serpent, and dead her brood? Do you think de Winter, his uncle, would raise such a son of a serpent? De Winter will have rejected the son as he condemned the mother."

"If so," said Athos, "then woe to de Winter, for the child had done nothing to him."

"The child is dead, or the Devil take me!" said Porthos. "There's too much fog and damp in that country, or so d'Artagnan says."

And Porthos's conclusion might have restored the gaiety to their more-or-less worried faces but there came the sound of footsteps on the stairs, and a knock on the door. "Enter," said Athos.

"Gentlemen," said the host, "there's a fellow below who's arrived in a great hurry to speak to one of you."

"Which one?" asked the four friends.

"The one who is called the Count of La Fère."

"I am he," said Athos. "And what's this fellow's name?"

"Grimaud."

"Oh?" Athos turned pale. "Back already? What has become of Bragelonne?"

"Show him in!" said d'Artagnan. "Show him in!"

But Grimaud was already waiting on the landing. He rushed into the room and dismissed the host with a gesture. The host went out and shut the door while the four friends turned expectantly to Grimaud. His agitation, his pallor, the sweat that bedewed his face, the dust that soiled his clothing, all declared him a messenger of important and terrible news. "Gentlemen," he said, "that woman had a child, and the child has become a man. The tigress bore a tiger and beware! For that tiger is stalking you."

Athos looked at his friends with a shrug and a rueful smile. Porthos reached to his side for his sword that was hanging on the wall; from somewhere, Aramis had drawn a dagger. D'Artagnan arose.

"Tell us what you mean, Grimaud," he said.

"I mean that the son of Milady has left England and is in France, on his way to Paris – if he's not here already."

"The devil!" said Porthos. "Are you sure of this?"

"I'm sure," said Grimaud.

A long silence followed this statement. Grimaud was so exhausted that he collapsed onto a chair. Athos poured a glass of champagne and gave it to him. "Well, after all," said d'Artagnan, "so what if he lives, and so what if he comes to Paris? We've had enemies before, and he's just one more. Let him come!"

"Yes," said Porthos, looking longingly toward where his sword hung on the wall, "we'll be ready for him."

"Besides, he's just a boy," said Aramis.

Grimaud rose. "A boy!" he said. "Do you know what he did, this boy? Disguised as a monk, he discovered the whole story of Milady's death while confessing the executioner of Bethune, and after having learned everything he could from him, as absolution he planted his dagger in the dying man's heart. Here it is, still red and dripping, because it's no more than thirty hours since I took it from the wound."

And Grimaud threw on the table the dagger left by the monk in the executioner's chest. In a spontaneous movement, d'Artagnan, Porthos, and Aramis arose and grabbed their swords. Athos alone remained in his chair, calm and almost spellbound. "And you say he was dressed as a monk, Grimaud?" he asked.

"Yes, an Augustinian monk."

"What does he look like?"

"He's about my height, or so the innkeeper told me; slim, pale, with light blue eyes, and blond hair."

"And ... he didn't see Raoul?" said Athos.

"On the contrary, they met. It was the viscount himself who brought him to the bed of the dying man."

Athos rose without a word and reached for his sword. "Look at us, Gentlemen," said d'Artagnan, trying to laugh, "acting like a pack of silly women! Us, four men who have stood before armies, trembling in the face of a child!"

"Yes," said Athos, "but this child comes in the name of God." And they hurriedly left the hôtel.

209
The Letter from Charles I

Now we must ask the reader to follow us across the Seine, to the door of the Carmelite Convent on the Rue Saint-Jacques. It was eleven in the morning, and the pious sisters were returning from a mass for the success of the arms of Charles I. Also leaving the church were a woman and a young girl wearing black, one dressed as a widow and the other as an orphan, on the way back to their cell. There, the woman knelt on a of painted wood, pray God, while near her the girl, leaning on a chair, stood and cried quietly. The woman would have been beautiful, had she not been aged by sorrow. The girl was charming, and her tears made her even more so. The woman looked to be aged forty, the girl about fourteen. "My God," said the kneeling suppliant, "protect my husband, watch over my son, and take from me this life so sad and miserable!"

"My God," said the girl, "preserve my mother for me!"

"Your mother is of no use to you in this world, Henrietta," replied the mournful woman. "Your mother has no throne, no husband or son, no money, no friends. Your mother, my poor child, has been abandoned by all the world."

And the mother, falling into the arms of the daughter who rushed to support her, burst into tears. "Have courage, Mother!" said the girl.

"Ah! Kings are down on their luck this year," said the mother, resting her head on her child's shoulder. "No one spares a thought for us in this country, where everyone is caught up in their own affairs. So long as your brother was with us he sustained me but now your brother is gone, and can't send news of himself to either me or his father. I've pawned my last jewels, sold all our clothes to pay the wages of your brother's servants, who refused to go with him until I made that sacrifice. Now we're reduced to living on the charity of these holy sisters – we're the poor, Henrietta, succoured only by God."

"But why don't you address yourself to the queen, your sister?" asked the girl.

"Alas!" said the weeper. "The queen my sister is no longer queen, my child, and another reigns in her name. One day you'll understand."

"Well, then, what about your nephew the king? Why not speak to him? You know how he loves me, mother."

"But my nephew the king isn't old enough to be king, and he himself, as La Porte has told us twenty times, has nothing of his own."

"Then let us turn to God," said the girl.

And she knelt beside her mother. These two women who prayed at the same pray God were the daughter and granddaughter of Henry IV – Queen Henriette and Henrietta, the wife and daughter of Charles I. Just as they were finishing their double prayer, there came a gentle scratching at the door of their cell. "Come in, Sister," said the elder of the two women, drying her tears and standing up. A nun respectfully opened the door. "Your Majesty will excuse me if I disturb her meditations," she said, "but in the parlour there's a foreign lord who's arrived from England, and who requests the honour to present a letter to Your Majesty."

"Oh, a letter! Did you hear that, Henrietta? Maybe it's a letter from the king with news from your father!"

"Yes, Madam, I heard, and I hope so too."

"And who is this lord, tell me."

"A gentleman of around forty-five or fifty."

"His name? Did he say his name?"

"Milord de Winter."

"Lord Winter!" cried the queen. "My husband's friend! Oh, let him come, let him come."

As he entered, the queen ran to meet the messenger and seized his hand eagerly. Lord Winter knelt and presented the queen a letter rolled up in a golden scroll case. "Ah, Milord," said the queen, "you bring us three things we haven't seen in a long while: gold, a devoted friend, and a letter from the king, our husband and master."

Winter bowed again but he couldn't answer, he was so deeply moved. "Milord," the queen said, taking the case, "you understand that I'm eager to know the contents of this letter."

"I will withdraw, Madam," said Winter.

"No, stay," said the queen, "and we'll read it to you. You must realise that I have a thousand questions for you." Winter stepped back and remained, standing in silence. The mother and the daughter retreated to a window embrasure, where the girl leaned on her mother's arm as they avidly read the following letter:

Madam, My Dear Wife,

We are at the end. All the resources God has seen fit to leave me are concentrated in our camp at Naseby, from which I am writing in haste. Here I await the army of my rebellious subjects, and here I will fight them one last time. If the victor, I'll continue the struggle; if the vanquished, I'll have lost for the last time. I hope, in the latter case (alas, we must prepare for every outcome), to cross to the coast of France. But even if I can, will they welcome such an unlucky king to a country already in the throes of civil discord? Your affection and your wisdom must guide me. The bearer of this letter will inform you, Madam, what I dare not risk putting on paper. He will explain what action I expect from you. I also ask you to give my love to my children, and accept all my heart's affection for you, Madam and dear wife.

The letter was signed, not "Charles, King," but "Charles, still King."

This sad reading that Winter followed by watching the expressions on the queen's face, nonetheless brought some hope to her eyes. "If he is no longer king," she cried, "defeated, exiled, proscribed, at least he still lives! Alas! The throne is too perilous a place nowadays for me to wish he were on it. But tell me, Milord," the queen continued, "and keep nothing from me: How do things stand? Is his position really as hopeless as he thinks?"

"Alas, Madam – even more hopeless than he thinks himself. His Majesty's heart is so good, he doesn't understand hatred; so loyal, he can't comprehend treason. England is caught in a kind of delirium, a fever that I fear can be quenched only in blood."

"But what of Lord Montrose?" asked the queen. "I've heard talk of great and rapid success, of a string of victories at Inverlochy, at Auldearn, Alford, and Kilsyth. I'd heard he was marching to the border to join his king."

"Yes, Madam – but at the border he encountered Lesley. He'd won victory by superhuman effort, until victory abandoned him: Montrose was beaten at Philiphaugh, had to dismiss what remained of his army, and flee disguised as a lackey. He's at Bergen, in Norway."

"God preserve him!" said the queen. "It's at least some consolation to know that a few of those who risked so much for us have reached safety. And now, Milord, since I see the king's position for what it is – that is to say, desperate – tell me what my royal husband asked you to say to me."

"Well, Madam," said Winter, "the king wants you to try to ascertain the feelings of the king and the queen toward him."

"Alas, as you know," the queen replied, "the king is still a child, and the queen, though a woman, is a weak woman – it's Mazarin who rules."

"Does he plan to play the same role in France that Cromwell plays in England?"

"Oh, no! He's a subtle and cunning Italian who might dream of a crime but would never dare commit it, the opposite of Cromwell, who does as he likes with the Houses of Parliament. In his battles with the French Parliament, Mazarin must stand at the side of the queen."

"All the more reason, then, why he should protect a king whom a parliament persecutes."

The queen shook her head bitterly. "From my experience, Milord," she said, "the cardinal will do nothing, or perhaps even oppose us. The presence of myself and my daughter in France already embarrasses him – imagine how he'd feel if we were joined by the king. Milord," Queen Henriette added with a melancholy smile, "I am sad and ashamed to say that we spent the winter in the Louvre without money, without linen, and almost without bread, often not getting up for lack of firewood."

"Horrible!" exclaimed Winter. "The daughter of Henry IV, the wife of King Charles! Why didn't you tell us, Madam, what had happened, what to expect?"

"You see the hospitality afforded a queen by this minister the king wishes to address."

"But I've heard talk of a marriage between His Highness the Prince of Wales and Miss d'Orléans," Winter said.

"Yes, I had a brief moment of hope. The children loved each other – but the queen, who had at first approved of their love, changed her mind, and now the Duke of Orléans, who had encouraged the beginning of their familiarity, has forbidden his daughter to think about such a union. Ah, Milord," continued the queen, without even bothering to wipe her tears, "better to fight, as the king did, and perhaps to die, than to live as a beggar as I have."

"Courage, Madam, courage," said Winter. "Don't despair. The interests of the Crown of France, even when preoccupied, must be opposed to the rebellion of the people in a neighbouring realm. Mazarin is a statesman and will understand that."

"But are you sure," said the queen doubtfully, "that you haven't been pre-empted?"

"By who?" asked Winter.

"By Joyce, by Pride, or by Cromwell."

"By a tailor! By a carter, or a brewer! I should hope, Madam that the cardinal would not enter into an alliance with such men as those."

"Well, what is he but such a man?" asked Madam Henriette.

"But for the king's honour, and that of the queen..."

"We'll have to hope he'll do something in their honour," said Madam Henriette. "With so eloquent a friend as you, Milord, I'm somewhat reassured. Give me your hand and let's go see the minister."

"Madam," said Winter, bowing, "you overwhelm me with honour."

"But if he refuses," said Madam Henriette, pausing, "and the king loses his battle – what then?"

"His Majesty might take refuge in Holland, where I've heard His Highness the Prince of Wales is."

"And can His Majesty, in flight, count on many such servants as yourself?"

"Alas, no, Madam!" said Winter. "But plans have been laid; I plan to search for allies in France."

"Allies!" said the queen, shaking her head.

"Madam," Winter replied, "If I can find the old friends I once had, I can answer for anything."

"Find them, then, Milord," said the queen with that poignant doubt that afflicts the long-suffering, "find them – and may God hear our pleas!" The queen went down to her carriage where Winter on horseback and followed by 2 lackeys, rode beside her window.

210

The Letter from Cromwell

Just as Queen Henriette was leaving the Carmelite convent for the Royal Palace, a cavalier dismounted at the door of that royal residence and announced to the guards that he had something important to convey to Cardinal Mazarin. Though the cardinal feared assassins, he nonetheless needed a great deal of information and advice, so he was relatively accessible. It wasn't the first door that was hard to pass, nor the second but rather the third, where, besides guards and footmen, there stood the loyal Bernouin, that Cerberus whom no words could beguile and no golden bribe could subvert. It was at this third door that anyone who sought an audience would undergo a formal interrogation. The cavalier, having tied his horse at the courtyard gate, climbed the grand stairway, and addressing the guards in the first chamber, asked, "Sir Cardinal de Mazarin?"

"Go on in," the guards replied without even looking up from their dice and cards as if to show they didn't consider it their job to act as ushers.

The cavalier entered the second chamber that was guarded by musketeers and footmen, and repeated his question. "Do you have a Letter of Audience?" asked an usher, advancing to meet the visitor.

"I have one but not from Cardinal Mazarin."

"Enter and ask for Sir Bemouin," said the usher.

And he opened the door to the third chamber. Either by chance or because it was his usual post, Bemouin had been standing behind the door and had heard everything. "I'm the one you're looking for, Sir," he said. "From whom is the letter you bear for His Eminence?"

"From General Oliver Cromwell," said the newcomer. "Please announce this name to His Eminence, and then let me know if he'll receive me."

And he stood in that proud and sombre pose favoured by Puritans. Bernouin, after taking a long look at the young man, went into the cardinal's study, where he repeated the messenger's words. "A man bearing a letter from Oliver Cromwell?" said Mazarin. "What sort of man is he?"

"A real Englishman, my Lord: blond hair or rather red-blond, grey-blue eyes, more grey than blue, and puffed up with pride."

"See if he'll give you the letter."

Bemouin returned to the antechamber and said, "My Lord asks for the letter."

"My Lord must see the bearer to see the letter," replied the young man, "but to convince you of its bona fides, look here."

Bemouin looked at the letter's seal, and seeing that the letter really came from General Oliver Cromwell, turned to go back to Mazarin. "You may add," said the young man, "that I am not just a messenger but an envoy extraordinaire."

Bemouin re-entered the study and came out again a few seconds later. "Enter, Sir," he said, holding open the door.

Mazarin had needed the brief delay to get hold of his emotions upon hearing of the letter's origin. Meanwhile his shrewd mind was trying to figure out Cromwell's motive in sending the missive. The young man appeared in the door of the study, holding his hat in one hand and the letter in the other. Mazarin rose and said, "Sir, you claim you have a letter for me?"

"Here it is, My Lord," said the young man. Mazarin took the letter, opened it, and read:

Mister Mordaunt, one of my secretaries, bears this letter of introduction to His Eminence Cardinal Mazarin, at Paris. He has, in addition, a second, more confidential letter.

OLIVER CROMWELL

"Very well, Sir Mordaunt," said Mazarin, "give me this second letter and take a seat."

The young man drew a second letter from his pocket, gave it to the cardinal, and sat down. However, the cardinal, having taken the letter, thoughtfully turned it over and over in his hand instead of opening it, and then decided to sound out the messenger with some questions, as his experience had convinced him that few men could hide their secrets if watched closely while interrogated. "You're very young, Sir Mordaunt, for the difficult job of ambassador that taxes even veteran diplomats."

"My Lord, I am twenty-three but Your Eminence shouldn't be fooled into thinking me young. In my way I am older than you, though I lack your wisdom."

"How is that, Sir?" said Mazarin. "I don't understand you."

"They say, My Lord that years of suffering count double – and I have suffered for twenty years."

"Ah, yes, I see," said Mazarin, "a lack of fortune. You are poor, aren't you?" And he added to himself, "These English revolutionaries are all beggars and peasants."

"My Lord, I should have a fortune of six million but it was stolen from me."

"So, you're not a commoner, then?" said Mazarin, astonished.

"If I bore my proper title, I'd be a lord; if I wore my real name, you'd know me by one of the most illustrious in England."

"What is your name, then?" asked Mazarin.

"I'm known as Sir Mordaunt," said the young man, bowing.

Mazarin saw that Cromwell's envoy wished to maintain his incognito. He paused a moment, considering the young man more closely than he had before. The young envoy was unmoved. "To the devil with these Puritans!" Mazarin said under his breath. "They're carved of marble." Then, aloud, he said, "But your noble relatives are still alive?"

"One of them is, yes, My Lord."

"And can't he help you?"

"I've presented myself three times to my uncle to implore his aid, and three times I've been driven from his door."

"Oh, Lord help us, good Sir Mordaunt!" said Mazarin, hoping to trap the young man with false pity. "My God, your story moves me! So, you don't know the true facts of your high birth?"

"I have only recently learned the truth."

"And until you knew that...?"

"I'd considered myself an abandoned child."

"So, you've never seen your mother?"

"I did, My Lord, when I was a child – she came three times to my nursery, and I remember the last time as if it were yesterday."

"You have a good memory," said Mazarin.

"Oh, yes, My Lord," said the young man with a strange emphasis that sent a chill down the cardinal's spine.

"And who raised you?" asked Mazarin.

"A French nurse, who drove me away when I was five years old because she hadn't been paid, though she told me the name of the uncle my mother had spoken of."

"What happened to you?"

"I took to crying and begging on the highways, until a minister from Kingston took me in. He instructed me in the Calvinist faith, taught me everything he knew, and helped me in trying to find my family."

"And this research...?"

"It was in vain. It was chance that finally led me to the truth."

"You discovered what had become of your mother?"

"I learned that she'd been murdered by my uncle with the help of four accomplices, and that I'd been expelled from the nobility and stripped of all my rights by King Charles I."

"Ah, now I understand why you serve Sir Cromwell. You hate the king."

"Yes, my Lord, I hate him!" the young man said.

Mazarin was astonished by his diabolical expression as he uttered these words: unlike most complexions that flush red, this young man's face was livid and suffused with gall. "Your story is a terrible one, Sir Mordaunt, and touches me deeply; but fortunately, you now serve an all-powerful master who will help you in your quest. People in power have a great deal of information available to us."

"My Lord, offer the slightest scent to a well-bred hunting dog, and he'll follow the trail to the end."

"But this uncle you mentioned, would you like me to speak to him?" said Mazarin, who thought it would be useful to have an ally near to Cromwell.

"Thank you, My Lord but I'll speak to him myself."

"But didn't you say he mistreated you?"

"He'll treat me better the next time I see him."

"So, you have a way to make him listen?"

"I have a way to make him afraid."

Mazarin stared at the young man but was met by such a fiery glare that he looked down. Unwilling to continue the conversation, he opened the letter from Cromwell. Gradually the young man's eyes returned to their usual glassy passivity, and he fell into a deep reverie. After reading the first few lines, Mazarin glanced up to see if the young man was watching him, and noticing his indifference, he shrugged slightly and said to himself, "To pursue your agenda by using those who are pursuing their own is one way to conduct affairs. Let's see what this letter is all about." We reproduce it here verbatim:

To His Eminence

My Lord Cardinal Mazarini

I would like, My Lord, to know your intentions concerning current affairs in England. Our neighbouring realms are too close for France not to care about our situation, or for us not to care about France. The English are almost unanimously opposed to the tyranny of King Charles and his supporters. Placed at the head of this movement by the public's trust, I appreciate more than anyone its nature and consequences. Today we go to war, and I will engage King Charles in a decisive battle. I will prevail, for the hope of the nation and the will of the Lord is with me. Once defeated, the king has no more resources in England or Scotland; if he is not taken or killed, he will try to escape to France to raise money, recruit soldiers, and buy arms. France has already received Queen Henriette, and thereby, unintentionally perhaps, contributed to sustaining the fires of civil war in our country; but Madam Henriette is a Daughter of France and is entitled to her hospitality. For King Charles, it is another story; if he receives refuge and aid, France would insult the English people and their government in a manner tantamount to open hostility ...

At this point Mazarin, uneasy at the turn the letter had taken, stopped reading to glance once more at the young man. He was still lost in reverie, so Mazarin continued.

It is urgent, my Lord, that I know therefore the intentions of France; the interests of that realm and that of England, though seemingly different, are closer than they may appear. England needs domestic tranquillity to complete the expulsion of its king, while France needs peace to secure its young monarch's throne; you, as much as we, need stability as we consolidate the power of our governments. Your disputes with your parliament, your noisy quarrels with the princes who today are with you and tomorrow are against you, the popular uprising fomented by the coadjutor, President Blancmesnil, and Councillor Broussel; all this disorder, in short that afflicts every level of government should make you wary of involvement in a foreign war – for then England, overexcited by enthusiasm for new ideas, would ally with Spain, who already desires such an alliance. So, I thought, My Lord, knowing your prudence and how affairs affect your personal situation, that you would prefer to focus your energies within the bounds of France and leave affairs in England to its new government. Such neutrality consists solely of denying King Charles entry to French territory, and all French arms, money, and troops, as he is a monarch entirely foreign to you. This letter is confidential that is why I send it to you by a trusted and devoted servant; it is intended to give Your Eminence forewarning of what measures I will take in certain events. Oliver Cromwell feels he can communicate better with an intelligence like that of Mazarini than with a queen who, though admirable for her firmness, is too susceptible to the privileges of royal birth and divine right. Farewell, My Lord. If I receive no response within two weeks, I will consider that my overtures have been rejected.

OLIVER CROMWELL

"Sir Mordaunt," said the cardinal, raising his voice to arouse the dreamer, "my response to this letter from General Cromwell will be more satisfactory to him if no one else knows that I've made it. Wait for my reply, therefore, at Boulogne-sur-Mer, and promise me you'll leave for there by tomorrow morning."

"I shall, My Lord," replied Mordaunt, "but how many days would Your Eminence have me wait for your response?"

"If you haven't received it in ten days, you may depart." Mordaunt bowed. "That's not all, Sir," continued Mazarin. "Your personal story deeply moved me, and in addition, Sir Cromwell's letter names you an ambassador. So, tell me, I repeat, what can I do for you?"

Mordaunt thought for a moment, and, after some visible hesitation, had opened his mouth to speak, when Bernouin rushed in, leaned toward the cardinal's ear, and spoke softly. "My Lord," he whispered, "Queen Henriette, accompanied by an English gentleman, has just entered the Royal Palace."

Mazarin started in his chair, a movement that didn't escape the notice of the young man, and he suppressed the confidence he was about to share. "Sir," said the cardinal, "I hope you understand that I picked Boulogne because I assumed any city in France would suffice for you but if you prefer another, name it; however, you can see that, surrounded by the inquisitive whom I can escape only by discretion, I'd prefer no one know of your visit to Paris."

"I depart, then, Sir," said Mordaunt, turning toward the door through which he'd entered.

"No, not that way, Sir, please!" said the cardinal quickly. "Exit through this gallery that will take you to the vestibule. I wish no one to see you leave, as our interview must remain secret." Mordaunt followed Bernouin, who led him into an adjoining chamber, where an usher showed him the way out. Then Bernouin hurried back to his master to admit Queen Henriette, who was already crossing the window gallery outside.

211 Mazarin & Queen Henriette

The cardinal stood up and hurried to receive the Queen of England, joining her in the middle of the gallery that led to his study. He was all the more respectful of this queen who came without servants or jewellery because inside he was ashamed of his own avarice and lack of heart. As for the queen, supplicants learn to keep careful control of their expressions, and the daughter of Henry IV smiled as she went to meet a man she hated and despised. "Oh ho!" Mazarin said to himself. "What a pleasant smile! Is she coming to ask me for money?"

He gave a worried glance toward the door of his strong-room, and even turned the bezel of his magnificent diamond ring around to the inside of his palm. Unfortunately, this gem didn't have the power of Gyges's ring that when turned could render its wearer invisible. And Mazarin would have liked to be invisible at that moment because he guessed that Madam Henriette came to ask for something. When a queen he'd treated so poorly came with a smile on her lips instead of a threat, she wanted something. "Sir Cardinal," said the august visitor, "it occurred to me to talk first to the queen, my sister, about the affair that brings me to you but then I thought that politics is really the province of men."

"Madam," said Mazarin, "Your Majesty overwhelms me with this flattering distinction."

He's being very gracious, thought the queen. Can he have guessed why I've come?

They'd arrived in the cardinal's study, and once he'd seated the queen in his own armchair, he said, "Now give your orders to this most respectful of your servants."

"Alas, Sir," the queen replied, "I lost the habit of giving orders when I had to turn to prayer. I've come now to pray to you, and will be only too happy if you hear my prayers."

"I'm listening, Madam," said Mazarin.

"Sir Cardinal, it concerns the war that my husband wages against his rebellious subjects. You might not be aware that there is fighting in England," said the queen with a sad smile, "and that there will soon be a decisive battle."

"I had no idea, Madam," said the cardinal with a slight shrug. "Alas! Our own conflicts absorb all the time and energy of a poor minister as infirm and incapable as I am."

"Well, Sir Cardinal," said the queen, "I must inform you that my husband, Charles I, is about to make a final effort. In the event of his defeat" – Mazarin gave a start – "for we must prepare for anything, he wishes to retire to France to live here as a private individual. What do you say to this idea?"

The cardinal listened without a line on his face betraying his innermost thoughts and feelings; his expression was mild and pleasant, as usual, and when the queen had finished, he said in his softest voice, "Do you think, Madam, that France, agitated and unruly as it is now, is a safe harbour for a dethroned king? The crown already rests uneasily on the brow of King Louis XIV; how could he support a double burden?"

"The weight of a crown hasn't been so heavy as far as I'm concerned," interjected the queen with a sad smile, "and I ask no more for my husband than has been done for me. You see that we're very modest monarchs, Sir."

"Oh but you, Madam!" the cardinal said hastily, to forestall this subject before it could turn to reproaches. "You are another matter entirely, a daughter of Henry IV, of that great, of that sublime king..."

"Which doesn't prevent you from refusing hospitality to his son-in-law, does it, Sir? You should nonetheless recall that that great, that sublime king, when threatened much as my husband is now, asked for aid from England, and England granted it – although Queen Elizabeth wasn't his niece."

"Peccato!" said Mazarin, finding it hard to contradict such simple logic. "Your Majesty doesn't understand me; she misjudges my intentions, doubtless because I express myself poorly in French."

"Speak Italian then, Sir; Queen Marie de Médicis, our mother, taught us that language before the old cardinal, your predecessor, sent her off to die in exile. If that great that sublime King Henri of whom you spoke just now is watching us, he must be astonished at how you combine such profound admiration for him with such scant regard for his family."

Sweat began to bead Mazarin's forehead. "My admiration is, on the contrary, so great and so real, Madam," said Mazarin, declining the queen's offer to change language, "that if King Charles I – whom God protect from all misfortune! – were in France, I would offer him my house, my own home, though sadly that would be no safe haven. Someday the people will burn my house as they burned that of Marshal d'Ancre. Poor Concino Concini! All he ever thought of was the good of France."

"Yes, My Lord, just like you," said the queen ironically.

Mazarin pretended not to understand the double meaning behind this remark and continued to look sorry about the fate of Concino Concini. “So, then, My Lord le Cardinal,” said the queen impatiently, “what do have to tell me?”

“Oh, Madam,” cried Mazarin, as if deeply moved, “Madam, will Your Majesty permit me to give you some advice? Please understand that before I do anything so bold, I place myself entirely at Your Majesty’s feet to serve your desires.”

“Speak, Sir,” replied the queen. “The advice of a man as prudent as you must certainly be good.”

“Madam, believe me, the king must defend himself to the bitter end.”

“So he has, Sir, and in the coming final battle he’ll commit all his resources, though they’re less than those of his enemies, to show that he’s determined not to give up without a fight – but then what? What happens if he’s defeated?”

“Well, Madam, in that case, my advice, though I know it’s presumptuous to offer it, is that His Majesty shouldn’t leave his own realm. Absent kings are soon forgotten; if he comes to France, his cause’s lost.”

“But then,” said the queen, “if that’s your advice and you really support his best interests, send him some money and troops! I can do nothing more for him, I’ve sold everything down to my last diamond, I have nothing left, as you know better than anyone, Sir. Had I still any jewellery, I’d have bought firewood to warm my daughter and myself last winter.”

“Oh, Madam,” said Mazarin, “Your Majesty doesn’t know what she’s asking. From the moment that foreign aid enters a conflict to keep a king on his throne, it’s an admission that he no longer has the loyalty of his subjects.”

“In fact, Sir Cardinal,” said the queen, impatient with following his subtle mind through the maze of his words, “in fact, tell me yes or no: if the king stays in England, will you send him any help? If he comes to France, will you give him hospitality?”

“Madam,” said the cardinal, in a voice of utmost sincerity, “I’m going to show Your Majesty just how devoted I am, and how dedicated I am to resolving this heart-breaking affair. After that, I think Your Majesty will have no cause to doubt my eagerness to serve.”

The queen bit her lips and shifted impatiently in the armchair. At last she said, “Well, what are you going to do? Show me. Speak!”

“I shall go this instant to talk to the queen, and we shall take the matter up with parliament.”

“With whom you’re at odds, are you not? You’ll put Broussel in charge of it, perhaps. Enough, Sir Cardinal, enough. I see how things stand. Go indeed to parliament – for it’s only from parliament, that enemy to kings, that the daughter of the great, the sublime Henry IV, whom you so admire, received enough charity to avoid dying of cold and hunger last winter.”

And with these words, the queen arose in majestic indignation. The cardinal extended his clasped hands to her. “Ah, Madam, Madam, how you misunderstand me! My God!”

But Queen Henriette, turning her back on those hypocritical tears, crossed the study, opened the door herself, and, marching through the guards and retainers of His Eminence, and past the courtiers waiting their turns, went and took the hand of Lord Winter, who stood waiting unattended. Poor queen, already fallen, before whom all still bowed from etiquette but who had, in fact, only a single arm upon which she could lean. “That’s done,” said Mazarin, when he was alone. “It was an ugly scene, and I had to play a difficult role but still I managed to commit to nothing whatsoever. Hmm! That Cromwell is a cruel enemy to kings – I pity his ministers, if he has any. Bemouin!”

Bemouin came in. “Find out if that short-haired man in the black doublet, who was here before the queen, is still in the palace,” said Mazarin.

Bemouin went out. The cardinal spent the time waiting for his return in turning the bezel of his ring back out, polishing the diamond, admiring its clarity – and as a lingering tear in one eye was interfering with this, he shook his head to make it drop. Bemouin returned with Comminges, who was on guard duty. “My Lord,” said Comminges, “I was conducting that young man out as Your Eminence requested but as we passed the door to the window gallery he stopped and stared as if astonished at something beyond – probably that big Raphael painting. He stood spellbound for a moment, and then hurried down the stairs. I think I saw him mount a grey horse and ride out of the courtyard. Is My Lord on his way to visit the queen?”

“To what end?”

“Sir Guitaut, my uncle, just told me that Her Majesty has had news from the army.”

“Excellent. I’ll go.” At that moment Sir Villequier appeared, having been sent by the queen to find the cardinal. Mordaunt had behaved just as Comminges had reported. While crossing the hall across from the window gallery, he had seen Lord Winter where he was awaiting the outcome of the queen’s negotiations. The young man had stopped short, not in admiration of the Raphael but as if fascinated by the sight of some terrible object. His eyes had dilated, a shudder had run through his body, and he looked as if he wanted to burst through the glass wall that separated him from his prey. If Comminges had seen the young man’s face, hatred burning in his eyes as they fixated on Winter, he would have had no doubt but that the English lord was his mortal enemy. But Mordaunt stopped himself – pausing, no doubt, to think. Then, instead of following his first impulse that was to launch himself straight at Milord Winter, he went slowly down the stairs, head lowered. In the courtyard he got into the saddle, rode no farther than the corner of the Rue Richelieu, and there, eyes fixed on the gate, he waited for the English queen’s carriage to leave the palace. He didn’t have long to wait, as the queen spent no more than a quarter of an hour with Mazarin – but that quarter hour seemed like a century to he who waited. Finally, the heavy coach they termed a carriage at that time appeared, the gates groaned open, and out it came, with Winter, still mounted, riding once more at Her Majesty’s window. The horses went into a trot and made their way to the Louvre and through its gates. Before leaving the Carmelite convent, Queen Henriette had told her daughter Henrietta to wait for her at that palace, where they had lived so long, and which they’d only left because their poverty seemed harder to support while inside its still-gilded halls. Mordaunt followed the carriage, and when he saw it pass under the dark arches of the Louvre gates, he took a position in the shadow of the walls, sitting astride but immobile against the background of Jean Goujon’s mouldings, like a bas-relief of an equestrian statue. And there he waited as he had outside the Royal Palace.

212

How those in Need Sometimes mistake Blind Luck for the Will of God

“Well, Madam?” Lord Winter asked, once the queen had sent away the servants.

“Well, it turned out just as I’d foreseen, Milord.”

“He refused?”

“Didn’t I say he would?”

“The cardinal refuses to receive the king? France refuses hospitality to a refugee prince? That’s never happened before, Madam!”

“I didn’t say France, Milord, I said the cardinal – and the cardinal is by no means French.”

“But the queen – have you seen her?”

“Useless,” said Madam Henriette, shaking her head sadly. “The queen will never say yes if the cardinal says no. Don’t you know the cardinal rules the Court, inside and out? Furthermore, as I told you, I wouldn’t be surprised if he’d been forewarned by Cromwell – he was embarrassed while speaking to me but firm in his refusal. Plus, did you see how busy the Royal Palace was, all those people hurrying through its halls? Do you think there’s been some news, Milord?”

“It’s not news from England, Madam; I worked hard to make sure we arrived before we could be forestalled. I set out three days ago and passed by a miracle through the Puritan army. I rode post horses with my servant Tony, and the horses we ride now were bought here in Paris. Besides, before risking anything, I’m sure the king will await a response from Your Majesty.”

“You’ll tell him, Milord, that I can do nothing,” said the queen in despair. “I’ve suffered as badly as he has, or worse, obliged to eat the bread of exile and to beg hospitality from false friends who laugh at my tears. Now he must sacrifice himself and die like a king. Would that I could die by his side.”

“Madam, Madam!” cried Winter. “Your Majesty gives in to despair but we may still find some hope.”

“I’ve no more friends, Milord, no other friends in the world but you! Oh, my God!” cried Madam Henriette, raising her arms to heaven, “have you taken, then, all the generous hearts from the world?”

“I hope not, Madam,” Winter replied fervently. “I told you I still knew four men.”

“What do you think you can do with four men?”

“Four devoted men, four men willing to die for a cause, can do much, and believe me, Madam – the men I speak of have done a great deal in their time.”

“And these four men, where are they?”

“Ah, now that I don’t know. I’ve lost touch with them for almost twenty years, and yet every time the king was in danger, I’ve thought of them.”

“And these men were your friends?”

“One of them held my life in his hands and returned it to me; I don’t know if he’s still my friend but since that time at least I’ve always been his.”

“And these men are in France, Milord?”

“I think so.”

“Tell me their names – maybe I’ve heard of them and could help in your search.”

“One of them was called the Knight d’Artagnan.”

“Really! Unless I’m mistaken, your Knight d’Artagnan is a lieutenant of the musketeers, or so I’ve heard. But be careful, because I’m afraid he’s a cardinal’s man.”

“If true, that would be the final blow,” said Winter, “and I’d begin to believe that we’re truly cursed.”

“But the others,” said the queen, clinging to this final hope like a shipwrecked sailor to floating debris, “what of the others, Milord?”

“The second – I heard his name by chance, because before fighting a duel with us these four gentlemen told us their names – the second was called the Count of La Fère. As for the other two, the habit I had of calling them by their assumed names made me forget their real ones.”

“But it’s urgent that you find out,” said the queen, “if you think these worthy gentlemen might be able to aid the king.”

“They’re just the men for the task,” said Winter. “Think back, Madam – do you recall how Queen Anne of Austria was saved from the greatest threat any queen ever faced?”

“Yes, during her romance with Sir Buckingham – some affair involving her diamond studs.”

“That’s right, Madam – and these are the men who saved her. The sad and shameful truth is that if these gentlemen’s names aren’t known to you, it’s because the queen has forgotten them, when she ought to have made them Peers of the Realm.”

“Well, then, Milord, they must be found. But what can a mere four men do? Or rather three, for I warn you we mustn’t count upon Sir d’Artagnan.”

“At a minimum, it’s three valiant swords, four if you count mine. Four devoted men near the king to guard him from his enemies, to surround him in battle, to aid him with advice, and to escort him in his flight, that would be enough, if not to give him victory, then at least to save him if he’s defeated. Four men to bring him across the sea – and no matter what Mazarin says, once he’s ashore on the coast of France, your royal husband will find as many safe havens as a seabird on a storm-girt cliff.”

“Seek them, Milord, seek out these gentlemen, and if you find them, and if they agree to go with you to England, on the day we regain the throne I’ll give each one a duchy, and enough gold to pave the floors of Whitehall. This is the task I charge you with, Milord – find them!”

“I’ll seek them, Madam, and I’ll find them,” said Winter, “but time is running out. Has Your Majesty forgotten that the king is anxiously awaiting a reply?”

“Then we are lost!” cried the queen, in a despairing tone.

At that moment the door opened, and young Henrietta appeared. The queen, with that supreme effort that heroism provides to mothers, buried her grief in the depths of her heart, and made a sign to Baron Winter to change the subject. But her efforts, though bravely taken, didn’t escape the notice of the young princess. She stopped on the threshold, sighed, and said to the queen, “Why do you hide your tears from me, Mother?”

The queen smiled, and instead of replying to her, turned to Winter and said, “Hear that, Baron? I’ve gained one thing at least by being but half a queen – my children call me mother instead of madam.”

Then, turning to her daughter, she continued, “What do you want, Henrietta?”

“Ma Mère,” said the young princess, “a cavalier, who has just entered the Louvre, begs leave to pay his respects to Your Majesty. He comes from the army, he says, and has a letter to deliver to you from Marshal Grammont, I think he said.”

“Ah!” the queen said to Winter. “He’s one of my faithful. But do you notice, my dear Baron that we’re so poorly served here that my daughter has to act as usher?”

“Madam, have mercy on me,” said Winter. “You’re breaking my heart.”

“And who is this cavalier, Henrietta?” asked the queen.

“I saw him from the window, Madam; he’s a young man who looks barely sixteen years old and is called the Viscount of Bragelonne.”

The queen nodded and smiled, the young princess opened the door, and Raoul appeared on the threshold. He took three steps toward the queen and knelt down. "Madam," he said, "I bring to Your Majesty a letter from my friend, the Count of Guiche, who's given me the honour of doing you a service. This letter conveys his respect and contains important news."

At the name of the Count of Guiche, a flush rose to the cheeks of the young princess that the queen saw with disapproval. "But you told me the letter was from Marshal Grammont, Henrietta!" said the queen.

"I thought so, Madam..." the young girl stammered.

"That's my fault, Madam," said Raoul. "I did announce myself as coming from Marshal Grammont but as he was wounded in the arm, he couldn't write, so his son the Count of Guiche served as his secretary."

"So, there's been a battle?" said the queen, gesturing for Raoul to rise.

"Yes, Madam," said the young man, handing a letter to Winter, who'd advanced to receive it, and who passed it to the queen.

At this news of a battle, the young princess opened her mouth as if impelled to ask a question but then closed it without saying a word, as the roses gradually faded from her cheeks. The queen noted all this, and no doubt her maternal heart understood it, for she asked Raoul, "Has anything happened to the young Count of Guiche? For he's not only one of our faithful servants, as he told you, Sir, he's also a friend."

"No, Madam," Raoul replied. "On the contrary, he gained great glory that day, and had the honour of being embraced by Sir Prince on the battlefield."

The young princess clapped her hands together but then, ashamed of having allowed herself to be carried away to such an expression of joy, she turned away and leaned over a vase of roses, as if to sample their scent. "Let's see what the count tells us," said the queen.

"As I had the honour to say to Your Majesty, he was writing in his father's name."

"Yes, Sir." The queen unsealed the letter and read aloud:

Madam and Majesty,

Not having the honour to write to you myself due to a wound suffered in my right hand, I write to you by way of my son, Sir Count of Guiche, who serves you as I do, to inform you that we have just won the Battle of Lens, and that this victory will bring power and prestige to Cardinal Mazarin and the queen, and influence in European affairs. I pray Your Majesty, if she will accept my advice, will take advantage of this occasion to seek favour for your august husband from the royal government. Sir Viscount of Bragelonne, who will have the honour of presenting this letter to you, is the friend of my son, whose life he almost certainly saved; he is a gentleman in whom Your Majesty may confide entirely, in case she has any verbal or written commands to send me.

With respect, signed in the name of ...

Marshall de GRAMMONT

When the marshal mentioned the service Raoul had done his son, the viscount couldn't help turning to glance at the young princess, and saw in her eyes a look of infinite gratitude – so Raoul knew, beyond doubt, that the daughter of Charles I loved his friend. "The Battle of Lens is won!" the queen said. "Here they're happy, for here they win their battles. Yes, Marshal Grammont is right, this will improve their situation but I fear it will do nothing for ours, if it doesn't actually make it worse. Your news is timely, Sir," continued the queen. "I'm grateful to you for having brought it to us so diligently; without you, and this letter, I wouldn't have heard it before tomorrow, and might have been the last person in Paris to know."

"Madam," said Raoul, "the Louvre is only the second palace to receive this news; no one else knows it. I'd sworn to the Count of Guiche to deliver this letter to Your Majesty before even going to see my guardian."

"Is your guardian a Bragelonne as well?" asked Lord Winter. "I once knew a Bragelonne – is he still alive?"

"No, Sir, he's dead, and it's from him that my guardian, who was a close relative, I believe, has inherited the land whose name I now bear."

"And your guardian, Sir, what's his name?" asked the queen, who couldn't help taking an interest in this handsome young man.

"Sir Count of La Fère, Madam," replied the young man, bowing.

Winter started in surprise, and the queen looked at him, alight with joy. "The Count of La Fère!" she cried. "Isn't that the name you mentioned?"

As for Winter, he couldn't believe what he'd heard. "The Count of La Fère! Oh, Sir! Answer me, I implore you: is the Count of La Fère a noble I once knew, handsome and brave, who was a musketeer under Louis XIII, and must now be about forty-seven or forty-eight?"

"Yes, Sir, that's quite right."

"And who was serving under an assumed name?"

"Under the name of Athos. I recently heard his friend, Sir d'Artagnan, call him by that name."

"That's him, Madam, that's him. God be praised! And is he in Paris?" continued the baron, addressing Raoul. Then, returning to the queen, "Hope still – hope! Providence protects us, since it moves to help me find that brave gentleman in such a miraculous fashion. Where is he to be found, Sir, please tell me?"

"The Count of La Fère is staying in Rue Guénégaud, at the Grand Charlemagne Hôtel."

"Thank you, Sir. Ask this worthy friend to remain at home, and I'll come to see him shortly."

"Sir, I obey with pleasure, if Her Majesty will give me leave to go."

"Go, Sir Viscount of Bragelonne," said the queen, "go, and be assured of our affection."

Raoul bowed respectfully to the two Princesss, saluted Winter, and departed.

Winter and the queen continued to converse for a while in voices so low the young princess couldn't hear them – not that it mattered, as she was lost in her thoughts. Then, as Winter was about to depart, "Listen, Milord," said the queen, "I had preserved this diamond cross that comes from my mother, and this plaque of Saint Michael that came from my husband; together they're worth about fifty thousand livres. I had vowed to die of starvation before selling them but now that these two pieces might be useful to the king or his defenders, I must sacrifice everything to that hope. Take them, and if you need funds for your mission, sell them without hesitation. But if you can find a means of preserving them, know, Milord, that I'll regard you as having rendered the greatest service a gentleman can do for a queen, and that on the day of my prosperity he who can bring me this plaque and this cross will be blessed by me and my children."

"Madam," said Winter, "Your Majesty will be served with true devotion. I go now to put in a safe place these objects that I wouldn't have accepted in the days of our good fortune; but our property has been confiscated, our income is dried up, and we must succeed by making use of whatever we have. After that I'll go visit the Count of La Fère, and tomorrow Your Majesty will know where we stand."

The queen extended her hand to Lord Winter, who kissed it respectfully, and then indicating her daughter, said, "Milord, you were charged with delivering to this child something from her father."

Winter looked astonished; he wasn't sure what the queen was talking about. But young Henrietta stepped forward, smiling and blushing, and said "Tell my father that, king or fugitive, victor or vanquished, powerful or poor, he has in me the most loyal and affectionate of daughters."

And she presented her forehead to the gentleman. "I know that, Miss," replied Winter, brushing Henrietta's brow with his lips. Then he departed, going unescorted through those grand echoing chambers, now deserted and gloomy, wiping away those tears that, jaded though he was by fifty years of court life, he couldn't help shedding when faced with the sight of such deep and profound royal misery.

213

The Uncle & the Nephew

Lord Winter's horse and lackey were waiting for him at the gate. Pensive, he rode toward his lodgings, looking back from time to time toward the dark and silent façade of the Louvre. It was then that he saw a cavalier detach himself, so to speak, from the wall and follow him at a distance. He remembered having seen a similar shadow behind him on the way from the Royal Palace. Lord Winter's lackey, who followed him a few paces behind, had also been watching this cavalier anxiously. "Tony," said the gentleman, beckoning his valet to approach.

"I'm here, Milord."

The valet rode up beside his master. "Have you noticed that man who's following us?"

"Yes, Milord."

"Who is he?"

"I don't know. I only know he followed Milord from the Royal Palace, waited at the Louvre for you to come out, and then left when we left."

"Some spy of the cardinal's," said Winter. "Pretend not to notice his surveillance." And spurring on, he plunged into the maze of streets that led to his hôtel in the Marais quarter. Long ago he'd lodged in the Place Royale, and now Lord Winter had returned to his former neighbourhood. The unknown follower put his horse into a gallop. Winter reached his inn and went up to his rooms, where he hoped to see the spy from his windows but as he put his hat and gloves on a table he glanced in a mirror and saw a figure appear in the doorway behind him. He turned, and Mordaunt stood before him. Winter turned pale and froze. As for Mordaunt, he stood in the doorway, cold, threatening, like the statue of Don Juan's Commander. There was a moment of icy silence between the two men. Then Winter said, "Sir, I thought I'd already made it clear that your harassment is tiresome. Withdraw, or I'll have you driven off as I did in London. I'm not your uncle, and I do not know you."

"Dear Uncle," replied Mordaunt in his hoarse, mocking voice, "you're quite mistaken – you won't drive me away as you did in London. You don't dare. As for denying that I'm your nephew, think again, as I've learned many things I didn't know a year ago."

"What does it matter to me what you've learned?" said Winter.

"Oh, I'm quite sure it will matter a great deal, Uncle, as I believe you'll agree," Mordaunt added, with a smile that sent a shiver down Winter's spine. "When I first presented myself at your house in London, it was to ask what had befallen me. The second time I introduced myself, it was to ask what had tainted my name. This time I stand before you to ask a question far more terrible than those before, to ask you, as God said to the first murderer, 'Cain, where is thy brother Abel?' Milord, where is your sister, that sister who was my mother?"

Winter recoiled from the fire in those ardent eyes. "Your mother?" he said.

"Yes, Milord – my mother," replied the young man, nodding savagely.

Though battered by the memories such fierce hatred stirred up, Winter made an effort to get hold of himself, and snapped, "What's become of her? Ask for her in Hell, wretch, and maybe Hell will answer you."

Mordaunt advanced into the room until he was face-to-face with Lord Winter and crossed his arms. "I already asked the executioner of Bethune," the young man said in a hollow voice, his face livid with grief and anger, "and the executioner of Bethune told me."

Winter fell back on a chair as if struck by a thunderbolt and tried in vain to reply. "Oh, yes," continued the young man. "At his words all was explained, for they were the key that unlocked the abyss. My mother inherited from her husband, and then you assassinated my mother! My name would have given me my paternity, so you denied my name – and when you denied my name, you robbed me of my fortune. I no longer wonder why you refused to acknowledge me. When one is a thief, it's unseemly to call the one you robbed 'nephew' – when one is a murderer, it's inconvenient to recognise the one you've orphaned!"

These words produced an effect contrary to what Mordaunt had expected, as they only served to remind Winter what a monster Milady had been. He rose, calm and grave, and his severe look disconcerted the furious young man. "Do you want to know the whole truth of this horrible secret, Sir?" Winter said. "Well, then, let me tell you about the woman of whom you come today to call me to account. This woman had in all likelihood poisoned my brother, and in order to inherit from me, planned to assassinate me in my turn; of that I have proof. Now what do you have to say?"

"I say she was my mother!"

"She took a man formerly just, good, and pure and seduced him into stabbing the Duke of Buckingham to death. Of that crime I have proof. Now what do you say?"

"She was my mother!"

"Returned to France, at the Augustine convent in Bethune, she poisoned a young woman just because she loved one of her enemies. Will that crime persuade you of the justice of her punishment? For of that crime, I have proof!"

"She was my mother!" the young man cried even louder than before.

"At last, filthy with murder and debauchery, abhorrent to all, still as menacing as a bloodthirsty panther, she was captured by five men she'd driven to despair, though they'd never caused her the slightest harm. She was found and judged for her appalling crimes. This executioner with whom you spoke, whom you said told you all – if he'd really told you everything, he must have told you that he trembled with joy when he avenged the shame and suicide of his debauched brother. Perverted daughter, adulterous wife, unnatural sister, poisoner, assassin, an abomination to all who knew her, to every nation that received her – that's what that woman was."

An involuntary sob tore from Mordaunt's throat and brought the blood mounting back to his pallid face. He clenched his fists, his face streamed with sweat, his hair bristling on his head like Hamlet's, and trembling with fury, he cried, "Silence! Silence! She was my mother! These quarrels, these vices, these crimes – I don't know them! What I do know is that I had a mother, and that five men, conspiring against one woman, killed her secretly, silently, vindictively, like cowards! What I know is that you were one of them, Sir, and that it was you, Uncle, who said, loudest and most fervently, that she must die! So now I warn you: listen to these words and engrave them on your memory so you'll never forget them – this murder that drives me mad, this murder that has taken my name, this murder that has impoverished me, this murder is what's made me corrupt, wicked, and implacable! I demand an accounting for it, first of all from you, and then, when I find them, from your accomplices." Hatred in his eyes, froth rimming his mouth, his fist outstretched, Mordaunt took a terrible and menacing step toward Winter. But the latter put his hand on his sword, and said, with the smile of a man who has gammed with death for thirty years, "Would you try to assassinate me, Sir? Then I'd have to acknowledge you as my nephew, for you'd reveal yourself as your mother's son."

"No," replied Mordaunt, exerting an iron will and forcing all the muscles of his face and body back into their usual slackened state. "No, I won't kill you – at least not now. For I need you to lead me to the others. But when I find them, sir, you may then tremble ... for I'll treat you as I did the executioner of Bethune. Him I stabbed to the heart without pity or mercy and he's the least guilty of all of you." At these words, the young man departed, descending the stairs so quietly he was unnoticed, even by Tony, waiting on the landing for a call from his master. But Winter didn't call; shaken, near fainting, he stood frozen, listening hard until he heard hoof beats as a horse rode away. Then he collapsed in a chair, whispering, "I'm thankful, dear God, that he knows only my name."

214
Paternity

While this terrible scene was playing out at Lord Winter's, Athos, seated by the window of his chamber, his elbow resting on a table and his head resting on his hand, listened rapt as Raoul recounted the events of his journey and the details of the battle. The gentleman's handsome and noble figure almost glowed with joy at the recital of the youth's first adventures; he drank in the sound of that youthful voice, so fresh and pure, as if listening to harmonious music. He forgot everything dark in the past, and everything cloudy in the future, as if the return of the beloved child had turned even fears into hopes. Athos was happy, as happy as he'd ever been. "And you saw and took part in this great battle, Bragelonne?" said the former musketeer.

"Yes, Sir."

"And it was fierce, you say?"

"Sir Prince personally led the charge eleven times."

"He is a great man of war, Bragelonne."

"He's a hero, Sir – I didn't lose sight of him for a second. Oh, it's a grand thing, Sir, to bear such a name as Condé!"

"Brilliant, and yet calm, is he not?"

"Brilliant as if at a party and calm as if on parade. When we approached the enemy, it was on the double; we were forbidden to fire first, and marched at the Spaniards, who awaited us on a crest, musketoon at the ready. At a range of thirty paces, the prince turned to our soldiers. 'Boys,' he said, 'you're about to withstand a furious volley; but afterward, believe me, they'll pay the price for it.' There was such a hush that the soldiers on both sides heard every word. Then raising his sword, he cried, 'Sound the trumpets.'"

"Well, well! ... When the time comes, you'll do the same thing, won't you, Raoul?"

"Absolutely, Sir, for I found it both grand and moving. At a range of twenty paces we saw their muskets glint as they lowered them on us, for the sun gleamed on the barrels. 'At a walk, my boys,' said the prince, 'now's the time.'"

"Were you scared, Raoul?" asked the count.

"Yes, Sir," the young man said naively, "I felt a chill grasp my heart, and as the word 'Fire!' echoed down the enemy ranks, I closed my eyes and thought of you."

"Did you indeed, Raoul?" said Athos, taking his hand.

"Yes, Sir. At that moment there was such an explosion you would have said that Hell had opened its gates, and those who weren't killed felt the heat of the flames. I opened my eyes, astounded at not being dead, or at least wounded; a third of the squadron was lying on the ground, bloody and mutilated. At that moment I met the prince's eye and thought of nothing except that he was looking at me. I drove in both spurs and found myself amidst the ranks of our enemies."

"And the prince was pleased with you?"

"He told me so at least, Sir, when he asked me to ride to Paris with Sir Châtillon, sent to bring the queen the news along with our captured banners. 'Go,' said the prince. 'The enemy won't regroup for a fortnight. Until then I don't need you. Go and embrace those you love and who love you, and tell my sister de Longueville that I thank her for the gift she gave me in sending you.' And so, I came, Sir," added Raoul, looking at the count with a loving smile, "for I thought you'd be glad to see me again."

Athos drew the young man to him and kissed him on the forehead as he would a young girl. "And so," he said, "you are launched, Raoul. You have dukes as friends, a Marshal of France for a godfather, a Prince of the Blood as your captain, and in one day you've been received by two queens. Not bad for a novice."

"Oh, Sir!" said Raoul suddenly. "You've reminded me of something I forgot to say, I was so eager to recount my adventures: in the Queen of England's chamber was a gentleman who, when I mentioned your name, gave a cry of surprise and joy. He said he was a friend of yours, asked me your address, and said he's coming to see you."

"What was his name?"

"I didn't dare to ask him, Sir; but, though he spoke quite well, based on his accent I think he's English."

"Ah!" said Athos. He bent his head as if searching his memory but when he looked up, the memory was before him as a man was standing in the half-open doorway and looking at him fondly. "Lord Winter!" cried the count.

"Athos, my friend!"

The two gentlemen embraced for a long moment. Then Athos, taking him by the hands, looked at him and said, "What's the matter, Milord? You seem as sad as I am happy."

"Yes, dear friend, it's true – and moreover, the sight of you redoubles my fears."

And Winter looked around as if seeking something. Raoul understood that what he wanted was privacy and left the two old friends without hesitation. "Now that we're alone," said Athos, "let's speak of you."

"While we're alone, we must speak of both of us," replied Lord Winter. "He's here."

"Who?"

"The son of Milady."

Athos, struck again by this name that seemed to pursue him like a fatal echo, hesitated a moment, frowned slightly, and then calmly said, "I know."

"You know?"

"Yes. Grimaud ran into him between Bethune and Arras, and returned at the gallop to warn me of his coming."

"Grimaud recognised him then?"

"No but he stood at the deathbed of a man who did."

"The executioner of Bethune!" cried Winter.

"How do you know that?" said Athos, astonished.

"From the son – I just saw him," Winter replied, "and he told me everything. Ah, my friend, what a terrible plight! We should have buried the child with the mother!"

Athos, like all noble natures, didn't inflict his painful feelings on others; instead he swallowed them, and tried to replace them by emanating hope and encouragement. It was as if he transformed his personal griefs into shared consolation. "What are you afraid of?" he said, understanding the need to address that instinctive terror he had also felt at first. "Is this young man a trained assassin who murders in cold blood? He slew the executioner of Bethune in a mad rage but now his fury is sated."

Winter smiled sadly, shook his head, and said, "Don't you know whose blood he shares?"

"Bah!" said Athos, trying to smile. "Such ferocity would be diluted in younger generations. Besides, friend, Providence has warned us, so we're on our guard. All we can do is wait, so let's wait. But as I said before, let's talk about you. What brings you to Paris?"

"Some important matters I'll eventually get to. First, what's this I hear from Her Majesty the Queen of England that d'Artagnan is one of Mazarin's men? Pardon my bluntness, my friend – I have nothing against the cardinal, and I trust your judgement completely but are you by any chance also with his party?"

"Sir d'Artagnan is in the service," said Athos, "and as a soldier, he obeys the constituted authority. D'Artagnan isn't wealthy and needs his lieutenant's salary. Millionaires like you, Milord, are rare in France."

"Alas!" said Winter. "I'm now as poor as or even poorer than he is. But let's return to you."

"So, you want to know if I'm with Mazarin? Well, pardon my bluntness, Milord but no – a thousand times no."

Winter rose and pressed Athos in his arms. "Thank you, Count," he said, "thanks for this wonderful news. I rejoice and am rejuvenated! You're not with Mazarin – what great good luck! Of course, you couldn't possibly be one of his minions. But, pardon my asking, are you at liberty?"

"What do you mean, at liberty?"

"I'm asking if you're married."

"Oh, as to that – no," said Athos, smiling.

"I wondered: that young man, so handsome, so elegant, so gracious..."

"He's a child whom I raised, and who doesn't know his father."

"Ah, very good. You're still the same, Athos, grand and generous."

"Come, Milord, why do you ask?"

"You're still in touch with your friends Gentlemen Porthos and Aramis?"

"And d'Artagnan as well, Milord. We are four friends who are as devoted to each other as always – but when it comes to serving the cardinal or opposing him, as Mazarin's men or Frondeurs, we are in two camps."

"Sir Aramis sides with d'Artagnan?" asked Lord Winter.

"No," said Athos, "Sir Aramis does me the honour to share my convictions."

"Can you put me in touch with your charming and witty friend?"

"Indeed, whenever you like."

"Has he changed?"

"He's become an abbot, that's all."

"Now that worries me – for surely that's made him give up on adventures."

"On the contrary," said Athos with a smile, "he was never more of a musketeer than he is since becoming an abbot – you'll find him a veritable Galaor. Do you want me to send Raoul for him?"

"Thank you, Count but he might not be instantly available. But if you think you can answer for him..."

"As much as for myself."

"Then would you engage to bring him at ten o'clock tomorrow morning to the Louvre drawbridge?"

"Oh ho!" said Athos, smiling. "Do you have a duel arranged?"

"Yes, Count, a fine duel, a duel of which you'll approve, I hope."

"Where shall we go, Milord?"

"To see Her Majesty the Queen of England, who has charged me with bringing you to her."

"Her Majesty knows of me, then?"

"No but I know you."

"A conundrum!" said Athos. "But I agree nevertheless, and you have my word on it – I don't need to know more. Will you do me the honour of dining with me, Milord?"

"Thank you, Count," Winter said, "but that young man's visit, I must confess, has robbed me of my appetite, and will probably rob me of my sleep. Why did he come to Paris? It wasn't to track me down, because he didn't know I was here. That young man terrifies me, Count; he's a future of blood ahead of him."

"What has he been doing in England?"

"He's one of the most ardent followers of Oliver Cromwell."

"What brought him to that cause? His mother and father were Catholics, I believe."

"The hatred he bears for the king."

"He opposes the king?"

"Yes, the king declared him a bastard, deprived him of his property, and forbade him to use the name of Winter."

"What name does he go by now?"

"Mordaunt."

"A Puritan, disguised as a monk, travelling alone on the roads of France."

"A monk, you say?"

"Yes, didn't you know?"

"I know only what he told me."

"It's true, and by that imposture – may God pardon me if I blaspheme – he was able to hear the confession of the executioner of Bethune."

"Then I think I understand at last. He's an envoy sent by Cromwell."

"To whom?"

"To Mazarin. And the queen had guessed rightly: we were forestalled. Everything is clear to me now. Goodbye, Count, until tomorrow."

"But the night is pitch black," said Athos, seeing Lord Winter anxious and trying to hide it. "Have you any lackeys with you?"

"I have Tony – a good lad but green."

"Whoa! Olivain, Grimaud, Blaisois – get your musketoon and go with Sir Viscount."

Blaisois was a big fellow, half servant, half peasant, whom we glimpsed at the Château de Bragelonne announcing that dinner was served, and whom Athos had baptised with the name of his province. Hearing these orders, Raoul came in. "Viscount," said Athos, "you will escort milord to his inn, and not allow anyone else to approach him."

"Really, Count," Winter said, "what do you take me for?"

"For a stranger who doesn't know his way around Paris," said Athos, "so let the viscount lead the way."

Winter shook his hand. "Grimaud," said Athos, "place yourself in the vanguard of the troop, and watch out for the monk."

Grimaud started and then nodded, caressing the stock of his musketoon with eloquent silence. "Until tomorrow, Count," said Winter.

"Yes, Milord."

The little troop made its way toward Rue Saint-Louis, Olivain trembling like Sosia at every shadow, Blaisois confident because he was unaware of what risks they were running, and Tony looking left and right without saying a word, since he didn't speak French. Winter and Raoul marched side by side and spoke together. Grimaud, at Athos's orders, preceded the band with a torch in one hand and his musketoon in the other, leading the way to Winter's inn where he knocked on the door with his fist. When they came to open it, he bowed to the lord without a word. They followed the same routine for the return. Grimaud's piercing gaze saw nothing suspicious until he spotted a strange shadow at the corner of the quay and Rue Guénégaud. It seemed to Grimaud that he'd seen this shadow before, and he darted toward it but before he could reach it the shadow disappeared into a dark alley where Grimaud didn't think it would be prudent to pursue. Athos was informed of the expedition's success, and as it was ten in the evening, everyone retired to their rooms. The next morning, upon opening his eyes, the count found Raoul waiting at his bedside. The young man was fully dressed and was reading a new book by Sir Chapelain. "Up already, Raoul?" said the count.

"Yes, Sir," replied the young man, after a slight hesitation. "I slept poorly."

"You slept poorly – you, Raoul? Was something bothering you?" asked Athos.

"Sir, you'll say I'm too eager to leave you again when I've only just arrived but..."

"So, you had only two days' leave, Raoul?"

"On the contrary, Sir, I had ten; I wasn't planning to go back to camp yet."

Athos smiled. "To where, then, if it's not a secret, Viscount? Having fought your first battle, you're almost a man, and have earned the right to go where you like without telling me about it."

"Never, Sir," said Raoul. "So long as I have you as my guardian, I wouldn't think of it. I was just thinking I'd pass a day or two at Blois. Wait, are you laughing at me?"

"No, not at all," said Athos, suppressing a sigh. "No, I'm not laughing at you, Viscount. If you want to visit Blois, that's entirely natural."

"Then, you'll let me go?" Raoul said happily.

"Certainly, Raoul."

"And in your heart, Sir, you have no qualms?"

"Not at all. Why should I be concerned by what pleases you?"

"Oh, Sir, how good you are," cried the young man, who went to embrace Athos, then stopped out of respect. But Athos opened his arms to him.

"Then I can leave right away?"

"Whenever you like, Raoul."

Raoul took three steps toward the door, then stopped and said, "Sir, there is one thing: it was thanks to the Duchess de Chevreuse, who was so good to me, that I owe my introduction to Sir Prince."

"And you owe her some gratitude – is that it, Raoul?"

"So, it seems to me, Sir ... but it's up to you to decide."

"Send to the Hôtel de Luynes, Raoul, and ask if the duchess can receive you. I'm very pleased that you remember your manners. Take Grimaud and Olivain with you."

"Both of them, Sir?" asked Raoul, astonished.

Athos nodded, so Raoul bowed and went out. Watching him close the door and hearing him call out in a joyful voice to Grimaud and Olivain, Athos sighed. All too soon he leaves me, he thought, shaking his head but it's only to be expected, for it's Nature's law to look forward. He certainly loves that child in Blois; but must he love me less for loving others? Athos admitted to himself that he hadn't expected such a speedy departure but Raoul was so happy about it, that swept away any concerns. By nine o'clock everything was prepared for the departure. As Athos watched Raoul mount his horse, a footman arrived for him from Madam de Chevreuse. He'd been sent to tell the Count of La Fère that she'd heard of the return of his young protégé, as well as of his conduct at the battle, and that she'd be very glad to congratulate him in person. "Tell Madam Duchess," replied Athos, "that the Viscount of Bragelonne is mounted and on his way to the Hôtel de Luynes." Then, after giving Grimaud some instructions, Athos made a sign to Raoul that he could depart. It occurs to me, Athos thought, remembering his own appointment, that maybe it's best for Raoul to be away from Paris at just this moment.

215
The Queen asks for Aid Once More

In the morning, Athos had sent a message to Aramis by way of Blaisois, his only remaining servant. Blaisois found Bazin donning his beadle's robe; it was his day of service at Notre Dame. Athos had ordered Blaisois to try to speak to Aramis personally. Blaisois, a brawny but simple lad, who knew only what he'd been told, had asked for the Abbot d'Herblay, and despite Bazin's telling him he wasn't at home, had insisted so persistently that Bazin had lost his temper. Blaisois, seeing Bazin dressed as a man of the Church, wasn't bothered by his anger and tried to go around him, assuming the man he was dealing with possessed the virtues of the cloth that is, patience and Christian charity. But Bazin, still the valet of a musketeer when the blood rose to his round face, grabbed a broomstick and struck at Blaisois, saying, "You've insulted the Church, you lout – you've insulted the Church!"

At this unaccustomed commotion, Aramis finally appeared, cautiously opening the door of his bedchamber. Bazin respectfully grounded one end of his stick, as he'd seen the Swiss Guards do at Notre Dame, while Blaisois, with a glare at the rotund Cerberus, drew his letter from his lapel and presented it to Aramis. "From the Count of La Fère?" said Aramis. "Very good." He took it and went back into his room without even asking the reason for all the noise. Blaisois returned sadly to the Grand Charlemagne Inn, where Athos asked him for a report on his mission. Blaisois told his story. "Idiot!" said Athos, laughing. "Didn't you tell Bazin that you'd come from me?"

"No, Sir."

"And what did Bazin say when he learned you were mine?"

"Ah, Sir, he made all kinds of apologies and forced me to drink two glasses of very good Muscat with him in which we dipped three or four excellent biscuits. But he's still a brutal devil. A beadle, acting that way!"

Well, thought Athos, since Aramis's received my letter, then unless he's forestalled, he'll be there. At ten o'clock, Athos, with his usual punctuality, stood on the bridge of the Louvre. There he met Lord Winter, who arrived at the same time. They waited about ten minutes until Winter began to worry that Aramis wasn't coming. "Patience," said Athos, who was looking toward the Rue du Bac. "I see an abbot clouting a man and bowing to a woman: that must be Aramis."

It was him, in fact. A lad chasing birds had splashed him as he passed, and with a blow of his fist Aramis had sent him reeling. Then he met one of his congregation, and as she was young and pretty, Aramis had bowed to her with a most gracious smile. A moment later he arrived in front of the Louvre. At his reunion with Lord Winter, there were several hearty embraces, as one might imagine.

"Where are we going?" Aramis asked. "Is it a fight? If so, damn it, I'll have to run back to my house for my sword."

"No," Winter said, "we're paying a visit to Her Majesty the Queen of England."

"Ah, very good," said Aramis, and added in an undertone to Athos, "and what's the purpose of this visit?"

"My faith, I have no idea. Some evidence needed from us, perhaps?"

"I hope it's not about that cursed affair of the son," said Aramis. "If it is, I'm not eager to be reproached about it. I give reprimands to others, and don't like receiving them myself."

"If that were the case," said Athos, "we wouldn't be conducted to Her Majesty by Lord de Winter as he was one of us, and shares the blame."

"Yes, quite so. Let's go then."

Upon entering the Louvre, Lord Winter went in first. There was just a single usher at the door, and in the cold light of day Athos, Aramis, and the Englishman couldn't avoid seeing the awful destitution of the lodging a miserly charity afforded the unlucky queen. The grand halls were stripped of furniture; the cracked and faded walls were enlivened only by bits of gold moulding that hadn't fallen yet; windows that no longer shut properly, were missing panes of glass; and there were no carpets, no guards, and no servants. This sad dilapidation hit Athos hard, and he silently pointed out the worst of it to his companion, nudging him with his elbow and indicating with his eyes. "Mazarin lives a good deal more grandly than this," said Aramis.

"Mazarin is nearly a king," said Athos, "and Madam Henriette is almost no longer a queen."

"If you'd only made the effort to be witty, Athos," said Aramis, "I believe you'd have outdone even Sir Voiture."

Athos smiled. It seemed the queen was waiting impatiently, for at the first movement she heard from the hall outside her chamber, she herself came to the doorway to receive the witnesses of her misfortune. "Come in and be welcome, Gentlemen," she said.

The gentlemen entered, and at first they stood but at a gesture from the queen, who invited them to be seated, Athos set the example of obedience. He was grave and calm but Aramis was angry; this insult to distressed royalty infuriated him, and he glared at the signs of misery around him. "You've noticed my luxurious lodgings?" Queen Henriette said with a sad look around the room.

"Madam," said Aramis, "I beg Your Majesty's pardon but I can't contain my indignation at seeing how the Court of France treats the daughter of Henry IV."

"Sir is not a cavalier?" asked the queen of Lord Winter.

"Sir is the Abbot d'Herblay," he replied.

Aramis flushed. "Madam," he said, "I am an abbot, it's true but it's not my preference, as I've never had a vocation for the cloth. My cassock is held on by a single button, and I'm always on the verge of doffing it and becoming a musketeer once more. This morning, unaware that I was to have the honour of addressing Your Majesty, I donned my clerical outfit but I'm nevertheless a man Your Majesty will find utterly devoted to her service, should she wish to command me."

"Sir Knight d'Herblay," added Winter, "was one of those valiant musketeers of His Majesty King Louis XIII of whom I've spoken to Your Majesty." Then, indicating Athos, he continued, "As for Sir here, he's the noble Count of La Fère whose reputation is so well known to Madam."

"Gentlemen," said the queen, "just a few years ago I was surrounded by wealth, soldiers, and loyal gentlemen who would obey my command at a gesture. Today as you look around me you might be surprised by my situation, for now, to accomplish a plan that will save my life, I have only Lord Winter, a friend of twenty years, and you, Gentlemen, whom I've just met for the first time, and know only as my compatriots."

"That will be enough, Madam," said Athos, bowing deeply, "if the lives of three men can redeem yours."

"Thank you, Gentlemen. Now hear me," she continued, "I'm not only the most wretched of queens but the unhappiest of mothers and the most desperate of wives. Two of my children, the Duke of York and Princess Elizabeth, are far from me, exposed to the attacks from our enemies and ambitious opportunists; my husband the king is trapped in England, enduring a life so painful that death might be better. Here, Gentlemen, is the letter he sent me by Lord Winter. Read it."

Athos and Aramis tried to decline but, "Read it," said the queen.

Athos read aloud from the letter, the contents of which we know, in which King Charles asked to obtain refuge in France. "Well?" asked Athos, after he'd finished reading.

"Well!" said the queen. "Mazarin has refused."

The two friends exchanged smiles tinged with contempt. "And now, Madam, what is to be done?" asked Athos.

"Then you can have compassion for so much misfortune?" the queen said, moved.

"I have had the honour to ask Your Majesty what Sir d'Herblay and I can do in her service; we are ready."

"Ah, Sir, you truly have a noble heart!" the queen burst out, her voice choked with gratitude, while Lord Winter gave her a look that seemed to say, Didn't I tell you so?

"And you, Sir?" the queen asked Aramis.

"Wherever the count goes," he replied, "I follow without question, Madam, even unto death – but when it comes to the service of Your Majesty," he added, with a look as ardent as in his youth, "I go before even Sir Count."

"Well, Gentlemen!" said the queen. "If that is so, and you're willing to devote yourself to the service of a poor princess whom the rest of the world abandons, here is what you can do for me. The king is all alone, except for a few remaining gentlemen whom he expects to lose any day, and is among the Scots, whom he mistrusts, though he's Scottish himself. Since Lord Winter left him, I scarcely dare breathe. Well, Gentlemen, though I'm in no position to ask, please: go to England, join the king, be his friends and his guards, march by his side in battle, and stand next to him in his house, where there are dangers even greater than the risks of war; and in exchange for this sacrifice I promise, not to reward you – for I think you would find that insulting – but to love you like a sister, and to regard you above all others but my husband and my children, so swear I before God!"

And the queen slowly and solemnly raised her eyes toward heaven. "Madam," said Athos, "when shall we depart?"

"You agree, then?" said the queen with joy.

"Yes, Madam, though Your Majesty goes too far, it seems to me, in offering a friendship that is beyond our merits. We serve God, Madam, by serving such an unhappy prince and virtuous queen. We are yours, body and soul."

"Oh, Gentlemen," said the queen, moved to tears, "this is the first moment of hope and joy I've felt in five years. Yes, you serve God, and as I'm too weak to recompense your efforts, it's from him your reward will come, from him who reads in my heart all the gratitude I feel for you and yours. Save my husband; save the king; and though you may never receive what you deserve for it here on Earth, at least I can hope to live long enough to thank you in person. Until then, I wait. Is there anything I can do for you? For now that you're my friends, and involved in my affairs, I should do whatever I can."

"I have nothing to ask of Her Majesty but her prayers," said Athos.

"And I," said Aramis, "am alone in the world, and have no one to serve but Your Majesty."

The queen offered them her hand that they kissed, and then whispered to Winter, "If you're short of money, Milord, don't hesitate for a moment to break up that jewellery I gave you, and sell some of those diamonds to a moneylender – they ought to be worth fifty or sixty thousand livres. Sell them if necessary but make sure these gentlemen are treated as they should be, in other words, like kings."

The queen had two letters ready, one she'd written herself, and one written by her daughter Princess Henrietta. Both were addressed to King Charles. She gave one to Athos and one to Aramis, so that if they became separated, each would still have an introduction to the king; then they withdrew. At the base of the stairs, Winter paused. "Let's each of us go to our own lodgings, Gentlemen, so as not to arouse suspicion," he said, "and then meet tonight at nine at the Saint-Denis gate. We'll ride on my horses as far as they'll take us, and thereafter travel by post-horse. Once again, I thank you, my dear friends, both in my name and in the name of the queen."

The three gentlemen shook hands, then Baron Winter went down Rue Saint-Honoré, leaving Athos and Aramis, who remained together. "Well!" said Aramis, once they were alone. "What do you think of this affair, my dear Count?"

"It's bad," replied Athos, "very bad."

"But you took to it with such enthusiasm!"

"As I will always come to the defence of such an important principle, my dear d'Herblay. Kings aren't great without their nobility, and the noblesse is only as great as its kings. In supporting the monarchies, we support ourselves."

"We're going to get murdered over there," said Aramis. "I hate the English – they're coarse, like all folk who drink beer."

"Would it be better to stay here and serve a sentence in the Bastille or the dungeon of Vincennes, since we helped Sir Beaufort to escape?" said Athos. "My faith, Aramis, believe me, there's nothing to regret about this. We stay out of prison and get to be heroes – it's an easy choice."

"True enough, my friend. But at the beginning of every affair, we face the same question, vulgar though it may be: do you have any money?"

"Around a hundred pistoles that my tenants had sent me before leaving Bragelonne but I must leave fifty for Raoul, as a young noble must live with dignity. That leaves about fifty for me. And you?"

"If I go home and turn out all my pockets and search in all my drawers, I'm sure I can turn up ten Louis d'or. Fortunately, Lord de Winter is rich."

"Lord de Winter is ruined, for the moment, because Cromwell has confiscated his revenue."

"This is where having Baron Porthos with us would be handy," said Aramis.

"I also regret not having d'Artagnan," said Athos.

"What a bulging purse!"

"What a proud sword!"

"Let's recruit them."

"This secret isn't ours to share, Aramis. I don't think we should take anyone into our confidence. Besides, recruiting our friends would seem like we doubted ourselves. Let's regret their absence but privately, and say nothing."

"You're right. What are you doing for the rest of the day? I must postpone a couple of matters."

"Are they matters that can be postponed?"

"Dame! They have to be."

"What are these matters?"

"First, I owe a sword-thrust to the coadjutor, whom I saw last night at Madam de Rambouillet's, where he made some remarks about me in an offensive tone."

"What? A duel between priests! A fight between allies!"

"What would you have, my dear? He's a swordsman, and so am I; he's a rabble-rouser, as I am; his cassock weighs on him, as mine does on me; I sometimes wonder which of us is Aramis and which the coadjutor, we're so alike. This doppelganger business vexes me and makes me feel like a shadow. Besides, he's a bungler who will ruin our faction. I'm convinced that if I hit him hard enough, as I did with that lad who splashed me this morning, it would change the face of affairs."

"And I, my dear Aramis," Athos replied calmly, "think it would just change the face of Sir Retz. Besides, it's best to leave things as they stand; he belongs to the Fronde as you now do to the Queen of England. Now, if the second matter you must postpone is no more important than the first..."

"Oh, it's much more important."

"Then get it over with quickly."

"Unfortunately, it's not something I can do whenever I please; it must be done at night, late at night."

"I see," said Athos, smiling. "At midnight?"

"Thereabouts."

"Well, my friend, these affairs must be postponed, all the more because you'll return with such a good excuse for having postponed them."

"Yes – if I return."

"If you don't return, what does it matter? Be reasonable. Come, Aramis, you're no longer twenty years old."

"To my great regret, Mordieu! Ah, if only I were!"

"Indeed, I think you'd involve yourself in some grand follies!" said Athos. "But we must part; I have one or two visits to make myself and a letter to write. Come to my place at eight o'clock – unless you'd rather dine with me first at seven."

"All right," said Aramis. "Though I have to make about twenty visits and write about that many letters." They took their leave of each other. Athos went to visit Madam de Vendome, had a word with Madam de Chevreuse, and wrote the following letter to d'Artagnan:

Old friend, I'm going off with Aramis on a matter of importance. I'd prefer to bid you farewell personally but don't have time for it, so I'm writing to remind you of how fond I am of you. Raoul has gone to Blois and doesn't know of my departure. Watch over him in my absence as best you can, and if you haven't heard from me in three months, tell him to open a sealed packet he'll find in my bronze coffer there, the key to which I'll enclose with this letter. Embrace Porthos for Aramis and for me. Farewell, and perhaps goodbye.

And he sent Blaisois off with the letter. Aramis arrived at the appointed hour. He was on horseback and had at his side that trusted sword that he'd drawn so often, more often now than ever. "Oh that!" he said. "I think it's a mistake to go off like this without notifying Porthos and d'Artagnan."

"I took care of it, my friend," said Athos, "and sent them both our embraces."

"You're an admirable man, my dear Count," said Aramis, "and you think of everything."

"Well, then! Are you ready to set off on our journey?"

"Absolutely – and the more I think about it, the happier I am to be away from Paris at this time."

"And I, as well," replied Athos. "I regret not saying goodbye to d'Artagnan in person but he's such a clever devil he'd have guessed what we're up to."

As they were finishing supper, Blaisois returned. "Sir, here's the reply from Sir d'Artagnan."

"But I didn't tell you to wait for a reply, you imbecile!" said Athos.

"Well, I started to leave without waiting for one but then he called me back and gave me this." And he held out a little leather purse, round and jingling. Athos opened the brief note that read as follows: My dear Count,

When one travels, especially for three months, one never has enough money. Now, I remember our times of hardship, so I'm sending you half my money in this purse. It's cash that I managed to sweat out of Mazarin but don't use it poorly on that account. As for the idea that I might not see you again, I don't believe a word of it. A man with your heart – and your sword – can pass through anything.

Farewell and not goodbye. It goes without saying that from the day I met Raoul I've loved him as if he were my own; but believe me when I say I sincerely pray to God to keep me from becoming his father, no matter how proud I'd be of a son like him.

Your D'ARTAGNAN

P.S.: Of course, the fifty Louis I'm sending you are as much Aramis's as they are yours.

Athos smiled, and tears welled up in his eyes. D'Artagnan, whom he'd always loved, still loved him, even if he was allied with Mazarin. "And, my faith, here they are – fifty Louis," said Aramis, emptying the purse on the table, "each one with Louis XIII's face on it. Well, what shall we do with this money, Count – keep it, or send it back?"

"We keep it, Aramis, though we won't have it for long. What is offered so nobly should be nobly accepted. You take twenty-five, Aramis, and give the other twenty-five to me."

"It's a timely gift, and I must say I agree with you. Now, then, shall we be off?"

"Whenever you like ... but aren't you bringing any lackeys?"

"No, that fool of a Bazin had the bad judgement to become a beadle, and now he can't leave Notre Dame."

"Well, you take Blaisois then whom I don't need since I already have Grimaud."

"Willingly," said Aramis.

At that moment, Grimaud appeared on the threshold. "Ready," he said, laconic as usual.

"Then let's go," said Athos.

Indeed, the horses were saddled and waiting, and the lackeys were prepared. They rode into the night but at the corner of the quay they encountered Bazin who ran up to them all out of breath. "Ah, sir!" he huffed. "Thank God I caught you in time."

"What is it?" said Aramis.

"Sir Porthos stopped by the house and left this for you, saying it was very urgent and you had to have it before you left."

"What's this?" said Aramis, taking a purse from Bazin.

"Wait, Sir Abbot, there's a letter too."

"You know I warned you that if you called me anything other than knight that I'd break your bones. Let's see the letter."

"How are you going to read it?" said Athos. "It's as dark as the bottom of a well."

"Wait," said Bazin. He took out a flint and lit a taper of the kind used to light church candles. By its light, Aramis read the following:

My dear d'Herblay,

I hear from d'Artagnan, who embraces me on your behalf and that of the Count of La Fère, that you're leaving on an expedition that may last two or three months. Since I know you don't like to ask aid of your friends, I offer this so you don't have to: here are two hundred pistoles you can use as you think best, and which you can repay if it's ever convenient. Don't worry about putting me in hardship; if I need some money I'll just send to one of my châteaux: at Bracieux alone I have twenty thousand livres in gold. So, I could have sent more but I was afraid you wouldn't take it if I sent too much. I address this to you because you know the Count of La Fère always intimidates me a little, although I love him with all my heart. But you understand that what I offer to you, I offer equally to him.

I am, as you should never doubt, your devoted

DU VALLON DE BRACIEUX DE PIERREFONDS

"Well!" said Aramis. "What do you say to that?"

"I say, my dear d'Herblay, that it would be sacrilege to doubt in Providence when one has such friends."

"And so?"

"And so, let's share out Porthos's pistoles as we did d'Artagnan's Louis." They split the money by the light of Bazin's taper, and then resumed their journey. A quarter of an hour later they were at the Saint-Denis gate, where Lord Winter was waiting for them.

216

The 1st Impulse is always the Right One

The three gentlemen took the road to Picardy, that road so familiar to them, reminding Athos and Aramis of some of the most colourful adventures of their youth. "If Mousqueton were with us," said Athos, as they arrived at the spot where they'd fought with the road workers, "he'd tremble as we rode past. Do you remember, Aramis? This is where he took that famous musket ball."

"And I'd let him tremble, by my faith," said Aramis, "for he's not the only one to shiver at this place: there, beyond that tree, is a little spot where I thought I was a dead man."

They went on their way. Soon it was Grimaud who was taken by a memory. As they arrived before an inn where he and his master had dined so long and so well, he approached Athos, pointed at the cellar door, and said, "Sausages!"

Athos began to laugh, as amused by this recollection of his youth as if hearing a mad tale told about someone else. At last, after riding two days and a night, they arrived, in magnificent weather, at Boulogne. At that time, it was still a small town, lightly populated, and built up on the heights; the district now known as the lower town didn't yet exist. But behind its walls, Boulogne had a formidable position. Arriving at the gates of the city, Lord Winter said, "Gentlemen, let's do as we did in Paris, and separate to avoid suspicion. I know an inn that is little frequented but where the host is entirely devoted to me. I'm going to go there, because that's where letters will be waiting for me. You should go to one of the city's leading inns such as the Épée du Grand Henry and briefly rest and recuperate. Then meet me on the jetty in two hours, where our boat will be waiting for us."

They agreed. Lord Winter followed the road around the walls and entered the city by another gate while the two friends went in through the gate in front of them. A few hundred paces inside they came upon the large inn Winter had recommended. The horses were fed and rested but not unsaddled, and the lackeys were sent to supper. It was beginning to grow late, and the two masters, impatient to embark, told their lackeys to meet them on the jetty, and meanwhile to speak to no one. Of course, this latter instruction applied only to Blaisois; the silent Grimaud needed no such orders. Athos and Aramis went down to the harbour. By their dust-covered clothes, and by a certain easy manner that always indicates a man accustomed to travel, they attracted the attention of several dockside loiterers. There was one on whom their arrival had made a definite impression. This man, whom they'd noticed for the same reasons others had noticed them, was walking morosely up and down the jetty. However, once he saw Athos and Aramis he stared, and seemed taken with a sudden need to speak with them. This man was young and pale, with eyes of such a light variable blue that they seemed, like a tiger's, to change to reflect his mood. His walk, though slow and wandering, was stiff and determined; he was dressed all in black and wore a long sword at his side with the ease of familiarity. Stepping onto the jetty, Athos and Aramis paused to look at a small boat moored to the pier and equipped as if ready to go. "No doubt that's ours," said Athos.

"Yes," Aramis replied, "and that sloop at anchor out there's probably the one intended for us. Now if only de Winter won't keep us waiting; there's no amusement to be had here and not a woman in sight."

"Hush!" said Athos. "Someone might be listening."

In fact, the pale loiterer, who, after staring at the two friends, had resumed walking up and down, paused at the name of de Winter – but as his face showed no emotion upon hearing this name, he might just have paused by chance. Turning, the young man bowed to them and said politely, "Gentlemen, pardon my curiosity but I see that you've come from Paris, or are at least newcomers to Boulogne."

"Yes, we have come from Paris, Sir," Athos replied just as politely. "What can we do for you?"

"Sir," the young man said, "could you please tell me if it's true that Cardinal Mazarin is no longer prime minister?"

"That's a strange question," said Aramis.

"He's and isn't," Athos replied. "By which I mean that half of France opposes him but by balancing intrigue with promises, the other half supports him. That situation might continue for quite a while."

"Then, Sir," the stranger said, "he's neither fled nor in prison?"

"No, Sir – not for the moment, at least."

"Gentlemen, my thanks for your courtesy," said the young man as he walked away.

"What do you think of this inquisitive fellow?" said Aramis.

"I think he's either a bored provincial or a nosy spy."

"And that's the answer you give to a spy?"

"I could scarcely have replied otherwise. He was polite to me, as I was to him."

"But if he's a spy..."

"What's a spy going to do to us? We're no longer in the reign of Cardinal Richelieu, who could close the ports on a mere suspicion."

"Nonetheless, it was a mistake to answer him that way," said Aramis, watching the young man as he disappeared among the dunes.

"And you," said Athos, "forget that you committed an imprudence of your own when you mentioned the name of Lord de Winter. Didn't you notice that that's what attracted the young man?"

"All the more reason, when he spoke to you, to tell him to move along."

"And start a quarrel?" said Athos.

"Since when are you afraid of a quarrel?"

"I'm always afraid of a quarrel when I'm on a mission that a quarrel might endanger. Besides, to tell the truth, I wanted a close look at this young man."

"Why's that?"

"Aramis, you're just going to laugh at me, tell me I'm seeing things, and am obsessed with a single idea."

"Let's hear it. What, then?"

"Who do you think that man looks like?"

"In ugliness or in beauty?" asked Aramis, laughing.

"In ugliness, insofar as a man can resemble a woman."

"Ah, for the love of God!" said Aramis. "Now you've set me to thinking. No, of course you're not seeing things, my dear friend, and now that I think about it, you're right: that thin, narrow mouth, those eyes that take orders only from the mind and not from the heart. It's Milady's bastard, of course!"

"You laugh, Aramis!"

"From habit, that's all. For I swear to you, I'd hate to encounter such a serpent in our path as much as you would."

"Ah, here comes de Winter at last," said Athos.

"Good, then there's only one thing lacking," said Aramis. "Now we need only our servants."

"No," Athos said, "I see them, they're about twenty paces behind milord. I recognise Grimaud with his cocked head and long legs. Tony is bringing our carbines."

"Are we going to embark at night, then?" asked Aramis, glancing toward the west where the sun was just a golden haze sinking into the sea.

"It seems likely," said Athos.

"The devil!" replied Aramis. "Even by day I don't like the sea, and it's worse at night – the slap of the waves, the whine of the wind, the dreadful shifting of the deck – I'd much rather be in the monastery at Noisy."

Athos smiled his melancholy smile, for though he seemed to be listening to his friend, it was clear he really was thinking about something else. He made his way toward Winter, and Aramis followed him. "What's wrong with our friend?" Aramis said. "He looks like those damned in Dante who had their necks twisted by Satan to turn backward. What the devil is he looking for behind him?"

Noticing them, Winter doubled his pace and reached them in no time. "What's wrong, Milord?" said Athos. "You're out of breath."

"Nothing," said Winter, "nothing. Only, passing by the dunes, it seemed to me..." and he turned and looked anew. Athos gave Aramis a look. "But let's depart," Winter continued. "Here's the boat waiting for us, and our sloop is at anchor – do you see it there? I wish I was already on it." And he turned again and looked back.

"Ah çà!" said Aramis. "Did you forget something?"

"No, I'm just distracted..."

"He saw him," Athos whispered to Aramis.

They arrived at the gangway to the boat. Winter first sent down the lackeys carrying their arms, next the porters with their trunks, and then began to follow them. As he did, Athos noticed a man who was hastening along the shoreline parallel to the jetty, as if trying to reach the opposite wharf across from where they were embarking. He thought, through the descending twilight, that he recognised the young man who'd questioned them. "Oh ho!" he said to himself. "Is he a spy after all, and planning to block our departure?"

But if that was the stranger's plan, it was already too late to put it into action. Athos, in his turn, went down the gangway but without losing sight of the young man, who went out upon the breakwater. He seems to be angry at us, thought Athos but let's just depart. Once we're on the open sea, he can be as angry as he likes.

Athos leapt into the boat, the ropes were loosed, and it began to pull away due to the efforts of four brawny rowers. But the young man began to follow the boat along the breakwater, or rather precede it. The boat had to pass between the end of the jetty, where the harbour lighthouse had just been lit, and a boulder at the end of the breakwater. The man could be seen climbing the boulder so as to tower over the boat as it passed. "See there?" said Aramis to Athos. "That young man is definitely some sort of spy."

"What young man?" asked Winter, turning to look.

"That one, who spoke to us earlier, followed us, and now awaits us. See!"

Winter looked where Aramis was pointing. The lighthouse clearly illuminated the little strait they were about to pass through, and the boulder where the young man stood waiting, head bare and arms crossed. "It's him!" Lord Winter cried, grabbing Athos by the arm. "It's him. I thought I'd seen him, and I was right."

"Him? Who?" asked Aramis.

"Milady's son," Athos replied.

"The monk!" cried Grimaud.

The young man heard these words and perched over the water on the edge of the boulder, he looked like he was ready to pounce. "Yes, Uncle, here I'm. I, Milady's son; I, the monk; I, the aide and friend to Cromwell – and I recognise you and your companions."

There were three brave men in that boat, men of whom no man could dispute the courage – but at that voice, in that tone, they felt a shiver of terror run down their spines. As for Grimaud, his hair was bristling on his head, and sweat poured from his brow. "Ah!" said Aramis. "So, this is the nephew, the monk, and Milady's son – that's him, is it?"

"Alas, yes," murmured Winter.

"All right, then," said Aramis.

And he picked up with that terrible sangfroid he displayed in extremity, one of Tony's muskets, loaded it, and took aim at the man standing on the rock like an angel of malediction. "Fire!" cried Grimaud beside himself.

Athos knocked aside the musket barrel before Aramis could shoot. "The devil take you!" Aramis exclaimed. "You ruined my shot just when I was about to put a ball into his chest."

"It's quite enough to have killed the mother," said Athos gruffly.

"The mother was a monster who hurt us and those dear to us."

"Yes but the son has done us no harm."

Grimaud, who had risen when Aramis took up the musket, fell back discouraged, wringing his hands. The young man burst out laughing. "Ah, it is you, for sure – and now I know you."

His harsh and menacing laughter rang out over the water, fading as the boat rowed on into the darkness. Aramis shuddered. "Calm down," said Athos. "What the devil! Are we men, or aren't we?"

"We are," said Aramis, "but him – he's a demon. Just ask the uncle if he thinks I'd have done wrong to rid him of his nephew."

Winter's only response was a sigh.

"I could have finished this," Aramis went on. "Agh! I'm afraid, Athos, that your restraint has led you into folly."

Athos took Winter's hand and said, changing the subject, "How long will it take to reach England?" But Winter wasn't listening and didn't answer.

"Look, Athos," said Aramis, "maybe it isn't too late. Look, he's still in the same place."

Athos turned with an effort, as the sight of the young man seemed painful to him. Indeed, he still stood on the rock, the glow from the lighthouse making a halo around him. "But what is he doing in Boulogne?" asked Athos who sought the cause for everything, being reason incarnate, little caring for the effect.

"He followed me, he followed me," said Winter, who this time had heard Athos, since the words echoed his own thoughts.

"To follow you, my friend," said Athos, "he would have had to know we were leaving; and besides, it seems probable he was here ahead of us."

"Then I can't understand it!" said the Englishman, shaking his head like a man who sees no use in battling the supernatural.

"Decidedly, Aramis," said Athos, "I think I was wrong not to let you do it."

"Oh, hold your tongue," Aramis replied. "You'd make me weep, if I was the sort of man who could weep."

Grimaud just uttered a deep, mournful groan. At that moment, a voice hailed them from the sloop. The pilot, who was seated at the rudder, answered the call, and the boat approached the vessel.

Within minutes, the gentlemen, their servants, and baggage were all aboard. The captain waited only for the porters to return to the boat; as soon as they were clear, he set a course for Hastings, where they were to land. Meanwhile the three friends, anxious despite themselves, peered back toward the breakwater, where, on the boulder at the end, the menacing shadow that pursued them was still visible. A voice echoed across the water with a final threat: "We'll meet again, Gentlemen – in England!"

217

The Te Deum [] for the Victory at Lens

The commotion in Paris that Queen Henriette had noticed was caused by news of the victory at Lens, brought by the Duke Châtillon on behalf of Sir Prince. The duke who'd had such a noble share in the triumph, was also charged with hanging 22 flags in the vault of Notre-Dame, banners captured from the Lorrainers and Spaniards. This news was decisive in resolving the conflict with parliament in favour of the Royal Court. All the taxes that had been decreed and the Parliament had opposed, were immediately ratified to sustain the honour of France during the ongoing battle with its enemies. The country had experienced nothing but defeats since the Battle of Nördlingen, and parliament had had a fine time mocking Mazarin* for the promised victories that never occurred but now victory was in hand at last, and a great victory, too: everyone regarded it as a double triumph for the Court, giving it the upper hand over enemies both domestic and foreign so that the young King Louis XIV upon hearing the news, declared, "Ah, gentlemen of the Parliament, what do you have to say now?"

Hearing that, Queen Anne* had hugged to her heart her royal child, whose hauteur accorded so well with her own. A council was called that very evening, summoning Marshall de La Meilleraie and Sir Villeroy because they were Cardinalists, Chavigny* and Séguier because they hated parliament, and Guitaut* and Comminges because they were devoted to the queen. None of this council's decisions were made public, except that on the following Sunday there would be a Te Deum sung at Notre-Dame in honour of the victory at Lens. That Sunday, the Parisians awoke with joy: at that time a Te Deum was a grand affair, not yet made routine by overuse, and it was widely hailed. The sun that seemed a willing partner in the festivities, had risen radiant, gilding the sombre towers of the city, its streets already teeming with immense crowds; even the darkest alleys had taken on a festive air, and along the quays streamed long lines of citizens, workers, women, and children moving toward Notre-Dame, like fish in a river ascending toward its source. The shops were deserted, the houses closed up; everyone wanted to see the young king, his royal mother, and the famous Cardinal Mazarin, whom they hated so much they couldn't do without him. Freedom of speech reigned among the surging crowds; every shade of opinion was loudly expressed, and rang out like a call to riot, just as the thousand bells of the churches of Paris rang out the Te Deum. The citizens of Paris made their own rules that day and ensured that nothing dampened the cries of hatred or stilled the flow of slander. At eight in the morning, the Regiment of the Queen's Guards, commanded by Guitaut and seconded by his nephew, Comminges, had marched, to the sound of drums and trumpets, from the Royal Palace to Notre-Dame, a manoeuvre which the Parisians had watched with their habitual admiration of military music and bright uniforms. Friquet was part of the crowd, dressed in his best, able to attend thanks to a temporary swelling caused by jamming a huge number of cherry pits into the side of his mouth that had persuaded Bazin to give him the day off. Bazin had refused at first, for the beadle was in a lousy mood, first due to the departure of Aramis who had left without telling him where he was going, and then from having to serve at a mass in honour of a victory that didn't accord with his opinions – Bazin, we recall, was a Frondeur. If there was some way by which, despite the dignity of his position, the beadle could absent himself as easily as the choirboy, Bazin would certainly have made the same request of the archbishop the choirboy had made of him. Thus, he had refused Friquet at first but the boy's cheek continued to swell, so for the honour and reputation of the choir that couldn't be compromised by such a deformity, he had finally given in, muttering to himself. Outside the church door, Friquet had spat out the cherry pits and sent toward the oblivious Bazin one of those supremely rude gestures that demonstrate the superiority of the Parisian gamin to all other guttersnipes. As for his tavern job, he had naturally avoided that by saying he'd be serving at the mass at Notre-Dame. Friquet was thus free, and as we mentioned, dressed in his very best, capped by a remarkable ornament, one of those bulbous bonnets worn during the period between the cap of the Middle Ages and the brimmed hat of the reign of Louis XIII.* His mother had made this grotesque headgear for him, and either from whim or from a lack of uniform fabric, had sewn it from an assortment of colours, so that this paragon of 17th-century haberdashery was yellow and green on one side and red and white on the other. This made Friquet, who had always loved bright colours, all the more proud and triumphant. After leaving Bazin, Friquet ran toward the Royal Palace. He arrived just as the regiment of guards was marching out, and as he hadn't come for any reason other than to see the sights and enjoy the music, he took a position marching at the head of the column, beating a tattoo with two wooden slats. From the tambour he passed on to the trumpet that he imitated with his mouth in a way that was the envy of his fellow amateurs of musical imposture. This amusement lasted from the Barrière des Sergents all the way to Place Notre-Dame, and Friquet thoroughly enjoyed it. But then the regiment halted, and the companies deployed along the streets in the heart of the Île de la Cité, from the end of Rue Saint-Christophe almost to Rue Cocatrix where Broussel lived. Then Friquet, remembering he'd not yet had breakfast, considered where best to acquire this important meal, and after thinking for a moment, decided to let Councillor Broussel pick up the tab. Following this impulse, he ran till he was out of breath, and was soon knocking loudly at the councillor's door. His mother, Broussel's aging maidservant, opened and said, "What are you doing here, lad, and why you aren't at Notre-Dame?"

"I was there, Mother Nanette," said Friquet, "but I saw things going on that Master Broussel should be warned about, so with the permission of Sir Bazin – you know him, Bazin the beadle, right? – I've come to speak to Sir Broussel."

"And what do you want to say, you monkey, to Sir Broussel?"

"I'll tell him that personally."

"Well, you can't, because he's working."

"Then I'll wait," said Friquet, pleased because that suited how he intended to spend the time.

And he ran quickly up the stairs, with Dame Nanette following slowly behind him. "But what do you want with Sir Broussel?" she called.

"I want to tell him," shouted Friquet at the top of his lungs, "that there's a whole regiment of guards coming this way! And since everybody says the Court is angry with him, I've come to warn him to look out!"

Broussel heard the young prankster's cries and, charmed by this display of zeal, came down to the first floor from where he'd been working up above. "What's this about a regiment of guards, my friend?" he said. "You simpleton, you'll start a panic. Don't you know it's their custom to march this way, and that the regiment always lines the streets where the king is to pass?"

Friquet pretended to be surprised, and said, turning his new hat between his hands, "Well, of course you'd know that, Sir Broussel, because you know everything. But I didn't know it, I swear to God, and thought I was bringing you important news. Please don't be angry with me, Sir Broussel."

"On the contrary, my dear lad, your zeal pleases me. Dame Nanette, see if you can find those apricots Madam de Longueville* sent us yesterday from Noisy, and give a half dozen to your son with a crust of fresh bread."

"Ah, thank you, Sir Broussel!" said Friquet. "I like apricots a lot."

Broussel went to find his wife and ask for his own breakfast. He stopped at the window; the street was completely deserted but in the distance could be heard like the rush of an incoming tide, the waves of sound that were rising from the crowds around Notre-Dame. This sound redoubled when d'Artagnan arrived at the head of a company of musketeers to take up a position at the doors of Notre-Dame. He'd invited Porthos to join him and take the opportunity to see the ceremony, and Porthos, in full court dress and mounted on his finest horse, was playing the part of an honorary musketeer, as d'Artagnan had so often done. The company's sergeant, a veteran of the wars with Spain, had recognised his old companion Porthos, and was regaling his subordinates with tales of the deeds of this giant, a champion of the King's Musketeers under old Captain Tréville. The company, therefore, had welcomed him with pride. At ten o'clock, the cannon of the Louvre announced the king's departure. A movement like that of the trees bending before a windstorm swept along the ranks of the crowd, stirring behind the rigid hedge of the muskets of the guards. At last the king appeared in a gilded carriage with his mother the queen. This was followed by ten other carriages containing the ladies of honour, the officers of the royal house, and the other members of the Court. “Long live the king!” came the cheers from every side.

The young king gravely brought his head to the carriage door, made a face that might have been approval, and bowed slightly that made the crowd cheer all the louder. The procession advanced slowly, taking almost half an hour to advance from the Louvre to Place Notre-Dame. Arriving there, the Court moved group by group into the vast and sombre vault of the church, and the divine service began. As the procession was arriving, a coach bearing the arms of Comminges left the line of carriages waiting to disembark their courtiers and turned slowly down Rue Saint-Christophe, now entirely deserted. Once parked around the corner, four guards and an officer went into the heavy coach and closed all the shutters, leaving only the one in front slightly open so the officer could look out toward Rue Cocatrix, as if waiting for someone to arrive. Everyone was occupied with the ceremony, so no one paid any attention to the coach or the careful precautions of those within. Friquet, the only one nosy enough to spot them, had climbed up onto a house opposite Notre-Dame, where he savoured his apricots as he watched the arrival of the king, the queen, and Cardinal Mazarin, and heard the mass as well as if he’d been taking part in it. Toward the end of the service, the queen, seeing that Comminges was standing near at hand awaiting confirmation of the order she’d given before they left the Louvre, said to him in a low voice, “Go, Comminges – and may God go with you!”

Comminges went at once, leaving the church and turning down Rue Saint-Christophe. Friquet, who noticed this handsome officer marching with two guards behind him, amused himself by following along, as the ceremony had ended and the king had re-entered his carriage. As soon as the officer in the coach saw Comminges arrive at the end of Rue Cocatrix, he spoke an order to the driver, who put the vehicle into motion and drove it to Broussel’s door. Comminges began knocking on that door just as the coach arrived. Friquet came up behind Comminges as he was knocking on the door.

“What are you doing here, monkey?” asked Comminges.

“I’m waiting to go into Councillor Broussel’s house, Sir Officer,” Friquet said in that obsequious tone the Parisian gamin can adopt at need.

“Does he live here?” Comminges asked.

“Yes, Sir.”

“On what floor?”

“All of them,” said Friquet. “The whole house is his.”

“But where is he usually found?”

“He works on the second floor but comes down to the first for his meals. Right now, he must be eating, since it’s noon.”

“Good,” said Comminges.

Just then the door opened. The officer questioned the servant, learning that Broussel was at home and dining. Comminges followed the servant up the stairs, and Friquet went up behind Comminges. Broussel was seated at the table with his family, his wife across from him, and his two daughters by his side, and at the end of the table was his son, Louvières whom we already met on the day of the councillor’s accident, from which he was now fully recovered. The good man, restored to full health, was enjoying the apricots sent by Madam de Longueville. Comminges who had stopped the servant by grabbing his arm as he was about to open the door and announce him, opened the door himself and was face-to-face with this family tableau. At the sight of the officer Broussel felt uneasy but as the officer bowed politely, he rose and did the same. Despite this polite exchange, the women looked anxious, while Louvières, turning pale, waited impatiently for the officer to explain himself. “Sir,” said Comminges, “I’m the bearer of an order from the king.”

“Very well, Sir,” Broussel replied. “Where is this order?”

And he extended his hand. “I’m commissioned to detain you, Sir,” said Comminges in the same polite tone, “and if you’ll take my word for that, it’ll save you the trouble of reading this long letter. Please follow me.” If a thunderbolt had fallen among those good people, so peacefully gathered, it couldn’t have had a more terrible effect. Broussel backed away, trembling. It was a terrible thing at that time to be imprisoned by direct order of the king. Louvières made a movement toward his sword that hung on a chair in the corner but a look from Broussel, who was determined not to lose his head, stopped him. Madam Broussel, separated from her husband by the width of the table, burst into tears, and the two young daughters embraced their father. “Come, Sir, make haste,” said Comminges. “We must obey the king.”

“Sir,” said Broussel, “I’m in poor health and in no condition to give myself up – I need some time.”

“Impossible,” replied Comminges. “It’s a formal order and must be executed at once.”

“Impossible?” said Louvières. “Sir, be careful you don’t drive us to desperate measures.”

“Impossible!” screeched a voice from the rear of the room.

Comminges turned to see Dame Nanette, broomstick in hand and eyes aflame with anger. “My good Nanette, calm down,” said Broussel, “I beg you.”

“Me, calm down while they arrest my master, the supporter, the liberator, the father of the people! Oh, right! You know me better than that! You,” she said to Comminges, “get out of here!”

Comminges smiled. “Come, Sir,” he said, turning to Broussel, “silence this noisy woman and follow me.”

“Silence me! Me!” said Nanette. “It will take more than just you to do that, my king’s pretty coxcomb. You’ll see.” And Dame Nanette rushed to the window, opened it, and shouted in a voice so piercing it could be heard in the Place Notre-Dame, “Help! Help! They’re arresting my master! They’re arresting Councillor Broussel! Help!”

“Sir,” said Comminges, “make up your mind: will you obey, or do you intend rebellion against the king?”

“I obey, I obey, Sir,” cried Broussel, trying to disengage himself from his clinging daughters, and from his son, who wanted to help him escape.

“In that case,” said Comminges, “make this old crone shut up.”

“Oh! Crone, is it?” said Nanette. And, clinging to the bars of the window, she began to scream even louder, “Help! Help! Help for Master Broussel, who’s being arrested for defending the people! Help!”

Comminges grabbed the maidservant by the arm and tried to drag her from the window but another voice, issuing falsetto from the ground floor below, took up the cry: “Murder! Fire! Assassination! They’re slaughtering Sir Broussel!”

It was Friquet. Dame Nanette, encouraged by his support, joined loudly in chorus. Already a few curious heads were appearing at neighbouring windows. People, attracted to the end of the street, came around the corner at a run, individuals, groups, and then a whole crowd. They saw the coach but didn’t understand what it meant. Friquet leapt from the staircase to the top of the vehicle. “They’re trying to arrest Sir Broussel!” he cried. “There are guards in the coach, and an officer upstairs!”

The crowd began to shout and approach the coach and horses. The two guards who’d stayed in the street went inside to assist Comminges, while those in the coach came out and blocked the doorway with crossed halberds. “Do you see them?” cried Friquet. “Look! Here they are!”

The driver turned and gave Friquet a blow with his whip that made him howl in pain. “Agh! You devil’s coachman! You want a fight? Just wait!”

And he jumped back to the staircase, from which he peppered the driver with whatever projectiles came to hand. Despite the guards’ aggressive response, or perhaps because of it, the crowd began to close in on the coach. The guards struck out with the flats of their halberds, and the rebels were driven back. However, the tumult continued to increase, and soon the street was overflowing as the mob came from every direction, and people began to invade the space between the coach and the formidable pole arms of the guards. The soldiers, compressed as by living walls, seemed about to be crushed against the wheels and side of the vehicle. The cry, “In the king’s name!” repeated twenty times over by the officer just seemed to make the mob angrier – until a young cavalier, hearing the king’s name invoked and seeing uniformed soldiers being mistreated, rushed into the fray with his sword in his hand, bringing unexpected aid to the guards.

This young man, fifteen or sixteen years old, was pale with anger. Like the guards, he dismounted, put his back against the shaft of the coach, made a rampart of his horse, drew his pistols from the saddle holsters, thrust them through his belt, then drew his sword and began to use it like a man who knows how. For several minutes, the young man on his own fended off the attacks of the crowd. But then the mob saw Comminges come out, pushing Broussel before him. “Smash the coach!” cried the crowd.

“Help! Help!” cried the old woman.

“Murder! Murder!” cried Friquet as he continued to pepper the guards with everything he could find.

“In the king’s name!” cried Comminges.

“The next one who tries something is dead!” cried Raoul de Bragelonne who feeling himself pressed especially by a giant of a man who looked ready to crush him, pricked him with the point of his sword and the giant recoiled with a howl, feeling himself wounded.

For it was indeed Raoul, who, returning from Blois after five days’ absence, as he’d promised the Count La Fère, had wished to have a look at the ceremony, and was thus in the streets that led to Notre-Dame. Arriving in the neighbourhood of Rue Cocatrix, he’d found himself swept along by the huge crowd – and hearing the words, In the king’s name, he’d recalled that Athos had told him, “Serve the king.”

And he’d rushed into the fight to defend the royal guards. Comminges basically threw Broussel into the carriage and tumbled in after him. At that moment a harquebus was fired, the ball perforated Comminges’s hat, and went on to break a guard’s arm. Comminges looked up and saw, behind the powder smoke, the menacing figure of Louvières at the second-floor window. “Very well, Sir,” Comminges called, “you’ll be hearing from me about this.”

“As you’ll hear from me, Sir,” Louvières said, “and we’ll see who speaks the loudest.”

Friquet and Nanette were still screaming; the shouts, the sound of the shot, the smell of gunpowder, always so intoxicating, all these had their effect. “Kill the officer! Kill him!” the crowd cried.

And they surged forward. “One more step,” shouted Comminges, knocking open the shutters so everyone could see into the carriage, and placing the point of his sword on Broussel’s chest, “one more step and I kill the prisoner. I was ordered to bring him in dead or alive, and I’ll bring him in dead if I have to.” There was a terrible cry from above, as Broussel’s wife and daughters held out their hands in supplication to the people. And the people realised that this officer, so pale but seemingly so resolute, would do as he said, so they continued to threaten but drew back a bit. Comminges had the wounded guard get into the coach with him and ordered the others to shut the door. “To the palace,” he called to the driver who was more dead than alive.

The coachman whipped up his animals, who forced their way through the crowd. But upon reaching the quay they could go no further; the coach was upset, and the horses carried away by the crowd. Raoul, still on foot, as he’d never had time or space to remount his horse, gave up striking with the flat of his blade and began using the point. But this last resort only infuriated the mob. Weapons began to appear in the crowd, a musket barrel here, a rapier blade there; shots rang out, a sound that only added to the excitement, and projectiles rained down from the windows above. The crowd’s voice rose to that roar heard only in a true riot, and faces showed expressions seen only on days of bloody conflict. Shouts of “À mort! Kill the guards! Throw the officer in the Seine!” could be heard even above the clamour of the crowd.

Raoul felt that not just his strength but his very reason began to abandon him, his hat crushed, face bloody. His vision clouded with a reddish mist, and through this fog he saw a hundred arms reaching out to menace him, ready to seize him when he fell. In the overturned coach, Comminges tore his hair in rage. The guards couldn’t help him, as they could barely defend themselves. It was all over: coach, horses, guards, officer, maybe even the prisoner, all seemed likely to be torn to pieces – when suddenly a voice well-known to Raoul rang out, and a familiar sword shone in the air. The crowd separated and reeled back as an officer of the King’s Musketeers, striking and slashing left and right, ran to Raoul and took him in his arms just as he was about to fall. “God!” the officer cried. “Have they murdered him? If so, woe unto them!”

And he turned, bristling with such fury, menace, and force that even the angriest rebels recoiled, some retreating right into the Seine. “Sir d’Artagnan,” Raoul murmured.

“Yes, God’s blood! In person and fortunately for you it seems, my young friend. This way! Over here!” he called, leaping back into the saddle and waving his sword to the rest of his musketeers, who were just catching up. “Come on, drive this rabble back! Muskets at the ready! Present arms! Prepare to fire! Ready…”

At this order the populace withdrew so suddenly that d’Artagnan couldn’t restrain a burst of Homeric laughter. “Thank you, d’Artagnan,” said Comminges, protruding half out the door of the overturned coach. “And thank you, my young gentleman. Your name? For I must tell the queen.”

Raoul was about to respond, when d’Artagnan leaned down and said in his ear, “Keep quiet, and let me do the talking.” Then, turning to Comminges, he said, “No time for that now, Comminges. Get out of this coach if you can, and let’s find you another.”

“Another? What other?”

“For the love of God, the first one that comes along! They’ll be happy, I’m sure, to lend their carriage to the service of the king.”

“Well, I don’t know,” said Comminges.

“Let’s move, or in five minutes that rabble will be back with swords and muskets. You’ll be killed and your prisoner set free. Come on. Ah, here comes a carriage now.”

Then, leaning back toward Raoul, d’Artagnan whispered, “No matter what, don’t mention your name.”

The young man looked at him in astonishment. “Very well, we’ll go then,” said Comminges. “But if the crowd comes back, open fire.”

"No, by no means," replied d'Artagnan. "On the contrary, nobody make a move. A shot fired today would be dearly paid for tomorrow." Comminges took his four guards and the same number of musketeers and ran to the approaching carriage. He made the passengers get out and brought the carriage to the overturned coach. But when Broussel was to be transferred from the broken vehicle to the new one, the people, who saw the man they called their liberator, uttered angry screams and rushed forward anew. "Go," said d'Artagnan. "I'm sending ten musketeers with you; I'll keep twenty to hold back the crowd. Go, and don't lose a moment. Ten men for Sir Comminges!" Ten men separated from the troop, surrounded the new carriage, and departed at a gallop. At the departure of the carriage the cries redoubled; ten thousand people crowded the quays, thronging the Pont Neuf and the nearby streets. A few shots rang out. A musketeer was wounded. "Forward," cried d'Artagnan, pushed to the limit and gnawing his moustache.

And with his twenty men he charged the entire crowd, who fell back in terror. Only one man stood fast, holding a harquebus. "Ah!" said the man. "It's you, the one who tried to trample the councillor! Now we'll see."

And he lowered his harquebus on d'Artagnan, who approached at the gallop. D'Artagnan leaned low on his horse's neck as the young man fired, so the ball only cut the plume from his hat. The furious horse hurtled into the reckless young man, who'd tried single-handed to stop a tempest, and threw him against a wall. While his musketeers continued their charge, d'Artagnan reined in his horse and raised his sword over the man he'd knocked down. "Wait!" cried Raoul who recognised the young man from Rue Cocatrix. "Spare him, sir – that's Broussel's son."

D'Artagnan lowered his sword. "Ah, you're his son?" he said. "That changes things."

"Sir, I surrender," said Louvières, holding out his smoking harquebus.

"Not at all! Surrender? Mordieu, on the contrary, run for it, and quickly! If you're captured, you'll hang."

The young man didn't wait to be told twice. He ducked under the horse's neck and disappeared around the corner of Rue Guénégaud. "My faith," d'Artagnan said to Raoul, "it was high time to stop me, because he was a dead man otherwise, and if I'd killed him and then learned who he was, I'd have regretted it."

"Please, Sir," said Raoul, "allow me, after thanking you for saving that poor lad, to thank you for saving me. I was as good as dead when you arrived."

"Hush, my young friend, save your breath till you recover." Then, drawing from a saddle bag a canteen of Spanish honey, he said, "Drink two sips of this."

Raoul drank, then tried to renew his thanks. "Dear lad," d'Artagnan said, "we'll talk about this later."

Then, seeing that his musketeers had swept the crowd away from the Pont Neuf to the Quai Saint-Michel and were returning, he waved his sword to signal haste. The musketeers arrived at the trot but at the same time, the ten troopers who'd been sent as escort with Comminges reappeared at the end of the quay. "Whoa!" called d'Artagnan. "What's happened?"

"Eh, Sir," said the sergeant, "that carriage is broken down as well. It's like a curse or something."

D'Artagnan shrugged his shoulders. "Incompetence," he said. "Why couldn't they choose a decent carriage? If you set out to arrest a Broussel, you need a carriage strong enough to carry a thousand."

"What are our orders, Lieutenant?"

"Take the detachment and escort them home."

"But you're going off alone?"

"I am. Do you think I'm in need of an escort?"

"Well..."

"Get going."

The musketeers departed, leaving Raoul with d'Artagnan, who said to him, "Now, are you hurt?"

"Yes, Sir, they cracked my head well."

"Your head? Let's take a look," d'Artagnan said, lifting Raoul's hat. "Ow, look at that bump."

"Yes, I think they hit me with a flower pot."

"The rabble!" said d'Artagnan. "But you're wearing spurs – were you on horseback?"

"Yes, I dismounted to defend Sir Comminges, and then my horse disappeared. But wait, here it comes."

In fact, at that moment Raoul's horse came galloping along, ridden by Friquet, who was waving his hat of four colours and crying, "Broussel! Broussel!"

"Hold on! Pull up, you young rascal," d'Artagnan cried. "Bring that horse over here."

Friquet heard him but pretended not to, trying to continue on his way. D'Artagnan thought about running after him but didn't want to leave Raoul, so he just pulled out a pistol and cocked it. Friquet had a sharp eye and a keen ear; he saw what d'Artagnan was up to and stopped the horse short. "Ah, it's you, Sir," he said, riding up to d'Artagnan. "I'm very glad to see you."

D'Artagnan looked at Friquet and recognised him as the gamin of the Rue de la Calandre. "Ah, it's you, little jester," he said. "Come here."

"Why yes, it's me, Sir Officer," Friquet said innocently.

"Have you found a new calling? Are you no longer a choirboy or a potboy? Are you a horse thief now?"

"Oh, Sir, how can you say that?" said Friquet. "I was looking for the gentleman who owns this horse, a young cavalier as brave as Caesar ...." He then pretended to see Raoul for the first time. "Why, if I'm not mistaken, here he is! Sir, you remember me, don't you?"

Raoul put his hand into his pouch. "What do you think you're doing?" said d'Artagnan.

"Giving ten livres to a brave young lad," Raoul replied, pulling a pistole from his pocket.

"Ten whacks on the head is more like it," said d'Artagnan. "Get going, jester! And don't forget I know where you live." Friquet, who hadn't expected to get off so easy, dismounted and disappeared up the Rue Dauphine. Raoul regained his horse and at a walking pace, d'Artagnan guarding the young man as if he were his own son, they made their way to Rue Tiquetonne. Along the way they could hear tumult in the distance and were given threatening looks but the appearance of this officer, so upright and martial, and the sight of the well-worn sword in his determined grip, kept trouble at bay, and no serious attempts were made to interfere with the two cavaliers. They arrived without incident at the Hôtel de La Chevrette. There, the lovely Madeleine reported to d'Artagnan that Planchet had returned accompanied by Mousqueton, who had heroically borne the extraction of the musket ball and was as well as could be expected given his condition. D'Artagnan asked her to call Planchet but though Planchet was summoned, he didn't appear – he was gone. "In that case, some honey!" said d'Artagnan.

Once the honey had been brought, and d'Artagnan was alone with Raoul, he looked Raoul straight in the eye and said, "You're quite pleased with yourself, aren't you?"

"But yes," said Raoul. "It seems to me I did my duty. Didn't I defend the king?"

"And who told you to defend the king?"

"Why, the Count La Fère himself."

"Right, he said the king. But today you didn't defend the king, you defended Mazarin that isn't the same thing at all."

"But, Sir..."

"You have blundered, young man, and mixed yourself up in things that don't concern you."

"But you yourself..."

"Oh, me! That's another thing entirely. I had to follow the orders of my commander. Hear me well: your commander is Sir Prince, and you have no other. But today you had the ridiculous idea of assisting Mazarin, and helping him to arrest Broussel, of all things! Don't breathe a word of this to anyone. Why, the Count La Fère would be furious."

"You think the Count La Fère would be angry with me?"

"Think so? I'm sure of it! If it wasn't for that I'd thank you, for you certainly worked hard on our behalf. So, I'll scold you in his place – and believe me, the storm of my reproof is a lot milder than his would be. Anyway," d'Artagnan added, "I'm just exercising the responsibilities your guardian placed on me in his absence."

"I don't understand, Sir," Raoul said.

D'Artagnan got up, went to his desk, picked up a letter and presented it to Raoul. Raoul finished reading the letter and looked up in dismay. "My God!" he said, his handsome eyes moist with tears.

"Has Sir Count left Paris without even seeing me?"

"He left four days ago," d'Artagnan said.

"But his letter implies he runs the risk of death."

"What, him – in danger of death? Hardly. He's travelling on business and will return soon enough. In the meantime, I hope you're not reluctant to accept me as your acting guardian."

"Oh, no, Sir d'Artagnan!" Raoul said. "You're such a brave gentleman, and Sir Count loves you!"

"Then, by God, you should love me as well! I promise not to torment you more than you deserve, my young friend, on the condition that you remain a Frondeur – and a dedicated Frondeur, at that."

"But may I continue to see Madam de Chevreuse?"*

"Mordieu, I should think so! And the coadjutor* as well, and Madam de Longueville, and even good Councillor Broussel, whom you so foolishly helped to arrest. If you see him, apologise at once, and kiss him on both cheeks."

"All right, Sir, I'll obey you, though I don't understand you."

"It's not necessary for you to understand me," said d'Artagnan, turning toward the door as it opened. "And now here comes Sir du Vallon with his fine clothes all torn."

"Yes," said Porthos, dripping with sweat and covered in dust, "but in exchange I tore a lot of others' skin. Plague! The rabble actually tried to take away my sword. It's an uprising, I tell you," the giant continued, dusting himself serenely. "But I knocked over a good twenty of them with the pommel of Balizarde here. A little honey, if you please, d'Artagnan."

"Oh, it's an uprising, I quite agree with you," said the Gascon, filling Porthos's glass to the brim. "But once you've had a sip, I'd like your opinion on something."

Porthos drank the honey in a single swallow, sucked his moustache, put down the glass, and said, "On what?"

"You see before you," d'Artagnan replied, "one Sir Bragelonne, who did everything he could to assist at the arrest of Broussel, and whom I prevented from defending Sir Comminges only with the greatest of difficulty."

"Plague!" said Porthos. "And his guardian? What would he say if he learned of this?"

"You see?" d'Artagnan said to Raoul. "Be a Frondeur, my young friend, and take my word in everything as if I were the count." Then, turning to his companion, he said, "Are you coming, Porthos?"

"Where to?" asked Porthos, pouring himself another glass of honey.

"To pay our compliments to the cardinal." Porthos swallowed the second glass with the same tranquillity he had the first, picked up his hat, and followed d'Artagnan. As for Raoul, he stayed behind and tried to sort out the confusing things he'd been told, remaining in his chamber, at d'Artagnan's request, until all the commotion in the streets had died down.

D'Artagnan's delay in reporting to the Royal Palace was entirely calculated; it had given Comminges time to arrive before him, and to inform the cardinal of the valuable services which he, d'Artagnan, and his friend had performed that morning on the queen's behalf. So, they were well received by Mazarin, who paid them many compliments, and told them they were more than halfway to the goals they desired, that is, d'Artagnan to his captaincy and Porthos to his barony. D'Artagnan would rather have had money than compliments, for he knew that Mazarin promised more often than he paid off. He regarded the cardinal's promises as mists and smoke but tried to appear satisfied while in the presence of Porthos, whom he didn't want to discourage. While the two friends were with the cardinal, the queen sent for him. The cardinal thought he saw a way to increase the zeal of his two champions by procuring for them the queen's personal thanks, so he beckoned them to follow him. D'Artagnan and Porthos protested, displaying their torn and soiled garments but the cardinal shook his head. "These outfits," he said, "are better than those of the courtiers you'll find around the queen, for these are the uniforms of war."

D'Artagnan and Porthos obeyed. The court of Anne of Austria was crowded and joyfully loud, for, after having won a victory over the Spanish, they'd won another victory over the people. Broussel had been taken out of Paris without resistance and by this hour should be in the prison at Saint-Germain. Blancmesnil, who'd been arrested at that same time as Broussel but without noise or difficulty, was already incarcerated in the Château de Vincennes. Comminges was near the queen, who was asking him about the details of his expedition, and everyone was listening to his account when he saw d'Artagnan and Porthos at the door, entering behind the cardinal. "Ah, Madam," he said, rushing over to d'Artagnan, "here's someone who can tell you better than I, for he was my saviour. If not for him, at this moment my body would probably be getting caught in the fish-nets at Saint-Cloud, for the mob was about to throw me into the river. Speak, d'Artagnan, speak."

He just bowed. Since he was a Lieutenant of the Musketeers, d’Artagnan had found himself in the same room as the queen a hundred times before but she’d never spoken with him. “Well, Sir, after having rendered me such a service, you remain silent?” Anne of Austria said.

“Madam,” d’Artagnan replied, “I have nothing to say other than that my life is in Your Majesty’s service, and I’ll be happy on the day I lose it for her.”

“I know that, Sir, I know that,” the queen said, “and have for a long time. So, I’m delighted to have an opportunity to make a public show of my esteem and gratitude.”

“Allow me, Madam,” said d’Artagnan, “to share some of that with my friend, a former musketeer of the company of Tréville, as I was” – he emphasised these words – “and who has performed wonders.” “Sir’s name?” the queen asked.

“In the musketeers,” d’Artagnan said, “he was known as Porthos” – the queen started – “but his real name is the Knight du Vallon.”

“De Bracieux de Pierrefonds,” added Porthos.

“These names are too numerous for me to remember them all – and I prefer to remember only the first,” the queen said graciously.

Porthos bowed. D’Artagnan took two steps back. Just then the coadjutor was announced. There was a cry of surprise from the royal assembly. Though the coadjutor had preached at the morning’s mass, it was known that he leaned strongly toward the Fronde; Mazarin, in asking the Archbishop of Paris to have his nephew conduct a victory mass, had evidently intended to bestow upon Sir Retz one of those underhanded Italian blows of which he was so fond. In fact, upon leaving Notre-Dame, the coadjutor had learned what was going on. Though friendly with the leading Frondeurs, he wasn’t in so deep that he couldn’t retreat if the Court offered him the right incentives; for him, the office of coadjutor was just a means to an end. Sir Retz wanted to be an archbishop like his uncle, or a cardinal like Mazarin, and the people’s faction could hardly award him those royal favours. He’d come to the palace to compliment the queen on the victory at Lens, and how his compliments were received would determine whether he would side for or against the Court. So, the coadjutor entered, and at his appearance, the entire Court, giddy with triumph, turned in curiosity to hear what he had to say. Now the coadjutor, by himself, almost had more wit than all those gathered there prepared to mock him. His speech was so eloquent and proper that those who were ready to ridicule him could find no fault to seize upon. He concluded by placing all his weak and unworthy powers at the feet of Her Majesty. The queen appeared, while it lasted, to enjoy the coadjutor’s address but when it ended with that expression of devotion – the only phrase that provided any pretext for mockery – she turned away from him toward her favourites with a look that said that now he was fair game. At once the court wits began pretending surprise and mystification. Nogent-Bautru, the Court’s leading clown, declared that the queen must be thrilled to have the support of the Church, though it came when she no longer needed it. Everyone started to laugh. The Count Villeroi said that he didn’t see how anyone could have been anxious for a moment when the Court had as a defender against parliament and the mob one such as the coadjutor, who with a word could raise an army of curates, beadles, and choirboys. The Marshall de La Meilleraie added that, if it came to blows, the coadjutor should join in, though it would be a shame they wouldn’t be able to recognise him in the mêlée by a red cardinal’s hat, the way Henry IV had been known by his white plume at the Battle of Ivry. Coadjuteur de Gondy remained calm and serene before this storm that he could turn about and make deadly to his mockers. The queen then asked him if he had anything to add to the fine speech he’d just made. “Yes, Madam,” said the coadjutor. “Victories are fine things but I must beg you to think twice before throwing the kingdom into civil war.”

The queen turned her back and the laughter resumed. The coadjutor bowed and left the chamber, after sending the cardinal who was watching him, one of those looks that everyone knew declared them mortal enemies. This look was so sharp that it went right to Mazarin’s heart, and he, sensing that it was a declaration of war, grabbed d’Artagnan by the arm and said, “When the time comes, you’ll recognise that man, won’t you? The one who just went out.”

“Yes, My Lord,” d’Artagnan said. Then, turning to Porthos, he added. “The devil! I don’t like quarrels with men of the Church.”

Meanwhile, Gondy made his way out of the palace, bestowing blessings as he went, and savouring the pleasure of making his enemies’ servants fall on their knees. “Oh,” he muttered, passing through the palace gate, “what an ungrateful court – a perfidious court – a cowardly court! Tomorrow they’ll be laughing in a different tone.”

But while the courtiers at the Royal Palace outdid each other in transports of joy to entertain and exalt the queen, Mazarin, who was a man of sense, and who, moreover, had the foresight that comes from fear, wasted no time in vain and dangerous distractions: he left right behind the coadjutor, secured his account books, locked up his gold, and with workers he trusted, contrived new secret caches in the walls. On returning home, the coadjutor learned that a young man had arrived after his departure and now awaited him; he asked for the young man’s name and started with pleasure when he heard it was Louvières. He rushed to his office, where Broussel’s son was in fact waiting for him, still furious and bloodstained from his fight with the king’s guards. The only precaution he’d taken before coming to the archbishopric had been to leave his arquebus with a friend. The coadjutor went up to him and held out his hand. But the young man looked searchingly at him, as if trying to plumb the depths of his heart. “My dear Sir Louvières,” said the coadjutor, “please believe that I am personally moved by the tragedy that’s come upon you.”

“Is that true? Do you mean it sincerely?” asked Louvières.

“From the bottom of my heart,” Gondy said.

“In that case, My Lord, the time for words has passed, and the hour for action has come. My Lord, if you will it, within three days my father will be out of prison, and within six months you will be a cardinal.”

The coadjutor flinched. “Oh, let’s speak frankly!” said Louvières. “Let’s put all our cards on the table. One doesn’t hand out thirty thousand crowns in alms, as you’ve done in the past six months, from pure Christian charity – no one is that good. You are ambitious: you’re a man of genius, and you want your worth to be recognised. As for what I feel, I hate the Court, and at this moment my sole desire is for vengeance. Give us the clergy and the working poor, I’ll bring you the bourgeoisie and the Parliament, and with these four elements, Paris will be ours within a week. And then believe me, Sir Coadjuteur, the Court will give us out of fear what they won’t give out of benevolence.”

The coadjutor looked at Louvières with his piercing gaze, and said, “But, Sir Louvières, don’t you know that what you’re proposing is nothing less than civil war?”

“You’ve been preparing for that for a long time, My Lord, so that should be welcome to you.”

“Regardless,” said the coadjutor, “you understand that what you propose requires reflection?”

“How much time are you asking for?”

“Twelve hours, Sir. Is that too long?”

“It’s noon; I’ll be back here at midnight.”

“If I haven’t returned by then, wait for me.”

“Good! At midnight then, My Lord.”

“At midnight, my dear Sir Louvières.”

Left alone, Gondy summoned all the curates with whom he was in contact. Two hours later, he had assembled the thirty priests whose parishes were the most populous, and thus the most contentious, in Paris. Gondy related the insults he’d suffered at the Royal Palace, and the mockeries of Bautru, the Count Villeroi, and the Marshall de La Meilleraie. The curates asked him what was to be done. “It’s very simple,” the coadjutor said. “You are the conscience of the people. Well! You must undermine the culture of respect and fear of kings. Tell your congregations that the queen is a tyrant, and repeat, forcefully so that everyone knows, that all the evils France suffers come from Mazarin, her lover and her corrupter. Begin this work today, this very hour, and within three days I hope to see results. Now, if any of you have useful advice to give me, stay behind and I’ll be pleased to listen.”

After the others had left three priests remained, the curates of Saint-Merri, of Saint-Sulpice, and of Saint-Eustache. “You think you have better ways to help me than your colleagues?” Gondy asked.

“We hope so,” the curates replied.

“Come, let’s start with you, priest of the parish of Saint-Merri.”

“My Lord, I have in my parish a man who might be of great service to you.”

“Who is this man?”

“A merchant of the Rue des Lombards who has great influence over the local tradesmen.”

“What is he called?”

“He’s named Planchet; he started a riot all by himself about six weeks ago but afterward, since they were out to hang him, he’s disappeared.”

“And can you find him again?”

“I hope so. I haven’t heard that he was arrested, and since I’m his wife’s confessor, if she knows where he is, I’ll know too.”

“Very well, Sir Curé, seek out this man, and if you find him, bring him to me.”

“At what time, My Lord?”

“At six o’clock, if you can.”

“I’ll bring him to see you at six o’clock, My Lord.”

“Go then, my dear Curate, and God go with you!”

The curate departed. “And you, Sir?” Gondy said, turning to the Curate of Saint-Sulpice.

“I, My Lord,” said the latter, “know a man who’s done great things for one of the popular princes. He’d make an excellent rebel captain, and I can place him at your disposal.”

“What do they call this man?”

“Sir Count Rochefort.”*

“Yes, I know him too – but unfortunately he isn’t in Paris.”

“My Lord, he’s in Rue Cassette.”

“Since when?”

“Since about three days ago.”

“Why hasn’t he come to see me?”

“They told him ... My Lord will pardon me...”

“Of course. Speak.”

“He heard My Lord was negotiating with the Court.”

Gondy bit his lips. “He was mistaken. Bring him to me at eight o’clock, Sir Curé, and may God bless you as I bless you!”

The second curate bowed and departed. “It’s your turn, Sir,” said the coadjutor, turning to the remaining curate. “Do you have something to offer me as good as those two?”

“Better, My Lord.”

“The devil! Take care not to exaggerate; the one offered me a merchant, the other a count. Do you offer me a prince, then?”

“My Lord, I offer you a beggar.”

“Indeed!” said Gondy, reflecting. “You’re right, Sir Curé – I could use someone who could rouse that legion of the poor who choke the streets of Paris, who could make them shout out loud enough for all France to hear that it was Mazarin who reduced them to beggary.”

“I have just the man.”

“Bravo! And who is this man?”

“A simple beggar, as I said, My Lord, who for some years has asked alms by dispensing holy water on the steps of the Church of Saint-Eustache.”

“And you say he has influence over his fellow beggars?”

“Is My Lord aware that begging is an organised occupation, a sort of association of those of no association, to which each contributes a share and reports to a chief?”

“Yes, I’d heard that,” replied the coadjutor.

“Well! This man I offer you is one of their syndics.”

“And what do you know of this man?”

“Nothing, My Lord, other than that he seems to me tormented by remorse.”

“What makes you think that?”

“On the twenty-eighth of each month he has me say a mass for the rest of the soul of a person who died a violent death; just yesterday I said this mass again.”

“What do you call him?”

"Maillard – but I don't think that's his real name."

"And do you think that right now we'd find him at his post?"

"Certainly."

"Let's go see your beggar, Sir Curé – and if he's all you say he is, then you're right, it's you who's brought me the real treasure."

Gondy dressed as a cavalier, wearing a large felt hat with a red plume, a long sword at his belt, and spurs buckled on his boots, then enveloped himself in a large cloak and followed the curate. The coadjutor and his companion traversed the streets between the archbishopric and the Church of Saint-Eustache, taking careful note of the temper of the populace. The people were aroused but like a swarm of bees uncertain of where to settle, and if no leadership was found for them, their buzzing would simply fade and die. Upon arriving at the Rue des Prouvaires, the curate pointed toward the square before the church. "There," he said, "see him, he's at his post."

Gondy looked and saw a poor man sitting on a cheap chair and leaning against a balustrade. He had a small bucket next to him and held a holy water sprinkler in his hand. "Does he have that spot by special privilege?" Gondy asked.

"No, My Lord," said the curate, "he made a deal with his predecessor for the position of holy water dispenser."

"A deal?"

"Yes, these positions are bought and sold. I believe he paid a hundred pistoles for it."

"So, this rascal is rich?"

"Some of these men die leaving behind twenty or thirty thousand crowns – or more."

"Huh!" said Gondy, laughing. "I didn't know my alms were such a good investment."

Meanwhile they were advancing into the square; when the curate and the coadjutor reached the base of the church stair, the beggar rose and lifted his aspergillum. He was a man of between sixty-five and seventy, small and portly, with grey hair and light eyes. His face was stamped with the struggle between two opposing principles, an evil nature constrained by sheer force of will, perhaps through repentance. On seeing the cavalier who accompanied the curate, he started slightly and stared, surprised. The curate and the coadjutor touched the holy water sprinkler with their fingertips and made the sign of the cross, and the coadjutor dropped a silver coin into the open hat sitting on the ground. "Maillard," said the curate, "we've come, sir and I, to speak with you for a moment."

"With me!" said the beggar. "This is quite an honour for a poor holy water dispenser." The man's voice was accented with a tone of irony he couldn't quite suppress, and which astonished the coadjutor. The curate, apparently accustomed to this tone, went on, "Yes, we wanted to get your opinion on the events of the day, and what you're hearing from people going in and out of the church."

The beggar shook his head. "These are sad times, Sir Curé, and as always, the poor people have the worst of it. As for what's being said, everyone is dissatisfied, and everyone complains but when you say everybody, you say nobody."

"Explain yourself, my friend," said the coadjutor.

"I say that all these cries, all these complaints and curses, are nothing but wind and thunder, and without a leader to steer the storm, no lightning will strike."

"My friend," said Gondy, "you seem like a clever fellow. If we had a little civil war, would you be inclined to place at the disposal of its leader, if we find one, the personal power and influence you have over your comrades?"

"Yes, Sir, provided this war was blessed by the Church, and thus could lead me to my goal that is the remission of my sins."

"This war will not only be blessed by the Church, it will be led by it. As for the remission of your sins, we'll have on our side the Archbishop of Paris, who has all the powers of the Court of Rome, and even Sir Coadjuteur, who can grant plenary indulgences; we could recommend you to him."

"Consider, Maillard," said the curate, "that I've vouched for you to sir, who is a powerful lord, so in a way I'm responsible for you."

"I know, Sir Curé, that you've always been very good to me," said the beggar, "so I'm inclined to serve you."

"And do you think your influence with your colleagues is as great as Sir Curé tells me it is?" asked Gondy.

"They hold me in a certain esteem," said the beggar with pride. "They'll do whatever I ask of them, and wherever I go, they'll follow."

"And do you think you could find for me fifty reliable and energetic men ready for a brawl, and able to shout, 'Down with Mazarin!' loud enough to bring down the walls of the Royal Palace as was done at Jericho?"

"I think," said the beggar, "we could undertake to do things even more difficult and significant than that."

"Ah!" said Gondy. "Could you undertake to build a dozen barricades overnight?"

"I could undertake to build fifty of them, and to defend them, when the time comes."

"For the love of God," said Gondy, "you speak with an assurance that pleases me, and since Sir Cure vouches for you..."

"I do," said the curate.

"Here's a purse containing five hundred pistoles in gold. Make all your arrangements and tell me where I can meet you this evening at ten o'clock."

"It would have to be a high place, from which we can see every quarter of Paris."

"Would you like me to have a word with the vicar of Saint-Jacques-la-Boucherie? He could let you up into the tower," said the curate.

"Perfect," said the beggar.

"Then till this evening, at ten o'clock," said the coadjutor. "And if I'm satisfied with you, you'll have another purse of five hundred pistoles."

The beggar's eyes shone with a gleam of greed, quickly suppressed. "Until tonight, Sir," he said. "Everything will be ready." He took his chair, pail, and aspergillum and stored them in the church, dipped some holy water from the basin as if he had no confidence in his own, and went on his way.

219

The Tower of Saint-Jacques-la-Boucherie

By a quarter to six, Sir Gondy had made all his arrangements and had returned to the archbishop's palace. At six o'clock the Curate of Saint-Merri was announced. The coadjutor noticed that he was followed by another man. "Come in," he said.

The curate entered, with Planchet right behind him. "My Lord," said the Curate of Saint-Merri, "this is the person whom I had the honour to tell you about."

Planchet bowed with the air of a man familiar with genteel houses. "Are you disposed to serve the cause of the people?" Gondy asked.

"I certainly am," said Planchet. "I'm a Frondeur to the soul. I stand before you, My Lord, a man condemned to be hanged."

"For doing what?"

"From the hands of Mazarin's officials, I liberated a noble lord whom they were escorting back to the Bastille where he'd languished for five years."

"His name?"

"Oh, My Lord knows him well! It was the Count Rochefort."

"Ah! Yes indeed!" said the coadjutor. "I've heard talk of this affair – you raised the whole quarter, I was told."

"Very nearly," said Planchet with a satisfied air.

"And your situation is...?"

"Confectioner, Rue des Lombards."

"Explain to me how it happens that, coming from such a gentle occupation, you have such warlike inclinations?"

"How is it that My Lord, a man of the Church, receives me now dressed as a cavalier, with a sword at his side and spurs on his boots?"

"My faith! Not bad!" said Gondy, laughing. "But you know I've always had warlike inclinations despite my clerical calling."

"Well, My Lord, before I was a confectioner, I spent three years as a sergeant in the Piedmont Regiment, and before that for eighteen months I was lackey to Sir d'Artagnan."

"The Lieutenant of Musketeers?" Gondy asked.

"The same, My Lord."

"But who's said to be loyal to Mazarin?"

"Uh..." stammered Planchet.

"What are you trying to say?"

"Nothing, My Lord. Sir d'Artagnan is in the service, so Sir d'Artagnan obeys Mazarin, who pays him, just as we bourgeois Frondeurs attack Mazarin, who robs us."

"You're a smart fellow, my friend but are you reliable?"

"I think Sir Curé can vouch for that," said Planchet.

"Indeed but I'd prefer to hear it from your own mouth."

"You can count on me, My Lord, if it's a matter of inciting a riot in the streets."

"That's exactly what this is. How many men do you think you could assemble in a night?"

"Two hundred muskets and five hundred halberds."

"If we had just one man in each quarter who could do the same, by tomorrow we'd have a mighty army."

"That's so."

"Would you be willing to follow the orders of the Count Rochefort?"

"I'd follow him into hell – which is no small statement, considering I think he's capable of getting there."

"Bravo!"

"What sign shall we use to distinguish friend from enemy?"

"Have every Frondeur wear a knot of straw in his hat."

"Good. I'll spread the word."

"Do you need money?"

"Money never hurts, My Lord – if we don't have any, we'll do without but if we have some, things will go better and faster."

Gondy went to a coffer and pulled out a sack. "Here are five hundred pistoles," he said. "If the action goes well, count on receiving a similar sum tomorrow."

"I'll give My Lord a faithful accounting of how it's spent," said Planchet, tucking the sack under his arm.

"If it's an accountant you want to follow, I recommend the cardinal to you."

"Nevertheless, it's in good hands."

Planchet went out but the curate stayed behind for a moment. "Are you satisfied, My Lord?" he said.

"Yes, he seems like a dependable rascal."

"He'll deliver even more than he promises."

"If so, he's a wonder."

And the curate left to rejoin Planchet, who was waiting for him on the stairs. Ten minutes later the Curate of Saint-Sulpice was announced. As soon as the door to Gondy's office was opened a man rushed in – the Count Rochefort. "So, it is you, my dear Count!" said Gondy, holding out his hand.

"Have you finally decided you're with us, my Lord?" asked Rochefort.

"I always was," said Gondy.

"Then we won't mention it again – if you say so, I believe you. We're going to invite Mazarin to a ball."

"Well ... I hope so."

“And when shall the dancing begin?”

“The invitations were sent out tonight,” said the coadjutor, “but the violins won’t begin to play until tomorrow.”

“You can count on me, plus fifty soldiers promised me by the Knight d’Humières whenever I need them.”

“Fifty soldiers?”

“Yes, he’s raising recruits that he’ll lend to me; when the dance is over, I’ll find a way to replace any losses.”

“Very good, my dear Rochefort – but that’s not all.”

“What else is there?” asked Rochefort, smiling.

“Sir Beaufort,* what is he doing?”

“He’s in the Vendômois, where he’s waiting until I write and tell him it’s time to return to Paris.”

“Write to him; it’s time.”

“Then you’re sure about this business?”

“Yes but he should hurry: once the people of Paris are in revolt, we’ll have ten princes who want to place themselves at their head. If he’s late, he’ll find someone else in his place.”

“Can I tell him that comes straight from you?”

“Yes, absolutely.”

“And can I tell him he can count on your support?”

“Completely.”

“And you’ll put him in charge?”

“Of the war, yes – but as to policy…”

“You know that’s not his strong suit.”

“He must allow me to bargain for my cardinal’s hat as I think best.”

“Why do you want one?”

“Since I must wear a hat that isn’t a helmet,” said Gondy, “I at least want it to be red.”

“There’s no need to argue about shapes and colours,” said Rochefort with a laugh. “I’ll answer for his consent.”

“You’ll write to him tonight?”

“I’ll do better than that – I’ll send a messenger.”

“How long will it take him to get here?”

“Five days.”

“Let him come. He’ll find things have changed.”

“So I hope.”

“I’ll answer for it.”

“What now?”

“Go assemble your fifty men and stand ready.”

“For what?”

“For anything.”

“Is there a rallying sign?”

“A straw knot on the hat.”

“Very good. Goodbye, My Lord.”

“Goodbye, my dear Rochefort.”

“Ah, Mazarin! Mazarin!” said Rochefort, trailed by his curate, who hadn’t been able to get a word into the conversation. “Now you’ll see if I’m too old to be a man of action!”

It was half past nine, and it took a half hour to go from the archbishopric to the tower of Saint-Jacques-la-Boucherie. The coadjutor noticed a light glimmering in one of the highest windows of the tower.

“Good,” he said, “our syndic is at his post.”

He knocked, and they opened the door for him. The vicar himself led him up, lighting the way to the top of the tower; arriving there, he opened a small door, set the lantern in a corner so the coadjutor could find it upon leaving, and went back down. Though the key was in the door, the coadjutor knocked. “Enter,” came a voice the coadjutor recognised as that of the beggar.

Gondy entered, and indeed there was the holy water dispenser of the Saint-Eustache square, reclining on a sort of pallet. Upon seeing the coadjutor come in, he rose. Ten o’clock sounded. “Well!” said Gondy. “Have you kept your word?”

“Not exactly,” said the beggar.

“What do you mean?”

“You asked me for five hundred men, yes?”

“Yes – well?”

“Well! I will have two thousand.”

“That’s no boast?”

“Would you like proof?”

“I would.”

Three candles were burning, each in front of a different window, one facing the Île de la Cité, the second toward the Royal Palace, the third toward Rue Saint-Denis. The man went silently to each of these candles and, one by one, blew them out. The coadjutor found himself in darkness, the room lit only by the uncertain rays of a moon lost among the clouds, edging their dark masses with silver.

“What did you do?” the coadjutor asked.

“I’ve given the signal.”

“To do what?”

“To raise the barricades.”

“Ah!”

“When you leave here you’ll see my men at work. Take care not to break your legs by tripping over a chain or falling into a trench.”

“Good! Here’s a sum equal to what you received before. Now remember that you’re a leader and stay away from drink.”

“For the last twenty years I’ve drunk nothing but water.”

The man took the purse from the coadjutor, who could hear him handling it and feeling the coins within. “Ah ha!” Gondy said to himself. “You are a greedy rascal, after all.”

The beggar sighed and put the purse down. “Will I never change?” he said. “Will I never be able to set aside the man I was? What vanity! What misery!”

“But you’ll take it, won’t you?”

“Yes, though I swear a vow before you now that whatever remains afterward will be spent in pious works.” His face was pale and drawn like that of a man who has fought an inner battle.

“Strange man!” Gondy murmured.

He picked up his hat but turning to go he saw the beggar between him and the door. His first thought was that the man meant him some harm – but the beggar only clasped his hands and fell to his knees. “My Lord,” he said, “before you leave, give me your blessing, I pray you.”

“My Lord?” Gondy said. “My friend, you’ve mistaken me for someone else.”

“No, My Lord, I take you for who you are, that is, Sir Coadjuteur. I knew you at first glance.”

Gondy smiled. “And you want my blessing?” he said.

“Yes. I need it.”

The beggar said these words in a tone of humility so great and of repentance so profound, that Gondy extended his hand and gave him his blessing with all the unction at his command. “Now there is communion between us,” said the coadjutor. “I have blessed you, and you are sacred to me, as I am to you. Come, have you committed any crime for which human justice pursues you, and from which I can protect you?”

The beggar shook his head. “My crime, My Lord, is not a matter for human justice, and you can only help me by freely blessing me as you have.”

“Come, be frank with me,” said the coadjutor. “You haven’t always followed your current calling?”

“No, My Lord, only for the last six years.”

“What did you do before that?”

“I was in the Bastille.”

“And before you were in the Bastille?”

“I will tell you, My Lord, on the day you hear my confession.”

“Very well. Remember that at whatever hour of the day you choose to present yourself, I’ll be ready to give you absolution.”

“Thank you, My Lord,” the beggar said in a low voice, “but I’m not yet ready to receive it.”

“Very well. Goodbye then.”

“Goodbye, My Lord,” said the beggar, opening the door and bowing before the prelate. The coadjutor picked up the lantern and went down the stairs, leaving the supplicant to himself.

220
The Riot

It was about eleven o’clock at night. Gondy had scarcely gone a hundred steps along the streets of Paris when he saw that strange changes were underway. The whole city seemed inhabited by spectres, silent shadows that could be seen flitting down the streets, or dragging and overturning carts, while others dug trenches deep enough to swallow entire companies of cavalry. All these energetic figures toiled away busily, like demons performing some unknown labour. These were the beggars of the Court of Miracles, the agents of the holy water dispenser of Saint-Eustache, preparing the barricades for the following day. Gondy regarded these men of the darkness, these nocturnal labourers, with a certain terror; he wondered if, having summoned these unclean creatures from their lairs, he would have the power to compel them to return there. When one of these figures neared him, he was moved to make the sign of the cross. He reached Rue Saint-Honoré and went along it toward the Rue de la Ferronnerie. There, the situation changed: merchants were going from shop to shop, closing shutters and locking doors, opening them only long enough to admit men trying to conceal what they were carrying – shopkeepers bringing spare weapons to lend to those who had none. One individual went from door to door, bending under a stack of swords, harquebuses, muskets, and weapons of every kind that he deposited as he went along. As he passed near a lantern, the coadjutor recognised Planchet. The coadjutor returned to the river by the Rue de la Monnaie; along the quays, groups of citizens in cloaks of black or grey, depending on whether they were of the upper or lower bourgeoisie, stood waiting, while isolated individuals passed from one group to another. All these grey or black cloaks bulged out behind with the point of a sword, or in front with a harquebus or musket. On arriving at the Pont Neuf, the coadjutor found that the bridge was guarded. A man approached him and asked, “Who are you? I don’t recognise you as one of us.”

“Then you fail to recognise your friends, my dear Sir Louvières,” said the coadjutor, raising his hat. Louvières saw who it was and bowed.

Gondy crossed the river and turned toward the Tour de Nesle. There, he saw a long line of people filing past the city wall. One might have taken them for a procession of phantoms, for they were all enveloped in white cloaks. At a certain point, these men seemed to vanish one after another. Gondy drew closer and watched them disappear into the earth from the first to the last. The final phantom looked up as if to make sure that he and his companions weren't observed, and saw Gondy watching from the shadows. This phantom marched right up to him and put a pistol to his head. "Hey, Sir Rochefort," said Gondy with a laugh. "Let's not get too playful with the firearms."

Rochefort recognised the voice. "Ah! Is it you, My Lord?" he said.

"Myself. What are these people doing entering the bowels of the earth?"

"They're my fifty recruits from the Knight d'Humières, who are wearing white cloaks as they're destined for the light horse."

"Where are they going?"

"We're assembling in the underground studio of a sculptor friend of mine, going in through the trap door where they bring in the slabs of marble."

"Fine," said Gondy.

And he shook hands with Rochefort, who followed his men down and closed the trap door behind him. The coadjutor returned home. It was one o'clock in the morning. He opened his window and leaned out to listen. An uncanny ferment, unprecedented, unknown, sounded from the city. One could hear echoing down the streets, dark and hollow, something strange and terrible. From time to time a rumbling like a distant storm or rising swell could be heard but there was nothing clear, nothing distinct, nothing intelligible about it. It was like that mysterious and subterranean growling said to precede earthquakes. The work of preparing for revolt lasted all night. The next day Paris, upon awakening, seemed to tremble at her own appearance. It was like a city under siege. Armed men stood at the barricades, their eyes menacing, their muskets at the ready; passwords, slogans, interrogations, and arrests were what passers-by encountered in every block. Those with plumed hats and gilded swords were stopped and made to cry out, "Long live Broussel! Down with Mazarin!"—

And any who resisted this ceremony were booed, spat upon, and even beaten. No one was killed as yet but the desire to do so was evident. The barricades had been pushed almost to the Royal Palace. From the Rue des Bons-Enfants to Rue de la Ferronnerie, from Rue Saint-Thomas-du-Louvre to the Pont Neuf, from Rue Richelieu to the Saint-Honoré gate, there were more than ten thousand men under arms, the most forward of whom called challenges to the impassive sentinels of the regiment of guards placed in defensive positions around the Royal Palace, the gates of which were closed behind them that made their situation precarious. In between the barricades there circulated, in bands of a hundred or more, ragged and desperate men bearing banners that read, Behold the misery of the people! Wherever these folk passed, shouts and frantic cries went up — and there were many such bands roaming the streets. Upon arising, Anne of Austria and Mazarin were astonished when they were informed that the city that had been tranquil the evening before, now trembled with fever and emotion; neither of them would believe the reports until they witnessed it with their own eyes and ears. An outer window was opened for them: they saw, they heard, and were convinced. Mazarin shrugged his shoulders and pretended to dismiss this fever of the populace but he paled visibly, and, at the first opportunity, rushed to his study, where he shut himself up with his gold and jewels, running his hands over the finest of his diamonds. As for the queen, furious and left to her own devices, she summoned Marshall de La Meilleraie and ordered him to take as many men as he pleased and go find out the meaning of this nonsense. The marshal was both adventurous and arrogant, displaying that disdain for the commoners typical of men of the sword. He took a hundred and fifty men and tried to march out by the Louvre Bridge but he encountered the barricades built by the beggar of Saint-Eustache. They were guarded, not only by armed men but also by women and children. Master Friquet, owner of a pistol and a sword given him by Louvières, had organised a band of rascals like himself, and if nothing else they made a lot of noise. The marshal thought these defences less well guarded than the others and tried to force them. He ordered twenty men to dismount and storm the first barricade, while he and the rest of the mounted troop protected the assailants. The twenty men marched right up to the obstacle but from behind the beams, through the cart wheels, from the windows on either side, came a terrible fusillade. At the sound of this musketry, Planchet's halberdiers appeared at the corner of the Cemetery of the Innocents while Louvières's bourgeois came up the Rue de la Monnaie. The Marshall de La Meilleraie was taken between two fires. But the marshal was brave, and resolved to die where he stood. His men gave back blow for blow and screams of pain began to rise from the crowd. The guards, better trained, dealt out more damage but the citizens so outnumbered them they began to drop beneath a veritable hurricane of iron. Casualties fell so fast it was almost like Rocroi or Lérída. Fontrailles, the marshal's aide-de-camp, had his arm broken, and his horse took a ball in the neck, the pain of which drove it nearly mad and made it impossible to control. It was at this climactic moment, when even the bravest felt a thrill of fear and a cold sweat, that the crowd opened up toward the Rue de l'Arbre-Sec, shouting, "Vive le Coadjuteur!" Gondy appeared, in a surplice and hood of chainmail, and walked serenely into the midst of the fusillade, distributing blessings left and right as calmly as if he were conducting the Procession of Corpus Christi. Everyone fell on their knees. The marshal recognised Gondy and rushed up to him. "Get me out of here, in the name of heaven," he said, "or I and all my men are going to lose our skins." There was such a clamour that in the midst of it not even thunder could have been heard. Gondy raised his hand to demand silence. Everyone fell quiet. "My children," he said, "this is the Marshall of La Meilleraie whose actions you have misunderstood. He intends, upon returning to the Louvre, to ask the queen in your name for the release of our Broussel. You agree to this, don't you, Marshal?" added Gondy, turning to La Meilleraie.

"Morbleu!" the latter cried. "Agree to it? I should think so! I never hoped to get off so cheaply."

"He gives you his word as a gentleman," said Gondy.

The marshal raised his hand in sign of assent. "Long live the coadjutor!" the crowd shouted. Some even added, "Long live the marshal!" But then everyone returned to the refrain: "Down with Mazarin!"

The crowd drew back. The Rue Saint-Honoré was the shortest route, so the barricades were opened, and the marshal and his remaining troops retreated, led by Friquet and his rascals, some pretending to beat on drums while others imitated trumpets. It was almost a triumphal march — except that the barricades closed again behind them. The marshal gnawed on his knuckles. Meanwhile, as we've said, Mazarin was in his study, putting his affairs in order. He had sent for d'Artagnan but in all the tumult he didn't expect to see him, since d'Artagnan wasn't on duty. But after about ten minutes the lieutenant appeared in the doorway, followed by his inseparable Porthos. "Ah! Come in, sir d'Artagnan," cried the cardinal, "and be welcome, your friend as well. But what's going on in this damned Paris?"

"What's going on, My Lord? Nothing good," said d'Artagnan, shaking his head. "The city is in open revolt, and just now, as I was crossing Rue Montorgueil with your servant Sir du Vallon, in spite of my uniform — or maybe because of my uniform — they tried to get us to shout, 'Long live Broussel!' And can I tell you, My Lord, what else they wanted us to shout?"

"Tell me."

"Down with Mazarin! And my faith, that was the more popular cry."

Mazarin smiled but became very pale. "And did you shout it?" he said.

"My faith, no," said d'Artagnan. "I was not in good voice, and Sir du Vallon, who has a cold, also refused to shout. Then, My Lord..."

"Then what?" asked Mazarin.

"Take a look at my hat and my cloak." And d'Artagnan showed him four bullet holes in his cloak and two in his hat. As for Porthos's clothing, a halberd had slashed open the side of his doublet, and a pistol shot had cut short his plume.

"Diavolo!" said the cardinal thoughtfully, regarding the two friends with genuine admiration. "Even I would have shouted it."

At that moment the tumult seemed to grow nearer. Mazarin wiped his forehead and looked around. He wanted to go to the window but didn't dare. "See what's going on, Sir d'Artagnan," he said.

D'Artagnan went to the window with his usual nonchalance. "Oh ho!" he said. "What have we here? Marshall de La Meilleraie is returning without his hat, Fontrailles has his arm in a sling, I see wounded guards, horses covered in blood ... but wait! What are the sentries doing? They're presenting arms and preparing to fire!"

"They've been ordered to fire upon the people," said Mazarin, "if the people approach the Royal Palace."

"But if they fire, all is lost!" cried d'Artagnan.

"We still have the gates."

"The gates! They'll have those down inside of five minutes, torn right from their hinges! Don't shoot, Mordieu!" d'Artagnan cried, opening the window.

Despite this desperate cry that, in all the clamour, hadn't even been heard, three or four musket shots sounded out, and in reply there was a terrible fusillade. They heard the patter of musket balls on the façade of the Royal Palace, and one passed under d'Artagnan's arm and shattered a mirror, at which Porthos glanced complacently. "Ohimé!" cried the cardinal. "My Venetian glass!"

"Oh, My Lord," said d'Artagnan, quietly closing the window, "don't bother weeping now, it's not worth it, since inside of an hour, in all likelihood, there won't be a single mirror still intact in the Royal Palace, whether Venetian or Parisian."

"But what should we do, then?" said the cardinal, trembling.

"Why, morbleu! You'd better give them Broussel, since that's what they demand. What the devil do you want with a Councillor of Parliament anyway? He's good for nothing."

"And you, Sir du Vallon, is that your advice? What would you do?"

"I'd give up Broussel," said Porthos.

"Come, come, Gentlemen," cried Mazarin, "I must speak of this matter to the queen."

At the end of the corridor he paused. "I can count on you, can't I, Gentlemen?" he said.

"We don't give our loyalty twice," said d'Artagnan. "We're committed to you and will follow your orders."

"Good!" said Mazarin. "Wait here in this office." And turning aside, he went into the salon by a different door.

221

The Riot becomes a Revolt

The office in which d'Artagnan and Porthos were waiting was separated from the queen's salon by nothing but tapestry doors. This thin partition made it possible to hear everything that was passing within, while the gap between the curtains, narrow though it was, made it possible to see. The queen stood in the centre of her salon, pale with anger but her self-control was so great that but for her pallor, one would have said she was quite undisturbed. Behind her were Comminges, Villequier, and Guitaut, while beyond them were her lords and ladies. In front of her, Chancellor Séguier — the same man who, twenty years before, had so persecuted her — recounted how his carriage had been upset, how he'd been pursued into the Hôtel d'O, and how that house had been immediately invaded, plundered, and devastated. Luckily, he'd had time to get into a closet behind a tapestry, where an old woman had hidden him and his brother the Bishop of Meaux. But the danger had been so real, as madmen searched the house shouting threats, that the chancellor had believed his hour had come, and he'd confessed himself to his brother, so he'd be prepared for death if discovered. Fortunately, that hadn't happened, and the mob, believing he'd gotten out by some back door, marched off and gave him a chance to escape. He'd disguised himself by dressing in some of the Marquis d'O's clothes and had left the hôtel, stepping over the bodies of an officer and two guards who had died defending the door to the street. During this account, Mazarin had come in, quietly glided over next to the queen and listened. "And so?" the queen asked the chancellor once he'd finished. "What do you have to say about this?"

"I think the situation is very serious, Madam."

"But what advice do you have for me?"

"There is a course I would propose to Your Majesty but I dare not."

"Oh, be daring, Sir," said the queen with a bitter smile. "You have dared other things."

The chancellor reddened and stammered out a few words. "This has nothing to do with the past, just the present," said the queen. "You said you have some advice to give me. What is it?"

"Madam," said the chancellor, hesitating, "it would be to release Broussel."

The queen, already pale, turned even paler, and her face contorted. "Release Broussel!" she said. "Never!"

At that moment steps were heard in the antechamber, and without being announced, the Marshall de La Meilleraie appeared on the threshold. "Ah! There you are, Marshal!" Queen Anne cried joyfully.

"You've taught that rabble to see reason, I hope?"

"Madam," said the marshal, "I've left three men dead on the Pont Neuf, four at Les Halles, six at the corner of the Rue de l'Arbre-Sec, and another two at the gates of the palace, fifteen in all. I have ten or twelve wounded. My hat is I know not where, carried away by a bullet, and in all probability, I'd be with my head if it wasn't for Sir Coadjuteur, who came and got me out of that mess."

"Ah!" said the queen. "I would have been surprised not to find that bow-legged hound mixed up in this."

"Madam," said La Meilleraie with a laugh, "don't speak ill of him in front of me, I beg, for the service he's done me is still too recent."

"Very well," said the queen, "be grateful to him all you like but that doesn't bind me. You're safe and sound, and to me that's what matters. Your safe return is very welcome to us."

"Yes, Madam – but I've been allowed to return on one condition that is that I convey to you the will of the people."

"Their will!" said Anne of Austria, frowning furiously. "Oh, Sir Marshall, you must have found yourself in great danger indeed to accept so strange a mission!"

These words were pronounced with an accent of irony that didn't escape the marshal. "Your pardon, Madam," said the marshal. "I'm not a diplomat, I'm a man of war, so perhaps I don't weigh my words well; I should have said the desire of the people, and not their will. As to the reply with which you honoured me, I believe you were implying that I was afraid."

The queen smiled. "Well! Yes, Madam, I was afraid. This is only the third time in my life it's happened though I've been in a dozen pitched battles and I don't know how many fights and skirmishes; yes, I was afraid, and I'd rather be here facing Your Majesty, no matter how threatening your smile, than facing those demons from hell who chased me back here, and who come from I know not where."

"Bravo!" said d'Artagnan quietly to Porthos. "Well answered."

"Well, then!" said the queen, biting her lips, while the courtiers looked on in astonishment. "What is this desire of my people?"

"To release Broussel, Madam," said the marshal.

"Never!" said the queen. "Never!"

"Your Majesty commands," said La Meilleraie, bowing and taking a step back.

"Where are you going, Marshal?" said the queen.

"I go to take Your Majesty's response to those who await it."

"Stay here, Marshal – I don't wish to appear to be parleying with rebels."

"Madam, I have given my word," said the marshal.

"Which means what?"

"That unless you arrest me, I'm compelled to return to them."

Anne of Austria's eyes flashed like lightning. "Oh! If it comes to that, Sir," she said, "I've arrested greater men than you. Guitaut!"

Mazarin hastened forward. "Madam," he said, "if I might dare to offer some advice..."

"If it's also to release Broussel, Sir, you may dispense with it."

"No," said Mazarin, "Though that advice might be as good as any."

"What is it, then?"

"It's to call for Sir Coadjuteur."

"The coadjutor!" cried the queen. "That miserable troublemaker! He's the one who's behind the entire revolt."

"All the more reason," said Mazarin. "If he did it, he can undo it."

"And here's the opportunity," said Comminges, who was near a window and looking out, "because there he is, giving blessings in the square outside the Royal Palace."

The queen rushed to the window. "It's true!" she said. "Look at him, the great hypocrite!"

"What I see is that everyone kneels to him although he's just a coadjutor," said Mazarin, "while if I were out there they'd tear me to pieces, even though I'm a cardinal. I persist, then, in my desire" – Mazarin emphasised the word – "that Your Majesty receive the coadjutor."

"Why not just say it's your will?" replied the queen in a low voice.

Mazarin just bowed. The queen stood thoughtfully for a moment. Then, raising her head, she said, "Sir Marshall, go find the coadjutor and bring him to me."

"And what shall I say to the people?" asked the marshal.

"To have patience," said Anne of Austria, "as I've had!"

In the voice of the proud Spaniard there was an accent so imperious that the marshal refrained from a reply; he bowed and went out. D'Artagnan turned toward Porthos and said, "How do you think this will end?"

"We'll see soon enough," said Porthos, calm as ever.

Meanwhile Anne of Austria went to Comminges and spoke to him in a whisper. Mazarin, uneasy, glanced toward where he knew d'Artagnan and Porthos were. The other advisors exchanged words in low voices. The door reopened, and the marshal reappeared, followed by the coadjutor. "Here's, Madam," said the marshal, "Sir Gondy who hastens to comply with Your Majesty's orders."

The queen took a couple of steps toward him and stopped, cold and stern as a statue, her lips curled in disdain. Gondy bowed respectfully. "Well, Sir," said the queen, "what's the meaning of this riot?"

"It's no longer just a riot, Madam," the coadjutor replied, "it's a revolt."

"The revolt is on the part of those who think my people can revolt!" cried Anne, unable to contain herself before the coadjutor, whom she seemed to regard as the one responsible for the disturbance.

"Those who incite such unrest may dignify it with the name of revolt but just wait – the authority of the king will soon restore order."

"Is it to tell me that, Madam," Gondy replied coldly, "that Your Majesty has admitted me to the honour of her presence?"

"No, my dear Coadjutor," said Mazarin, "it's to ask your advice in the unfortunate situation in which we find ourselves."

"Can it be true," said Gondy, feigning astonishment, "that Her Majesty has summoned me to ask for my advice?"

"Yes," said the queen. "I wish it."

The coadjutor bowed. "Then Her Majesty desires..."

"That you tell her what you would do in her place," Mazarin hastened to reply.

The coadjutor looked at the queen, who signified her assent. "In Her Majesty's place," Gondy said coldly, "I wouldn't hesitate: I'd release Broussel."

"And if I don't release him," the queen snapped, "what do you think will happen?"

"I think Paris will be rubble by tomorrow," said the marshal.

"I didn't ask you," said the queen drily, without even turning around, "I asked Sir Gondy."

"If it's me Her Majesty is asking," replied the coadjutor in the same tone, "I would say that I'm of the same opinion as the marshal."

The blood mounted to the queen's face, and her beautiful blue eyes seemed ready to start from her head; her rosy lips, compared by all the poets of the time to flowers in bloom, turned pale and trembled in rage. She very nearly frightened even Mazarin, accustomed as he was to her furies. "Release Broussel!" she finally spat with a frightful smile. "Fine advice, my faith! It's obvious it comes from a priest!"

Gondy stood firm. The insults of this day seemed to have no more effect on him than the mockeries of the day before – but hatred and desire for revenge were glowing like burning coals in the bottom of his heart. He looked coldly at the queen who nudged Mazarin to get him to add something. Mazarin, as usual, thought a great deal but said little. "Hmm," he said, "good, friendly advice. I, too, would release Sir Broussel, dead or alive, and that would be an end to it."

"If you release him dead, everything will be at an end, My Lord, though perhaps not in the way you mean," said Gondy.

"Did I say dead or alive?" replied Mazarin. "It's just a manner of speaking. You know I'm not as good with French, spoken or written, as you are, Sir Coadjuteur."

"Here's a real Council of State," said d'Artagnan to Porthos, "but we've had better than this at La Rochelle, with Athos and Aramis."

"At the Saint-Gervais bastion," said Porthos.

"There, and elsewhere."

The coadjutor allowed the brief shower of sarcasm to pass, and then replied, still in his calm tone, "Madam, if Your Majesty doesn't appreciate the advice I submit to her, doubtless it's because she has better advice to follow; I know too well the wisdom of the queen and her advisors to expect that they'll leave the city for long in a state so troubled that it might lead to revolution."

"So, in your opinion," replied the royal Spaniard with a sneer, biting her lips in anger, "the riot of yesterday that is a revolt today, may tomorrow become a revolution?"

"Yes, Madam," the coadjutor said gravely.

"To hear you tell it, Sir, the people have no self-restraint."

"It's a bad year for kings," said Gondy, shaking his head. "Look at England, Madam."

"Yes but fortunately we have no Oliver Cromwell* in France," the queen replied.

"Who knows?" said Gondy. "Such men are like lightning, unexpected till they strike."

Everyone shuddered, and there was a moment of silence. Meanwhile, the queen had both hands resting on her chest, and one could see that she was trying to steady her own heartbeat. "Porthos," murmured d'Artagnan, "take note of this priest."

"All right, I see him," said Porthos. "Well?"

"Well! There stands a man."

Porthos looked at d'Artagnan with surprise; it was obvious he didn't quite understand what his friend was telling him. "Your Majesty intends to take such measures as suits herself," continued the coadjutor, pitilessly. "But I predict their nature will be such as to only infuriate the rebels even further."

"In that case you, Sir Coadjuteur, who have such influence over them, and who are our friend," said the queen ironically, "will calm them by giving them your blessings."

"Perhaps it will be too late," said Gondy, still icy, "and perhaps I will have no more influence – whereas by releasing Broussel, Your Majesty removes the excuse for rebellion, and gains the right to cruelly punish any recurrences of revolt."

"Do I not have that right already?" cried the queen.

"If you have it – use it," Gondy replied.

"Plague!" said d'Artagnan to Porthos. "That's the sort of character I like. If only he were my minister, and I were his officer, instead of my being attached to Mazarin. Ah, Mordieu! What great things we would do!"

"Yes," said Porthos.

The queen, with a gesture, dismissed her Court, except for Mazarin. Gondy bowed and began to withdraw with the others but the queen said, "Remain, Sir."

"Good," Gondy said to himself, "she's going to yield."

"She's going to have him killed," said d'Artagnan to Porthos. "But if she does, I won't be the one to do it. I swear to God that on the contrary, if anyone comes to attack him, I'll fall on them myself."

"Me too," said Porthos.

"Good!" murmured Mazarin, taking a seat. "Now we'll see something new."

The queen watched her people go, following them out with her eyes. When the last one had closed the door, she turned. One could see what efforts she was making to contain her anger; she fanned herself, inhaled some perfume, and walked up and down. Mazarin remained seated, apparently thinking. Gondy, who'd begun to get uneasy, scanned the tapestries and curtains, tapped the cuirass he wore under his long robe, and checked from time to time to make sure the good Spanish dagger he also had under his robe was easy to get at. "Now," said the queen, pausing at last, "now we're alone, repeat your advice, Sir Coadjuteur."

"Here it is, Madam: to feign reflection, and then publicly acknowledge having made a mistake, a mark of a strong government; then let Broussel out of prison and return him to the people."

"Oh!" cried Anne of Austria. "To humiliate me so! Am I not the queen? Are those howling rabble my subjects or not? Have I no friends, no guards? Ah! By Our Lady, as Queen Catherine used to say," she continued, her voice rising, "before I'll give up this insolent Broussel, I'll strangle him with my own hands!"

And she shook her clenched fists at Gondy who at that moment she hated at least as much as she hated Broussel. Gondy remained motionless; not a muscle on his face even twitched – but his icy glance crossed like a sword with the furious gaze of the queen. "There stands a dead man, if there was still someone like Vitry at Court, and he came in at this moment," said the Gascon. "But before he could reach this good prelate, I'd kill such a Vitry on the spot! And Cardinal Mazarin would be infinitely grateful to me."

"Hush!" said Porthos. "Listen."

"Madam!" cried the cardinal, drawing Anne of Austria back. "Madam, what are you doing?" Then he added in Spanish, "Anne, are you crazy? You're fighting with a churchman – you, a queen! Don't you see that you have before you, in the person of this priest, all the people of Paris, whom it's dangerous to insult, especially now, since if he wills it, he could have your crown within the hour! Another day, another time, you will stand firm and strong but this is not that time. Today you will flatter and cajole, not quarrel like a fishwife."

At the first words of this speech d'Artagnan had taken Porthos by the arm and squeezed it gradually tighter, only letting go when Mazarin was through. "Porthos," he whispered, "never mention in Mazarin's hearing that I understand Spanish, or I'm a dead man, and so are you."

"Fine," said Porthos.

This sharp reprimand, marked by the eloquence characteristic of Mazarin when he spoke Italian or Spanish, and which he completely lacked in French, was spoken with such an impassive expression on his face that Gondy, skilled at reading people though he was, thought Mazarin was just warning her to be more moderate. The queen, thus sharply rebuked, quickly turned milder; she let the fire in her eyes die down, her flush paled away, and she swallowed the angry words on her lips. She sat down, dropped her arms to her sides, and said in a voice edged with tears, "Pardon me, Sir Coadjuteur, and blame my outburst on my suffering. I'm a woman, and subject to the weaknesses of my sex; I'm terrified of civil war but as a queen accustomed to obedience, I can't abide contradiction."

"Madam," said Gondy with a bow. "Your Majesty would be wrong to reject my sincere advice. Your Majesty has only submissive and respectful subjects. It's not the queen the people oppose, they just want Broussel, that's all. If Your Majesty releases Broussel, they'll be only too happy to live under Your Majesty's laws," Gondy added, smiling.

At the words, It's not the queen the people oppose, Mazarin thought the coadjutor was going to mention their oft-repeated cry of "Down with Mazarin!" He was grateful when Gondy didn't, and said, with an imploring expression and in his silkiest voice, "Madam, do believe the coadjutor, who's one of our most able politicians. The first available cardinal's hat seems made to order for him."

"Ah!" Gondy said to himself. "I see how badly you need me, you cunning rogue!"

"And what will he promise us," whispered d'Artagnan, "on the day they want us to kill Gondy? Plague, if he gives out red hats so easily, get ready, Porthos, as we're each going to ask for a regiment tomorrow. God! If the civil war only lasts a year, I'll get them to revive the Sword of the Constable for me!"

"And for me?" said Porthos.

"For you? I'll see that you get the marshal's baton of Sir La Meilleraie, since it looks like he's going to be out of favour."

"So, Sir," said the queen, "you seriously fear a popular uprising?"

"To be serious, Madam – I do," said Gondy, astonished at how little progress he was making. "When a flood breaks through a dike, it can cause terrible damage."

"And I," said the queen, "think that in that case, we must build new dikes. I will consider; you may go."

Gondy looked at Mazarin in astonishment. Mazarin approached the queen to speak to her. Just then a terrible tumult erupted outside the gates of the Royal Palace. Gondy smiled, the queen's eyes kindled, and Mazarin paled. "Now what?" he said.

At that moment Comminges rushed into the salon. "Pardon, Madam," he said to the queen as he entered, "but the people have crushed the sentries against the gates and are starting to force them open. What are your orders?"

"Listen, Madam," said Gondy.

The roar of waves, the crash of thunder, the rumblings of a volcano were nothing compared to the tempest of cries that now arose. "What are my orders?" said the queen.

"Yes, time is short."

"How many men do you have in the Royal Palace?"

"Six hundred."

"Put a hundred men around the king, and with the rest sweep away this rabble."

"Madam," said Mazarin, "what are you doing?"

"Go!" said the queen.

With the passive obedience of a soldier, Comminges left. Just then a horrible, grinding crash was heard, as one of the gates gave way. "Ah, Madam!" said Mazarin. "You're gonna ruin us all – you, me, and the king." Anne of Austria, at this cry of fear from the depths of the cardinal's soul, at last grew afraid as well, and called back Comminges. "It's too late!" said Mazarin, tearing his hair. "It's too late!" The other gate fell and they could hear the people howling with glee. D'Artagnan drew his sword and gestured to Porthos to do the same. "Save the queen!" cried Mazarin to the coadjutor. Gondy rushed to the window and opened it; he recognised Louvières at the head of a mob of maybe three or 4000 men. "Not another step!" he shouted. "The queen will sign!"

"What are you saying?" cried the queen.

"The truth, Madam," said Mazarin, presenting her with a pen and paper. And he added, "Sign it, Anne, please – I beg of you."

The queen collapsed on a chair but took the pen and signed. Contained by Louvières, the people had paused but the terrible growl of their anger continued. Above her signature, the queen wrote, "The Concierge of the Prison of Saint-Germain's to set Councillor Broussel at liberty."

The coadjutor who devoured her every movement with his eyes, grabbed the paper as soon as she was done, returned to the window and waved it, saying, "This is the order!"

All Paris seemed to draw breath, and then cry out in joy, "Long live Broussel! Long live the coadjutor!"

"Long live the queen!" said the coadjutor.

But few took up the cry. And perhaps the coadjutor only made it to emphasise to Anne of Austria her weakness. "And now that you've what you came for, Sir Gondy," she said, "go."

"When the queen needs me," said the coadjutor, bowing, "Her Majesty knows that I'm at her service."

The queen nodded and Gondy withdrew. "Ah! Cursed priest!" cried Anne of Austria, shaking her fist toward the door that had scarcely closed. "One day I'll make you drink from the poisoned draught you poured out for me today."

Mazarin tried to approach her. "Be gone!" she said. "You are no man!"

And she went out. "It's you who're no woman," murmured Mazarin.

Then, after a moment's thought, he remembered that d'Artagnan and Porthos were at hand and must have heard everything. He frowned, went to the tapestry door and opened it – but the chamber beyond was empty. At the queen's final words, d'Artagnan had grabbed Porthos by the arm and dragged him out to the gallery. In his turn, Mazarin came out to the gallery, where he found the two friends walking up and down. Mazarin said, "Why did you leave the antechamber, Sir d'Artagnan?"

"Because the queen ordered everyone to leave," said d'Artagnan, "and I thought that order included us as well as the others."

"Then you've been here for..."

"For about a quarter of an hour," said d'Artagnan, giving Porthos a look telling him not to contradict him.

Mazarin noticed this look and was convinced that d'Artagnan had seen and heard everything but was grateful for the falsehood. "Decidedly, Sir d'Artagnan," he said, "you're the man I've been looking for, and you can count on me to be your friend." Then, gracing the two friends with his most charming smile, he returned quietly to his study, for with the departure of Gondy, the tumult had ceased as if by magic.

222

Misfortune aids the Memory

Anne had stormed off to her private chapel. "What!" she cried, flailing her beautiful arms "The people saw Sir Condé, the First Prince of the Blood," arrested by my mother-in-law, Marie de Médicis; they saw my mother-in-law, their former regent, driven out by Cardinal Richelieu;* they saw Sir Vendôme, the son of Henry IV, imprisoned in Vincennes; they said nothing while all these great persons were threatened, insulted, and imprisoned – but they rise up for Broussel! Jesus, what is the point of royalty?"

Anne had touched on the burning question of the day. The people had said nothing for the princes but they'd arisen for Broussel. It was because he was a commoner, and in defending Broussel, the people instinctively knew they defended themselves. Meanwhile, Mazarin was pacing back and forth in his study, glancing from time to time at the splintered shards of his Venetian mirror. "Eh!" he said.

"It's sad to have to yield this way but bah! We'll have our revenge. What does one Broussel matter, more or less? He's just a symbol, not a faction."

Mazarin, able politician though he was, had got it wrong this time: Broussel was more than just a symbol. The next morning, when Broussel made his entry into Paris in a splendid carriage, with his son Louvières beside him and Friquet riding up behind, all the armed citizens rushed to see him pass. The cries of "Vive Broussel! Long live our father!" arose on all sides, and sounded like impending death to Mazarin; the reports of the cardinal's many spies brought nothing but bad news that made the minister grow anxious and the queen grow very quiet. Her Majesty appeared to be nerving herself up to some great resolve that only made the cardinal more worried. For he knew that proud princess and feared the resolve of Anne of Austria. The coadjutor had returned to parliament more of a monarch than the king, queen, and cardinal put together; on his advice, an edict of parliament had invited the citizens to lay down their arms and demolish the barricades. Of course, they knew that the people could re-arm themselves in an hour and the barricades could be rebuilt overnight. Planchet returned to his shop. The victory was as good as an amnesty, and he had no more fear of being hanged. He was convinced that if an attempt was made to arrest him, the people would rise up for him as they had for Broussel. Rochefort returned his troop of light horse to the Knight d'Humières; at the roll call two were found missing but the knight, who was a Frondeur at heart, refused all offers of indemnity. The beggar had resumed his post in the plaza outside Saint-Eustache, once more distributing his holy water with one hand while asking for alms with the other – and no one suspected those hands of having pried at the foundation stones of the edifice of royalty. Louvières was satisfied and proud; he'd taken his revenge upon Mazarin, whom he detested, he'd been instrumental in getting his father released from prison, his name was now repeated in terror at the Royal Palace, and he said with a laugh when the councillor was once more among his family, "Do you think, Father, that if I asked the queen for the command of a regiment that now she'd give it to me?"

D'Artagnan took advantage of the moment of calm to send off Raoul, whom he'd had difficulty in keeping indoors during the riot, when he'd been eager to draw his sword for one side or the other. The lad had been stubborn about it until d'Artagnan had invoked the name of the Count La Fère. Raoul first paid a visit to Madam de Chevreuse and then departed to rejoin the army. Rochefort alone was sorry the affair was over – he'd sent to the Duke Beaufort to come to Paris, and the duke would arrive to find the city tranquil. He went to the coadjutor to ask if he thought the prince should be met on the road and turned around; Gondy thought for a moment, and then said, "Let him come anyway."

"Then it's not over yet?" Rochefort asked.

"Over! My dear Count, it's barely begun."

"What makes you think that?"

"My understanding of the queen's heart: she won't stand for being beaten."

"Is she preparing something?"

"I hope so."

"But what do you know?"

"I know that she wrote to Sir Prince to return from the army in haste."

"Oh ho!" Rochefort said. "You're right, we must encourage Sir Beaufort to come."

That very evening, word went around that the Prince de Condé had arrived. There was nothing strange about this but the news made a great impression. Madam de Longueville, it was said, had been indiscreet, repeating some confidences made to her by Sir Prince, whom gossip accused of having for his sister a tenderness beyond the bounds of fraternal friendship. These secrets involved some sinister plans on the part of the queen. On the evening of the Prince de Condé's arrival, some of the more radical high-ranking citizens, aldermen and ward captains, got together and said, "Why shouldn't we take charge of the king and install him in the Hôtel de Ville? It's a mistake to leave him to be raised by our enemies, who fill his head with bad advice. Now if the coadjutor was his mentor, he'd absorb more tolerant principles, and learn to love the people."

That night was busy with furtive activity, and the morning saw the return of the grey and black cloaks, the bands of beggars, and patrols of armed merchants. The queen had spent the night in private conference with Sir Prince, who had been admitted to her chapel at midnight and had stayed there until five in the morning. Then the queen went to the cardinal's study. She'd been up all night but he was already awake and at work. He was writing a reply to Cromwell, 6 days having already passed of the ten he'd asked Mordaunt to wait. "I may've kept him waiting," he said to himself, "but Cromwell knows something of revolutions and will understand."

As he reread with satisfaction the first paragraph of his letter, a scratching came from the door of the passage that led to the queen's chambers. Anne of Austria was the only one who'd use that door, so the cardinal got up to open it. The queen hadn't yet dressed but undress suited her, for, like Diane de Poitiers and Ninon de Lenclos, Anne of Austria had the gift of looking beautiful in every condition – and that was never truer than on this morning, when her eyes were radiant with an inner joy. "What is it, Madam?" asked Mazarin, inwardly anxious. "You seem bursting with pride."

“Yes, Giulio,” she said, “pride and happiness, for I’ve found the means to slay the hydra.”

“Then you are a great politician, my Queen,” said Mazarin. “Tell me of this means.”

And he slid the unfinished letter under another sheet. “You’ve heard they want to take the king from us?” said the queen.

“Yes – and hang me while they’re at it!”

“They shall not have the king.”

“And they certainly won’t hang me, very well.”

“Listen: I myself will spirit my son away, and you with us. It will change the face of things overnight – but I want it done without warning, unknown in advance to anyone but you, me, and a third person.”

“And who is this third person?”

“Sir Prince.”

“So, he’s arrived, as I’d heard?”

“Last night.”

“And you’ve seen him?”

“I just left him.”

“He’s ready to assist this project?”

“It was his idea.”

“And Paris?”

“We starve the city and force it at length to surrender.”

“The proposal isn’t without grandeur but you may have overlooked something.”

“What?”

“The fact that it’s impossible.”

“Nonsense. Nothing is impossible.”

“In theory.”

“And in execution! How much money do we have?”

“A little,” said Mazarin, trembling for fear that Anne of Austria might empty his purse.

“How many troops?”

“Five or six thousand.”

“And have we no courage?”

“Plenty of that.”

“Then we’ll do it, and easily. Oh, can’t you see it, Giulio? Paris, wretched Paris, awakening in the morning to find king and queen gone, the city surrounded, besieged, starving, with no one to turn to but that stupid parliament and their bow-legged coadjutor!”

“Yes, very pretty – it’s a lovely dream. I just don’t see any way of making it a reality.”

“I’ll find a way!”

“You’re talking about war, civil war: furious, relentless, and implacable.”

“Oh, yes, it’s war, all right” said Anne of Austria. “I want to reduce this rebellious city to ashes; I want to extinguish the fire with blood; I want to punish their crimes with a terrible example. Paris! I hate it. I detest it!”

“Gently, Anne; how bloodthirsty you are! Take care, these aren’t the days of Malatesta and Castruccio Castracani who plunged all Italy into bloody strife. You’ll get yourself decapitated, my sweet Queen, and that would be a shame.”

“You laugh.”

“I laugh very little at war, especially against an entire nation. Look at your brother-in-law Charles I* – he’s in a bad way, very bad.”

“We’re in France. And I am Spanish.”

“All the worse for us, for Bacchus. I’d like it better if you were French, and me too, for that matter. They wouldn’t hate us so much.”

“However – do you approve of my plan?”

“Yes, if I could see how it was possible.”

“It is, I’ll answer for it. Get ready to depart.”

“Me! I’m always ready to depart – only, you know, I never actually go. And this time is probably no different than the others.”

“Well, if I go, will you go with me?”

“I’ll try.”

“You’re killing me with your fears, Giulio. What is it you’re afraid of?”

“A lot of things.”

“Such as?”

Mazarin’s expression that had been mocking, turned sombre. “Anne,” he said, “you’re a woman, and as a woman you can insult men as you please, sure you can do so with impunity. You accuse me of being afraid – but I’m not as fearful as you, for I wasn’t planning to run. Whose downfall does the mob cry out for? Who is it they want to hang – you or me? Nonetheless, I stand up to the storm – not with bravado, that’s not my style – but I hold out. Yet you call me afraid. Imitate me: less noise, more effect. You make loud declarations but nothing comes of them. And now you talk about fleeing!”

Mazarin shrugged, took the queen’s hand and led her to the window. “Look!”

“Well?” said the queen, blinded by obstinacy.

“Well, what do you see from this window? Those are, unless I’m mistaken, your subjects out there wearing cuirasses and helmets and armed with good muskets, like in the days of the Catholic League – and they’re staring right at this window. If you lifted the curtain a bit, you’d be recognised. Now, look out this other window: what do you see? Armed Parisians just outside your gates. You’d see the same thing from any other window in this palace: your gates are guarded, as are your postern doors, your sally ports, even the vents of your cellars. I say to you what La Ramée told Sir Beaufort: unless you’re a bird or a mouse, you cannot get out.”

“But Beaufort got out, didn’t he?”

“Do you plan to get out the same way he did?”

“Then ... I’m a prisoner?”

“For God’s sake! Isn’t that what I just proved to you?”

And Mazarin sat down and quietly went back to work on his letter, picking up from where he’d been interrupted. Anne, flushed and trembling with anger and humiliation, left the study, slamming the door hard behind her. Mazarin did not even turn his head. Returning to her chambers, the queen threw herself into an armchair and began to cry. Then she was struck by a sudden idea. “I’m saved!” she said, arising. “Of course! Yes, I know a man who can get us out of Paris, a man I’ve forgotten for far too long.” Alight with joy, she said, “Ingrate that I’m, for twenty years I’ve forgotten this man whom I should have made a Marshal of France. My mother-in-law lavished gold, titles, and caresses on Concini who plotted against her; the king my husband made Vitry a Marshal of France for assassinating Concini; but I, I left in obscurity and misery that noble d’Artagnan who saved me.” She rushed to a table where she found paper, ink, and began to write.

223

The Interview

That morning d’Artagnan was in Porthos’s room, still asleep. Sharing a room was a habit the two old friends had resumed since the disturbances had begun. Their swords were under their pillows, and their pistols were on a table near at hand. D’Artagnan was dreaming that the sky was covered by a great glowing cloud, and from this cloud fell a rain of gold that he was catching in his hat. Porthos, meanwhile, was dreaming that his carriage’s door panel wasn’t large enough to contain the coat of arms he was having painted on it. They were awakened at seven o’clock by a valet wearing no livery who brought a letter for d’Artagnan. “From whom?” asked the Gascon.

“From the queen,” replied the valet.

“Hey!” said Porthos, rising on his bed. “What does it say?”

D’Artagnan asked the valet to wait in the next room, and as soon as the door was closed he leapt from his bed and quickly read the letter, while Porthos watched with wide eyes, not daring another question. “Friend Porthos,” said d’Artagnan, handing him the letter, “here’s your title of baron and my promotion to captain. Read it and see if I’m wrong.” Porthos reached out, took the letter, and read in a trembling voice:

The queen wishes to speak with Sir d’Artagnan who’s to follow the bearer of this letter.

“Well!” said Porthos. “I see nothing here out of the ordinary.”

“Whereas I see much that is extraordinary,” said d’Artagnan. “If I’m summoned, it’s because there’s going to be trouble. Consider what upheaval must have taken place in the mind of the queen to make her suddenly remember me after twenty years.”

“You’re right,” said Porthos.

“Sharpen your sword, Baron, load your pistols, and ready your horses, as I foresee big news by tomorrow. And keep this quiet!”

“Oh that! But are you sure this isn’t some kind of a trap to get rid of us?” said Porthos, always worried that others might feel threatened by his future greatness.

“If it’s a trap, rest assured, I’ll smell it,” said d’Artagnan. “Mazarin may be an Italian but I’m a Gascon.” And d’Artagnan dressed himself in less than a minute. As Porthos, still in bed, reached for his cloak, there came another knock at the door. “Come in,” said d’Artagnan.

A second valet entered and handed d’Artagnan a second letter, saying, “On the behalf of His Eminence Cardinal Mazarin.”

D’Artagnan looked at Porthos. “This is awkward,” said Porthos. “Who do you answer first?”

“No, it’s perfect,” d’Artagnan said. “His Eminence summons me to an appointment in half an hour.”

“Good.”

“My friend,” said d’Artagnan, turning to the valet, “tell His Eminence that in half an hour I’ll be at his command.”

The valet bowed and went out. “It’s lucky he didn’t see the other valet,” d’Artagnan said.

“Then you don’t think the two have sent to you for the same meeting?”

“I not only don’t think so, I’m certain of it.”

“Then go, d’Artagnan, and quickly! The queen is waiting for you – and after the queen, the cardinal. And after the cardinal, me!”

D’Artagnan called back Anne of Austria’s valet. “I’m ready, friend,” he said. “Lead on.”

The valet took him by way of the Rue des Petits-Champs, where, turning left, he led him through a small door into a garden adjacent to Rue Richelieu, where they entered a secret staircase that brought d’Artagnan to the queen’s chapel. A certain unexpected emotion made the lieutenant’s heart beat faster. He no longer had the blind confidence of youth, and experience had taught him the gravity of involvement in events like this. He understood the power of princes and the majesty of kings, and the insignificance of his family and fortune in comparison. Once he would have approached Anne of Austria as a young man going to pay his respects to a lady; but now he went to her as a humble soldier does to a commander. A slight noise broke the silence of the chapel, and d’Artagnan started as a white hand drew back a tapestry – a hand white in colour and beautiful in shape, a royal hand he recognised and once had kissed. The queen entered. “It’s you, Sir D’Artagnan,” she said, regarding the officer with a look of affectionate melancholy, “it’s you – I know you well. Look at me, I am the queen – do you recognise me?”

“No, Madam,” replied d’Artagnan.

“But don’t you recall,” continued Anne of Austria, in that sweet tone she could adopt when it pleased her to do so, “how a queen once needed a brave and devoted young cavalier, and found that cavalier, and who, though he might have believed that she’d forgotten him, kept him in a place in the bottom of her heart?”

“No, Madam, I don’t recall that,” said the musketeer.

“So much the worse, Sir,” said Anne of Austria, “so much the worse, at least for the queen, for that queen once again has need of that bravery and devotion.”

“What!” said d’Artagnan. “The queen, surrounded as she is by servants so devoted, by counsellors so wise, by men so mighty in merit and position, deigns to cast her eyes on an obscure soldier!”

Anne understood this veiled reproach but she was more moved than angered by it. The Gascon gentleman’s patient and unselfish service had long been an unacknowledged humiliation for her, and she was outdone by his generosity. “Everything you say about those around me, Sir d’Artagnan, may perhaps be true,” said the queen, “but you are the only one I can trust. I know you serve the cardinal but serve me as well, and I will make your fortune. Come, would you do for me today what the cavalier you don’t recall once did for his queen?”

“I am at the orders of Your Majesty,” said d’Artagnan.

The queen reflected for a moment on the circumspect attitude of the musketeer. “Perhaps you prefer ease and repose?” she said.

“I wouldn’t know, Madam – I’ve never had any.”

“Do you have any comrades?”

“I’d three: two have left Paris and gone I know not where. Only one’s still with me – but he’s one of those who knew, I think, the cavalier of whom your Majesty’s done me the honour to speak.”

“Very well,” said the queen. “You and your friend are worth an army.”

“What must I do, Madam?”

“Come back at five o’clock and I’ll tell you – but in the meantime, Sir, don’t tell a living soul about that rendezvous.”

“No, Madam.”

“Swear it by Christ.”

“Madam, I never lie once I’ve given my word; if I say no, I mean no.”

The queen, though astonished by such language, so different from what she heard from her courtiers, took it as a sign of the zeal d’Artagnan would apply to the accomplishment of her plan. It was an occasional artifice of the Gascon’s to hide his deep subtlety under a guise of brusque loyalty. “The queen has no further orders for the moment?” he said.

“No, Sir,” replied Anne of Austria, “and you may retire until the time I’ve appointed.”

D’Artagnan bowed and went out. “The devil!” he said once he had passed through the door. “There seems to be a great need for me around here.”

Then, as the half hour had passed, he went across the gallery and knocked on the cardinal’s door. Bernouin* let him in. “I’ve come at your orders, My Lord,” d’Artagnan said to the cardinal. As was his custom, he took a quick glance around the room, noticing that Mazarin had a sealed letter before him – but it was placed face down on the desk, so it was impossible to see to whom it was addressed.

“You’ve just come from the queen?” said Mazarin, looking directly at d’Artagnan.

“Me, My Lord? Who told you that?”

“No one – but I know it.”

“I’m sorry to tell my Lord he’s mistaken,” the Gascon replied shamelessly in accord with the promise he had just made to Anne of Austria.

“I was at the door of the antechamber and saw you coming from the end of the gallery.”

“That’s because I was brought in by the secret staircase.”

“Why was that?”

“I don’t know; there may have been some mistake.”

Mazarin knew how hard it was to get d’Artagnan to talk when he did not want to so he decided to set aside for later the mystery of whatever the Gascon was hiding. “Let’s discuss my affairs,” said the cardinal, “since you’ll tell me nothing about yours.” D’Artagnan bowed. “Do you like travelling?” asked the cardinal.

“I’ve spent my life on the high roads.”

“There’s nothing to keep you here in Paris?”

“Nothing but the orders of my superior.”

“Good. Here’s a letter that must be delivered to a certain address.”

“An address, My Lord? But it’s none.”

And in fact, the side opposite the seal was blank. “That’s because it’s a double envelope,” said Mazarin.

“I understand – I must open the outer one only after I’ve arrived at a given place.”

“Exactly. Take it and go. You’ve a friend, Sir du Vallon whom I like very much – take him as well.”

“The devil!” d’Artagnan said to himself. “He knows we overheard his conversation yesterday and wants to get us out of Paris.”

“You hesitate?” asked Mazarin.

“No, my Lord, I leave at once. There’s only one thing I request…”

“What’s that? Speak.”

“It’s that Your Eminence should go to the queen.”

“When?”

“Right away.”

“To do what?”

“Just to say this: ‘I have sent Sir d’Artagnan somewhere and asked him to leave immediately.’”

“So, I see,” said Mazarin, “that you have met with the queen.”

“I had the honour to tell Your Eminence that it’s possible there’d been some mistake.”

“What does that mean?” Mazarin asked.

“Shall I renew my request of His Eminence?”

“Very well, I’ll go. Await me here.”

Mazarin checked carefully to make sure none of the keys had been left in the strongbox locks and went out. Ten minutes elapsed, during which d’Artagnan did everything he could to try to read the address of the inner envelope through the fabric of the outer, to no avail. Mazarin returned, pale and deeply preoccupied, and sat at his desk. D’Artagnan examined his expression as closely as he had the dispatch but the envelope of the cardinal’s face was as impenetrable as the envelope of the letter. “Uh-oh,” the Gascon said to himself, “he looks angry. Is it toward me? He’s considering – is he thinking of clapping me in the Bastille? Good luck, My Lord! At the first order you issue to do so, I’ll strangle you and turn Frondeur. They’ll carry me in triumph like Sir Broussel, and Athos will proclaim me the French Brutus. That would be funny.”

The Gascon, with his ever-active imagination, had already carried his hypothetical situation to its end. However, Mazarin gave no such order but on the contrary said, in a cajoling tone, “You’re quite right, my dear Sir d’Artagnan, you can’t leave us so soon.”

“Ah!” said d’Artagnan.

“Return to me that dispatch if you please.”

D’Artagnan obeyed. Mazarin assured himself the seal was still intact. “I’ll need you this evening,” he said. “Come back in eight hours.”

“In eight hours, My Lord,” said d’Artagnan, “I’ve an appointment that I can’t fail to keep.”

“Don’t worry about that,” said Mazarin, “it’s all the same business.”

Good! D’Artagnan thought. I suspected as much.

“Return then at five o’clock and bring with you that dear Sir du Vallon – only leave him in the antechamber, as I’ll want to speak to you alone.”

D’Artagnan bowed, saying to himself, “The same order from both, at the same hour and the same place, the Royal Palace – I get it. Ah, now here’s a secret Sir Gondy would pay a hundred thousand livres for.”

“You have a concern?” said Mazarin anxiously.

“Yes, I was wondering if we should come armed or not.”

“Armed? To the teeth!” said Mazarin.

“Very well, My Lord, we shall be.” D’Artagnan bowed, went out, and hurried back to his friend to report on the interview, including Mazarin’s flattery and promises that made Porthos very happy.

224

The Escape

When d’Artagnan returned at five in the evening, the Royal Palace, despite the signs of agitation in the city, presented a cheerful appearance. This wasn’t surprising: the queen had given up Broussel and Blancmesnil to the people, so the queen had nothing more to fear, as the people had nothing more to ask. But inside her emotions were still overwrought, a disturbance that would take some time to dissipate, as after an ocean storm it sometimes takes several days for the swell to subside. There had been a grand formal dinner, the pretext for which had been the return of the victor of Lens. The princes and princesses had all been invited, and their carriages had crowded the courtyard since midday. After dinner, there was to be gaming in the queen’s apartments. Anne of Austria was charming that day, graceful and witty, and had never been seen in better humour. The joy of vengeance to come shone in her eyes and on her lips. As soon as they rose from the dinner table, Mazarin slipped away. D’Artagnan was already awaiting him in the antechamber. The cardinal arrived chuckling, took d’Artagnan by the hand and drew him into his study. “My dear Sir d’Artagnan,” said the minister, sitting down, “I will show you the greatest mark of confidence a minister can give an officer.”

D’Artagnan bowed. “I hope,” he said, “that My Lord grants it to me without hesitation, and in the conviction that I’m worthy of it.”

“The worthiest of all, my dear friend, since it’s to you that I give it.”

“Well,” said d’Artagnan, “I must admit, My Lord, that I’ve been waiting so long to hear that, I hope you’ll speak quickly and delay no longer.”

“This evening, my dear Sir d’Artagnan,” replied Mazarin, “you’re going to have the security of the entire state in your hands.”

He paused. “Please explain, My Lord. I’m waiting.”

“The queen has decided to take the king on a short trip to Saint-Germain.”

“Ah!” said d’Artagnan. “What you mean is, the queen has decided to leave Paris.”

“A feminine caprice – you understand.”

“Oh, I understand very well,” d’Artagnan said.

“That was why she sent for you this morning and asked you to return at five o’clock.”

“So much for going to all that trouble to have me swear not to mention the appointment to anyone!” murmured d’Artagnan. “Ah, the women! Even when they’re queens, they’re still women.”

“Do you disapprove of this little sojourn, my dear Sir d’Artagnan?” asked Mazarin anxiously.

“Me, My Lord?” said d’Artagnan. “Why do you ask?”

“You shrugged your shoulders.”

"That's just my habit when talking to myself, My Lord."

"Then you approve of this journey?"

"I neither approve nor disapprove, My Lord – I follow orders."

"Good – because you're the one I've chosen to get the king and queen safely to Saint-Germain."

"A double deceit," d'Artagnan said to himself.

"So, you see," continued Mazarin, trying to penetrate d'Artagnan's impassivity, "that as I said, the security of the State will be in your hands."

"Yes, My Lord, and I feel all the responsibility of such a charge."

"You accept, though?"

"I always accept."

"You think the thing is possible?"

"Everything is possible."

"Will you be attacked on the way?"

"It seems likely."

"How will you handle that?"

"I'll ride through the attackers."

"What if you can't get through them?"

"If I can't go through them, I'll go over them."

"And you'll bring the king and queen safe and sound to Saint-Germain?"

"Yes."

"On your life?"

"On my life."

"You're a true hero, my dear!" said Mazarin, looking admiringly at the musketeer.

D'Artagnan smiled.

"And me?" said Mazarin after a moment of silence, looking fixedly at d'Artagnan.

"What about you, My Lord?"

"What if I want to go along?"

"That ... would make it harder."

"How so?"

"Your Eminence might be recognised."

"Even wearing this disguise?"

And he lifted a cloak from an armchair, under which was a complete cavalier's outfit of pearl grey and garnet with silver lace. "If Your Eminence is disguised, the matter is easier."

"Ah!" said Mazarin with a sigh of relief.

"But it means that Your Eminence must do what he said he'd have done the other day in our situation."

"What do I have to do?"

"Shout, 'Down with Mazarin!'"

"I can shout that."

"In French, in good French, My Lord, taking care with the accent. They killed six thousand Angevins in Italy because they spoke bad Italian. Be careful so the French don't take their revenge for the Sicilian Vespers."

"I'll do my best."

"There are a lot of armed men in the streets," continued d'Artagnan. "Are you sure no one else knows about the queen's plan?"

Mazarin reflected.

"It would be a pretty risky affair if this matter fell into the hands of a traitor, My Lord. The trip you propose would provide an opportunity for the worst sort of mischief."

Mazarin shuddered – That's an implied threat? – But then considered that a man who planned treachery wouldn't say so. "No," he said briskly. "I rely on just no one and the proof's that I've chosen you to escort me."

"You're not going with the queen?"

"No," said Mazarin.

"You plan to go after the queen does?"

"No," Mazarin said again.

"Oh ho!" said d'Artagnan who was beginning to understand.

"Yes, I have my own plans," the cardinal continued. "If I go with the queen, I double her danger; if I follow the queen, I double my own. Besides, the Court, once saved, might forget about me – the great can be so ungrateful."

"That's true," said d'Artagnan, glancing in spite of himself at the queen's diamond ring on Mazarin's finger.

Mazarin noticed this look and gently turned the ring's stone inside. "I wish, then," said Mazarin with his handsome smile, "to keep them from being ungrateful to me."

"It's just Christian charity not to lead one's neighbour into temptation," said d'Artagnan.

"And that's exactly why I want to leave ahead of the others," said Mazarin.

D'Artagnan smiled; he was the sort of man who could appreciate the Italian's trick. Mazarin saw him smile and took advantage of the moment. "Then you'll undertake to get me out of Paris first, my dear Sir d'Artagnan?"

"That's no easy task, My Lord!" said d'Artagnan, resuming his serious air.

"But," Mazarin said, looking at him attentively, "you made no such objections regarding the king and the queen."

"The king and the queen are my queen and my king, My Lord," the musketeer replied. "My life is theirs; I belong to them. What they ask of me, I do – without objection."

"That's fair," Mazarin said quietly. "As your life isn't mine, then, I must buy it from you, no?" And with a heavy sigh, he began to rotate the ring's diamond back out. D'Artagnan smiled. These two men had one thing in common: cleverness. If on top of that they'd only had courage in common, they would have done great things together. "You understand then," said Mazarin, "that if I ask this service of you, it's with the intention to be grateful for it."

"Does My Lord have only the intention?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Here," said Mazarin, pulling the ring from his finger. "Here, my dear Sir d'Artagnan, is a diamond that once belonged to you; it's only right that it should return. I beg of you, take it."

D'Artagnan didn't put Mazarin to the trouble of insisting; he took it, inspected the stone to make sure it was the same, recognised the purity of its water, and placed it on his finger with profound pleasure.

"I was ... very attached to it," said Mazarin, giving it a last look. "But no matter, I'm very pleased to give it to you."

"And I, My Lord, am very pleased to receive it," said d'Artagnan. "Come, let's talk about your little affair. You want to leave before everyone else?"

"Yes, I do."

"At what time?"

"At ten o'clock?"

"And the queen, when does she leave?"

"At midnight."

"Then it's possible – I'll get you out first, leave you outside the gates, and return to bring her."

"Wonderful but how can I get safely out of Paris?"

"Oh, as to that, leave it to me."

"You're in charge; bring as large an escort as you like." D'Artagnan shook his head. "But surely that's the safest way," said Mazarin.

"Maybe for you, my Lord but not for the queen."

Mazarin bit his lip. "Then how will we manage things?" he said.

"You must let me manage them, My Lord."

"Hmm!" said Mazarin.

"You must put me in full command of this exercise."

"Yes but..."

"Or find somebody else," said d'Artagnan, turning to go.

"Eh?" Mazarin said to himself. "I think he's leaving with my diamond." He called him back, in a cajoling voice: "Sir d'Artagnan, my dear Sir d'Artagnan."

"My Lord?"

"You'll answer for whatever happens?"

"I guarantee nothing – but I'll do my best."

"Your best?"

"Yes."

"Well, then! We must trust in that."

"At last," d'Artagnan said to himself.

"Then you'll come back at half past nine?"

"Will I find Your Eminence ready?"

"Entirely ready."

"Then we're agreed. Now, My Lord, will you take me to see the queen?"

"To what end?"

"I'd like to get Her Majesty's orders from her directly."

"She's directed me to give them to you."

"She might have forgotten something."

"You have to see her?"

"It's indispensable, My Lord."

Mazarin hesitated a moment but d'Artagnan remained implacable. "Let's go, then," said Mazarin. "I'll take you to see her but don't say a word about our conversation."

"What was said between us regards only us, My Lord," said d'Artagnan.

“You swear to say nothing?”

“I never swear, My Lord. I say yes or I say no, and as I’m a gentleman, I keep my word.”

“All right, I see I must trust you completely.”

“Believe me, My Lord, that’s the best possible course.”

“Come,” said Mazarin.

He conducted d’Artagnan to the queen’s chapel and told him to wait there. D’Artagnan didn’t have to wait long. Five minutes later the queen came into the chapel, still in her full regalia. Dressed thus she was still beautiful and seemed no older than thirty-five. “Ah, Sir d’Artagnan,” she said with a gracious smile. “I’m glad you insisted on seeing me.”

“I beg Her Majesty’s pardon,” said d’Artagnan, “but I thought it best to receive Madam’s orders directly.”

“You know what they concern?”

“Yes, Madam.”

“And you accept this mission I entrust to you?”

“Gratefully.”

“Very good. Be here at midnight.”

“I’ll be here.”

“Sir d’Artagnan,” said the queen, “I know your honest loyalty too well to speak to you now of my gratitude but I swear to you I will not forget this second service as I did the first.”

“I don’t know what any of that means; Her Majesty is entitled to decide what to forget, and what to remember.”

And d’Artagnan bowed. “Go, Sir,” said the queen with her most charming smile. “Go, and return at midnight.”

She gestured in farewell and d’Artagnan withdrew; but as he retired he glanced at the way the queen had come in and at the foot of the tapestry he saw the tip of a velvet shoe. “So,” he said to himself,

“Mazarin eavesdropped to see if I’d betray him. Truly, this Italian puppet doesn’t deserve the service of an honourable man.”

D’Artagnan was nonetheless punctual with his appointment, and at half past nine he entered the cardinal’s antechamber. Bernouin was waiting and showed him in to the study. He found the cardinal dressed as a cavalier; that kind of attire suited him, as we’ve said, and he wore it elegantly, though he was very pale and trembling slightly. “Just you?” said Mazarin.

“Yes, my Lord.”

“And the good Sir du Vallon, will he be joining us?”

“Yes, my Lord, he’s waiting at the carriage.”

“Where’s that?”

“At the Royal Palace’s garden gate.”

“Then we’re going in a carriage?”

“Yes, My Lord.”

“And with no other escort but you two?”

“Isn’t that enough? One of us would suffice!”

“In truth, my dear Sir d’Artagnan, you terrify me with your nonchalance,” said Mazarin.

“I’d have thought, on the contrary, that it would inspire confidence.”

“And Bernouin, am I not taking him?”

“There’s no room for him; he can follow with the others and rejoin Your Eminence later.”

“All right,” said Mazarin, “since I must do everything just the way you want.”

“My Lord, there’s still time to call it off, and Your Eminence is perfectly free to do so,” said d’Artagnan.

“No, no,” said Mazarin, “let’s be on our way.”

And they went down by the secret staircase, Mazarin holding onto the arm of d’Artagnan, who could feel him trembling. They crossed the courtyards of the Royal Palace, where a few carriages awaiting guests were still lingering, reached the garden, and found the little door. Mazarin tried to unlock it with a key he drew from his pocket but his hand trembled so much he couldn’t find the keyhole. “Let me,” said d’Artagnan. Mazarin gave him the key; d’Artagnan opened the door and put the key into his own pocket. He expected to need it when he returned. Beyond was the carriage, its footboard lowered and door open; Mousqueton stood at the door, with Porthos on the rear seat. “Get in, my Lord,” said d’Artagnan. Mazarin didn’t wait to be told twice; he leapt into the vehicle. D’Artagnan got in behind Mazarin, Mousqueton closed the door, and then climbed with many a groan up onto the carriage’s rear step. He had made some objections about coming along on the pretext that he was still suffering from his wound but d’Artagnan had said to him, “Stay if you like, my dear Sir Mouston but I warn you that tonight, Paris will burn.”

After that, Mousqueton had stopped complaining, and declared he was ready to follow his master and Sir d’Artagnan to the ends of the world. The carriage set off at a steady trot, though not so fast as to imply that its passengers were in a hurry. The cardinal wiped his forehead with a handkerchief and looked around. He had Porthos on his left and d’Artagnan on his right, each guarding a door and serving as a rampart. Facing them, on the front seat, were two pairs of pistols, one before Porthos and the other before d’Artagnan. Both men held their swords beside them. A hundred paces from the Royal Palace the carriage was stopped by a people’s patrol. “Who goes there?” said the leader.

“Mazarin!” replied d’Artagnan, laughing.

The cardinal felt the hair rise on his head. This joke seemed like a good one to the citizens who seeing a carriage without arms or escort, did not think to believe the response could be a reality. “Have a safe trip!” they cried.

And they let the carriage pass. “Ha!” said d’Artagnan. “How did My Lord like my answer?”

“Oh, you’re quite the wit,” said Mazarin, sweating.

“By the way,” said Porthos, “I got that one.”

In the middle of the Rue des Petits-Champs, the carriage was stopped by a second patrol. “Who goes there?” called the patrol’s leader.

“Prepare yourself, My Lord,” said d’Artagnan.

Mazarin sank down so deeply between his two guardians that he disappeared completely. “Who goes there?” the voice repeated impatiently.

D’Artagnan saw that they were making ready to seize the horses’ heads; he leaned halfway out the carriage door and called, “Hey, Planchet!”

The leader approached. It was indeed Planchet – d’Artagnan had recognised his former lackey’s voice. “Why, Sir!” said Planchet. “Is that you?”

“My God, yes, old friend. Our dear Porthos has just taken a sword-wound, and I’m bearing him back to his country house at Saint-Cloud.”

“Really?” Planchet said.

“Porthos, friend Porthos, if you can still talk,” said d’Artagnan, “say a few words to our good Planchet.”

“Planchet, my friend,” said Porthos with a groan, “I feel awful; if you meet a doctor, and please send him along after me.”

“Oh! Great God, what a terrible thing!” said Planchet. “How did this happen?”

“I’ll tell you that,” said Mousqueton while Porthos gave a great groan.

“Make way, Planchet, or he won’t make it,” said d’Artagnan in a low voice. “He took it through the lungs.”

Planchet shook his head with the air of a man who says, In that case, it’s all over. Then, turning to his men, he said, “Let them pass – they’re friends.”

The carriage resumed its ride, and Mazarin who had been holding his breath, dared to exhale. “Rogues!” he murmured.

A few paces short of Porte Saint-Honoré they encountered a third troop, this one composed of ragged men who looked more like bandits than anything else. They were the men of the beggar of Saint-Eustache. “Beware, Porthos!” said d’Artagnan. Porthos reached for his pistols.

“What is it?” said Mazarin.

“My Lord, I think we’ve fallen into bad company.”

A man carrying a sort of scythe came to the door; it was the beggars’ chief himself. “Who goes there?” he asked.

“Dolt! Don’t you recognised the carriage of Sir Prince?” said d’Artagnan.

“Prince or not,” said the beggar, “open up! It’s our duty to guard the gate, and no one passes who we don’t know.”

“What should we do?” asked Porthos.

“For the love of God! We go on,” said d’Artagnan.

“Go on? But how?” said Mazarin.

“Through them or over them. Coachman, at the gallop!”

The driver raised his whip. “Not one step further,” said the beggar who seemed to be the leader, “or I’ll hamstring your horses.”

“Plague! That would be a shame,” said Porthos. “Those horses cost me a hundred pistoles.”

“I’ll pay you two hundred,” said Mazarin in a low voice.

“Sure,” said d’Artagnan, “but after they hamstring the horses, they’ll hack off our heads.”

“There’s one on my side,” hissed Porthos. “Should I kill him?”

“Do it – with your fist, if you can. No shooting unless we have to.”

“I can do that,” said Porthos.

“Come have a look, then,” called d’Artagnan to the man with the scythe, meanwhile picking up one of his pistols by the barrel so he could strike with the butt.

The man approached. D’Artagnan leaned halfway out the door into the light of a lantern to gain room to move. His eyes met those of the beggar who seemed to recognise the musketeer for he suddenly turned pale – and d’Artagnan seemed to recognise him, for a visible shudder ran through him. “Sir d’Artagnan!” the man gasped, recoiling a step. Then he shouted, “It’s Sir d’Artagnan! Let them pass!” D’Artagnan might have replied to this but a sound came like that of a sledge-hammer striking an ox on the head; it was Porthos felling his man. D’Artagnan turned to see the poor man lying four paces from the carriage. “Whip on! Whip on!” he cried to the driver. “Now! Belly to the ground!” The coachman cracked his whip over the horses, and the noble animals leapt forward. Cries came as men were thrown aside. There was a double jolt as the wheels passed over a body. Then there was a moment of quiet as the carriage passed through the gate. “To the Cours-la-Reine!” d’Artagnan called to the driver. Then, turning to Mazarin, he said, “Now, My Lord, you may say five Paters and five Aves to thank God for your deliverance – you are free, and you are safe!”

Mazarin’s only reply was a sort of groan. He didn’t believe in miracles. Five minutes later the carriage stopped, having arrived at the Course-la-Reine. “Is My Lord satisfied with his escort?” asked the musketeer.

“Enchanted, Sir,” said Mazarin, risking a look out one of the doors. “Now do the same for the queen.”

“That will be less difficult,” said d’Artagnan, jumping to the ground. “Sir du Vallon, I commend His Eminence to your care.”

“Rest easy,” said Porthos, extending his hand.

D’Artagnan took Porthos’s hand and shook it. “Ouch!” said Porthos.

D’Artagnan looked at his friend in astonishment. “What’s wrong?”

“I think I sprained my wrist,” said Porthos.

“Why the devil did you hit him? Didn’t you hear my man?”

“I had to do it, he was aiming his pistol. But you, how did you get rid of your man?”

“Oh!” said d’Artagnan. “Mine was no man.”

“What was he, then?”

"He was ... a spectre."

"And...?"

"And so, I conjured him away." Without further explanation, d'Artagnan took his pistols from the front seat, thrust them through his belt, wrapped himself in his cloak, and then, not wishing to return through the same gate they'd come out, made his way toward Porte Richelieu.

225

The Carriage of Sir Coadjuteur

Instead of re-entering the city by Porte Saint-Honoré, d'Artagnan, who had a little time, rode around and returned through Porte Richelieu. There citizen guards stopped him for inspection, and, when they saw he was a musketeer with his feathered hat and embroidered cloak, they surrounded him and insisted that he shout, "Down with Mazarin!"

At first, he considered refusing but then he remembered what mission he had ahead of him, and cried out so enthusiastically that the citizens were satisfied. He rode in along the Rue de Richelieu, considering how he would get the queen out in her turn that he certainly couldn't do in a coach displaying the Arms of France when he spotted a carriage standing at the gate of Madam de Guéménée's mansion, and was struck by an idea. "Ah, for the love of God," he said, "it'd be poetic justice." He approached the carriage until he could see what arms were painted on the door and whose livery was worn by the coachman – an examination made all the easier as the driver was asleep, snoring on his seat. "No doubt about it: this is Sir Coadjuteur's carriage," he said. "Upon my word, I begin to believe we may have Providence on our side."

He climbed quietly into the carriage, found the silk cord the passengers used to communicate with the coachman, tugged on it and called, "To the Royal Palace!"

The driver awakened with a start, and drove off toward the given destination, without the least suspicion that the order had come from anyone but his master. The Swiss Guards at the gate almost barred their entry but the sight of the magnificent vehicle persuaded them the visit must be one of importance, so they let the carriage pass, and it stopped beneath the portico. Only then did the coachman notice the carriage had no lackeys on the rear step. He thought the coadjutor must have given them other orders, so he jumped down from his seat to open the door. D'Artagnan leapt out of the carriage, and as the coachman, frightened at not seeing his master, took a step back, the musketeer grabbed him by the collar with his left hand and clapped a pistol to his head with the right. "Say one word and you're dead," said d'Artagnan.

The coachman saw by the expression on his captor's face that he'd fallen into a trap, and he froze, gaping and wide-eyed. Two musketeers were crossing the courtyard; d'Artagnan called them over by name. "Sir Bellière," he said to one of them, "do me the favour of taking this brave man's reins, climbing up onto his seat, and driving the carriage to the door of the private staircase. Await me there, on a matter of the greatest importance and in the king's service."

The musketeer who knew his lieutenant would never joke about a matter of the king's service, obeyed without saying a word, though the order seemed strange to him. Then, turning to the second musketeer, he said, "Sir du Verger, help me conduct this man to a safe place."

The musketeer, thinking his lieutenant must have just arrested some disguised rebel prince, bowed, drew his sword, and indicated he was ready. D'Artagnan went up the stairs, followed by his prisoner and the other musketeer, crossed the vestibule, and entered Mazarin's antechamber. Bernouin was there, waiting impatiently for news of his master. "Is all well, sir?" he asked.

"Extremely well, my dear Sir Bernouin. But here, if you please, is a man who needs to be put someplace for safekeeping."

"Where would that be, Sir?"

"Wherever you like, provided the place has shutters with a padlock and a door that locks with a key."

"That we have, Sir," said Bernouin. And he led the poor coachman into a small counting-room that had iron bars across the window and resembled a prison cell. "Now, my friend," said d'Artagnan, "I invite you to remove your hat and cloak and lend them to me."

The coachman, as might be imagined, made no resistance – besides, he was so stunned by events that he staggered and stammered like a drunk. D'Artagnan put the hat, cloak under Bernouin's arm, and said, "Now, Sir du Verger, stay in here with this fellow until Sir Bernouin returns to let you out. This sentry duty may be long and not very amusing, I know – but it's on the king's service," he added gravely.

"As you command, Lieutenant," replied the musketeer who could see he was involved in serious matters.

"By the way," said d'Artagnan, "if this man tries to shout or get away, run him through." The musketeer made a formal salute. D'Artagnan went out, taking Bernouin with him. Midnight was sounding.

"Take me to the queen's chapel," d'Artagnan said. "Inform her that I'm there, and then take that bundle there – the one with the loaded carbine – down and put it on the seat of the carriage waiting at the bottom of the private staircase."

Bernouin conducted d'Artagnan into the chapel, where he sat down, thoughtfully. Everything seemed in order at the Royal Palace as usual. By ten o'clock all the evening's guests had retired; those that were to flee with the Court had been given the secret password and told to make their way to the Cours-la-Reine between midnight and one o'clock. At ten o'clock, Anne of Austria had gone in to see the king. They had already put Sir, his brother, to bed, and young Louis, who was still up, was enacting a battle with some lead soldiers, a game he greatly enjoyed. Two children of honour were playing with him. "La Porte,"* said the queen, "it's time for His Majesty to go to bed."

The king asked to stay up, as he wasn't ready for sleep but the queen insisted. "Don't you plan to go at six in the morning to bathe at Conflans? That was your own idea, as I recall."

"You're right, Madam," said the king, "and I'm ready to retire to my room as soon as you kiss me goodnight. La Porte, give the candlestick to the Knight of Coislin."

The queen rested her lips on the pale royal forehead which the august child offered with all the gravity of etiquette. "Fall asleep quickly, Louis," said the queen, "because you're getting up early."

"I'll do my best to obey you, Madam," said young Louis, "though I don't really feel sleepy."

"La Porte," whispered Anne of Austria, "find some very boring book to read to His Majesty but don't undress."

The king retired, accompanied by the young Knight of Coislin as candle-bearer; the other child of honour went off to his room. Then the queen returned to her own apartments. Her women, that is to say Madam de Brégy, Miss Beaumont, Madam de Motteville, and her sister Socratine, so called due to her wisdom, had just brought into the dressing room the remains of the dinner, upon which the queen supped, as was customary. The queen then gave her final orders, spoke about a dinner for her the following day hosted by the Marquis de Villequier, designated those to be honoured by dining with her, and announced that on the day after that she would pay a visit to Val-de-Grâce, where she intended to make her devotions. She then told Beringhen, her premier valet, to accompany her. The ladies having finished their supper, the queen pretended to be very tired and went into her bedchamber. Madam de Motteville, who was on duty that evening, followed her in and helped her undress. The queen got into bed, spoke to her affectionately for a few minutes, and then dismissed her. It was at that moment that d'Artagnan was entering the Royal Palace courtyard with the coadjutor's coach. Just after that, the carriages of the ladies of honour drove out, and the gate was shut behind them. Midnight sounded. Five minutes later, Bernouin knocked at the queen's door, coming through the secret passage from the cardinal's study. Anne of Austria opened the door herself. She was already dressed, that is, she'd put on her stockings and wrapped herself in a long robe. "Is that you, Bernouin?" she asked, "And is Sir d'Artagnan there?"

"Yes, Madam, in your chapel, where he's waiting until Your Majesty is ready."

"I'm ready. Go and tell La Porte to awaken and dress the king, and from there go to the Marshall de Villeroy and ask him to come to me."

Bernouin bowed and went out. The queen went to her chapel that was lit by a single Venetian lamp. There she found d'Artagnan waiting for her. "It's you?" she said to him.

"Yes, Madam."

"You're ready?"

"Quite ready."

"And the cardinal?"

"Got out without injury. He awaits Your Majesty at the Cours-la-Reine."

"But in what carriage will we go?"

"I've arranged everything; a carriage is waiting for Your Majesty below."

"Let's go to the king."

D'Artagnan bowed and followed the queen. Young Louis was already dressed in everything but his shoes and his doublet. He allowed himself to be dressed despite his astonishment, and showered La Porte with questions, who just told him, "Sire, this is by the queen's orders."

The royal bedcovers were thrown back, exposing sheets so worn there were holes in some places – evidence of Mazarin's shameful stinginess. The queen came in, while d'Artagnan remained on the threshold. The child, seeing the queen, escaped from La Porte's hold and ran to her. The queen beckoned d'Artagnan to approach. D'Artagnan obeyed, removing his hat. "My son," said Anne of Austria, pointing to the musketeer, who stood calm and upright, "here is Sir d'Artagnan, who is as brave as one of those noble knights whose stories you love so much when my ladies read them to you. Remember his name and take a good look at him so you will recognise him again, for tonight he renders us a great service."

The young king regarded the officer with his proud gaze and repeated, "Sir d'Artagnan?"

"That's him, my son."

The young king slowly raised his boyish hand and extended it to the musketeer, who fell to one knee and kissed it. "Sir d'Artagnan," Louis repeated, nodding. "It is well, Madam."

At that moment they heard an approaching clamour. "What's that?" said the queen.

"Uh-oh," d'Artagnan said, cocking his intelligent head. "It's the sound of the people, aroused."

"We must flee!" said the queen.

"Your Majesty has granted to me the direction of this affair – and I say we must stay until we know what this noise means."

"Sir d'Artagnan!"

"I'll answer for everything."

Nothing is more contagious than confidence. The queen, herself strong and brave, responded to those virtues in others. "So be it," she said. "I rely on you."

"Will Her Majesty permit me to give orders in her name?"

"Give your orders, Sir."

"What is it the people want?" asked the king.

"We'll soon know, Sire," said d'Artagnan.

And he quickly left the room. The tumult grew, until it seemed to envelop the entire Royal Palace. Cries came from within, the meaning of which was unclear – but there was evidently some commotion and unrest. The king, half dressed, the queen, and La Porte all remained just as they were, listening and waiting. Comminges, who was on guard duty that night at the Royal Palace, rushed in; he reported that he had about two hundred men in the courtyards and the stables, and placed them at the queen's disposal. "Well?" Anne of Austria asked as d'Artagnan reappeared. "What's going on?"

"A rumour has spread that the queen has left the Royal Palace, taking the king with her, and the people demand proof to the contrary, or they threaten to demolish the palace."

"Oh! This time, it's too much," said the queen. "I'll prove to them that I haven't gone."

D'Artagnan saw, from the queen's face, that she was going to order some violent retaliation. He approached her and whispered, "Does Your Majesty have full confidence in me?"

His voice made her tremble. "Yes, Sir – full confidence," she said.

"Will the queen deign to follow my advice?"

"Speak."

"Would Your Majesty be so kind as to dismiss Sir Comminges and have him order his troops to withdraw into the guardhouse and stables?"

Comminges gave d'Artagnan that envious look with which every courtier regards a new favourite. "Did you hear, Comminges?" said the queen.

D'Artagnan turned to Comminges, and with his usual shrewdness recognised the man's unease. "Sir Comminges," he said, "pardon me but we're both servants of the queen, aren't we? It's my turn to be useful to her; don't be envious of my moment."

Comminges bowed stiffly and went. And thus, thought d'Artagnan, I've managed to make myself another enemy.

"Now," said the queen, addressing d'Artagnan, "what's to be done? For as you can hear, instead of decreasing, the noise is growing louder."

"Madam," d'Artagnan replied, "if the people want to see the king, they should see him."

"What do you mean, they should see him – and where? On the balcony?"

"Not there, Madam but here in bed, asleep."

"Oh, Your Majesty, Sir d'Artagnan is absolutely right!" said La Porte.

The queen thought for a moment, and then smiled like a woman to whom duplicity is no stranger. "We'll do it," she murmured.

"Sir La Porte," said d'Artagnan, "go out through the palace gates and announce to the people that if they would be satisfied, in five minutes they will not only see the king but see him in his bed – however, add that the king is asleep, and the queen begs that they remain silent so as not to awaken him."

"You mean everyone, not just a delegation of a few persons?"

"Everyone, Madam."

"But think about it, this will take all night."

"It will take a quarter of an hour. Trust me on this, Madam – believe me, the people are like big children who just need to hear some calm words. At the sight of the sleeping king, they will be silent, sweet, and gentle as lambs."

"Go, La Porte," said the queen.

The young king approached his mother. "Why do we have to do what these people ask?" he said.

"Because we must, my son," said Anne of Austria.

"But then, if I must do what they tell me, am I still the king?"

The queen said nothing. "Sire," said d'Artagnan, "will Your Majesty permit me to ask him a question?"

Louis XIV turned, astonished that someone should address him uninvited. The queen took hold of his hand. "...Yes, Sir," he said.

"Does Your Majesty remember playing in the park at Fontainebleau, or in the courtyards at Versailles, when suddenly the sky clouded over and there came the sound of thunder?"

"Yes, of course."

"Well! That thunder, no matter how much Your Majesty wished to continue to play, said to you, 'Sire, you must go inside.'"

"No doubt, Sir – but I was always told that the sound of thunder was the voice of God."

"Well, Sire," said d'Artagnan, "if you listen to the voice of the people, you'll hear that it sounds a lot like thunder."

In fact, at that moment a terrible rumble was borne in on the night breeze. Then suddenly it stopped. "There, Sire," said d'Artagnan, "they just told the people that you are asleep. And by that you see that you are still the king."

The queen looked with astonishment at this strange man whose courage was equal to the bravest, and whose subtle and clever wits were the equal of anyone's. La Porte came in. "Well, La Porte?" the queen asked.

"Madam," he replied, "Sir d'Artagnan's prediction was justified – they've calmed down as if by magic. We're going to open the doors to them, and in five minutes they'll be here."

"La Porte," said the queen, "if you substituted one of your sons for the king that would give us time to escape."

"If Your Majesty so commands," said La Porte. "My sons, like myself, are at the queen's service."

"No," said d'Artagnan. "If just one of them knew His Majesty by sight and detected the trick, all would be lost."

"You're right, Sir – always right," said Anne of Austria. "La Porte, put the king to bed."

La Porte put the king, dressed as he was, into bed, and pulled the sheet up to his shoulders. The queen bent over him and kissed him on the forehead. "Pretend to be asleep, Louis," she said.

"All right," said the king, "but I don't want any of those people to touch me."

"Sire, I'm right here," said d'Artagnan, "and I say to you that if any one of them is so presumptuous, he'll pay with his life."

"Now, what should we do?" asked the queen. "I hear them coming."

"Sir La Porte, go to meet them, and remind them to stay silent. Madam, wait there by the door. I'll be at the king's bedside, prepared to die for him."

La Porte went out, the queen stood by the tapestry door, and d'Artagnan slipped behind the bed, hidden by its curtains. Then came the plodding march of a multitude of men; the queen raised the tapestry herself, finger to her lips. When they saw the queen, the citizens stopped in respect. "Come in, Gentlemen, come in," said the queen.

Then the people hesitated, as if ashamed. They'd expected resistance; they'd expected to be opposed; they'd expected to have to force the gates and overwhelm the guards – but the gates had been opened for them, and the king, seemingly, had no one to guard him but his mother. The men in front stammered and tried to back up. "Come in, Gentlemen," said La Porte, "Since the queen permits it."

One man, bolder than the others, ventured beyond the threshold and advanced on tiptoe. The others imitated him, and the room fell silent, as if these men were nothing but the most humble and devoted courtiers. Outside the door could be seen the heads of those who, unable to fit, stood on tiptoe to peer in. D'Artagnan saw everything through a gap he'd made in the curtains – and he recognised the man who entered first as Planchet. "Sir," the queen said to him, regarding him as the leader of that band, "you wished to see the king, and I wished to show him to you myself. Approach, look at him, and say if this looks like people who are trying to escape."

"It ... it doesn't," said Planchet, rather astonished at receiving such an honour.

"Then you must tell my good and loyal Parisians," replied Anne of Austria, with a smile that didn't fool d'Artagnan in the slightest, "that you have seen the king abed and asleep, and the queen prepared to go to bed in her turn."

"I'll tell them, Madam, and all those with me will tell them as well but..."

"But what?" asked Anne of Austria.

"I hope Your Majesty will forgive me," said Planchet, "but is that really the king I see lying there?"

Anne of Austria trembled. "If there is anyone among you who knows the king," she said, "let him come forth and state whether this is truly His Majesty."

A man wrapped in a cloak, draped to hide his face, came in, approached the bed, and took a long look. D'Artagnan thought the man might intend harm, and put his hand to his sword but the cloak slipped slightly, and d'Artagnan recognised the coadjutor. "It is indeed the king," the man said in a muffled voice. "God bless His Majesty!"

"Yes," answered Planchet, in a stage whisper, "yes, God bless His Majesty!"

And all those men, who had come in furious, went from anger to sympathy, and murmured blessings on the royal child. "Now," said Planchet, "let's thank the queen, my friends, and depart."

Everyone bowed, and then one by one they quietly went out the way they'd come in. Planchet, the first to enter, was the last to leave. The queen stopped him. "What is your name, my friend?" she asked.

Planchet turned, astonished by this question. "Yes," said the queen. "I'm as honoured to have received you this evening as if you were a prince, and I desire to know your name."

Oh, yes, thought Planchet, so you can treat me the way you treat the princes!

D'Artagnan shuddered at the idea that Planchet, seduced like the raven of the fable, might say his name, and that the queen, hearing his name, might learn that Planchet belonged to him.

"Madam," Planchet respectfully replied, "I'm called Dulaurier, at your service."

"Thank you, Sir Dulaurier," said the queen. "And what do you do?"

"Madam, I'm a draper in the Rue des Bourdonnais."

"That's all I wanted to know," said the queen. "Much obliged, my dear Sir Dulaurier. You'll be hearing from me."

"Well, now," murmured d'Artagnan behind his curtain, "clearly Master Planchet is no fool, and learned his lessons in a good school."

The door dropped, and the various actors of this strange scene stood for a moment in tableau without saying a word, the queen standing by the door, d'Artagnan half out of his hiding place, and the king raised up on one elbow and ready to fall back again at the least noise that indicated the return of the mob – but instead of approaching, the noise grew more and more distant, and finally disappeared altogether. The queen exhaled slowly; d'Artagnan mopped his damp forehead; the king slid out of bed, saying, "Let's leave."

Just then La Porte reappeared. "Well?" asked the queen.

"Well, Madam," replied the valet, "I followed them to the gates, where they announced to everyone that they'd seen the king, and the queen had spoken to them, so they all went away proud and happy."

"Oh, the wretches!" murmured the queen. "They'll pay dearly for their insolence, this I promise!" Then, turning to d'Artagnan, she said, "Sir, this evening you've given me the best advice I've ever received. To continue, what should we do now?"

"Sir La Porte, finish dressing His Majesty," said d'Artagnan.

"Then we can go now?" asked the queen.

"Whenever Your Majesty likes. She has only to go down the secret staircase, where she will find me at the door."

"Go, Sir," said the queen. "I shall follow."

D'Artagnan went down, where he found the carriage waiting, with the musketeer on the driver's seat. D'Artagnan picked up the package he'd directed Bernouin to put in the carriage that included the hat and cloak of Sir Gondy's coachman. He wrapped the cloak around his shoulders and put the hat on his head. The musketeer de Bellière got down from the driver's seat. "Sir," said d'Artagnan, "I'm sending you to set free your companion, who's guarding the coachman. Then I want you to mount up and ride to Rue Tiquetonne, the Hôtel de La Chevrette, where you'll find my horse and that of Sir du Vallon. Saddle and equip them as if for war, then lead them out of Paris and bring them to us in the Cours-la-Reine. If you can't find us at the Cours-la-Reine, then continue on to Saint-Germain. In the king's service!"

The musketeer put his hand to his hat in salute and departed to fulfil his orders. D'Artagnan climbed up on the driver's seat. He had a brace of pistols in his belt, a carbine at his feet, and his naked sword on the seat behind him. The queen appeared, followed by the king and his younger brother, the Duke d'Anjou. "The coadjutor's carriage!" she cried, recoiling a step.

"Yes, Madam," said d'Artagnan, "but it's all right, because I'm driving it."

The queen stifled a cry of surprise and entered the carriage. The king and Sir followed and sat down beside her. "Come, La Porte," said the queen.

"What, Madam!" said the valet. "How can I ride in the same carriage as Your Majesties?"

"This isn't a matter of royal etiquette but of saving the king. Get in, La Porte!" La Porte obeyed. "Pull down the shades," said d'Artagnan.

"But won't that look suspicious, Sir?" asked the queen.

"Rest easy, Your Majesty. I have my responses ready," said d'Artagnan. The shades were pulled down, and they set off at a gallop along the Rue de Richelieu. On arriving at the gate, the leader of the citizen guards came out with a lantern in his hand, followed by a dozen men. D'Artagnan made a sign for him to approach. "Do you recognise this carriage?" he said to the sergeant.

"No," the man replied.

"Take a look at the arms on its door."

The sergeant brought his lantern near the door panel. "The arms of Sir Coadjuteur!" he said.

"Hush! He's receiving the favours of Madam de Guéménée."

The sergeant began to laugh. "Open the gate," he called, "I know who this is." Then, approaching the door and speaking through the shades, he said, "You're a lucky man, My Lord!"

"Not so loud!" said d'Artagnan. "Do you want to get me in trouble?"

The gate creaked on its hinges, and d'Artagnan, seeing the way opened, whipped up the horses and departed at a trot. Five minutes later they arrived where the cardinal's carriage was waiting.

"Mousqueton," called d'Artagnan, "come open the door of Her Majesty's coach."

"It's him," said Porthos.

"On the driver's seat!" cried Mazarin.

"Of the coadjutor's carriage!" said the queen.

"God, Sir d'Artagnan!" said Mazarin. "You are worth your weight in gold!"

D'Artagnan & Porthos gain 219 & 211 Golden Louis by Selling Straw Respectively

Mazarin wanted to leave at once for Saint-Germain but the queen declared she would wait for the others who were expected to join them. But she invited the cardinal to take La Porte's place in her vehicle. The cardinal accepted and crossed from one carriage to the other. There was a reason that the rumour had spread that the king was to leave Paris in the night: ten or twelve persons had been in on the secret since six o'clock in the evening, and no matter how discreet they might be, they hadn't been able to give their orders for departure without the word getting out. Besides, each of these persons had one or two other close associates, family or dear friends, and as no one believed that the queen intended to leave Paris without plans for taking her revenge, they had warned their friends and relations, and the rumour of the departure had spread like wildfire through the streets of the city. The first carriage to arrive after that of the queen was that of Sir Prince, containing the Prince de Condé, Madam Princess, and Madam the Princess Dowager. The latter two had been awakened in the middle of the night and had no idea of what was happening. The second carriage contained Sir Duke of Orléans, Madam Duchess, la Grande Miss, and the Abbot de La Rivière, the prince's inseparable favourite and intimate counsellor. The third carriage to arrive contained Sir Longueville and the Prince de Conti,* brother-in-law and brother of Sir Prince. They got out, approached the carriage of the king and the queen, and paid their respects to Their Majesties. The queen looked across into their carriage, the door of which stood open, and saw that it was empty. "But where then is Madam de Longueville?" she asked.

"Indeed, where's my sister?" asked Sir Prince.

"Madam de Longueville is ill, Madam," the duke responded, "And charged me with conveying her apologies to Your Majesty."

Anne glanced quickly at Mazarin, who responded with an almost-imperceptible shake of the head. "What do you think?" the queen asked.

"I think she's a hostage for the Parisians," replied the cardinal.

"Why didn't she come?" asked Sir Prince in a low voice to his brother.

"Hush!" Conti replied. "No doubt she has her reasons."

"She's betraying us," murmured the prince.

"She's saving us," said Conti.

Other vehicles arrived in a rush. Marshall de La Meilleraie, Marshall de Villeroy, Guitaut, Comminges, and Villequier all came in convoy. The two musketeers arrived leading the horses of d'Artagnan and Porthos, who got into their saddles. Porthos's coachman replaced d'Artagnan on the seat of the royal carriage, and Mousqueton replaced the coachman, standing up in the seat and driving erect for reasons best known to himself, like Achilles's driver Automedon. The queen, though occupied with a thousand details, sought for d'Artagnan but the Gascon, with his usual prudence, had already disappeared into the crowd. "Let's make up the vanguard," he said to Porthos, "and find ourselves some decent lodgings at Saint-Germain, as no one will think to do it for us. I feel rather fatigued."

"I'm about ready to fall off my horse," said Porthos, "and there wasn't even a proper battle. Really, the Parisians are such fools."

"Isn't it rather that we were very clever?" said d'Artagnan.

"Maybe."

"And how is your wrist doing?"

"Better. But do you think we've won them this time?"

"What?"

"You, your promotion, and me, my title?"

"Faith! Yes, I'd just about bet on it. Besides, if this time they forget, I'll make sure they remember."

"I think I can hear the voice of the queen," said Porthos. "She's asking to ride on horseback."

"Yes, she might like that but..."

"But what?"

"But the cardinal won't want it. Gentlemen," d'Artagnan continued, addressing the two musketeers, "ride escort on the queen's carriage, staying right next to the doors. We're going ahead to prepare lodgings."

And d'Artagnan spurred off toward Saint-Germain, accompanied by Porthos.

"On our way, Gentlemen! Let's go!" said the queen. And the royal carriage set out, followed by the other carriages and more than fifty mounted cavaliers. They arrived at Saint-Germain without accident. Upon descending from her carriage, the queen found Sir Prince waiting at the step, uncovered and offering his hand. "It will be a rude awakening for the Parisians!" said Anne of Austria, radiant.

"It means war," said the prince.

"Well! It's war then. Don't we have on our side the victor of Rocroi, of Nördlingen, and of Lens?"

The prince bowed in token of thanks. It was three o'clock in the morning. The queen was the first to enter the château, and then everyone followed her; about two hundred people had joined in the escape. "Gentlemen," said the queen, laughing, "find lodging in the château where you will – it's vast, and there's plenty of room but as we couldn't warn them we were coming, I'm afraid there are only three beds: one for the king, one for me..."

"And one for Mazarin," said Sir Prince in an undertone.

"And me, am I supposed to sleep on the floor?" asked Gaston d'Orléans* with a worried smile.

"Not at all, My Lord," said Mazarin. "The third bed is destined for Your Highness."

"But what of you?" asked the prince.

"Oh, I won't go to bed," said Mazarin. "I have work to do."

Gaston was shown to the room where he could find the third bed, without worrying about where his wife and daughter might stay. "Yes, well, I'm certainly going to bed," said d'Artagnan. "Come with me, Porthos."

Porthos followed d'Artagnan with the profound confidence he had in the wits of his friend. As they walked across the château courtyard, Porthos looked with surprise at d'Artagnan, who was calculating something on his fingers. "Four hundred at a pistole apiece makes four hundred pistoles."

"Yes, that makes four hundred pistoles," said Porthos. "But what makes these four hundred pistoles?"

"A single pistole isn't enough," continued d'Artagnan. "It's worth a full louis."

"What's worth a louis?"

"Four hundred, at a louis each, makes four hundred louis."

"Four hundred?" said Porthos.

"Yes, there are two hundred of them, and it takes at least two per person, thus two per person makes four hundred."

"But four hundred what?"

"Listen," said d'Artagnan.

And as there were all sorts of people around watching in amazement as the Court arrived, he finished his sentence with a whisper in Porthos's ear. "I understand," said Porthos, "My faith, I understand perfectly! Two hundred Louis for each of us sounds lovely – but what will the Court say?"

"They can say what they like. Besides, how will they know we were behind it?"

"But who will take charge of the distribution?"

"Mousqueton's here, isn't he?"

"In my livery!" said Porthos. "Which will be recognised."

"He can turn his coat inside out."

"You're right, as always, my friend," said Porthos. "Where the devil do you get all these ideas from?"

D'Artagnan smiled. The two friends turned up the first street they came to, Porthos knocking on the doors on the right, while d'Artagnan took the doors on the left. "Straw!" they called. "We need straw."

"Sir, we don't have any," replied the first man to open to d'Artagnan. "You should ask the fodder merchant."

"And where do I find this fodder merchant?"

"Behind the large gate at the end of the street."

"On the right or the left?"

"The left."

"And are there any other such merchants in Saint-Germain?"

"There's the innkeeper of the Crowned Mutton, and Gros-Louis the farmer."

"Where do they live?"

"Rue des Ursulines."

"Both of them?"

"Yes."

"Excellent!"

The two friends got directions as clear and exact for the second and third addresses as they had for the first, and then d'Artagnan went to the fodder merchant's and bargained with him for a hundred and fifty bundles of straw that he bought for the sum of three pistoles. He then went to the innkeeper, where he found that Porthos had just purchased 200 bundles for about the same price. They got a final one hundred and eighty from Gros-Louis the farmer that brought their total to four hundred and thirty bundles of straw. At the Château de Saint-Germain, there were none. All this trading took no more than half an hour. Mousqueton, duly briefed, was made the figurehead of the com-thank youal venture. He was advised to not to let a single bundle of straw get out of his hands for less than a louis that meant they were counting on him to bring in four hundred thirty louis. Mousqueton nodded his head and shrugged, not quite understanding the nature of the enterprise. D'Artagnan, carrying three bundles of straw, returned to the château, where everyone, weary and shivering with cold, looked on in envy at the king, the queen, and Sir in their beds. The musketeer's entry into the great hall carrying an armload of straw produced a general reaction of laughter, until d'Artagnan who didn't seem to notice he was an object of derision, began with deliberation and cheer to form his straw into a comfortable sleeping pallet, at which everyone else regarded him with sudden envy. "Straw?" they cried. "A pallet of straw! Where can we get hold of some straw?"

"I can show you," said Porthos.

And he led the nobles to Mousqueton, who generously distributed his straw at a Louis a bundle. They thought it a bit expensive. But when one is desperate for a good night's sleep, who wouldn't pay two or three Louis for such a luxury?

D'Artagnan sold his bed to an eager customer, got some more straw, and did the same thing again ten times over – and since he was supposed to have bought his straw like the others, he pocketed about thirty Louis in less than an hour. By five in the morning straw was going for three Louis a bundle but there was no more to be had. D'Artagnan had taken care to set four bundles aside for himself. He put into his pocket the key of the closet where he'd hidden them, and then, accompanied by Porthos, went back to Mousqueton, who, shrewdly and like the worthy steward that he was, turned over four hundred and thirty louis to them, keeping an extra hundred for himself. Mousqueton, who knew nothing of what was going on in the château, couldn't understand how it had never occurred to him before to go into the straw-selling business. D'Artagnan collected the coins in his hat, and on the way back, split them with Porthos. Each ended up with 215 Louis. Only then did Porthos realise he'd kept no straw for himself. He returned to Mousqueton but he'd sold the straw down to the last bundle. Porthos went back to d'Artagnan, whom he found making, with his four bundles of straw, a bed so soft, luxurious, and well-padded that the king himself might have envied it, if he hadn't had a bed of his own. D'Artagnan refused to sell his glorious bed to Porthos at any price – but for 4 Louis, paid in advance, he did agree to share it. D'Artagnan placed his sword at his head, his pistols at his side, covered himself in his cloak, propped his hat on his head, and stretched out voluptuously upon the crackling straw. He was already sinking into the sweet dreams that came after collecting 219 Louis in an hour when a voice rang out in the great hall, making him jump. "Sir d'Artagnan!" it cried. "Sir d'Artagnan!"

"Over here!" said Porthos who knew that if d'Artagnan was called away, he'd have the entire bed to himself.

D'Artagnan raised himself on one elbow as an officer approached. "Are you Sir d'Artagnan?" he said.

"Yes, Sir. What do you want from me?"

"I've been sent to find you."

"On whose behalf?"

"That of His Eminence."

"Tell His Eminence that I'm going to sleep, and I advise him as a friend to do the same."

"His Eminence hasn't gone to bed and isn't planning to. He requests you to come at once."

"Plague take this Mazarin, who doesn't know how to sleep!" murmured d'Artagnan. "What does he want? Is it to promote me to captain? In that case, I'll forgive him."

And the musketeer got up, muttering, took his sword, pistols, hat, and cloak, and then followed the officer, leaving Porthos in sole possession of the bed, arranging himself as d'Artagnan had. "Sir d'Artagnan," said the cardinal, upon seeing the man he'd so untimely summoned, "I haven't forgotten how zealously you've served me, and I'll give you a proof of that."

Well! D'Artagnan thought. This certainly sounds promising. He said, "Oh, My Lord ...!"

Mazarin was watching the musketeer and had seen his face flush. He said, "Sir d'Artagnan, do you really desire to be a captain?"

"Yes, My Lord."

"And does your friend still wish to be a baron?"

"At this very moment, My Lord, he's dreaming that he already is!"

"Then," said Mazarin, drawing from a satchel the letter he'd shown d'Artagnan previously, "take this dispatch and carry it to England."

D'Artagnan looked at the envelope; it still had no address. He said, "Can I know to whom I should deliver it?"

"You'll know when you arrive in London, because that's when you'll open the outer envelope."

"And what are my instructions?"

"To obey in every respect the one to whom this letter is addressed."

D'Artagnan was about to ask further questions when Mazarin added, "You will travel by way of Boulogne. There, at the English Arms, you'll find a young gentleman named Sir Mordaunt."

"Very well, My Lord – and what shall I do with this gentleman?"

"Follow him wherever he takes you."

D'Artagnan looked at the cardinal in astonishment. "You have your instructions," said Mazarin. "Now go."

"Go! That's easy to say," D'Artagnan replied, "but to go takes money, and I've none."

"Really?" said Mazarin, scratching his ear. "You say you don't have any money?"

"None, My Lord."

"What about that diamond I gave you last night?"

"I treasure that as a memento of Your Eminence." Mazarin sighed. "It's expensive to live in England, my Lord, especially as an envoy extraordinaire."

"Not so!" said Mazarin. "It's a simple and sober country, never more so than since the revolution. But no matter." He opened a drawer and drew out a purse. "What do you say to a thousand crowns?"

D'Artagnan pushed out his lower lip in disapproval. "I say, My Lord, that it isn't much, since I won't be travelling alone."

"I'm counting on it," replied Mazarin. "That worthy gentleman Sir du Vallon must accompany you, my dear Sir D'Artagnan – there's no man in France I esteem more than he."

"Then, My Lord," said d'Artagnan, indicating the purse that Mazarin still held, "in consideration of your esteem for him..."

"Indeed! In consideration of that, I'll add two hundred crowns more."

"Miser!" d'Artagnan murmured, then added aloud, "But upon our return, at least, we can count on Sir Porthos receiving his baronetcy and I my promotion?"

"Faith of a Mazarin!"

I don't put much stock in that oath, d'Artagnan thought to himself, then said, "May I pay my respects to Her Majesty the Queen?"

"Her Majesty is asleep," Mazarin replied briskly, "and you must leave without delay. Go, Sir."

"One more word, My Lord: if they're fighting in the place where I'm going, shall I fight?"

"You will follow the orders of the person I've sent you to."

"Very well, My Lord," said d'Artagnan, extending his hand for the purse, "then I'll leave my respects with you."

D'Artagnan carefully placed the purse in his largest pocket, and then turned to the officer who'd brought him and said, "Sir, will you go awaken Sir du Vallon on the orders of His Eminence, and tell him I await him at the stables?"

The officer immediately set off with an eagerness in which d'Artagnan thought he detected some self-interest. Porthos had finally made himself completely comfortable on his bed and had begun his usual vigorous snoring when he was awakened by a tap on the shoulder. He thought it was d'Artagnan returning and didn't move. "On the orders of the cardinal," said the officer.

"Eh?" said Porthos, opening his eyes wide. "What did you say?"

"I say that His Eminence sends you to England, and Sir d'Artagnan awaits you at the stables." Porthos gave a deep sigh, got up and took his sword, pistols, hat, and cloak, and left after a final regretful look at the bed in which he'd hoped to sleep so well. He had scarcely turned his back before the officer had taken his place and was barely out the door before his successor began to snore. Which was only natural, because of the entire Court, only the king, the queen, and My Lord Gaston d'Orléans had a better bed than he.

227

A Warning from Aramis

D'Artagnan had gone straight to the stables. Day was just dawning; he recognised his horse and that of Porthos tied to the manger but it was empty. He felt pity for the poor animals and went toward a corner of the stable where he saw a few wisps of straw. But upon sweeping up this straw with his foot, hit boot connected with a round body that, doubtless touched in a sensitive place, cried out, rose to its knees, and rubbed its eyes. It was Mousqueton who, having no straw for himself, had borrowed the hay from the horses. "Mousqueton!" said d'Artagnan. "Come on, we're leaving."

Mousqueton, recognising the voice of his master's friend, hastened to rise, accidentally dropping some of the extra coins he'd raked off from selling the straw. "Oh ho!" said d'Artagnan, picking up a Louis and sniffing it. "This gold has a funny odour – it smells like straw!"

Mousqueton blushed so openly and seemed so embarrassed that the Gascon laughed and said to him, "Porthos might be angry, my dear Sir Mousqueton but as for me, I pardon you. Just remember that this gold must serve as a balm for your wound as we ride, for we must travel!"

Mousqueton pretended to smile, quickly saddled his master's mount, and then climbed on his own without too much wincing. Meanwhile Porthos arrived in a sullen mood, and was surprised to find d'Artagnan resigned, and Mousqueton almost happy. "Oh that," he said, "have we got your promotion and my barony?"

"We're on our way to secure the brevet and patent," said d'Artagnan, "and on our return Mazarin will sign them."

"And where are we going?" asked Porthos.

"To Paris, first of all," d'Artagnan replied. "I want to settle some business there."

"Then let's go to Paris," said Porthos.

And they set off for Paris. When they reached the gates, they were surprised by the menacing aspect of the capital. Around a shattered carriage a crowd was crying threats and insults, holding the passengers who'd tried to flee as prisoners. These were an old man and two women. However, when d'Artagnan and Porthos demanded entry, the people fawned upon them, assuming they were deserters from the royalist party had come to join the citizens' faction. "What's the king doing?" they asked.

"He's sleeping."

"And the Spaniard?"

"She's dreaming."

"And that cursed Italian?"

"He's watching. So, stand firm – for if they've fled, it's because they must have a plan," said d'Artagnan. "But since, at the end of the day, you're the strongest, never fear women and old men, and stay true to your cause." The people felt better upon hearing this, and released the ladies, who thanked d'Artagnan with an eloquent look. "And now, onward!" said d'Artagnan.

They continued on their way, crossing barricades, passing chains, and answering questions. In the square outside the Royal Palace, d'Artagnan saw a sergeant who was drilling five or six hundred citizens. It was Planchet, employing his experience in the Piedmont Regiment for the benefit of the urban militia. As d'Artagnan passed, he recognised his former master. "Hello, Sir d'Artagnan!" said Planchet proudly.

"Hello, Sir Dulaurier," d'Artagnan replied. Planchet stopped short, staring wide-eyed at d'Artagnan. The first rank of militia, seeing him stop, did the same, and each successive rank followed suit. "These bourgeois are just ridiculous," d'Artagnan said to Porthos as they continued on their way. Five minutes later they dismounted at the Hôtel de La Chevrete. The lovely Madeleine rushed out to greet d'Artagnan. "My dear Madam Turquoise," said d'Artagnan, "if you have any money, bury it fast; if you have any jewellery, hide it even faster; if you have any debtors, call in your debts; and if you have any creditors, by no means pay them."

"Why's that?" asked Madeleine.

"Because Paris will soon be rubble and as ruined as old Babylon, of which you might have heard tell."

"And that's the moment you choose to leave me?"

"That very moment," said d'Artagnan.

"And where are you going?"

"Ah! If you could tell me that, you'd be doing me a real service."

"Oh, my God! My God!"

D'Artagnan gestured to his hostess to spare him her laments, as they were useless and unnecessary, and asked, "Have any letters come for me?"

"There's only this one that just arrived." And she gave the letter to d'Artagnan.

"From Athos!" cried d'Artagnan, recognising his friend's firm and formal handwriting.

"Ah!" said Porthos. "Let's see what he has to say." D'Artagnan opened the letter and read:

Dear d'Artagnan, and my dear du Vallon – my friends, this may be the last time you hear from me. Aramis is distressed but God, our courage, and the memory of your friendship support us. Take care of Raoul. Certain written instructions have been left at Blois, and if you haven't heard from us within two and a half months, please take note of them. Embrace the viscount with all the heart you have for your devoted friend,

ATHOS

"I'm going to take this to heart," said d'Artagnan, "and embrace Raoul when I can, since he's on our probable route. And if he has the misfortune to lose our poor Athos, from that moment on he becomes my son."

"And I will make him my sole heir," said Porthos. "But look, on the back Athos added a postscript: And if, on your way, you meet a Sir Mordaunt, defy him. I can say no more in a letter."

"Sir Mordaunt!" said d'Artagnan in surprise.

"Sir Mordaunt, right," said Porthos, "we'll remember that. But see here, there's another postscript, this one from Aramis."

"Indeed," said d'Artagnan. And he read: "We're keeping our location a secret, dear friends, because knowing your fraternal devotion, you'd come to die with us."

"Damn it!" interrupted Porthos, in an angry explosion that made Mousqueton jump across the yard. "Are they really in danger of death?"

D'Artagnan continued, “Athos entrusts you with Raoul, and I bequeath you a vengeance. If you find yourself within arm’s-reach of a certain Mordaunt, tell Porthos to take him into a corner and twist his head from his neck. I dare say no more in a letter. –ARAMIS.”

“Is that all?” said Porthos. “It’s easily done.”

“On the contrary,” said d’Artagnan sombrely, “it’s quite impossible.”

“And why is that?”

“It’s this very Sir Mordaunt whom we’re supposed to meet in Boulogne and who is supposed to escort us to England.”

“Well, then! Suppose that instead of going to join Sir Mordaunt, we go to join our friends?” said Porthos, shaking a fist that would frighten an army.

“I considered that,” said d’Artagnan, “but this letter has neither date nor address.”

“That’s true,” said Porthos, frowning.

And he began striding up and down like a wild man, gesticulating and sometimes half-drawing his sword. As for d’Artagnan, he stood rooted in place like a man afflicted with uncertainty, dismay painted all over his face. “Oh, this is bad,” he said. “Athos insults us by wanting to die by himself. This is awful.” Mousqueton, seeing these two great men in despair, sat down in another corner and burst into tears. “Come,” said d’Artagnan, “this is getting us nowhere. Let’s go, find Raoul and embrace him, and see if he’s heard any news from Athos.”

“Now there’s a good idea,” growled Porthos. “In truth, d’Artagnan, I just don’t know how one man can have so many ideas. Let’s go embrace Raoul.”

“I wouldn’t give a denier for the life of anyone who’d cross my master at this moment,” muttered Mousqueton.

They mounted their horses and set out. On arriving in Rue Saint-Denis, they encountered a great crowd of people. Sir Beaufort had just arrived from the Vendômois, and the coadjutor was presenting him to the Parisians, who were beside themselves with joy. With the arrival of the Duke Beaufort, they regarded themselves as invincible. The two friends turned down a side street to avoid the prince and thereby reached the Saint-Denis barrier. “Is it true,” the guards asked the two cavaliers, “that Sir Beaufort has arrived in Paris?”

“It couldn’t be truer,” said d’Artagnan, “and the proof is that he’s sent us out to meet Sir Vendôme, his father, who’s coming in his turn.”

“Long live Sir Beaufort!” cried the guards.

And they parted respectfully to allow the envoys of the great prince to pass. Once beyond the barrier, they raced up the road like riders to whom fatigue and discouragement were unknown. Their horses fairly flew, and all along the way they spoke of Athos and Aramis. Mousqueton was suffering terrible torments but he consoled himself with the thought that his masters had sufferings of their own. Indeed, he’d come to regard d’Artagnan as his second master, and obeyed him if anything more promptly than he did Porthos. The army’s camp was between Saint-Omer and Lambres, so the two friends made a detour thereto, and informed the general staff of the escape of the king and the queen, the details of which had remained a secret until then. They found Raoul near his tent, lying on a bale of hay from which his horse was tearing a few scraps. The young man had red eyes and seemed dejected; the Marshall de Grammont and the Count Guiche had returned to Paris, leaving the poor lad on his own. After a few moments Raoul looked up and saw the two cavaliers looking down at him; he recognised them and ran to them with open arms. “Oh! It’s you, dear friends!” he cried.

“Were you coming to get me? Are you taking me with you? Have you brought any news of my guardian?”

“Have you no news yourself?” d’Artagnan asked the young man.

“Alas! None, Sir, and in truth I don’t know what’s become of him. I’m so worried I could almost cry.”

And indeed, two fat tears rolled down the young man’s tanned cheeks. Porthos turned his head to conceal the feelings in his own heart. “The devil!” said d’Artagnan, more upset than he’d been in a long time. “Don’t despair, my friend – if you haven’t received any letters from the count, we at least have had ... er ... one ....”

“Really?” cried Raoul.

“And a very reassuring one, too,” said d’Artagnan, seeing what joy this news brought the young man.

“Do you have it?” asked Raoul.

“Yes – or anyway, I had it,” said d’Artagnan, pretending to search his clothes. “Wait, it was right here in my pocket. He spoke of his return, didn’t he, Porthos?”

Gascon though he was, d’Artagnan didn’t want to bear the entire burden of this falsehood. “Yes,” said Porthos, coughing.

“Oh, give it to me!” said the young man.

“Sure, you can read the whole thing. Oh, wait, it’s gone! There’s a hole in my pocket!”

“What a shame, Sir Raoul,” said Mousqueton. “The letter was really very comforting. These gentlemen read it to me, and I wept with joy.”

“So at least, Sir d’Artagnan, you know where he is?” asked Raoul, half reassured.

“Well, of course I know where he is,” said d’Artagnan, “but it’s a secret.”

“Not from me, I hope.”

“No, not from you ... so I’ll tell you where he is.”

Porthos looked at d’Artagnan with eyes wide in astonishment.

D’Artagnan muttered, “Where the devil can I say he’s gone so Raoul won’t try to follow him?”

“Well? Where is he, Sir?” asked Raoul in his soft, hopeful voice.

“He’s ... in Constantinople!”

“Among the Turks!” cried Raoul in dismay. “Good God! What are you telling me?”

“Why, what are you afraid of?” said d’Artagnan. “Bah! What are the Turks to men like the Count La Fère and the Abbot d’Herblay?”

“Oh, so his friend is with him?” said Raoul. “That reassures me a little.”

“This d’Artagnan has the Devil’s own wit!” said Porthos to himself, amazed by his friend’s cunning.

“Now,” said d’Artagnan, eager to change the subject, “Here are fifty pistoles Sir Count sent by the same courier. I assume by now you must be out of money, and this will be welcome.”

“I still have twenty pistoles, Sir.”

“Never turn down money. Take these, and then you’ll have seventy.”

“And if you want any more...” said Porthos, putting his hand to his pocket.

“Thank you,” said Raoul, blushing. “A thousand thanks, Sir.”

At that moment, Olivain ambled up. “By the way,” said d’Artagnan, loud enough so the lackey could hear, “are you satisfied with Olivain?”

“Yes, mostly.”

Olivain pretended not to have heard and went into the tent. “You have complaints about this buffoon?”

“He’s a glutton.”

“Oh, Sir!” said Olivain, reappearing at this accusation.

“He’s a petty thief.”

“Oh, now, Sir!”

“And worst of all, he’s a coward.”

“Ah, Sir, you dishonour me!” said Olivain.

“Plague!” said d’Artagnan. “Understand, Master Olivain, that people like us aren’t served by cowards. Steal from your master, eat his rations and drink his honey but cap de Diou, don’t be cowardly, or I’ll cut off your ears! Look at Sir Mousqueton, ask him to show you the honourable wounds he’s taken, and see the dignity his habitual bravery has stamped upon his face.” Mousqueton was in seventh heaven at this praise, and would have embraced d’Artagnan if he’d dared, while promising himself to die for him at the first opportunity. “Send this dolt home, Raoul,” said d’Artagnan, “for if he’s a coward, someday he’ll dishonour himself – and you.”

“Sir says I’m a coward,” cried Olivain, “because the other day he wanted to fight with a cornet of the Grammont Regiment, and I refused to accompany him.”

“Sir Olivain, a lackey must never be disobedient,” said d’Artagnan sternly. Then, drawing him aside, he added, “If your master was in the wrong, then here’s a crown for you. But if he’s ever insulted and you don’t get cut into quarters defending him, I’ll cut out your tongue and ruin your looks. Remember that well.” Olivain bowed and put the crown in his pocket. “And now, friend Raoul, we must depart, Sir du Vallon and I, on our mission as ambassadors,” said d’Artagnan. “I can’t tell you more than that, because I don’t know myself but if you need anything, write to Madam Madeleine Turquaine, à la Chevette, Rue Tiquetonne, and draw on her funds as you would on a banker – but gently, as her vault is not as well furnished as that of Sir d’Émery.” And then, having embraced his temporary ward, he passed him over to the mighty arms of Porthos who hugged him right off the ground and held him suspended against the noble heart of the formidable giant. “Come,” said d’Artagnan, “let’s be on our way.” They set out again for Boulogne, where they arrived toward evening, their horses soaked with sweat and white with foam. Ten paces from where they paused before entering the town was a young man dressed in black who seemed to be waiting for someone, and whose eyes were fixed upon them from the moment they appeared. D’Artagnan approached him and seeing that his gaze never dropped, said, “See here, friend, I don’t like being stared at.”

“Sir,” said the young man, ignoring d’Artagnan’s remark, “you come from Paris, don’t you?”

D’Artagnan thought he must just be a curious fellow looking for news from the capital. “I do, Sir,” he replied in a milder tone.

“Are you planning to stay at the English Arms?”

“Yes, Sir.”

“Are you charged with a mission from His Eminence Cardinal Mazarin?”

“Yes, Sir.”

“In that case,” said the young man, “you’re looking for me. I am Sir Mordaunt.”

“Ah ha!” said d’Artagnan in a low voice. “He’s the one Athos told us to distrust.”

“Oh ho!” whispered Porthos. “And the one Aramis wants me to strangle.”

And they both looked attentively at the young man, who mistook the meaning of their gaze. “Do you doubt my word?” he said. “If so, I can provide you with proof.”

“Not at all, Sir,” said d’Artagnan, “and we place ourselves at your disposal.”

“In that case, Gentlemen, we’ll leave without delay,” said Mordaunt, “for it’s the last day of the period the cardinal asked me to wait. Our vessel is ready, and if you hadn’t come, I was going to leave without you, for General Oliver Cromwell* must be waiting impatiently for my return.”

“Ah,” said d’Artagnan, “so it’s to General Cromwell that we’re dispatched.”

“Don’t you bear a letter for him?” asked the young man.

“I have a letter inside a double envelope that I’m supposed to open once we reach London – but since you tell me to whom it’s addressed, there’s no point in waiting until then.” D’Artagnan tore open the outer envelope, revealing a letter addressed, “To Sir Oliver Cromwell, General of the Armies of the English Nation.”

“Ah!” said d’Artagnan. “A singular commission!”

“Who is this Oliver Cromwell?” asked Porthos in a low voice.

“A former brewer,” d’Artagnan replied.

“Does Mazarin want to speculate in beer as we did in straw?” asked Porthos.

“Come, Gentlemen,” said Mordaunt impatiently. “Let’s go.”

“What?” said Porthos. “Without dinner? Can’t Sir Cromwell wait a little longer?”

“Yes but I...” said Mordaunt.

“Yes but you?” said Porthos. “What?”

“I am in haste!”

“Hasten, then,” said Porthos. “That’s nothing to do with me. I intend to dine with or without your permission.”

The young man's mild gaze suddenly inflamed, and he seemed about to reply angrily but he restrained himself. "Sir," said d'Artagnan, "please excuse a pair of hungry travellers. Besides, our dinner won't delay you much, and we must take care of our horses. Walk on down to the port, we'll eat a few bites, and be there at almost the same time you will."

"Whatever you like, Gentlemen, so long as we go," said Mordaunt.

"All right ... this time," murmured Porthos.

"The name of the vessel?" asked d'Artagnan.

"The Standard."

"Very well. We'll be on board inside half an hour." And the pair pricked up their horses, spurring on to the English Arms. "What do you think of this young man?" asked d'Artagnan as they rode.

"I think I don't like him one little bit," said Porthos, "and I have a strong inclination to follow Aramis's advice."

"Take care, my dear Porthos, this man is an envoy of General Cromwell, and Cromwell won't receive us very well if we report that we've wrung his agent's neck."

"Just the same," said Porthos, "I've always felt that Aramis was a man who gave excellent advice."

"Listen," said d'Artagnan, "when our embassy is over..."

"What then?"

"If he escorts us back to France..."

"Well?"

"Well! Then we'll see."

The two friends arrived at the English Arms, where they dined with good appetite, and then went straight to the port. A brig was ready to set sail, on the deck of which they recognised Mordaunt, who was pacing up and down impatiently. "It's amazing," said d'Artagnan as the longboat ferried them out to the Standard, "how much this young man resembles someone I once knew but can't say who." They hove to at the ladder, and a moment later they were aboard. But the embarkation of the horses took longer than that of the men, and the brig couldn't weigh anchor until eight in the evening. Then the young man, stamping with impatience, ordered them to raise every sail. Porthos, exhausted by three sleepless nights and a horseback ride of seventy leagues, retired to his cabin and slept. D'Artagnan, overcoming his repugnance to Mordaunt, walked with him on deck and engaged him with a hundred stories to try to draw him out. Mousqueton was seasick.

228

The Faithless Scot sold his Monarch for the Love of Gold like Judas

And now, as the Standard sails, not for London, where d'Artagnan and Porthos thought they were going but to Durham, where letters Mordaunt had received from England during his stay in Boulogne had ordered him to go, our readers must leave them and follow us to the royalist camp, located on the banks of the Tyne near the city of Newcastle. It's here, between two rivers, on the frontier of Scotland but the soil of England, that the tents of a small army are spread. It is midnight. Men who can be recognised as Highlanders by their bare legs, their short skirts, their colourful plaids, and the feathers on their bonnets, keep a casual watch. The moon, gliding between large clouds, illuminates through the gaps the sentries' muskets and outlines the walls, roofs, and towers of Newcastle, the town that Charles I has just turned over to the parliamentary forces, along with Oxford and Newark that had held out for him in hope of a negotiated peace. At one end of the camp, beside a sprawling canvas pavilion full of Scottish officers holding a council presided over by their chief, the old Earl of Leven, a man, dressed as a cavalier, sleeps on the grass, his hand on his sword. 15 paces beyond, another cavalier chats with a Scottish sentry, and though foreign, his grasp of the English language is good enough to enable him to understand the soldier's thick Perth dialect. As one o'clock struck in the town of Newcastle, the sleeper awoke, and after going through all the gestures of one who's awakened from a deep sleep, he looked around him, and finding himself alone, got up and went to pass by the cavalier who was talking to the sentry. That cavalier must have finished his conversation, for after a moment he took his leave of the sentry and followed the awakened cavalier. In the shade of a tent pitched near the path, the first cavalier awaited the second. "Well, my dear friend?" he said in the purest French as it was spoken between Rouen and Tours.

"Well, my friend, there's no time to lose if we're going to warn the king."

"What's going on?"

"It would take too long to tell you and besides, you're about to hear it anyway. Another word wasted here and all may be lost. We must go find Milord de Winter."

And the pair made their way toward the other end of the camp – but as the camp was no more than 500 paces square, they soon reached the tent of the man they were looking for. "Your master asleep, Tony?" said one of the cavaliers in English to a servant lying under the outer awning that served as an antechamber.

"No, Sir Count," replied the footman, "or if so it hasn't been for long, since after leaving the king he was pacing back and forth for a good two hours, and the noise of his footsteps only quit about ten minutes ago. Anyway," said the servant, lifting the door of the tent, "you can see for yourself."

In fact, Winter was seated before an opening in the canvas like a window that allowed the entry of the night air, and through which with melancholy eyes he watched the moon as it sailed lost among the dark clouds. The two friends approached Lord Winter who, head leaning on his hand, gazed up into the sky, oblivious to their arrival until he felt a hand on his shoulder. Then he turned, recognised Athos and Aramis, and extended his hand. "Have you noticed," he said, "how the moon tonight is tinged with blood?"

"No, it seemed normal to me," said Athos.

"Look, Knight and Count," said Winter.

"I confess," said Aramis, "that like the Count La Fère, I see nothing unusual about it."

"Milord," said Athos, "in a position as precarious as ours, it's the earth we should study, and not the heavens. Have you considered the Scots, and are you quite sure of them?"

"The Scots?" asked Winter. "Which Scots?"

"Eh? Why, our Scots, for the love of God!" said Athos. "Those to whom the king is entrusted – the Scots of the Earl of Leven."

"No," said Lord Winter. Then he added, "Are you telling me that you can't see the reddish tint that spreads across the sky?"

"Not at all," said Athos and Aramis.

"Tell me," continued Winter, obsessed with his idea, "isn't it said in France that the night before he was assassinated, King Henry IV, who was playing chess with Bassompierre, saw bloodstains on the chessboard?"

"Yes," said Athos, "I heard the late marshal say so myself."

"That's it," Winter murmured, "and the next day Henry IV was dead."

"But how can Henry IV's vision matter to you, Milord?" asked Aramis.

"It can't, Gentlemen, and indeed it's madness to speak of such things, when your arrival at my tent at this hour tells me you must bring news of importance."

"Yes, Milord," said Athos. "I would like to speak to the king."

"To the king? But the king is asleep."

"I have some very important matters to place before him."

"Can't these matters wait until tomorrow?"

"He must hear them immediately, and even now it may be too late."

"Then follow me, Gentlemen," said Winter.

The baron's tent was next to the royal pavilion, and a corridor of canvas connected the two. This corridor was guarded, not by a sentry but by a confidential valet of Charles I, so that in urgent need the king could send immediately for his devoted guardian Winter. "These gentlemen are with me," Winter said.

The valet bowed and let them pass. Within, on a camp bed, dressed in his black doublet and long boots, with his belt loosened and his hat beside him, King Charles had succumbed to sleep. The men approached, and Athos, who was in the lead, considered for a moment in silence that noble visage, so pale, framed by his long black hair, damp with the sweat of a troubled sleep, around eyes that seemed swollen with fatigue. Athos gave a deep sigh, and the king's sleep was so shallow this awakened him. He opened his eyes, raised himself on one elbow, and said, "Ah, is that you, Count La Fère?"

"Yes, Sire," replied Athos.

"You didn't come to watch me sleep – you have news."

"Alas, Sire!" said Athos. "Your Majesty has guessed right."

"And the news is bad, isn't it?" said the king, smiling sadly.

"Yes, Sire."

"No matter, the messenger is welcome, and you can never enter my presence without bringing me pleasure. You, whose devotion transcends nation and misfortune, who are sent to me by Henriette – whatever news you have to bring me, relate it with confidence."

"Sire, Sir Cromwell arrived tonight in Newcastle."

"Ah!" said the king. "Has he come to fight me?"

"No, Sire – he's come to buy you."

"What are you saying?"

"I'm saying, Sire, that the Scottish army is owed four hundred thousand pounds sterling."

"Their back pay? Yes, I know; for nearly a year my brave and loyal Scots have been fighting for honour."

Athos smiled. "Well, Sire, though honour is a fine thing, they've grown tired of being paid with it, and tonight they've sold you for two hundred thousand pounds, in other words, half of what they're due."

"Impossible!" cried the king. "The Scots, to sell their king for two hundred thousand pounds?"

"The Jews sold their God for thirty silver pieces."

"And who is the Judas who's made this infamous deal?"

"The Earl of Leven."

"Are you sure of that, Sir?"

"I heard it with my own ears."

The king breathed a deep sigh, as if his heart were breaking, and took his head in his hands. "Oh, the Scots, the Scots!" he said. "The Scots, whom I called my own! The Scots, whom I trusted, when I could have gone to Oxford! The Scots, my compatriots! The Scots, my brothers! ... But are you entirely sure, Sir?"

"I lay behind the Earl of Leven's tent, where I lifted the canvas, and saw and heard everything."

"And when will this odious bargain be completed?"

"Today, this very morning. As Your Majesty can see, there's no time to lose."

"But since I've been sold out, what should I do?"

"Cross over the Tyne to reach Scotland, and join up there with Lord Montrose, who will never sell you."

"And what would I do in Scotland? Wage war on my country from beyond its borders? Such a war is unworthy of a king."

"The example of Robert the Bruce is there as a precedent, Sire."

"No, no! I've fought for too long; if they've really sold me, then let me be betrayed, and let the eternal shame of their treason fall upon them."

"Sire," said Athos, "perhaps that's what a king should do but not a husband and a father. I have come at the urging of your wife and your daughter, and in their names, and in the names of the other two children you have in London, I say to you: Live, Sire. God wills it!"

The king got up, tightened his belt, buckled on his sword, mopped his glistening brow with a handkerchief, and said, "Well, what is to be done?"

"Sire, is there in your army a regiment you can count on?"

"Winter," said the king, "do you trust in the loyalty of yours?"

"Sire, they are only men, and men have shown themselves to be very weak or very wicked. As for their loyalty, I'd trust my own life to them but I hesitate to entrust that of Your Majesty."

"Well!" said Athos. "We may not be a regiment but we are three devoted men. We'll do. Let Your Majesty mount his horse and place himself between us. We'll cross the Tyne, reach Scotland, and we'll be safe."

"Is that your advice, Winter?" asked the king.

"Yes, Sire."

"And yours, Sir d'Herblay?"

"Yes, Sire."

"Then let it be done. Winter, give the orders."

Winter went out, while the king finished dressing. The first rays of daylight were filtering into the tent when Winter returned. "Everything is ready, Sire," he said.

"And us?" asked Athos.

"Grimaud and Blaisois have your horses saddled."

"In that case," said Athos, "let's lose not a moment more, and go."

"Let's go," said the king.

"Sire," said Aramis, "does Your Majesty need to warn his friends first?"

"My friends?" said Charles I, shaking his head sadly. "I have none here but the three of you: a friend of twenty years who's never forgotten me, and two friends of a week whom I'll never forget. Come, Gentlemen – let's go."

The king went out of his tent and found his horse was ready for him. It was a dun-coloured charger he'd been riding for three years and of which he was very fond. The horse, seeing him, neighed with pleasure. "Ah!" said the king. "I spoke unfairly – here's someone who, if not a friend, is at least a creature who loves me. You'll be faithful to me, won't you, Arthus?"

As if he'd understood these words, the horse brought its snuffling nose near the king's face, and happily showed its white teeth. "Yes, yes," said the king, stroking him, "yes, you're good, Arthus, and I'm very pleased with you."

And then, with that deftness that made the king one of the best equestrians in Europe, Charles swung himself into the saddle, and said, turning toward Athos, Aramis, and Winter, "Well, then, Gentlemen – I await you."

But Athos stood motionless, his eyes fixed beyond, and pointed toward a dark line along the banks of the Tyne that extended for twice the length of the camp. "What is that line?" Athos said, for the last long shadows of night struggling with the first rays of the day prevented him from seeing clearly. "What is that line? I didn't see it yesterday."

"It's probably just mist rising from the river," said the king.

"Sire, that's something more solid than steam."

"In fact, I see something like a reddish rampart," said Winter.

"It's the enemy, advancing from Newcastle to envelop us," cried Athos.

"The enemy!" said the king.

"Yes, the enemy. It's too late. Look, look! In that sunbeam, there, toward the town, do you see the shining breastplates of the Ironsides?"

(That's what they called the cuirassiers that Cromwell had made his guards.) "Ah!" said the king. "Now we'll see if it's true that my Scots have betrayed me."

"What are you going to do?" said Athos.

"Give them the order to charge and break through those miserable rebels." And the king, spurring his horse, dashed off to the tent of the Earl of Leven.

"After him," said Athos.

"Let's go," said Aramis.

"But is the king wounded?" said Winter dazedly. "I see spots of blood on the ground."

He pricked up to follow the two friends but Athos stopped him. "Go and assemble your regiment," he said. "I'm afraid we're going to need it very soon."

Winter reined aside, and the two friends continued on their way. Within seconds the king had arrived at the pavilion of the general in chief of the Scottish army. He jumped down and went in. The general was surrounded by his officers. "The king!" they cried, rising and staring at each other in surprise.

Charles stood before them, his hat on his head, his brows furrowed, whipping his boot with his riding crop. "Yes, Gentlemen," he said, "the king, in person. The king, who comes to ask you for an explanation of what's going on."

"What's the matter, Sire?" asked the Earl of Leven.

"The matter, Milord," said the king, letting himself get carried away by anger, "is that General Cromwell arrived last night in Newcastle, and that you knew and didn't warn me; that the enemy has left the city and blocked the passage of the Tyne, and that your sentinels must have seen this movement but you didn't alert me; that you have, through an infamous bargain, sold me to the Parliament for two hundred thousand pounds sterling – but at least there I've been warned. That is what's the matter, Gentlemen – now excuse or explain yourselves, for I hereby accuse you."

"Sire," stammered the Earl of Leven, "Your Majesty must have been deceived by some false report."

"I have seen with my own eyes the enemy's army arrayed between me and Scotland," said Charles, "and I can very nearly say I heard with my own ears the details of the bargain."

The Scottish leaders looked at each other, frowning and coughing. "Sire," murmured the Earl of Leven, head bowed down with shame, "Sire, we're ready to give you every proof of our loyalty."

"I ask only one," said the king. "Put the army into line of battle and march on the enemy."

"That cannot be, Sire," said the earl.

"What? It cannot be! And what prevents it from happening?" cried Charles I.

"Your Majesty is well aware there's a state of truce between us and the English army," the earl replied.

"If there's a truce, the English army broke it when they left the city, against the article that kept them there. Now, I say to you, pass with me through that army and back into Scotland, for if you don't, then ... Well! Choose the shameful name by which you'll be known to all men henceforth – as either cowards or traitors!"

The Scots' eyes flamed, and as often happens on such occasions, they instantly went from being ashamed to being reckless. Two clan chiefs stepped forward, to either side of the king, and one said, "Promises? That's right – we promised to deliver Scotland and England from the one who's been draining them of blood and gold for twenty-five years. And we'll keep that promise. King Charles Stuart, you are our prisoner." And they both reached out to seize the king but before they could touch him they both fell, one knocked out and the other dead. Athos had clouted one with the pommel of his pistol, and Aramis had run the other through with his sword. Then, as the Earl of Leven and the other chiefs recoiled from this unexpected attack that seemed to fall from heaven to steal away one they'd already considered captured, Athos and Aramis pulled the king out of that tent of treachery, into which he'd so imprudently ventured, and, leaping on their horses, galloped back to the royal pavilion. On their way they saw Winter at the head of his regiment, and the king beckoned him to follow.

229
The Avenger

The four entered the king's tent; they had no plan and had to make one quickly. The king dropped onto a camp chair. "I am lost," he said.

"No, Sire," replied Athos, "you are only betrayed."

The king gave a deep sigh. "Betrayed, betrayed by the Scots, among whom I was born, and whom I always preferred to the English. Oh, the wretches!"

"Sire," said Athos, "this is not the hour for recriminations but the moment to show that you are a king and a gentleman. Rise, Sire, rise! For you have at least three men who, you may rest assured, will not betray you. Ah, if only they were five!" he murmured, thinking of d'Artagnan and Porthos.

"What do you have in mind?" asked Charles, rising.

"I think, Sire, we have only one chance. Milord de Winter answers for his regiment, or nearly so – we won't quibble over words. He must place himself at the head of his troops, while we stand beside Your Majesty, and together we'll cut our way through Cromwell's army and reach Scotland."

"As another precaution," said Aramis, "if one of us would wear the king's clothing and ride his horse, he might be pursued while the king gets through."

"That's good advice," said Athos, "and if His Majesty wishes to honour one of us with that role, we would be very grateful to him."

"What do you think, Winter?" said the king, regarding with admiration these two men whose only thought was to take his perils upon themselves.

"I think, Sire, that if there's a way to save Your Majesty, it's what Sir d'Herblay just proposed. I therefore humbly beg Your Majesty to choose quickly, as we have no time to lose."

"But if I accept, it's death, or at least prison, for the one who takes my place."

"It's the honour of having saved one's king!" cried Winter.

The king looked at his old friend with tears in his eyes, and then detached the ribbon of the Order of Saint-Esprit that he was wearing in honour of the two Frenchmen, and hung it around Winter's neck, who fell to his knees to receive this fatal mark of the esteem and confidence of his sovereign. "That's only right," said Athos. "He has served far longer than we have."

The king heard that and turned with eyes damp with tears. "Wait a moment, Gentlemen," he said, "I also have a ribbon for each of you."

And he went to a wardrobe containing his private effects and drew out two Orders of the Garter. "Such orders are not for us," said Athos.

"And why not, Sir?" asked Charles.

"These orders are for the royal, or nearly so, and we are simple gentlemen."

"If all the thrones of the world passed before me in review, I'd find no greater souls than yours," said the king. "You don't do yourselves justice, Gentlemen, so I'm here to do it for you. On your knees, Count"

Athos knelt, the king passed the order's ribbon around his neck from left to right, as was traditional, and raised his sword but instead of the usual words – I dub you a knight; be brave, faithful, and loyal – he said, "You are brave, faithful, and loyal; I dub you a knight, Sir Count."

Then turning to Aramis, he said, "Now for you, Sir Knight."

And he performed the same ceremony with the same words, while Winter, helped by his squire, removed and donned Charles's shining cuirass, so he might more easily be mistaken for the king. When Charles was finished with Athos and Aramis, both were embraced by Winter who had recovered all his courage in the face of such devotion. "Sire," he said, "we're ready."

The king looked at the three gentlemen. "Then we really must flee?"

"In every country in the world, Sire," said Athos, "fleeing through an army is called charging."

"Then I shall die with the sword in my hand," said Charles. "Sir Count, Sir Knight, if ever I am king..."

"You have already honoured us above the deserts of simple gentlemen, so the gratitude is all ours. But let's lose no more time, for we've already lost enough."

The king shook each man's hand for the final time, exchanged his hat with Winter's, and went out.

Winter's regiment was drawn up on a little rise that dominated the centre of the camp. The king, followed by the three friends, went straight to them.

The Scottish camp seemed to be awake at last; the men had left their tents and assumed ranks as if for battle. "Look," said the king. "Maybe they've repented and are ready to march."

"If they've repented, Sire, they'll follow us," said Athos.

"Good!" said the king. "What do we do next?"

"Observe the enemy army," said Athos.

They turned their eyes toward the line that, at the day's dawning, they'd taken for fog, and which the first rays of the sun now clearly delineated as an army arrayed for battle. The air was as clear and crystalline as it usually was at that hour of the morning. One could easily distinguish the various regiments, their standards, and even their horses and the colours of their uniforms. Then on a low crest ahead of the enemy line a man appeared, short and stout, amid a group of officers. He pointed a telescope toward the king and his small group. "Does Your Majesty recognise that man?" asked Aramis.

Charles smiled. "That man is Cromwell," he said.

"Then lower the brim of your hat, Sire, so he doesn't notice our little substitution."

"Ah!" said Athos. "We've lost a lot of time."

"Then give the order, and let's go," said the king.

"Will you give it, Sire?" asked Athos.

"Not me, I'm just a lieutenant general here," said the king.

"Listen then, Milord de Winter," said Athos. "Give us a little room, if you will, Sire – what we have to say doesn't concern Your Majesty." The king smiled and stepped away. "This is what I propose," continued Athos. "Divide your regiment into two squadrons. Put yourself at the head of the first, and His Majesty and us with the second. If nothing bars our passage, we'll charge together to force the enemy line and throw ourselves into the Tyne that we'll cross by fording or swimming. On the other hand, if we encounter an obstacle on the way, you and your troops will take the lead and fight to the last man, while we continue on with the king. Once we've reached the banks of the river, your squadron will have done its duty, and the rest is up to us."

"To horse!" said Winter.

"To horse!" said Athos. "Everything is decided."

"Then forward, Gentlemen!" said the king. "Let us charge to the old French cry of 'Montjoie and Saint-Denis!' The cries of England have been too tainted by traitors."

They mounted, the king on Winter's horse, and Winter on the king's. Then Winter took the lead position of the first squadron, while the king, with Athos to his right and Aramis to his left, assumed the lead of the second. The entire Scottish army watched these preparations without moving and with the silence of shame. A few chiefs could be seen stepping out of the ranks and breaking their swords.

"Come, that's some consolation," said the king. "They're not all traitors."

Then Winter's voice rang out, crying, "Forward!"

The first squadron moved out, and the second followed, riding down from the rise. A regiment of cuirassiers nearly equal in numbers to theirs formed in front of the crest ahead and charged toward them. The king pointed them out to Athos and Aramis. "This contingency is planned for, Sire," said Athos. "If Winter's men do their duty, this manoeuvre will save us rather than doom us."

And then they heard, above the galloping and neighing of the horses, the voice of Winter crying, "Draw your sabres!"

The sabres flashed from their scabbards like lightning. "Come, Gentlemen!" cried the king in his turn, intoxicated by the sound and fury. "Gentlemen, draw your sabres!"

But to this command, despite the example of the king, only Athos and Aramis obeyed. "We are betrayed," said the king in a low voice.

"Not so fast," said Athos. "Maybe they didn't recognise Your Majesty's voice and are waiting for their commander's orders."

"Haven't they heard the voice of their colonel? But look!" cried the king, stopping his horse short with a shock, and grabbing the bridle of Athos's horse.

"Ah! Cowards! Wretches! Traitors!" shouted Winter while his men scattered across the fields, leaving their ranks.

Only about 15 men remained around him, awaiting the charge of Cromwell's cuirassiers. "Let's die with them!" said the king.

"Forward!" said Athos and Aramis. "To death!"

"To me, all faithful hearts!" cried Winter.

The two friends heard him and set off at the gallop. "No quarter!" came a cry in French, replying to Winter, at the sound of which he trembled. "No mercy!" came the voice.

Winter turned pale and froze. The voice was that of a cavalier mounted on a magnificent black horse, and who charged, in his zeal, ten paces ahead of the rest of the English regiment. "It's him!" murmured Winter, staring, his sword hanging limp in his hand.

"The king! The king!" cried several voices, fooled by Winter's disguise. "Take him alive!"

"That's not the king!" cried the cavalier. "Don't be deceived! It's Milord Winter, and not the king. Because you aren't the king, are you, Uncle?"

At the same time, Mordaunt, for it was he, pointed the barrel of a pistol at Winter and fired. The ball penetrated the chest of the older gentleman, who fell back from his saddle and into the arms of Athos, gasping, "The avenger!"

"Remember my mother!" snarled Mordaunt as he passed in a rush, carried on by his horse's furious charge.

"You wretch!" cried Aramis, aiming his pistol at point blank range as he passed but only the priming went off and the shot misfired.

At that moment the entire regiment fell upon the few men around Winter and the two Frenchmen were surrounded in the press. Athos, after ascertaining that Winter was dead, dropped the body and drew his sword, shouting, "Come, Aramis – for the honour of France!"

And the two Englishmen closest to the two friends fell instantly, mortally wounded. With an angry roar thirty blades flashed above their heads. Suddenly a man burst from the English ranks, leaped upon Athos with arms of iron, snatched away his sword, and held him in place, whispering in his ear, "Silence – Place Royale! To yield to me is no surrender."

A giant had likewise taken hold of Aramis, who struggled in vain to escape his grip. "Place Royale," said the giant, looking Aramis in the eye.

Aramis nodded his head, as Athos turned around. "D'Art ...!" cried Athos as the Gascon clapped a hand over his mouth.

"I surrender," said Aramis, handing his sword to Porthos.

"Shoot them! Shoot!" cried Mordaunt, returning to the group around the two men.

"Shoot them? Why?" said the English colonel. "Everyone has surrendered."

"He's the son of Milady," said Athos to d'Artagnan.

"I recognised him."

"It's the murdering monk," said Porthos to Aramis.

"I know."

At the same time the ranks began to open. D'Artagnan took Athos's horse by its reins, while Porthos took those of Aramis, and they began to lead their prisoners from the battlefield. This opened a space around the spot where Winter's body had fallen. With the instincts of hatred, Mordaunt had found him, and looked down from his horse with a hideous smile. Athos, as calmly as ever, put his hand to the pistol in his saddle holster. "What are you doing?" said d'Artagnan.

"Let me kill him."

"Don't make a move or say a single word that shows you know who he is, or all four of us are lost." Then, turning to the young man, he called, "Fine prizes, friend Mordaunt! Sir du Vallon and I have each got one – Knights of the Garter, no less!"

"But how could that be?" cried Mordaunt, looking at Athos and Aramis with blood in his eyes. "Aren't they Frenchmen?"

"I know nothing about it. Are you French, Sir?" d'Artagnan asked Athos.

"I am," Athos replied gravely.

"Well, my dear Sir, you are the prisoner of a compatriot."

"But what about the king?" said Athos in dismay, "The king?"

D'Artagnan gripped his prisoner's hand tightly, and said, "The king? We have him."

"Yes," said Aramis, "by disgraceful treachery."

Porthos gripped his friend's wrist so hard he nearly crushed it, and said, "Well, Sir, war is won as much by finesse as by force: look!"

In fact, at that moment the squadron that was to have protected Charles during his escape was advancing slowly toward the English regiment, surrounding the king, who was marching alone on foot in an empty space in their centre. The monarch seemed calm but one could see it took an effort to appear that way: sweat beaded his forehead, and he wiped his temples and mouth with a handkerchief that came away from his lips with bloodstains. "Behold Nebuchadnezzar!" cried one of Cromwell's cuirassiers an old Puritan whose eyes blazed at the sight of the one they called the tyrant.

"Who are you calling Nebuchadnezzar?" said Mordaunt with a dreadful smile. "No, that's King Charles I, that good King Charles who strips his subjects of their estates."

Charles raised his eyes to look at the man who spoke with such insolence but didn't recognise him. Yet the calm and serene majesty of his face made Mordaunt look away. "Good morning, Gentlemen," said the king to the two gentlemen he saw in the hands of d'Artagnan and Porthos. "It's an ill day but that's no fault of yours, thank God! Where's my old friend Winter?"

The two gentlemen turned their heads and remained silent. "He's gone to meet Strafford!" said Mordaunt harshly.

Charles started – the demon had struck home. The death of Strafford was his eternal remorse, the shadow of his days and the ghost that haunted his nights. The king looked down and found a corpse at his feet. It was that of Lord Winter. Charles didn't speak a word or shed a tear, only grew more pallid. He fell to one knee, raised Winter's head, and kissed him on the brow, then took the ribbon of the Order of Saint-Esprit from Winter's neck and placed it solemnly on his chest. "De Winter is dead, then?" asked d'Artagnan quietly, his eyes fixed on the cadaver.

"Yes," said Athos, "and at the hands of his nephew."

"Ah, well! There goes the first of us," murmured d'Artagnan. "May he rest in peace; he was a brave man."

"Charles Stuart," said the colonel of the English regiment, advancing toward the king, who had just regained his royal regalia, "will you surrender yourself to us?"

"Colonel Tomlinson," said Charles, "the king does not surrender, though the man must yield to force."

"Your sword."

The king took his sword and broke it across his knee. At that moment a horse without a rider, dripping with foam, eyes red and nostrils wide, galloped up and, recognising its master, stopped and neighed with joy; it was Arthus. The king smiled, caressed him with his hand, and jumped lightly into the saddle. "Come, Gentlemen," he said, "take me where you will." Then, turning quickly, he said, "Wait, I thought I saw Lord Winter stir. If he lives, by whatever you hold sacred, don't abandon this noble gentleman."

"Oh, don't worry about him, King Charles!" said Mordaunt. "The ball pierced his heart."

"Don't breathe a word, don't move a muscle, don't even risk a glance at me or Porthos," said d'Artagnan to Athos and Aramis, "for Milady isn't dead – her soul lives on in this demon's body!" And the detachment moved off toward the town, bearing its royal prisoner – but halfway there, an aide-de-camp from General Cromwell brought Colonel Tomlinson an order to escort the king to Holdenby Castle. At the same time couriers were dispatched in all directions to announce to England and all Europe that King Charles Stuart was the prisoner of General Oliver Cromwell.

230
Oliver Cromwell

"I came to congratulate you."

"Congratulate me? On what?"

"On the capture of Charles Stuart. Now you are the master of England."

"I was much more so two hours ago," said Cromwell.

"How's that, General?"

"Then England needed me to take the tyrant – but now the tyrant is taken. Have you seen him?"

"Yes, Sir," said Mordaunt.

"What was his attitude?"

Mordaunt hesitated but the truth seemed to escape from his lips. "Calm and dignified," he said.

"Did he say anything?"

"Just a few words of farewell to his friends."

"To his friends!" murmured Cromwell. "He still has friends, then?" Aloud he added, "Did he defend himself?"

"No, Sir – he was abandoned by everyone but three or four friends. Defence was impossible."

"To whom did he surrender his sword?"

"He didn't surrender it, he broke it."

"A fine gesture. But instead of breaking it, he'd have done better to wield it well."

There was a moment's silence. Then Cromwell, looking closely at Mordaunt, said, "The colonel of the regiment that was to escort King Charles – he was killed, was he not?"

"Yes, Sir."

"By whom?"

"By me."

"What was his name?"

"Lord Winter."

"Your uncle?" cried Cromwell.

"My uncle!" replied Mordaunt. "Traitors to England are no family of mine."

Cromwell looked at the young man thoughtfully for a moment, then said, with that deep melancholy so well portrayed by Shakespeare, "Mordaunt, you are a fearsome servant."

"When the Lord commands, there is no arguing with his orders," said Mordaunt. "Abraham raised his knife over Isaac, and Isaac was his son."

"Yes," said Cromwell, "but the Lord then forbade the sacrifice."

"I looked around me," said Mordaunt, "and I saw neither goat nor kid caught in the thickets of the field."

Cromwell inclined his head. "You are mighty even among the strong," he said. "And how did our Frenchmen conduct themselves?"

"Like men of courage, Sir," said Mordaunt.

"Yes, they would," said Cromwell, musing. "The French are good fighters. In fact, through my telescope, it seems to me I saw them in the front ranks."

"That's where they were," said Mordaunt.

"Behind you, however," said Cromwell.

"That wasn't their fault, it was the fault of their horses."

There was another moment of silence, then Cromwell asked, "And the Scots?"

"They kept their word," said Mordaunt, "and didn't move a step."

"Miserable wretches!" murmured Cromwell.

"Their officers ask to see you, Sir."

"I don't have the time. Have they been paid?"

"Tonight."

"Let them go, then – let them return to their mountains where they can hide their shame, if their mountains are high enough for that. I have no more business with them, nor they with me. And now you may go, Mordaunt."

"Before I go, Sir" said Mordaunt, "I have a few questions to ask you, Milord, and a request to make."

"Of me?"

Mordaunt bowed. "I come to you, my hero, my protector, my father, to ask you this: Master, are you satisfied with me?"

Cromwell looked at him in astonishment. "Yes," he said, "since I've known you, you've done, not just your duty but more than your duty. You've been a loyal friend, a capable negotiator and a fine soldier."

"Do you recall, Sir that I was the one who first had the idea of bargaining with the Scots to give up their king?"

"Yes, that thought did come from you, it's true. I had not yet reached that level of contempt for mankind."

"Was I a good envoy to France?"

"Yes, you got everything from Mazarin that I asked for."

"Have I always fought zealously for your interests and your glory?"

"Too zealously, perhaps – which is what I reproached you for just now. But where are you going with all these questions?"

"To tell you, Milord, that the moment has come when you can reward all my services with one word."

"Ah!" said Cromwell, with a slight shrug of disdain. "True, I'd forgotten that every service deserves its reward, that you have served me, and that I've not yet rewarded you."

"Sir, I can be justly rewarded this instant, beyond even what I'd wished."

"How so?"

"The price is here and almost in my hands."

"And what is this price?" asked Cromwell. "Do you want gold? Position? A governorship?"

"Sir, will you grant me my request?"

"Let's hear what it is first."

"Sir, when you've said to me, 'You must carry out an order,' have I ever said: First let's hear the order?"

"Your request might be impossible to fulfil."

"When you had a desire and charged me with fulfilling it, did I ever reply, 'That's impossible'?"

"But a request couched in such exacting terms..."

"Oh, rest assured, Sir," said Mordaunt in a tone of sincerity, "it won't ruin you."

"Well, then," said Cromwell, "I promise to grant your request insofar as it's within my power. Ask."

"We took two notable prisoners this morning, Sir," Mordaunt replied. "I ask you to give them to me."

"Have they offered a substantial ransom?" said Cromwell.

"On the contrary, Sir, I don't think they're at all wealthy."

"Are they friends of yours, then?"

"Yes, Sir, that's it," cried Mordaunt. "They're friends of mine, dear, dear friends, and I'd give my life for them."

"Fine, Mordaunt," said Cromwell, happy to have his good opinion of the young man restored. "Fine, I give them to you. I don't even need to know who they are; do as you please."

"Thank you, sir," cried Mordaunt, "thank you! My life is now yours, and even if I lose it I'll still be indebted to you. Thank you, you've paid me magnificently for my services."

He threw himself at Cromwell's feet and despite the efforts of the Puritan general to prevent him, who didn't want or pretended not to want this almost royal homage, he took Cromwell's hand and kissed it. "What!" said Cromwell, rising and making him stop. "No other reward? No money? No promotion?"

"You've given me all that I desire, Milord, and I'll never ask for more."

And Mordaunt rushed from the general's tent with the joy in his heart shining from his eyes. Cromwell watched him go. "Killed his own uncle!" he muttered thoughtfully. "Alas! What kind of men are my servants? It may be that this one, who asks for nothing, or seems to, asks a higher price in the sight of God than those who ask for the wealth of a province, or to steal the bread of the unfortunate. No one serves me for nothing; even Charles, my prisoner, still has friends. I? I have none." And with a sigh, he resumed the reverie that Mordaunt had interrupted.

231
Gentlemen

While Mordaunt made his way to Cromwell's tent, d'Artagnan and Porthos conducted their prisoners back to the house that had been assigned to them as lodging in Newcastle. Mordaunt's brief aside with his sergeant hadn't escaped the Gascon, so he'd warned Athos and Aramis to take every precaution. Consequently, the pair had marched along in silence, keeping near their ostensible captors, while wrapped in their own thoughts. If ever a man was astonished, it was Mousqueton when he saw from the doorway the approach of the four friends, followed by the sergeant with almost a dozen men. He rubbed his eyes, unable to believe in the sight of Athos and Aramis but finally he was forced to give in to the evidence. He was about to explode into questions and exclamations when a look from Porthos silenced him without argument. Mousqueton stepped back from the doorway but continued to stare, dismayed by the way the four friends didn't seem to recognise each other. The house to which d'Artagnan and Porthos had brought Athos and Aramis was where they'd been staying since the day before, when Cromwell had assigned it to them. It was on the corner of a street, had a small garden, and a stable around the corner on the side. The windows on the ground floor were barred, as is often the case in small provincial towns, making it somewhat resemble a prison. The two friends ordered Mousqueton to take their horses to the stable, then paused on the threshold of the door to let their prisoners enter first. "Why aren't we going in with them?" said Porthos.

"Because first," replied d'Artagnan, "we must see what this sergeant and the men who came with him want from us."

The sergeant and his men were taking up a position in the small garden. D'Artagnan asked them what they wanted and why there were posted there. "We were ordered to help you guard your prisoners," said the sergeant.

Nothing could be said against that; on the contrary, it had to be regarded as a sort of favour, an attention for which one should show gratitude. D'Artagnan thanked the sergeant and give him a crown with which to drink to the health of General Cromwell. The sergeant replied that Puritans didn't drink but still put the crown in his pocket. "Ah, d'Artagnan!" said Porthos when he returned. "What a terrible day!"

"What do you mean, Porthos? How can you complain about a day on which we found our friends?"

"Yes but consider the circumstances!"

"It's true that our current situation is a trifle embarrassing," said d'Artagnan, "but no matter, let's go inside and see if we can clear things up a little."

"It's a complete mess," said Porthos, "and now I understand why Aramis recommended I strangle that dreadful Mordaunt."

"Be silent!" said d'Artagnan. "Don't say that name."

"But I'm speaking French, and those soldiers speak English," said Porthos.

D'Artagnan gaped at Porthos with the awe of a man of reason in the presence of a prodigy. Then, as Porthos just stared back with a look of incomprehension, d'Artagnan pushed him toward the house and said, "Let's go in."

Porthos entered first, followed by d'Artagnan, who carefully closed the door before embracing his two friends. Athos was stricken with sorrow. Aramis looked at Porthos and d'Artagnan without saying a word but his look was so expressive that d'Artagnan understood it. "You wonder how it is we come to be here, eh? My God, that should be easy to guess: Mazarin ordered us to carry a letter to General Cromwell."

"But how is it you come in the company of Mordaunt?" said Athos. "Mordaunt, whom I warned you against, d'Artagnan."

"And whom I advised you to strangle, Porthos," said Aramis.

"Mazarin again," said d'Artagnan. "Cromwell had sent him to Mazarin, and Mazarin sent us to return with him to Cromwell. Fate seems to have taken a hand in this."

"Yes, you're right, d'Artagnan – fate which divides us, and then ruins us. So, Aramis, let's say no more about it and prepare ourselves to submit to fate."

"God's blood!" d'Artagnan swore. "On the contrary, we're going to talk about it, because we agreed once and for all that we would always support each other, even if we were on different sides."

"Very different indeed," said Athos with a sour smile. "For here I must ask you that side do you serve? Ah, d'Artagnan, you see what serving that wretch Mazarin has gotten you? Do you know what crime you were guilty of today? Of the capture of the king – of his humiliation – of his death."

"Oh!" said Porthos "Do you really think that?"

"You exaggerate, Athos," said d'Artagnan. "They won't go that far."

"Won't they, by God? On the contrary. Why does someone arrest their king? If you wish to respect him as a master, you don't buy him like a slave. Do you think it was to restore him to the throne that Cromwell paid two hundred thousand pounds for him? Friends, they mean to kill him, you can be sure of that at the very least. It's better to behead a king than to beat and belabour him."

"That may be possible, I won't argue," said d'Artagnan. "But what does that have to do with us? I'm here because I'm a soldier, and I serve my commander, from whom I draw my pay. I swore an oath to obey, and so I obey. But you, who have sworn no oath, why are you here, and what cause do you serve?"

"The most sacred cause in the world," said Athos. "That of chivalry, royalty, and religion. A friend, a wife, and a daughter did us the honour to ask for our help. We served them as best as our feeble means allowed, and God will measure our intentions rather than our abilities. You see things differently, d'Artagnan, and though I don't turn away from you, I do blame you for it."

"Oh?" said d'Artagnan. "And what's it to me if Sir Cromwell, who's English, wants to rebel against his king, who's Scottish? I'm French, I am, and none of these things concern me. Why hold me responsible for them?"

"That's right," said Porthos.

"Because all gentlemen are brothers; because you are gentlemen; because the kings of all nations are the first among gentlemen; because the peasants, like blind, ungrateful beasts, take pleasure in tearing down their betters – and it's you, d'Artagnan, a man of the old aristocracy, a man of good name, a nobleman of the sword, it's you who helped deliver a king into the lowly hands of brewers, tailors, and carters! Oh, d'Artagnan – as a soldier perhaps you did your duty but as a gentleman, I say you've failed." D'Artagnan felt ill at ease and did not answer, chewing on a straw. He looked away from Athos, only to meet the eyes of Aramis. "And you, Porthos," continued the count as if to avoid further embarrassing d'Artagnan, "you, the warmest heart, the best friend, the finest soldier I know; you, whose greatness of soul makes you worthy enough to have been born at the foot of a throne, as will someday be recognised by an intelligent king; you, my dear Porthos, a gentleman by manners, by taste, and by boldness – you are as guilty as d'Artagnan."

Porthos blushed, with pleasure rather than shame but nonetheless bowed his head as if humiliated, and said, "Yes, yes, I'm sure you're right, my dear Count."

Athos rose. "Come," he said, approaching d'Artagnan and offering his hand, "come, don't be dismayed, my dear son, for everything I've said to you, I've said it if not in the voice, then at least with the heart of a father. It would have been easier, believe me, just to thank you for saving my life, without revealing a word of my feelings."

"No doubt, Athos," said d'Artagnan, clasping his hand, "but the kind of feelings you have in that great heart are like those of no one else. Who could imagine that a reasonable man would leave France, his home, and his ward, a charming young man whom we visited in camp – to go where? To try to rescue a rotten and worm-eaten monarchy ready to collapse any day like an old barracks. The feelings you speak of are noble and high, certainly but so high they're superhuman."

"Whatever they may be, d'Artagnan," replied Athos, without falling into the trap his Gascon friend had set by alluding to his paternal affection for Raoul, "whatever they may be, you know very well in the bottom of your heart that they're right – but it is wrong of me to dispute so with my master. I'm your prisoner, d'Artagnan, and you may treat me as such."

"Ah, for the love of God!" said d'Artagnan. "You're well aware that you won't be my prisoner for long."

"No," said Aramis, "they will doubtless treat us like those who were taken at Philphaugh."

"And how were they treated?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Half of them were hanged, and the other half were shot," said Aramis.

"Indeed?" said d'Artagnan. "Well, I'm telling you now that as long as there's a drop of blood in my veins, you'll be neither hanged nor shot. God! Let them come! Athos, do you see this door?"

"Yes. Well?"

"Well! You can use this door whenever you please – and as soon as you do, you and Aramis are as free as air."

"Now there I recognise my brave d'Artagnan," replied Athos, "but you're not the power that holds us – that door is guarded, d'Artagnan, as you're well aware."

"Oh, you'll get through," said Porthos. "What's there to stop you? Ten men at the most."

"That would be nothing for the four of us but it's too much for just us two. No, divided as we are now, we're doomed. You've already seen the example, on the high road to Vendôme where d'Artagnan, though brave, and Porthos, though valiant and strong, were defeated. And now, for Aramis and me, it's our turn. That never happened when we four were united but now, well, let us die as de Winter died. As for me, I declare I refuse to flee unless we all four go together."

"Impossible," said d'Artagnan. "We're here under Mazarin's orders."

"I know it, and I won't press you further. My arguments have been useless; they must have been bad arguments, since they haven't persuaded minds as fair as yours."

"Besides, even if we'd succeeded," said Aramis, "we'd just have compromised our two fine friends, d'Artagnan and Porthos. Rest easy, Gentlemen – we'll honour you by dying well. As for me, I'm proud to stand up before the bullets, or even go to the rope with you, Athos, for you've never seemed to me as great as you do today."

D'Artagnan said nothing but after chewing his straw down to a nub, he gnawed his fingers. Finally, he said, "Do you really think they want to kill you? And why? Who would have an interest in your death? Besides, you're our prisoners."

"Fool, triple fool!" said Aramis. "I thought you said you knew Mordaunt? Well, I exchanged just a single glance with him, and by that look I knew we were condemned."

"As a matter of fact, I'm sorry I didn't strangle him as you advised, Aramis," said Porthos.

"Bah! Don't talk to me about Mordaunt!" snapped d'Artagnan. "That insect! Cap de Diou! If he buzzes too close to me, I'll crush him. There's no reason to flee, because, I swear to you, you're as safe here as you were twenty years ago, when Athos was in Rue Férou and Aramis in Rue de Vaugirard."

"Enough," said Athos, pointing out one of the two barred windows that admitted light into the room. "You'll know soon enough whether you can hold us, because here he comes now."

"Who?"

"Mordaunt."

In fact, looking where Athos had indicated, d'Artagnan saw a cavalier approaching at a gallop. It was indeed Mordaunt. D'Artagnan darted to the door. Porthos began to follow him but d'Artagnan said, "Wait here. Don't come out until you hear me drum my fingers on the door."

232 The Saviour!

When Mordaunt arrived before the house, he saw d'Artagnan at the doorway, and the soldiers sprawled out in the garden next to their weapons. "Hey!" he called, out of breath from his swift ride. "Are the prisoners still there?"

"Yes, Sir," said the sergeant, rising quickly along with his men, who, like him, raised hands to hats in sudden salutes.

"Good. Four men are to take them right away to my quarters."

Four men prepared themselves. "What's your pleasure?" said d'Artagnan in that mocking air with which our readers are familiar. "What's all this, if you please?"

"What it is, Sir," said Mordaunt, "is that I've ordered four men to take charge of the prisoners taken this morning and escort them to my quarters."

"And why is that?" asked d'Artagnan. "You'll pardon my curiosity but you can understand my desire to be educated on the subject."

"Because these prisoners are mine now," replied Mordaunt haughtily, "and I can dispose of them as I like."

"Permit me, my young gentleman, to point out that you're in error," said d'Artagnan. "The custom's that prisoners go to those who took them, and not to those who watched them taken. You'd have taken Milord de Winter who was your uncle or so they say but you preferred to kill him. Well, Sir Vallon and I'd have killed these two gentlemen but we preferred to take them. Everyone to his taste."

Mordaunt went white to his lips. D'Artagnan realised that things were about to get out of hand and drummed the march of the guards on the door. Porthos emerged and stood just outside the door, his giant frame filling the doorway. The significance of this move wasn't lost on Mordaunt. "Sir," said he, anger starting to rise, "to resist is useless, as these prisoners have been given to me just now by the general in chief, my illustrious patron, Oliver Cromwell."

These words struck d'Artagnan like a thunderbolt. He flushed to his temples, a cloud passed before his eyes, and as he comprehended the young man's fierce hopes, his hand dropped instinctively toward the hilt of his sword. As for Porthos, he watched d'Artagnan to match his own actions to the Gascon's. This look from Porthos worried rather than reassured d'Artagnan, who was beginning to be sorry he'd deployed the brute force of Porthos into a matter it now seemed to him had to be handled by a ruse. "Violence can't solve this," he said to himself. "D'Artagnan, my friend, you must prove to this young serpent that you are not only stronger than he but smarter as well."

"Ah!" he said aloud, making a deep bow. "Why didn't you say that before, Sir Mordaunt? You come on behalf of Oliver Cromwell, the most illustrious captain of our times?"

"I just left him, Sir, this very minute," said Mordaunt, dismounting and giving his horse to one of his soldiers.

"You should have said so immediately, my dear Sir!" continued d'Artagnan. "All England is at the command of Sir Cromwell, and since you demand the prisoners in his name, I bow to you, Sir, and say to you, take them."

Mordaunt advanced, radiant, while Porthos, devastated, looked at d'Artagnan in a profound stupor, and opened his mouth as if to speak. But d'Artagnan kicked Porthos, who then understood that his friend was playing a game. Mordaunt mounted the doorstep and then, hat in hand, prepared to pass between the two friends, while gesturing to his four men to follow him. "But, begging your pardon," said d'Artagnan with his most charming smile, while resting his hand on the young man's shoulder, "if the illustrious General Oliver Cromwell has disposed of these prisoners in your favour, you no doubt have a writ that orders such a disposition."

Mordaunt stopped short. "If you can show me such a letter, even the least little note, that attests you come in his name, then give me that scrap so I will have at least some pretext for handing over my compatriots. Otherwise, you understand, though I'm sure General Cromwell wishes them no harm, it would have an improper appearance."

Mordaunt drew back, feeling the blow, and glowered fiercely at d'Artagnan but the latter just maintained the most friendly and amiable expression ever seen on any face. "When I tell you something, Sir," said Mordaunt, "will you insult me by doubting it?"

"If!" exclaimed d'Artagnan. "I, to doubt what you say? God forbid, my dear Sir Mordaunt. On the contrary, I regard you as a worthy and accomplished gentleman – to all appearances. But come, Sir, will you speak frankly with me?" continued d'Artagnan, all sincerity.

"Speak, Sir," said Mordaunt.

"Sir du Vallon who's rich, has an income of forty thousand livres a year, and has no further need of money – so I don't speak for him, only myself."

"Go on, Sir."

"But as for me, I'm not wealthy. In Gascony, that's no dishonour, no one is – even Henry IV, of glorious memory, who was King of the Gascons, as His Majesty Philip IV is king of all Spain, even he never had a penny in his pocket."

"Get to it, Sir," said Mordaunt. "I think I see where you're going, and if that's the hold up, that difficulty can be overcome."

“Ah! I knew all along,” said d’Artagnan, “that you were a man of intelligence. Well, here’s the point, the spot where the saddle rubs, as we Frenchmen say: I’m a soldier of fortune, nothing more; I have only what my sword gets for me that is usually more blows than bank-notes. Now, upon taking this morning two Frenchmen who appear to be of high rank, two Knights of the Garter, no less, I said to myself, ‘My fortune is made.’ I say two, because under the circumstances, Sir du Vallon, who is wealthy, always yields his prisoners to me.”

Mordaunt, completely taken in by d’Artagnan’s charm offensive, smiled like a man who is in on the joke, and wryly replied, “I’ll have you your order within the hour, Sir, and two thousand pistoles to go with it – but meanwhile, let me take these men with me.”

“What does a half-hour delay matter to someone like you?” said d’Artagnan. “No, I’m an orderly man, Sir, and I like things done properly.”

“You know, Sir, that I could take them by force,” replied Mordaunt. “I command here.”

“Ah, Sir,” said d’Artagnan, smiling agreeably, “it’s clear that, though Sir du Vallon and I have had the honour of travelling in your company, you do not know us. We are veteran gentlemen of the sword, and quite capable, we two, of killing you and your eight men. Before God, Sir Mordaunt, don’t be obstinate, because when you persist I persist, and I can get terribly stubborn. And Sir here,” continued d’Artagnan, indicating Porthos, “is even more stubborn and difficult than I am – and besides, we were sent by Cardinal Mazarin, who represents the King of France. Which means that we represent the king and the cardinal, and are therefore, in our capacity as ambassadors, quite inviolable – a thing that Oliver Cromwell, who is a great politician in addition to a great general, certainly understands. Ask him for the written order. What does that cost you, my dear Sir Mordaunt?”

“Yes, a written order,” said Porthos who began to understand d’Artagnan’s intentions. “That’s all we’re asking for.”

However inclined Mordaunt might be to use force, he had to recognise that the reasons d’Artagnan had given him were good ones. Besides, d’Artagnan’s reputation was impressive, and since what he’d seen that morning had only reinforced that reputation, he paused to reflect. Also, ignorant as he was of the friendship between the four Frenchmen, his suspicions were settled by the very convincing motive of the ransom money. So, he decided to go get the requested order, and to return with the promised 2000 pistoles into the bargain. Mordaunt remounted his horse and after ordering the sergeant to remain on guard, turned and rode off. “Good!” muttered d’Artagnan. “It’ll take a quarter of an hour to reach the general’s tent, and another quarter-hour to return that is more time than we need.”

Then, turning to Porthos without the slightest change in his expression, so that anyone watching might think he was just continuing the same conversation, he said, “Friend Porthos, listen closely. First of all, not a word to our friends of what you just heard – there’s no need for them to know of the service we just rendered them.”

“All right, I understand,” said Porthos.

“Go to the stable, where you’ll find Mousqueton. Saddle the horses, load the pistols into their holsters, bring the horses out, and lead them down the street and around the corner. Then just mount and wait – the rest is up to me.”

Porthos made no remarks, just obeyed with that sublime confidence he had in his friend. “I go,” he said, “only, could I pass through the room where our friends are?”

“No, that’s unnecessary.”

“Fine! Just do me the favour to collect my purse that I left on the mantel.”

“No problem.”

Porthos walked calmly and quietly toward the stable, passing among the soldiers who, Frenchman though he was, couldn’t help but admire his great stature and mighty limbs. At the corner of the street he met Mousqueton, whom he took with him. Then d’Artagnan went inside, whistling a little air he’d begun while watching Porthos leave. “My dear Athos,” he said, “I’ve been considering your arguments, and I’m entirely convinced. I regret getting involved in this business. Mazarin is a wretch, just as you say, so I’ve decided to escape with you. No time for talk, prepare yourselves; your swords are there in the corner, and don’t forget them, as they’re tools which, under the circumstances, may prove useful. Which reminds me to get Porthos his purse – ah, here it is!” D’Artagnan put the purse into his pocket as his two friends gaped at him in amazement. “Well, what are you staring at?” he asked. “I was blind but now I see, thanks to Athos. Come over here.” His friends approached. “Do you see that street?” said d’Artagnan, pointing. “That’s where the horses will be. You’re just going to go out the door, turn left, jump on the horses, and that’s all there is to it. Just wait until you hear me call out the signal that will be: Our Saviour!”

“But you, d’Artagnan – give us your word that you’re coming with us,” said Athos.

“Before God, I swear it!”

“All right,” said Aramis. “At the cry of, ‘The Lord Our Saviour,’ we go out, knock over anyone who gets in our way, run to our horses, jump in the saddle, and spur off. Right?”

“As rain!”

“You see, Aramis,” said Athos, “I always tell you d’Artagnan is the best of us.”

“Fine,” said d’Artagnan, “but while you pay me compliments, I’ll get on with it. Goodbye.”

“And you’ll be right behind us, won’t you?”

“I hope so. Now don’t forget the signal: Our Saviour! ”

And he went back out wearing the same calm demeanour as when he’d entered, whistling the tune he’d interrupted. The soldiers dozed or played cards, while two in a corner badly sang the psalm, “By the waters of Babylon.” D’Artagnan called to the sergeant, “My dear Sir, Sir Mordaunt’s asked me to attend on General Cromwell. Please take good care of the prisoners.”

The sergeant shrugged to indicate that he didn’t understand French. D’Artagnan tried to make him understand by gestures and sign language what he wanted to convey, and the sergeant nodded to indicate everything was fine. D’Artagnan went around to the stable, where he found all five horses saddled, and his own among them. “Each of you take an extra horse,” he said to Porthos and Mousqueton, “and lead it around to the left to where Athos and Aramis can see you from their window.”

“Then will they come out?” said Porthos.

“In a moment.”

“You didn’t forget my purse?”

“No, never fear.”

“Good.”

And Porthos and Mousqueton, each leading another horse, rode to their position. D’Artagnan, left alone, took out flint and steel, and set fire to a tiny bit of tinder. Then he climbed on his horse, rode out into the street, and stopped in the midst of the soldiers in the yard. And there, while stroking the animal with one hand, with the other he pushed the burning tinder into its ear. It was a thing only a master horseman like d’Artagnan could risk, for as soon as the animal felt the touch of the burning ember it uttered a shriek of pain, reared back, and began leaping around as if mad. The soldiers, threatened by the flailing hooves, fell about and scattered. “Help me! Help!” cried d’Artagnan. “Stop my horse! It’s gone crazy!” And indeed, it had blood in its eyes and foam on its lips. “Help me!” d’Artagnan cried but the soldiers didn’t dare approach. “Help! Are you going to let him kill me? Our Saviour!”

D’Artagnan had scarcely uttered this cry before the door burst open and out rushed Athos and Aramis, swords in hand. But thanks to d’Artagnan’s ruse, the way was clear. “The prisoners are escaping!” cried the sergeant. “The prisoners are escaping!”

“Wait! Stop!” shouted d’Artagnan, releasing the reins of his furious horse that leapt forward, knocking over two or three men.

“Stop! Halt!” cried the soldiers, running to their weapons.

But the prisoners were already in the saddle, and once in the saddle they lost no time galloping toward the nearest city gate. Halfway up the street they met Grimaud and Blaisois, who were looking for their masters. At a sign from Athos Grimaud understood everything and fell in behind the little troop as it passed like a hurricane, while d’Artagnan, still shouting in feigned dismay, followed farther back. They passed through the gate in a blur, before the guards could even think about halting them, and found themselves in open country. Meanwhile, the soldiers at the house continued shouting, “Halt! Stop!” while the sergeant who realised he’d been fooled, tore at his hair.

Just then a rider came galloping up, a sheet of paper in his hand. It was Mordaunt, returning with the order. “Where are the prisoners?” he cried, leaping down from his horse. The sergeant couldn’t find the strength to answer him, just pointed toward the gaping door and the empty room. Mordaunt rushed to the doorstep, understood everything, gave a cry that seemed to come from the very depths of his being, and fell fainting to the flagstones.

Even in the Most Difficult Situations, Great Hearts Never lose their Courage & Strong Stomachs Never lose their Appetites

The little troop, without looking back or exchanging a word, rode on at the gallop, crossing a narrow river of which no one knew the name and passing a town on their left that Athos thought must be Durham. At length they came upon a little wood, and the horses were turned toward it and given a final touch of the spur. As soon as they’d disappeared behind a curtain of leaves thick enough to hide them from the eyes of pursuers, they stopped to hold a council. The horses were given to two of the lackeys so they could breathe without being unsaddled or unbridled, while Grimaud was placed as a sentinel. “First, come let me embrace you, my friend,” said Athos to d’Artagnan, “you who are our saviour, you who are the true hero among us!”

“Athos is right, and I admire you,” said Aramis, taking d’Artagnan into his arms. “Think what you could do for an intelligent master, with that infallible eye, that arm of steel, and that conquering spirit!”

“That’s all very well,” said the Gascon, “and I accept these thanks and embraces on behalf of myself and Porthos but we have no time to spare for that now.”

The two friends, reminded by d’Artagnan of what they also owed to Porthos, took turns shaking his hand. “Now,” said Athos, “it’s a matter of not riding off at random like fools, and instead coming up with a plan. What are we going to do?”

“What are we going to do? God be with you, that’s not hard to say!”

“Then say it, d’Artagnan.”

“We make our way to the nearest seaport, gather what resources we have, outfit a boat and cross over to France. As to me, I’ll put up everything I’ve got down to my last sou. Our chief treasure is our lives, and right now, it must be said, they’re hanging by a thread.”

“What do you say, du Vallon?” asked Athos.

“Me, I agree completely with d’Artagnan’s advice,” said Porthos. “It’s an ugly country, this England.”

“You’re determined to leave her, then?” Athos asked d’Artagnan.

“God’s blood!” said d’Artagnan. “I can’t see what there is to hold me.”

Athos exchanged a look with Aramis. “Then go on, my friends,” he said with a sigh.

“Go on! What?” said d’Artagnan. “You mean, ‘Let’s all go,’ don’t you?”

“No, my friend,” said Athos. “We must part.”

“We must part!” said d’Artagnan, flabbergasted.

“Bah!” said Porthos. “Why should we part, when we’re finally together?”

“Because your mission is done, and you can and ought to return to France – but ours is not.”

“Your mission isn’t finished?” said d’Artagnan, looking at Athos in surprise.

“No, my friend,” replied Athos, in that voice so gentle, yet so firm. “We came here to defend King Charles, we defended him poorly, and now we must save him.”

“Save the king!” said d’Artagnan, looking at Aramis as he had at Athos. Aramis just nodded.

D’Artagnan’s face took on an expression of deep compassion; he was beginning to think he was dealing with the mentally afflicted. “You can’t seriously mean that, Athos,” he said. “The king is surrounded by an army that’s taking him to London. That army is commanded by a butcher or the son of a butcher named Colonel Harrison. His Majesty’s trial will take place as soon as they arrive in London, I can assure you – I’ve heard enough right from the mouth of Oliver Cromwell to know what to expect.” Athos and Aramis exchanged a second glance. “And with his trial complete, his sentence will soon be executed,” continued d’Artagnan. “Oh, these Puritans don’t waste any time once they go to work!”

“And to what judgement do you think the king will be sentenced?” asked Athos.

“I’m afraid it can be nothing but death. Too much blood has been spilled for forgiveness; they have to kill him. Do you know what Cromwell said when he came to Paris and was shown the Dungeon of Vincennes, where Sir Vendôme had been held?”

“What did he say?” asked Porthos.

“‘You must strike princes only at the head.’”

"I knew it," said Athos.

"And do you think he won't put this maxim into execution, now that he has the king?"

"I'm quite sure he will – which is all the more reason not to abandon that august head."

"Athos, you've gone mad."

"No, my friend," Athos replied mildly. "You see, when de Winter came to find us in France, he took us to see Madam Henriette, and Her Majesty did us the honour, Sir d'Herblay and me, to ask our assistance for her husband. We gave her our word, and our word holds. We committed our minds, our bodies, our very lives to him. Isn't that how you see it, d'Herblay?"

"Yes," said Aramis. "We gave our word."

"Then," continued Athos, "we have another reason, and here it is, so listen carefully: all France is in a shambles at the moment. We have a ten-year-old king who doesn't know what he wants yet; we have a queen blinded by a late romantic passion; we have a minister who treats France as a vast farm to be harvested, caring for nothing but how much gold he can gather through intrigue and Italian tricks; and we have the princes whose opposition to Mazarin is entirely personal and egotistical, and will end up winning nothing but a few scraps of power and sundry bars of gold. I have served them but not out of respect – God knows I see them for who they are, and they don't rank high in my esteem – but rather on principle. Here, today, is something else: here, I find before me a terrible misfortune, a royal misfortune, a misfortune for all Europe, and I must act upon it. If we succeed in saving the king, it will be a fine thing – and if we die for him, it will be glorious!"

"So, you know in advance that it means your death," said d'Artagnan.

"We fear that it may but our only sorrow is to die apart from you."

"What can you do in a land where you're a stranger, an enemy?"

"When I was young I travelled in England, and speak English like a native, and Aramis also has some knowledge of the language. Ah, if only we had you two, my friends! With you, d'Artagnan, and you, Porthos, the four of us reunited for the first time in twenty years, we could stand up not just to England but to Scotland and Ireland into the bargain!"

"And did you promise this queen," replied d'Artagnan sarcastically, "to break into the Tower of London, kill a hundred thousand soldiers, to contest the will of an entire nation as well as the ambition of a man, when that man is named Cromwell? You haven't met that man, Athos – nor have you, Aramis. Hear me! He's a man of genius, who reminded me strongly of our old cardinal – the other, the great one, whom you knew so well. Don't exaggerate the extent of your obligations. In the name of heaven, Athos, you don't have a duty to throw away your life. When I look at you, I seem to see before me a reasonable person – but when I hear you talk, you sound like a madman. Porthos, back me up here: what do you think of this matter?"

"Nothing good," replied Porthos.

"Come," said d'Artagnan, impatient because Athos, instead of listening to him, seemed to hear only a voice within himself, "believe me, Athos, your mission is completed, and completed nobly. Come back to France with us."

"Friend," said Athos, "our resolution is unshakeable."

"Do you have some other motive for this that we don't know about?" Athos just smiled. D'Artagnan punched his thigh angrily, then resumed the battle, calmly stating all the most convincing reasons he could think of. But to all these reasons Athos merely responded with a serene and patient smile, and Aramis just shook his head. "All right!" cried d'Artagnan, losing his temper at last. "Fine! If that's what you want, let's all leave our bones in this bastard of a country, where it's always cold, where good weather is mist, where mist is rain, and where rain is a deluge; where the sun looks like the moon, and the moon looks like cream cheese. Die here, die there, since we all must die, what does it matter?"

"The way to think about it, dear friend," said Athos, "is that we just die a little sooner."

"Bah! A little sooner, a little later, it's scarcely worth fussing about."

"If I'm astonished by anything," said Porthos sententiously, "it's that it hasn't happened already."

"Oh, it's on its way, Porthos, never fear," said d'Artagnan. "So, we're agreed, assuming Porthos doesn't oppose it..."

"Me?" said Porthos. "I'll go where you go. Besides, I think the speech the Count La Fère just made for us was very pretty."

"But what about your future, d'Artagnan? And your ambitions, Porthos?"

"Our future! Our ambitions!" said d'Artagnan airily. "Why should we worry about that, since we're saving a king? We just need to rescue the king, rally his friends, defeat the Puritans, reconquer England, return him to London and place him on his throne..."

"And then he'll make us dukes and peers," said Porthos, his eyes alight, as if already living the happy ending to this fable.

"Or he'll just forget us," said d'Artagnan.

"But no!" said Porthos.

"Dame! We've seen that already, friend Porthos. It seems to me we performed a service for Queen Anne of Austria that wasn't much less than what we propose to do for Charles I. That didn't stop Queen Anne from forgetting us for over twenty years."

"Even so, d'Artagnan," said Athos, "are you sorry you did her that favour?"

"No, my faith," said d'Artagnan, "and I even admit that in hard times I've found some consolation in the memory of it."

"And you know, d'Artagnan, that though princes may be ungrateful, God will remember."

"You know, Athos," said d'Artagnan, "I think if you met the Devil on earth, you could talk him into following you into heaven."

"And so?" said Athos, offering his hand to d'Artagnan.

"And so, we're agreed," said d'Artagnan. "I find England a charming country, and I'll stay – on one condition."

"What's that?"

"That no one tries to teach me English."

"Well!" said Athos triumphantly. "Now, my friend, I swear to you, by God who hears all, and by my name which I believe to be above reproach, that there is a power who watches over us, and that gives me hope that we shall all once more return safely to France."

"May it be so," said d'Artagnan, "though I confess I can't believe it."

"Our dear d'Artagnan!" said Aramis. "He represents among us a parliament's loyal opposition that always says no but always does yes."

"And who in doing so, somehow always save the country," said Athos.

"Well, now that that's settled," said Porthos, rubbing his hands, "let's turn our thoughts to dinner! For it seems to me that, no matter what perils we've faced, we've always found time to eat."

"Ah, yes!" said d'Artagnan. "Let's speak of dinner in a land where they eat boiled mutton at every meal, and drink nothing but beer. What were you thinking when you came to such a country, Athos? Ah but pardon me," he added, smiling, "I forgot that you're no longer Athos. Never mind – let's hear your plan for dinner, Porthos."

"My plan!"

"Yes, don't you have a plan?"

"No, all I have is an appetite."

"For the love of God! Now that you mention it, so do I. We're going to have to find some food, or else take up eating grass like our horses..."

"Ah! When we were at the Heretic, do you remember what fine oysters we had?" said Aramis, who was not as detached from d'Arthos pleasures as Athos.

"And the lamb outlets they make in those salt marshes," said Porthos, licking his lips.

"But Porthos, don't we still have our friend Mousqueton," said d'Artagnan, "who made life so easy for you at Chantilly?"

"Indeed, we do have Mousqueton," said Porthos, "but since he became my intendant he's grown ... and grown less active. But no matter, I'll summon him." And he called out agreeably, "Hey! Mouston!"

Mousqueton appeared, wearing a most pitiful expression. "My dear Sir Mouston, what's the matter?" asked d'Artagnan. "Are you ill?"

"Sir, I'm very hungry," replied Mousqueton.

"Well! That's the very reason we called for you, my dear Sir Mouston. Could you please hunt up some nice rabbits and a few succulent partridges, like those from which you made such fricassees and soups at the Hôtel de ... my faith, what was the name of that inn?"

"The Hôtel de ... my faith, I can't remember it either."

"No matter! While you're at it, lasso up some more bottles of that Burgundy that had such curative properties when your master had his, er, sprain."

"Alas, Sir!" said Mousqueton. "I'm afraid what you ask for is quite hard to find in this dreadful country, and we might do better to ask for hospitality from the master of that little house one can see from the edge of the woods."

"Oh? You say there's a house nearby?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Yes, Sir," Mousqueton replied.

"Well, then, as you say, let's go ask the master of this house for some dinner. Gentlemen, are you in accord with this idea of Sir Mouston's?"

"But what if the householder is a Puritan?" said Aramis.

"God be with you, all the better!" said d'Artagnan. "If he's a Puritan, we'll tell him of the king's capture, and in honour of such news, he'll slaughter the fatted calf."

"And if he's a royalist?" said Porthos.

"In that case we'll look mournful, and he'll slaughter the black sheep."

"Such good cheer!" said Athos, smiling despite everything at the indomitable Gascon. "I think you could laugh at anything."

"What would you have?" said d'Artagnan. "I was born in a place without a cloud in the sky."

"Not like here," said Porthos, extending a hand to make sure what he'd felt on his cheek was a drop of rain.

"Then let's go," said d'Artagnan. "All the more reason for us to move on. Hey, Grimaud!"

Grimaud appeared. "Grimaud, my friend, have you seen anything?" asked d'Artagnan.

"Nothing," replied Grimaud.

"What blunderers," said Porthos. "They haven't even pursued us. Now, if we'd been handling it ...!"

"And a shame it is, too," said d'Artagnan. "A private place like this would be perfect for what I have to say to Mordaunt. This is a lovely spot to lay a man out."

"Decidedly, Gentlemen," said Aramis, "I don't think the son is in the same class as his mother."

"Eh, my friend," said Athos, "give him a chance. We've been gone less than two hours, and he has no idea which way we went or where we are. Don't decide he's less of a threat than his mother until we've once more set foot in France, with none of us run through or poisoned."

"Then let's have dinner while we wait," said Porthos.

"My faith, yes," said Athos, "for I'm hungry too."

"Black sheep, beware!" said Aramis. And the four friends, led by Mousqueton, advanced toward the house, already restored to their usual confidence, now that, as Athos had said, they were all four reunited.

As they approached the house, our fugitives saw that the ground around it was torn up, as if a considerable troop of equestrians had preceded them; the marks were most pronounced near the door and showed that the troop had halted there. "For the love of God!" said d'Artagnan. "It's as clear as writing: the king and his captors have passed here."

"The devil!" said Porthos. "In that case, they'll have eaten all the food."

"They might have missed a hen," said d'Artagnan.

He jumped from his horse and knocked on the door. But no one answered. He pushed open the door that was unlocked, and saw that the front room was empty and deserted. "Well?" asked Porthos.

"I don't see anyone," said d'Artagnan. "Ah, wait!"

“What is it?”

“Blood!”

At this word, his three friends leapt off their horses and entered the first room but d’Artagnan was already opening the door into the second, and by the expression on his face it was clear he’d found something. The three friends approached and saw a young man lying on the floor in a pool of blood. One could see that he’d tried to get to his bed but his strength had run out and he’d collapsed just short of it. Athos, who thought he’d seen a movement, was the first to approach the unfortunate young man. “Well?” asked d’Artagnan.

“Well!” said Athos. “If he’s dead, it hasn’t been for long, because he’s still warm. But no, his heart still beats. Hey, there, friend.”

The wounded man sighed. From a bowl, d’Artagnan poured some water into his cupped hand and splashed it on his face. The man opened his eyes, tried to raise his head and fell back. Athos tried to lift the man to lean him on his knee but saw that the man’s wound was to his head; his skull was split, and blood still flowed from the gash. Aramis dipped a towel in the water bowl and applied it to the wound, and the coolness brought the man around so that he opened his eyes again. He looked with surprise at these men who seemed to pity him and who as much as they could, were trying to help him. “You are among friends,” said Athos in English. “Have no fear. But if you have the strength, tell us what happened.”

“The king,” murmured the wounded man. “The king is a prisoner.”

“You saw him?” asked Aramis in the same language.

The man didn’t answer. “Don’t worry,” said Athos, “we’re loyal servants of His Majesty.”

“Are you speaking the truth?” asked the wounded man.

“On our honor as gentlemen.”

“Then I can tell you?”

“Speak.”

“I’m the brother of Parry, His Majesty’s valet.”

Athos and Aramis remembered that it was by that name that Winter had addressed the servant they’d met in the corridor of the royal pavilion. “We know him,” said Athos. “He never left the king’s side!” “Yes, that’s him!” said the wounded man. “When the king was taken, he went with him, and when they neared my house, he thought of me. He asked in the name of the king if they could stop here. The request was granted; the king, he said, was hungry. They brought him into this room so he could take his meal, and placed sentries at the doors and windows. Parry knew this room, because several times, while His Majesty was at Newcastle, he’d come to see me. He knew there was a trap door in the floor that led to the cellar, and that from the cellar one could reach the orchard. He made a sign to me about it, and I understood. But one of the king’s guardians must have seen the gesture and become suspicious. I knew nothing about that, I just wanted to save His Majesty. So, I pretended I needed to go out and get some wood, thinking there was no time to lose. I came back in through the outside door that opened into the cellar. I went to the trap door and slowly raised it, just as Parry was quietly bolting the inner door, and I beckoned to the king to follow me. But alas! He didn’t want to do it – it was as if he didn’t really want to escape. Then Parry clasped his hands and begged him, and we implored him not to lose this opportunity. Finally he decided to follow me into the cellar. I went in front, with the king a few steps behind me, when suddenly, in the passage to the outer door, a great shadow rose up in front of me. I tried to cry out to warn the king but didn’t have time – I felt a blow like the entire house falling on my head and fell unconscious.”

“Faithful servant!” said Athos. “Good and loyal Englishman!”

“When I came to, I was lying where they’d left me. I dragged myself out and around to the front but the king and his captors were gone. It took maybe an hour to crawl inside this far before my strength was gone, and I passed out for a second time.”

“And now, how do you feel?”

“Very bad,” said the brother of Parry.

“Can we do anything for you?” asked Athos.

“Help me up onto the bed; I think I’ll feel better there.”

“Is there anyone we can send to for help?”

“My wife went to Durham and should be back any time now. But you, is there anything you need, anything you want?”

“We came here intending to ask you for some food.”

“Alas! They took everything; there’s not a crust of bread left in the house.”

“Do you hear, d’Artagnan?” said Athos. “We’ll have to find our dinner elsewhere.”

“That hardly matters now,” said d’Artagnan. “I’ve lost my appetite.”

“My faith, me too,” said Porthos.

They carried the man to his bed, and sent for Grimaud, who dressed his wound. In the service of the four companions, Grimaud had had occasion to patch them up so many times that he had the skills of a field surgeon. Meanwhile the fugitives had gathered in the front room for a council. “Now we know what took place here,” said Aramis. “It was indeed the king and his captors who passed through. We should go in the opposite direction. Don’t you agree, Athos?”

Athos said nothing; he was thinking. “Yes,” said Porthos, “let’s go the other way. If we follow the king’s escort, we’ll find everything eaten up and we’ll die of hunger. This England is a cursed country but at least till now I’d always been able to find a dinner in it. Dinner is my favourite meal.”

“What do you think, d’Artagnan?” said Athos. “Do you agree with Aramis?”

“Not at all,” said d’Artagnan, “in fact I think quite the opposite.”

“What? You want to follow the escort?” said Porthos, shocked.

“No, I want to join up with them.”

Athos’s eyes sparkled with joy. “Join up with the escort!” cried Aramis.

“Hear d’Artagnan out,” said Athos. “You know he always has good ideas.”

“No doubt about it,” said d’Artagnan, “We must go where they won’t search for us. They won’t even think of looking for us among the Puritans, so among the Puritans we must go.”

“Fine, my friend – good advice!” said Athos. “I was about to say the same thing myself.”

“So, you agree with him?” asked Aramis.

“Yes. They’ll think we want to leave England, so they’ll be searching the ports. Meanwhile, we’ll go to London with the king. Once in London, we’re safe – it’s easy to hide among a million people. Not to mention,” said Athos, with a glance at Aramis, “the possible opportunities of such a journey.”

“Yes,” said Aramis, “I understand.”

“Me, I don’t understand at all,” said Porthos. “But no matter. If d’Artagnan and Athos agree on a thing, it must be the right idea.”

“But won’t Colonel Harrison be suspicious of us?” asked Aramis.

“Him? God be with you!” said d’Artagnan. “He’s the one I’m counting on. Colonel Harrison will welcome us; he’s seen us twice with General Cromwell, and knows we were sent from France by Mazarin. He’ll treat us like brothers. Besides, isn’t he the son of a butcher? He is, isn’t he? Well, Porthos will show him how he can knock out an ox with a punch and overturn a bull by taking it by the horns. He’ll love us.”

Athos smiled. “You’re the best comrade a man could have, d’Artagnan,” he said, taking the Gascon’s hand, “and I’m very glad we’re together again, my son.”

That is, as we know, what Athos called d’Artagnan when deeply moved. At that moment Grimaud called them in. The wounded man had been bandaged and was feeling better. The four friends bid him goodbye and asked if there was any message they could convey to his brother. The brave man said, “Tell him he should let the king know they didn’t quite kill me; no matter how unimportant I am, I’m sure His Majesty regrets my death and blames himself for it.”

“Don’t worry,” said d’Artagnan, “he’ll know it before nightfall.” The little troop resumed their march. There was no mistaking their path; the trail they had to follow was clearly visible across the fields.

After about two hours of silent march, d’Artagnan who was in the lead, stopped at a turn in the road, “Ah ha!” he said. “Here are our men.” In fact, a considerable troop of riders could be seen about a half-league ahead. “My dear friends,” said d’Artagnan to Athos and Aramis, “give your swords to Sir Mouston, who will hold them for you, and don’t forget for a moment that you’re our prisoners.”

Then they put their horses that were beginning to tire, into a final trot, and soon caught up to the escort. The king, at the head of the troop, surrounded by Colonel Harrison’s soldiers, rode impassively, dignified and resigned. On seeing Athos and Aramis, to whom he’d not even had time to say farewell, he read in the glances of the two gentlemen that he still had two friends at hand, though he thought they were prisoners. A flush of pleasure coloured the king’s cheeks. D’Artagnan reached the head of the column, where, leaving his friends guarded by Porthos, he rode straight to Harrison. The colonel recognised him from having seen him with Cromwell, and welcomed him as politely as a man of his character and background could manage. As d’Artagnan had foreseen, Harrison suspected nothing. The troop stopped at an inn; it was at this halt that the king was to dine – only this time precautions were put into place to make sure he didn’t escape. In the inn’s common room a small table was placed for the king, and a large table for the officers. “Will you dine with me?” Harrison asked d’Artagnan.

“Would I?” said d’Artagnan. “That would give me great pleasure – but I have my comrade, Sir du Vallon, and our two prisoners whom we can’t leave, and that would overcrowd your table. Maybe it would be better to set up another table in the corner, and send over to us whatever you can spare, because believe me, we’re famished. Then we’ll all be at dinner together, or at least in the same room.”

“We’ll do it,” said Harrison.

The matter was arranged as d’Artagnan had proposed, and when he returned to the colonel’s dinner with his friends, he found the king already seated at his table being served by Parry. Harrison and his officers were gathered in the centre of the room, and a side table awaited the friends in a corner. The table at which the Puritan officers were seated was round, and by chance or deliberate choice, Harrison was sitting with his back to the king. The king watched the four gentlemen enter but seemed to pay them no special attention. The four comrades went to the table set aside for them and seated themselves with their backs to the wall, facing the officers’ table and that of the king. Harrison, to do honour to his guests, sent them the best dishes from his table, though unfortunately for the four friends, there was no honey. This didn’t matter to Athos but d’Artagnan, Porthos, and Aramis grimaced every time they had to swallow beer, the drink of Puritans. “Faith, Colonel,” said d’Artagnan, “we’re very grateful for your gracious invitation, for, without you, we ran the risk of missing our dinner, and we’d already missed breakfast. My friend Sir du Vallon here shares my gratitude, as he was famished.”

“I’m still hungry,” said Porthos, saluting Colonel Harrison.

“And how did the grave calamity of your missing breakfast come about?” asked the colonel with a laugh.

“The reason is simple enough, Colonel,” said d’Artagnan. “I was eager to catch up to you, and in my haste, I followed the same route you’d taken, a mistake an old forager like me should never have made, as I should have known that where experienced troops like yours pass, they leave nothing behind. You can understand our disappointment when, upon arriving at a pretty little house at the edge of a wood, a handsome dwelling with a red roof and green shutters, instead of finding chickens to roast and ham steaks to grill, we discovered a poor devil bathed in blood .... God be with you, Colonel, my compliments to whichever of your officers delivered that blow, for it was so mighty it earned the admiration of my friend Sir du Vallon, who’s no amateur when it comes to blows.”

“Yes,” said Harrison, laughing and catching the eye of an officer at his table, “when Groslow takes on such a task, no follow up is needed.”

“Ah, so it was sir, here,” said d’Artagnan, saluting the officer. “I regret that sir doesn’t speak French, or I’d pay him my compliments directly.”

“I’m ready to receive them and pay you back in kind, Sir,” said the officer in reasonably good French. “I lived in Paris for three years.”

“Well, Sir,” continued d’Artagnan, “I’m pleased to tell you that your blow was so well struck that you nearly killed the man.”

“I thought I’d killed him outright,” said Groslow.

“No. It was a near thing, it’s true but he’s not quite dead.”

As he said this, d’Artagnan glanced at Parry, who stood behind the king looking pale as death that showed that the remark had found its intended audience. As to the king, he had listened to the whole conversation with a heart bursting with anguish, for at first, he didn’t understand the intentions of the French officer who spoke with such callous cruelty about the assault and was revolted. At d’Artagnan’s last words, he finally breathed freely. “Devil take it!” said Groslow. “I thought I’d done a more thorough job. If it wasn’t so far back to that dog’s house, I’d return and finish it.”

“And you’d be right to do so, if you’re afraid he’ll come after you,” said d’Artagnan, “for you know that when such a head wound doesn’t kill instantly, it heals within a week.”

And d'Artagnan cast a second glance at Parry, on whose face joy was spreading, as Charles pressed his hand and smiled. Parry bowed to his master's hand and kissed it with respect. "Truly, d'Artagnan," said Athos quietly, "you are both a man of your word and a man of wits. But what do you think of the king?"

"I like the look of him," said d'Artagnan. "He seems both noble and good."

"Yes but he let himself be taken," said Porthos. "That was a mistake."

"I have a strong desire to drink the king's health," said Athos.

"Then let me propose a toast," said d'Artagnan.

"Please do," said Aramis.

Porthos looked at d'Artagnan in surprise, ever amazed by the endless ideas his Gascon spirit supplied his comrade. D'Artagnan took up his tin goblet, filled it, and rose to his feet. "Gentlemen," he said to his companions, "let's raise a glass to he who presides over our feast. Let's drink to our colonel, to let him know that we're at his service to London and beyond."

As he said these words, d'Artagnan looked at Harrison, who thought the toast was for him. He rose and saluted the four friends, who, their eyes fixed on King Charles, drank all together, while Harrison, on his side, drained his glass without suspicion. Charles, in his turn, held out his glass to Parry, who poured in a few drops of beer – for the king had the same fare as the rest. He then raised it to his lips, and while looking at the four gentlemen, he drank with a smile full of nobility and gratitude. "Come, Gentlemen," said Harrison, resting his glass without so much as a glance at his illustrious prisoner, "let's be on our way!"

"Where do we sleep tonight, Colonel?"

"At Thirsk," replied Harrison.

"Parry," said the king, rising and turning to his valet, "my horse. I wish to go to Thirsk."

"Faith," said d'Artagnan to Athos, "your king has completely captivated me, and I'm entirely at his service."

"If you really mean that," Athos replied, "I think we can see to it that he never arrives in London."

"How so?"

"Because before then we'll have spirited him away."

"This time, Athos," said d'Artagnan, "word of honour, you really are mad."

"Do you mean to say you're out of ideas?" asked Aramis.

"Come now!" said Porthos. "It's not impossible. All we need is a good plan."

"I don't have any ideas," said Athos, "but I'll leave coming up with a plan to d'Artagnan." D'Artagnan just shrugged his shoulders and they left.

235
D'Artagnan comes up with a Plan

Athos knew d'Artagnan better than d'Artagnan knew himself. He knew that dropping a thought into a fertile mind like the Gascon's was like planting a seed in a rich and well-watered field. So, he let his friend shrug his shoulders and ride along, while chatting to him about Raoul, a conversation which he'd avoided under another circumstance, it may be recalled. As night fell they arrived at Thirsk. The four friends appeared completely uninterested in and indifferent to the security precautions for the king's custody. They retired to a private house, where they took precautions for their own security, gathering in a single room that had a reliable escape route in case of attack. Each lackey was given a sentry post; Grimaud slept across the doorway on a pallet of straw. D'Artagnan was pensive and seemed for once to have no interest in talking. He didn't say a word, just paced back and forth from window to bed, whistling tunelessly. Porthos, who never saw anything beyond the obvious, spoke to him as usual but d'Artagnan replied only in monosyllables. Athos and Aramis looked at each other and smiled. The day had been tiring, and yet, with the exception of Porthos, for whom slumber was as dependable as hunger, the friends slept badly. The next morning d'Artagnan was the first one on his feet. He had already gone down to the stables, checked on the horses, and given all the orders necessary for the day by the time Athos and Aramis got up. Porthos was still snoring. At eight in the morning the entire troop set out, marching in the same order as the day before – though d'Artagnan left his group of friends and went to expand on the acquaintance with Mister Groslow begun the day before. The officer, who was still glowing from d'Artagnan's earlier praise, received him with a gracious smile. "In truth, Sir," d'Artagnan said to him, "I'm happy to find someone with whom I can speak my poor language. My friend Sir du Vallon is so melancholy a character he speaks scarcely four words in a day – while as for our prisoners, you understand that we don't engage them in conversation."

"They're royalist fanatics," said Groslow.

"All the more reason for them to sulk since we've taken the Stuart. I hope he'll be given a fine and fiery trial."

"Faith! That's what we're taking him to London for," said Groslow.

"And you don't mean to let him out of your sight, I imagine?"

"Plague! I should think not! As you see," the officer added, laughing, "we're giving him a truly royal escort."

"Yes, by day, there's no chance he might escape. But by night..."

"At night, our precautions are doubled."

"They must be pretty thorough."

"There are always eight men in his room."

"The devil!" said d'Artagnan "You do guard him well. But, besides these eight men inside, you must have a guard outside, right? You can't be too careful guarding a prisoner like this one."

"True! But on the other hand, what could two unarmed men do against eight armed guards?"

"What do you mean, two men?"

"The king and his valet."

"They gave the king permission to keep his valet?"

"Yes, the Stuart asked for that favour, and Colonel Harrison agreed. The excuse is that he's a king, so he can't dress or undress himself."

"Truly, Captain," said d'Artagnan, pushing his flattery campaign to see how far it would take him, "the more I listen to you, the more I admire the easy and elegant way you speak French. I realise you lived in Paris for three years but I'm sure I could live in London for the rest of my life and never learn English that well. What were you doing in Paris?"

"My father, who's a merchant, had placed me in the office of his continental partner, who had sent his own son to work with my father. Such exchanges are customary between trading partners."

"And did you like Paris, Sir?"

"Yes but you ought to have a revolution like ours. Not against your king, he's just a child but against that thieving Italian who's your queen's lover."

"Ha! I quite agree with you, Sir, and we could do it, too, if we had only a dozen officers like you, sharp, vigilant, and determined! We'd soon see the end of that Mazarin, and give him a little trial like the one you're going to stage for your king."

"But I thought you were in Mazarin's service," said the officer. "Wasn't it he who sent you to General Cromwell?"

"Say rather that I'm in the service of the king. Knowing that Mazarin needed to send someone to England, I asked for the mission, for the express purpose of meeting the man of genius who now commands your three kingdoms. Then, when he invited me and Sir du Vallon to draw our swords for the honour of old England, you saw how we took up his offer."

"Yes, I know you led the charge with Mister Mordaunt."

"On his left side and his right, Sir. Plague, he's another brave and determined young officer. Did you see how he settled his score with his traitorous uncle?"

"Do you know him, then?" asked the officer.

"Very well indeed; I can even say we have a strong connection. Sir du Vallon and I came over from France with him."

"It sounded like you made him wait quite a while at Boulogne."

"What would you have?" said d'Artagnan. "I was like you, I had a king to guard."

"Oh?" said Groslow. "Which king is that?"

"Ours, for the love of God! Our little king, Louis XIV."

And d'Artagnan removed his hat. The Englishman did the same out of politeness. "How long did you guard him?"

"Three nights, and, by my faith, I'll always remember those nights fondly."

"Is the young king easy to get along with?"

"The king? He was fast asleep."

"Then what are you talking about?"

"What I'm talking about is that my friends, the officers of the guards and the musketeers, came to keep me company, and we spent those nights drinking and gambling."

"Ah, yes," sighed the Englishman. "It's true, you Frenchmen make merry companions."

"You mean you don't play dice and cards while you stand guard?"

"Never," said the Englishman.

"How terribly boring! I must say, I feel sorry for you," said d'Artagnan.

"The fact is," the officer replied, "I dread my turn at guard duty. It's a long, long night with nothing to do."

"Yes, when one watches alone or with dull mates. But when we share duty with a jolly friend, and scatter gold and dice on the table, the night passes like a dream. So you don't care for dice or cards?"

"On the contrary!"

"You'd enjoy a few hands of lansquenet then?"

"I'm crazy about it – played it almost every night in France."

"And since you've been back in England?"

"I've touched neither cards nor dice-box."

"You poor fellow," said d'Artagnan, with an air of deep compassion.

"Listen," said the Englishman, "do something for me."

"What's that?"

"Tomorrow night I'm on guard."

"Around the Stuart?"

"Yes. Come spend the watch with me."

"Impossible."

"Impossible?"

"Completely."

"But why?"

"I play cards every night with Sir du Vallon. Sometimes we don't go to bed at all .... This morning, for example, we were still playing at dawn."

"Well?"

"Well, he'll be bored to death if we don't play."

"Is he a devoted player?"

"I've seen him lose two thousand pistoles on a hand and laugh it off."

"Bring him, then."

"How could I do that? What about our prisoners?"

"Ah, the devil! I forgot," said the officer. "Just tell your lackeys to guard them."

"I might as well just let them escape," said d'Artagnan. "Those lads are no kind of guards."

"Are your prisoners men of high rank, then?"

"Plague! I'll say! One is a rich lord of Touraine, and the other is a Knight of Malta of an ancient house. We've set the ransom for both of them: two thousand livres in silver when we arrive in France. Believe me, we're not about to leave those men for a moment, especially with lackeys who know the prisoners are rich. We gave them a once-over, a pre-ransom search, and I confess it's their gold we're playing with every night, Sir du Vallon and I. But they might have a few more gemstones hidden away in their sleeves, even a diamond of price, so we guard them like misers guard their strongboxes. One or the other of us watches over them at all times."

"Ah! Hmm," said Groslow.

"So now you understand why I must refuse your noble offer – and with sorrow, because as I'm sure you know, nothing is more tiresome than to play the same games over and over, night after night, with the same partner. Luck goes back and forth equally between you, and at the end of a month you find you're both back where you started."

"No, there's one thing even more tiresome than that," said Groslow with a sigh, "and that's not playing at all."

"I imagine you're right," said d'Artagnan.

"But see here," said the Englishman, "your prisoners, are they dangerous men?"

"How do you mean?"

"Could they make a break for it?"

D'Artagnan laughed aloud. "Lord above!" he chuckled. "The lord is weak and trembling with fever, thanks to the climate of your charming country, while the Knight of Malta is as timid as a young girl. Though to be safe, we took away their pen knives and pocket scissors."

"All right, then," said Groslow, "just bring them along."

"Really? We could do that?"

"Why not? I have eight men."

"So?"

"So four can watch your prisoners, and four can guard the king."

"You know," said d'Artagnan slowly, "I think that could work – though we're putting you to a lot of trouble."

"Bah! Come anyway; we'll figure it out."

"Oh, I'm not worried about that," said d'Artagnan. "One can trust a man like you to handle anything." At this final flattery, the officer gave one of those little chuckles of satisfied vanity that cement a new friendship between one who is pleased and one who pleases. "Now that I think of it," said d'Artagnan, "why shouldn't we start tonight?"

"What?"

"Our game."

"No reason in the world," said Groslow.

"Why don't you come play lansquenet with us tonight, and we'll return the favour with you tomorrow night. That way, if there's anything about our 'fanatical royalists' that alarms you, well! We'll just play the one night and cancel the next."

"Perfect! Tonight at your place, tomorrow night at the Stuart's, and the night after that at mine."

"And then every night in London. Hey, God be with you!" said d'Artagnan. "You see, one can lead a merry life anywhere."

"Yes, when one falls in with Frenchmen, and they're Frenchmen like you," said Groslow.

"Especially ones like Sir du Vallon – what a merry soul he is! He's a furious Frondeur, and terrifies Mazarin, who employs him out of fear of opposing him."

"Yes, he's an imposing figure of a man," said Groslow, "but he has a pleasant face, and I like him without even knowing him yet."

"You'll like him even more when you get to know him better. But hey! They're calling me. My apologies but unlike you, he's not clever, and can't do without me. You'll excuse me?"

"Of course!"

"Until tonight."

"At your place?"

"At our place."

The two men exchanged salutes, and d'Artagnan returned to his companions. "What the devil were you talking about with that bulldog?" said Porthos.

"My dear Porthos, don't speak that way about Sir Groslow, who is my new best friend."

"Your new best friend," said Porthos, "that murderer of peasants?"

"Hush, my dear Porthos! All right, yes, Sir Groslow may be a brute but I've discovered that he has two excellent qualities: he's proud, and he's stupid."

Porthos, bewildered, stared wide-eyed but Athos and Aramis looked at each other and smiled; they knew that d'Artagnan did nothing without a purpose.

"Soon enough, you'll come to appreciate him yourself," said d'Artagnan.

"How's that?"

"I'll introduce him to you tonight, when he comes to play cards with us."

"Oh ho!" said Porthos, his eyes lighting up. "Is he rich?"

"He's the son of one of London's leading merchants."

"And he likes lansquenet?"

"He loves it."

"And basset?"

"Crazy about it."

"He plays biribi?"

"Like an expert."

"Good," said Porthos, "we'll have a pleasant evening."

"All the more pleasant as it promises us a better night tomorrow."

"What do you mean?"

"Yes, we host him at gaming tonight, and he hosts us tomorrow night."

"Where will that be?"

"I'll tell you later. Tonight, we must pay attention to just one thing: making sure we're worthy hosts to Sir Groslow. We're spending the night at Derby; send Mousqueton on ahead, and if there's a bottle of honey to be had in the city, have him buy it. It wouldn't hurt for him to find something tasty and prepare us a savoury supper – though the prisoners won't join us because you, Athos, are trembling with a fever, and you, Aramis, are an effete Knight of Malta who doesn't like the harsh conversation of soldiers – it makes you blush. Do you hear me?"

"I hear you," said Porthos, "but devil take me if I understand you."

"Porthos, my friend, you know that I'm descended from the prophets on my father's side and the sibyls on my mother's, and that I speak only in parables and riddles; let those who have ears listen, and those who have eyes look! I can say no more at this time."

"No need, my friend," said Athos. "I'm sure that whatever you're doing will be done well."

"And you, Aramis, do you agree with Athos?"

"Completely, my dear d'Artagnan."

"Behold," said d'Artagnan, "for here are true believers, and it's a pleasure to perform miracles for them. Not like the faithless Porthos, who only believes in what he can see and touch."

"I am, in fact," said Porthos with a shrewd look, "very incredulous."

D'Artagnan clapped him on the shoulder and then as the troop had arrived at their midday halt, the conversation was over. At about five in the evening, as agreed, Mousqueton was sent on ahead. Mousqueton spoke no English but since they'd been in England he'd been studying the methods of Grimaud, who never spoke a word, and nonetheless made himself understood by gestures. He'd asked Grimaud for some lessons, and thanks to studying with a master, he'd learned more than a little. Blaisois went with him. That evening the four friends, riding down Derby's principal street, saw Blaisois waiting at the gate of a fine house; this was to be their lodging for the night. All day they'd avoided the king for fear of arousing suspicion, and instead of joining Colonel Harrison's table for supper, they took that meal by themselves. Groslow arrived at the appointed hour. D'Artagnan received him as if he were a friend of twenty years' standing. Porthos looked him up and down from head to toe and smiled, for he realised that despite the remarkable blow he'd given to Parry's brother, Groslow wasn't as mighty as he. Athos and Aramis did what they could to conceal their disgust at Groslow's crude and brutal nature. In short, Groslow was pleased with his reception. Athos and Aramis played their parts. At midnight they retired to their room, the door of which was left open, on the pretext of keeping an eye on them. As they left, d'Artagnan went with them, leaving Porthos for a moment with Groslow. When he returned, they played; Porthos won fifty pistoles from Groslow, and found, by the time he retired for the night, that the man's company was less disagreeable than he'd expected. As for Groslow, he promised d'Artagnan he'd get his revenge on Porthos next time, and took his leave of the Gascon, reminding him of their rendezvous that evening. We say that evening, because by the time the players finally broke up, it was four in the morning. The day passed in the usual way; d'Artagnan went from Captain Groslow to Colonel Harrison, and from Colonel Harrison back to his friends. For one who didn't know d'Artagnan, he seemed to be in his usual cheerful mood – but to his friends, or Athos and Aramis anyway, he seemed to be in a fever of gaiety. "What's he up to?" said Aramis.

"Just wait," said Athos.

Porthos said nothing, only counted, one after another, with a visible air of satisfaction, the fifty pistoles he'd won from Groslow. Arriving that evening at Ryston, d'Artagnan assembled his friends. His face wore the expression of cheerful nonchalance it had shown all day. Athos gave Aramis a nudge and said, "The time approaches."

"Yes," said d'Artagnan, who'd heard him. "Yes, the time approaches. Tonight, Gentlemen, we rescue the king."

Athos trembled, his eyes alight. "D'Artagnan," he said, doubt momentarily displacing hope, "this isn't a joke, is it? Such a joke would be the death of me!"

"It's unlike you, Athos, to doubt me this way," said d'Artagnan. "When have you seen me jest about a friend's heart or a king's life? I told you, and I repeat, that tonight we rescue Charles I. You asked me to find a plan, and the plan is found."

Porthos gave d'Artagnan a look of deep admiration. Aramis smiled like a man who had found hope. But Athos was pale as death and trembled in every limb. "Tell us," he said.

Porthos opened his eyes wide, while Aramis hung on d'Artagnan's every word. "Did you hear that we've been invited to spend the evening with Sir Groslow?"

"Yes," responded Porthos. "He made us promise to give him his revenge."

"Good. And do you know where he's going to take this revenge?"

"No."

"In the king's quarters."

"In the king's quarters!" cried Athos.

"Yes, Gentlemen, the king's quarters. Sir Groslow is on guard duty with His Majesty tonight, and, for his amusement, has invited us to keep him company."

"All four of us?" asked Athos.

"For the love of God! Certainly, all four of us – do you suppose we'd let our prisoners out of our sight?"

"Oh ho!" said Aramis.

“Go on,” said Athos, excited.

“We’ll go to join Groslow, we with our swords, you with your poniards; the four of us will overwhelm those eight imbeciles and their stupid commander. What do you say to that, Sir Porthos?”

“I say it’ll be easy,” said Porthos.

“We’ll put Groslow’s clothes on the king; Mousqueton, Grimaud, and Blaisois will be waiting around the first corner with horses; we’ll jump into the saddle, and by dawn we’ll be twenty leagues from here. Will this plot do, Athos?”

Athos placed his hands on d’Artagnan’s shoulders and looked at him with his calm and gentle smile. “I declare, friend,” he said, “There isn’t another creature under the sun to equal you for nobility and courage. While we thought you indifferent to our troubles, you alone have found the answer we sought for in vain. I repeat once more, d’Artagnan, you are the best of us, and I bless you and love you, my dear son.”

“And to think that I didn’t think of it myself!” said Porthos, slapping his forehead. “It’s all so simple.”

“But as I see it,” said Aramis, “we have to kill them all, don’t we?”

Athos shuddered and turned pale. “God be with you!” said d’Artagnan. “You’re right, and we must. I’ve thought it through every way I can, and I don’t see how to avoid it.”

“Come,” said Aramis, “there’s no point in fretting about it. How do we proceed?”

“I have a two-part plan,” d’Artagnan replied.

“Let’s hear the first part,” said Aramis.

“You hold yourselves ready and await my signal, and when I give the word, each of us plunges a dagger into the heart of the soldier nearest to us. That puts four down right away, and evens the odds, as it leaves us four against five. These five surrender, and are bound and gagged, or they resist and are killed. If by any chance our host changes his mind and admits only Porthos and myself to the party, then, dame! We two will just have to do double the work. It will take longer and be louder but you’ll be nearby with swords and will rush in when you hear the commotion.”

“But what if they overwhelm you?” said Athos.

“Ha!” said d’Artagnan. “These beer-drinkers are too heavy and awkward. Besides, Porthos will punch them in the throat, and they’ll be killed before they can make a sound.”

“Sounds good!” said Porthos. “We’ll have a jolly little massacre.”

“Dreadful!” said Athos. “Dreadful!”

“Bah! Sir the sensitive,” said d’Artagnan, “you’d kill that many or more without hesitation in a battle. Besides, friend,” he continued, “if you think the king’s life isn’t worth that price, just say so, and I’ll send to Groslow to say I’m too sick to come.”

“No,” said Athos. “No, I’m wrong, my friend, and you’re right. Forgive me.”

At that moment the door opened, and a soldier appeared on the threshold. “Sir Captain Groslow,” he said in terrible French, “sends to advise Sir d’Artagnan and Sir du Vallon that he awaits them.”

“Where?” asked d’Artagnan.

“In the quarters of the English Nebuchadnezzar,” replied the soldier, a confirmed Puritan.

“Very good,” Athos replied in excellent English, though a flush had risen on his face at this insult to royal majesty. “Tell Captain Groslow we’re on our way.” The Puritan departed. The lackeys had been ordered to saddle eight horses, to stay mounted, and to keep together, in the street around the corner about twenty paces from the king’s lodging.

236

The Lansquenet Party

By that time, it was nine in the evening; the previous guards had been relieved at eight, and Captain Groslow’s squad had been on duty for an hour. D’Artagnan and Porthos, armed with their swords, and Athos and Aramis, each with a poniard hidden in his doublet, made their way toward the house that served as the prison of Charles Stuart. The latter two, humble and apparently disarmed, followed their conquerors like captives. “Faith,” Groslow said when he saw them, “I’d almost given up on you.”

D’Artagnan approached him and said in a low voice, “In fact, Sir du Vallon and I were hesitant to come.”

“But why?” asked Groslow.

D’Artagnan nodded toward Athos and Aramis. “Ah!” said Groslow. “Because of their royalist sympathies? No matter. On the contrary,” he said, laughing, “Since they love the Stuart, let them see him.”

“Will we spend the evening in the king’s chamber?” asked d’Artagnan.

“Not there but in the next room – and as the connecting door will remain open, it’ll be exactly as if we were in his chamber. Did you bring enough money? Because I declare I intend to gamble like the devil tonight.”

“Hear this?” said d’Artagnan, jingling the gold in his pockets.

“Ah, very good!” said Groslow, opening the door into the room. “I only precede you to show you the way, Gentlemen,” he said, going in first.

D’Artagnan glanced at his friends. Porthos was as nonchalant as if this were an ordinary card party; Athos was pale but resolute; Aramis mopped his brow with a handkerchief. The eight guards were at their posts: four were in the king’s chamber, two at the connecting door, and two at the door through which the four friends entered. At the sight of their naked swords, Athos smiled, for that would make it a mêlée, not a massacre. From that moment his good humour returned. Charles, whom they could see through the open door, was lying on his bed fully dressed, under a simple wool throw blanket. At his bedside, Parry sat reading a chapter from a Catholic Bible in a voice that was quiet but loud enough for the king to hear. A coarse tallow candle, placed nearby on a black table, illuminated the king’s resigned face, and the far more troubled face of his loyal servant. From time to time Parry paused, thinking that the king might have fallen asleep but each time the king opened his eyes, smiled, and said, “Continue, my good Parry, I’m listening.”

Groslow advanced to the threshold of the king’s chamber, putting back on the hat he’d removed to receive his guests, looking for a moment with contempt at the simple and touching tableau of the old servant reading the Bible to his captive king. He made sure every man was at his assigned post, and, turning back to d’Artagnan, looked triumphantly at the Frenchman as if inviting a compliment on his tactics. “Well done,” said the Gascon. “Cap de Diou! You’d make a distinguished general.”

“And do you think,” asked Groslow, “that while I’m guarding him there’s any chance the Stuart could be rescued?”

“Absolutely not,” replied d’Artagnan, “unless an army of his friends rained down from heaven.”

Groslow beamed with pleasure. As Charles Stuart’s eyes were closed throughout this exchange, it was impossible to tell if he was aware of the Puritan captain’s insolence. But when he heard d’Artagnan’s distinctive accent, he opened his eyes in spite of himself. Parry, meanwhile, trembled and stopped reading. “Why have you stopped, Parry?” said the king. “Continue – unless you’re too tired, of course.”

“No, Sire,” said the valet, and he resumed his reading.

A table was prepared in the outer room, with a tablecloth, two lit candles, cards, dice, and a pair of dice boxes. “Gentlemen,” said Groslow to Athos and Aramis, “seat yourselves facing the Stuart, as I do, because I love to watch him in captivity. Sit there, Sir d’Artagnan, across from me.”

Athos flushed with anger but d’Artagnan frowned and gave him a look. “Fine,” he said. “You, Sir Count La Fère, sit to the right of Mister Groslow; you, Sir Knight d’Herblay, to his left; you, du Vallon, next to me. You’ll back me, and those gentlemen will back Mister Groslow.”

So it was arranged: with Porthos to his left, d’Artagnan could signal him with his knee, and since Athos and Aramis were facing him, he could communicate to them with a look. At the names of the Count La Fère and the Knight d’Herblay, Charles had opened his eyes and raised his head, taking in at a glance all the actors of the scene. Just then Parry turned a few pages in his Bible and read aloud this verse from Jeremiah: “God said: ‘Hearken to the words of my servants the prophets, whom I sent unto you, both rising up early and sending them but ye have not hearkened.’”

The four friends exchanged glances. Parry’s words indicated that he and the king recognised they were there and understood why they’d come. D’Artagnan’s eyes sparkled. “You asked me just now if I’d brought enough money?” said d’Artagnan, placing twenty pistoles on the table.

“Yes,” said Groslow.

“Well,” d’Artagnan replied, “it’s my turn to ask you that. Haul out your cash, my dear Mister Groslow, for I tell you now I’m not leaving here until I’ve won it all from you.”

“I’m not going down without a fight,” said Groslow.

“All the better,” said d’Artagnan. “To battle, my dear Captain, to battle! Whether you know it or not, that’s what we’ve come for.”

“I’m sure of that!” said Groslow with his coarse laugh. “I know it doesn’t feel like a real game for you Frenchmen without a few bumps and bruises.”

In fact, Charles had heard it all, and understood everything. A light flush rose to his cheeks. The soldiers who guarded him saw him gradually stretch his weary limbs, and on the pretence of excessive heat from a stove glowing nearly white, slowly put off the Scottish blanket under which he lay fully clothed. Athos and Aramis trembled with suppressed joy on seeing that the king was lying dressed and ready. The party began. That night fortune had changed in favour of Groslow, and he won every pot. A hundred pistoles passed from their side of the table to his. Groslow was almost giddy. Porthos, who had lost the fifty pistoles he’d won the night before, plus thirty pistoles of his own, was sullen, and kept nudging d’Artagnan with his knee, as if asking if it wasn’t time to play a different game. Athos and Aramis also watched d’Artagnan closely but he remained impassive. The clock struck ten. From outside came the sound of the sentries passing. “How many times do they make the rounds?” asked d’Artagnan, drawing two more pistoles from his pocket.

“Five,” said Groslow, “once every two hours.”

“Good,” said d’Artagnan. “Very prudent.”

And he gave Athos and Aramis a meaningful look, while responding for the first time to Porthos’s prodding with a nudge from his own knee. Meanwhile, attracted by the fitting cards and the sight of gold, so magnetic to all men, the soldiers who were on duty in the king’s chamber had one by one approached the door, where they stood, rising on tiptoe to watch over d’Artagnan’s and Porthos’s shoulders. The pair at the outer door also approached that suited the purposes of the four friends, who much preferred having them close at hand to having to chase them to the four corners of the room. The two door sentries held naked swords but they leaned on their points as they watched the players. Athos seemed to grow calm as the moment approached, his white and aristocratic hands playing with a Louis d’or that he bent and straightened as easily as if the gold were tin. Less master of himself, Aramis kept fumbling at his doublet, while Porthos, who always hated losing, kept plying his knee. D’Artagnan stretched and glanced behind him, seeing between two soldiers where Parry stood while Charles leaned on one elbow, his hands clasped and appearing to address God in fervent prayer. D’Artagnan realised the moment had come, that everyone was at their post and awaiting only the words, “At last!”

That were to be the signal. He cast a preparatory glance at Athos and Aramis, who pushed their chairs back slightly to have greater freedom of movement. He gave a second nudge with his knee to Porthos, who stood as if to stretch his legs, meanwhile ensuring that his sword was loose in its scabbard. “Damn it!” said d’Artagnan. “Another twenty pistoles gone! Truly, Captain Groslow, your luck has been in but it can’t last.” He drew twenty more pistoles from his pocket. “A final turn, Captain. These twenty pistoles on a single last turn of the cards.”

“In, then, for twenty pistoles,” said Groslow.

And he turned two cards: a king for d’Artagnan, and an ace for himself. “A king,” said d’Artagnan. “It’s a good omen. Master Groslow,” he added, “beware of the king.” And there was something strange in d’Artagnan’s voice that sent a chill through his opponent. Groslow began to go through the deck, turning cards; if he turned an ace, he won; but if a king came up first, he lost. He turned a king. “At last!” said d’Artagnan.

At these words Athos and Aramis rose, while Porthos took a step back. Poniards and swords were about to shine out when suddenly the outer door opened and Colonel Harrison appeared on the threshold, accompanied by a man wrapped in a cloak. Behind the man, light glittered on the muskets of five or six soldiers. Groslow rose hastily, ashamed of being caught with honey, cards, and dice. But Harrison paid no attention to him, marching into the king’s chamber and saying, “Charles Stuart, an order has come that you are to be escorted to London without delay, riding day and night. Prepare to leave immediately.”

“And in whose name is this order given?” asked the king. “That of General Oliver Cromwell?”

“Yes,” said Harrison, “and here is Mister Mordaunt who has just brought it and who is charged with its execution.”

“Mordaunt!” murmured the four friends, exchanging looks.

D’Artagnan stooped over the table and swept all the money he and Porthos had lost into his deepest pocket, while Athos and Aramis moved around behind him. At this movement Mordaunt turned, recognised them, and uttered a cry of savage joy. “How happy he is to see us,” d’Artagnan said to his friends. “We might be caught.”

“Not yet,” said Porthos.

“Colonel! Colonel!” said Mordaunt. “Surround the house, you’ve been betrayed. These four Frenchmen escaped from Newcastle and must intend to rescue the king. Arrest them!”

“You’ll find, young man,” said d’Artagnan, drawing his sword, “that’s an order easier to give than to execute.” Then whirling his blade, he cried, “At them, my friends!”

Then he rushed toward the door, knocking over the pair of soldiers who guarded it before they had time to raise their muskets. Athos and Aramis followed, with Porthos as rear guard, and before the soldiers, officers, and colonel had time to take a breath, all four were in the street. “Fire!” cried Mordaunt. “Shoot them!”

Two or three muskets went off but had no more effect than to show by their flashes the four fugitives as they disappeared safely around the street corner. The horses were at the appointed place; the lackeys had only to throw the bridles to their masters, who leapt into the saddles like the consummate equestrians they were. “Ride!” said d’Artagnan. “Spur on!” They took off after d’Artagnan, returning along the route they’d come during the day, that is, back toward Scotland. The town had neither gates nor walls, so they no difficulty in leaving it. Fifty paces beyond the last house, d’Artagnan stopped. “Halt!” he said.

“What do you mean, ‘Halt?’” cried Porthos. “Don’t you mean, ‘Ride like the wind?’”

“Not at all,” d’Artagnan replied. “This time we’ll be closely pursued; let’s watch them ride out of town and chase us up the road to Scotland. After they’ve passed, we’ll go in the opposite direction.” A few yards away ran a stream with a bridge across it; d’Artagnan led his horse down under the arch and his friends followed. They had been there less than a minute before they heard the rapid gallop of an approaching troop of equestrians. Moments later, this troop passed over their heads, never suspecting that they were separated from those they sought by no more than the thickness of the bridge’s arch.

237
London

When the noise of the horses was lost in the distance, d’Artagnan climbed up the bank of the stream, mounted, and began to ride across the fields, turning as much as possible toward London. His three friends silently followed, until they had ridden in a wide semicircle and left the town behind them. “This time,” said d’Artagnan, when he thought they were far enough from where they’d hidden to drop from a gallop to a trot, “this time I really think everything is lost, and the best thing we can do is to try to reach France. What do you think of that idea, Athos? Does that sound reasonable to you?”

“Reasonable, yes,” Athos replied, “but I remind you that the other day you said something that sounded more admirable than reasonable, something noble and generous when you said, ‘Let’s die here!’”

“Oh, death’s nothing!” said Porthos. “Death shouldn’t bother us, since we don’t really know what it is. What tortures me is the idea of being beaten. The way things are going, we’d have to fight London, then the provinces, then all of England, and really we can’t fail to lose in the end.”

“We must follow this great tragedy to its conclusion, whatever it may be,” said Athos. “We can’t leave England until this is over. Do you think like I do, Aramis?”

“In every respect, my dear Count. And I must confess I look forward to the chance of once more meeting up with Mordaunt; it seems to me we have an account to settle with him, and it’s not our practice to leave a matter without paying that sort of debt.”

“Ah! Now that’s something else,” said d’Artagnan, “and there’s a reason I can approve. I confess that if it meant meeting Mordaunt again, I’d be willing to wait in London for a year. Only let’s find lodging with someone we can trust and where we can avoid suspicion, for at the moment Sir Cromwell is out for our blood, and from what I’ve seen, he doesn’t joke around, this Cromwell. Athos, do you know of an inn in the city where we can find clean sheets, beef that isn’t overcooked, and honey that isn’t made with hops or juniper?”

“I think I can manage it,” said Athos. “De Winter took us to a house run by a former Spaniard who is now a naturalized Englishman, thanks to the flow of guineas spent in his place by his new compatriots. What do you say, Aramis?”

“I say the idea of lodging at the house of Señor Perez sounds quite reasonable to me, and I endorse it. We’ll invoke the memory of poor de Winter, whom Perez seemed to hold in high esteem. We’ll tell him we’re here as sightseers and observers, we’ll each of us pay him a guinea a day, and with those precautions, I think we needn’t worry.”

“You did forget one precaution, Aramis,” said d’Artagnan, “maybe the most important of all.”

“What’s that?”

“We must change the way we dress.”

“Bah!” said Porthos. “Why should we change our clothes? I’m very comfortable in these!”

“So as not to be recognised,” said d’Artagnan. “Our clothes are of a cut and colour that says ‘Frenchman’ at first glance. Now, I’m not so attached to the cut of my doublet or the colour of my breeches to risk, for love of them, being hanged at Tyburn or shipped off to the Indies. I’m going to buy myself a dark brown suit. I’ve noticed that these Puritan imbeciles dote on that colour.”

“But Athos, can you find your way back to the Spaniard’s house?” said Aramis.

“Oh, absolutely! He lives in Green Hall Street, in Bedford’s Tavern; I could find my way there with my eyes closed.”

“I wish we were there already,” said d’Artagnan. “My advice is that we get to London before dawn, even if it cripples our horses.”

“Come, then,” said Athos, “for unless my calculations are off, we can’t be more than eight or ten leagues from there.”

The friends rode their horses hard, and in fact arrived by five in the morning. At the city gate they were stopped by a sentry but Athos told him in excellent English that they had been sent ahead by Colonel Harrison to notify his colleague Colonel Pride of the imminent arrival of the king. This response elicited some questions about the taking of the king but Athos gave such precise and positive details that if the guardians of the gate had any suspicions, they were quelled. The four friends were passed through amid all sorts of puritanical congratulations. Athos had spoken truly – he led them right to Bedford’s Tavern, where he reintroduced himself to the host. Perez was delighted to see him return with so many prosperous-looking guests, and gave orders to have his best rooms made ready. Though it was barely daylight, our four travellers, upon arriving in London, had found the entire city in an uproar. The rumour that the king, escorted by Colonel Harrison, was approaching the capital, had spread since the day before, and many citizens had stayed up all night in hopes of catching a glimpse of the Stuart, as they called him, making his entrance. The precaution of changing their clothing had been adopted unanimously, after some opposition from Porthos, and they put the plan into immediate execution. The host sent out for a variety of clothes on approval, as if he wanted to stock up his wardrobe. Athos donned a black suit that gave him the look of an honest bourgeois; Aramis, who didn’t want to give up his sword, chose a dark outfit in a military cut; Porthos couldn’t resist a red doublet and green breeches; while d’Artagnan, who’d already settled on his colour, found just the dark brown suit he had in mind that made him look like a retired sugar merchant. As for Grimaud and Mousqueton, since they didn’t wear livery, they were already in disguise; Grimaud looked like the calm, dry, and cautious kind of Englishman, while Mousqueton resembled the portly and complacent sort. “Now for the important part,” said d’Artagnan. “To avoid the insults of the populace, we must cut our hair. As we are no longer gentlemen of the sword, we must be Puritans of the hairstyle. It is, as you know, the key distinction between Covenanter and Cavalier.”

But on this point, key distinction or not, Aramis stubbornly refused. He was determined to keep his hair that was very handsome and of which he took the greatest care. It took Athos, who didn’t care about such things, to set the example. Porthos submitted without difficulty to the ministrations of Mousqueton, who took some shears to his master’s coarse and heavy mane. D’Artagnan gave himself a fanciful cut that made him look like a head on a medal from the times of François I or Charles IX. “We look frightful,” said Athos.

“So awful even a Puritan would shudder,” said Aramis.

“I feel a chill on my scalp,” said Porthos.

“And me, I feel like singing a psalm,” said d’Artagnan.

“Now that we can’t even recognise ourselves,” said Athos, “and therefore have no fear of being recognised by others, let’s go watch the entrance of the king. If they pushed on through the night, they can’t be far from London.”

They joined the waiting crowds, and after less than two hours loud shouts and commotion announced the arrival of Charles I. A carriage had been sent to meet him, and while it was still somewhat distant the gigantic Porthos, who was a head taller than the crowd around him, declared he could see the royal carriage approaching. D’Artagnan stood on tiptoe, trying to see, while Athos and Aramis listened to those around them to hear their opinions. As the carriage passed, d’Artagnan recognised Harrison riding at one door and Mordaunt at the other. As for the people, Athos and Aramis heard nothing but insults and imprecations toward Charles. Athos returned to the tavern in despair. D’Artagnan shook his head. “To persist seems pointless and in fact I told you the situation was bad. As for me, I intend to stick with it, mostly for your sake but also because I have a certain artistic interest in politics à la mousquetaire. It would be very satisfying to snatch their prey away from these louts and laugh at them. I’ll give the idea some thought.”

The next day, from the window that gave out onto the most populous parts of the city, Athos heard cried the Bill of Parliament that arraigned the ex-King Charles I, accusing him of treason and abuse of power. D’Artagnan stood by his side, while behind them Aramis consulted a map. Porthos was absorbed in finishing the final bites of a delicious breakfast. “Parliament!” cried Athos. “Parliament couldn’t possibly have passed such a bill!”

“Listen,” said d’Artagnan, “I understand very little English but as English is nothing but French very badly pronounced, when I hear, ‘Parliament’s bill,’ that must mean a bill of Parliament, or ‘God damn me,’ as they say here.”

Just then the host came in; Athos beckoned him to approach. “Has Parliament really passed this bill?” Athos asked in English.

“Yes, Milord – the Purified Parliament.”

“The Purified Parliament! Are there two parliaments, then?”

“Friend host,” interrupted d’Artagnan, “as I don’t understand English but we all understand Spanish, do us the pleasure to converse in that language. It’s your native tongue, so you must enjoy speaking it when you get a chance.”

“By all means,” said Aramis.

As for Porthos as we said, his attention was concentrated on a lamb chop he was occupied in picking clean. “You were asking?” said the host in Spanish.

“We’re asking,” Athos replied in the same language, “about these two parliaments, the pure and the impure.”

“Why, how bizarre!” said Porthos, slowly raising his head and looking at his friends in astonishment. “Suddenly I can understand English! I could follow every word you said.”

“That’s because we’re speaking Spanish, old friend,” said Athos with his usual sangfroid.

“Ah! The devil!” said Porthos. “What a shame – I thought I’d added a new language.”

“When I say the Pure Parliament, Señor,” replied the host, “I mean the one that Colonel Pride has purified.”

“Ah ha!” said d’Artagnan. “Really, these people are quite ingenious; when we return to France I must recommend this means to Sir Mazarin and Sir Coadjuteur. The one will purify in the name of the Court, the other in the name of the People, and soon there will be no parliament at all.”

“Who is this Colonel Pride,” asked Aramis, “and how did he go about purifying the Parliament?”

“Colonel Pride,” said the Spaniard, “is an old carter, a very clever man who had noticed something when driving his cart: when there was a stone blocking the way, it was easier to remove the stone than to try to drive the wheel over it. Of the two hundred fifty-one Members of Parliament, one hundred and ninety-one embarrassed him by blocking the wheel of his political cart. He picked them up as if they were stones and threw them out of the House.”

“Bravo!” said d’Artagnan, who esteemed cleverness wherever he encountered it.

“And all those expelled were Stuartists?” asked Athos.

“Indeed, Señor, because you understand, they would have tried to save the king.”

“For the love of God!” said Porthos, waving his fingers. “By my count, they made a majority.”

“And you think,” said Aramis, “that Charles will consent to appear before such a tribunal?”

“He’ll have no choice,” said the Spaniard. “If he tries to refuse, the people will force him.”

“Thank you, Master Perez,” said Athos. “That’s what I needed to know.”

“Do you begin to believe at last this is a lost cause, Athos?” said d’Artagnan. “Against such as these Harrisons, Joyces, Prides, and Cromwells, how could we defeat them?”

“It seems clear the king will be delivered to the tribunal,” said Athos. “This ‘purification’ has silenced his partisans.”

D’Artagnan shrugged his shoulders. “But surely,” said Aramis, “if they condemn the king, it will be to exile or prison, no more.”

D’Artagnan gave a sceptical little whistle. “We shall see,” said Athos, “because we’ll attend the hearings, I presume.”

“You won’t have long to wait,” said the host. “They begin tomorrow.”

“Oh that!” said Athos. “Were the proceedings arranged before the king was even taken?”

"Must have been, starting from the day he was bought," said d'Artagnan.

"And you know," said Aramis, "that it was our friend Mordaunt who, if he didn't finalize the deal, at least made the first overtures in that little affair."

"Sir Mordaunt again," said d'Artagnan. "The first time he falls under my hand, I think I'll kill him."

"Bah!" said Athos. "That miserable wretch?"

"It's precisely because he is such a wretch that I'll kill him," said d'Artagnan. "Ah, my friend! I've done your will often enough you should indulge me in mine. So this time, whether you like it or not, that wretch Mordaunt is a dead man. I swear it."

"As do I," said Porthos.

"As do I," said Aramis.

"So voted, so approved!" cried d'Artagnan. "And quite suited to our roles as citizens and bourgeois. Now how about a walk around town? Not even Mordaunt would recognise us from four paces away in the kind of fog they have here. Let's go take in some fog."

"Yes," said Porthos, "it'll be a nice change from beer." And the four friends went out to, as they say, take in the local air.

238
The Trial

The next day Charles I was conducted by a large detail of guards to the court where he would be judged. The crowd thronged the streets and houses surrounding Westminster Hall; reaching the area, the four friends were blocked by the nearly impassable obstacle of this living wall. Some swaggering rowdies in this crowd insulted Aramis so rudely that Porthos raised his formidable fist and brought it down on the floury face of a baker, instantly changing it from white to red as his features burst like crushed grapes. This caused a great commotion; three men attacked Porthos but Athos knocked aside the first, d'Artagnan the second, and Porthos threw the third over his head. Many of the English, who are connoisseurs of boxing, admired these manoeuvres and clapped enthusiastically. Instead of being overwhelmed by the mob, as they'd feared, they suddenly found the crowd prepared to hoist Porthos and his friends to their shoulders in triumph – but the four travellers, fearing to draw attention to themselves, managed to decline the honour. Yet they gained one thing by their Herculean exploit, in that the crowd opened before them, and they succeeded in doing that which moments before had seemed impossible, that is, to get close to the hall. All London was pushing through the gates to the galleries, so that when the four friends finally got inside, they found the first three rows of benches already full. That was small loss to people who didn't want to be recognised, so they took places toward the rear and were happy with them – with the exception of Porthos, who'd wanted to show off his red doublet and green breeches and was sorry they weren't in the front row. The benches were arranged as in an amphitheatre, and from their location the four friends looked down on the entire assembly. By chance they had entered the central gallery, and found themselves facing the defendant's chair prepared for Charles I. At about eleven in the morning the king appeared from a rear doorway. He entered surrounded by guards but with an air of quiet dignity. As he looked around the hall he seemed confident and self-possessed, as if he were presiding over an assembly of submissive subjects, rather than answering the accusations of a rebel court. The judges, proud of having a king to humiliate, were eager to begin abusing the rights they'd usurped. They sent an usher to inform Charles I that it was customary for the accused to remove his hat when before his judges. Charles said not a word, just sat his broad-brimmed hat more firmly on his head, then turned and looked aside. When the usher had withdrawn, the king sat down on the defendant's chair facing the president, tapping at his boot with a riding crop he held in one hand. Parry, who'd entered with him, stood behind the chair. D'Artagnan, instead of watching these ceremonies, was looking at Athos, whose face reflected all the emotions which the king, who had to control himself, managed to suppress. Athos was usually so cool and calm that this agitation worried him. He leaned toward Athos's ear and said, "I hope you're going to follow the example of His Majesty and not get yourself killed in this death trap."

"Don't worry," said Athos.

"Look around," continued d'Artagnan, "they're certainly afraid of something: the guards have been doubled, and the additional troops are armed, not with halberds but muskets. That way they're ready for anything – the halberds are to keep back the crowd but the muskets are for us."

"Thirty, forty, fifty ... seventy men," said Porthos, counting the newcomers.

"Ho!" said Aramis. "Don't forget to count their commander, Porthos, as it seems to me he's one you don't want to miss."

"By God!" said d'Artagnan. And he turned pale with anger, for he'd recognised Mordaunt, who stood with naked sword commanding the musketeers behind the king that is, facing the galleries. "Has he recognised us?" he continued. "If so, we should beat a quick retreat. I don't mind dying but not in this trap – I'll choose my own death, not be shot like a fish in a barrel."

"No, he hasn't seen us," said Aramis. "He sees no one but the king. Mordieu! How he glares, the insolent dog. Does he hate His Majesty as much as he hates us?"

"For the love of God!" said Athos. "We took only his mother from him; the king robbed him of his name and fortune."

"That's right," said Aramis. "But hush! The president is rising to speak to the king."

President Bradshaw addressed the august defendant. "Stuart," he said, "listen as your parliamentary judges are named to you, and then address your observations to the tribunal." The king, as if these words were spoken to someone else, turned his head and looked away. The president waited, and as no answer came, he was silent for a moment. Out of 163 Members of Parliament, only 73 were present as the others, frightened by the idea of complicity in such an act, had stayed away. "Proceed with the trial," said Bradshaw, disregarding the absence of three-fifths of the assembly. And he began to name the members, present or absent. Those present responded in a voice strong or weak, depending on the courage of their convictions. The name of each absent member was followed by a short silence before the name was repeated. The name of Colonel Fairfax was spoken in its turn, and followed by the short, sombre silence that denounced those absent members who didn't want to take part in this trial. "Colonel Fairfax?" Bradshaw repeated.

"Fairfax?" replied a mocking voice that by its silvery tone was that of a woman. "He has the good sense to be elsewhere."

A huge burst of laughter greeted these words spoken with the audacity that women use to exploit their own weakness, that weakness that exempts them from retaliation. "That's a woman's voice," said Aramis. "By my faith! I'd wager she's both young and pretty." He climbed a few steps higher to get a better view of the gallery the voice had come from. "Upon my soul," he said, "she is charming! See, d'Artagnan, how everyone is looking at her, and despite Bradshaw's glare, her chin is still high."

"That's Lady Fairfax herself," said d'Artagnan. "Remember her, Porthos? We saw her with her husband at General Cromwell's."

After a moment, the calm interrupted by this wry episode was restored, and the roll call resumed. "Once these clowns see that they lack the numbers for a quorum, they'll be forced to adjourn," said the Count La Fère.

"You still don't know them, Athos. Look at how Mordaunt smiles as he stares at the king. Does he look like a man who's worried that his victim will escape? No, that's the smile of hatred satisfied, of vengeance sure and certain. Ah, you evil basilisk! It'll be a happy day when I'm able to cross you with something more than just a look!"

"The king makes a handsome showing," said Porthos. "See how well turned out he is, despite being a prisoner. Why, the plume on his hat is worth at least fifty pistoles – look at it, Aramis."

With the roll call complete, the president gave the order to proceed to the reading of the indictment. Athos paled; he'd deluded himself once more. Even without sufficient members to sit as judges, the trial was to proceed – which could only mean the king had been condemned in advance. "I warned you, Athos," said d'Artagnan, shrugging his shoulders. "But you're always so sceptical. Now I beg you, summon all your courage and listen without exploding when you hear all the petty horrors that man in black, with full license and privilege, is about to ascribe to the king."

In fact, never had more brutal accusations, never had such base insults, never had such a bloody indictment been brought against royal majesty. Previous generations had been content to simply assassinate their kings, saving all these insults for their corpses. Charles I listened to the prosecutor's speech attentively, ignoring the abuse, overlooking the insults, disregarding the grievances, and when the litany of hatred reached its height, the prosecutor threatening almost to assume the role of executioner in advance, the king's only response was a contemptuous smile. It was, nonetheless, a terrible litany in which the unhappy king heard all his indiscretions called conspiracies, and his mistakes denounced as crimes. D'Artagnan who let this torrent of insult go by with the disdain it deserved, nonetheless took note of some of the prosecutor's accusations. "The fact is," he said, "that if one punished kings for imprudence and folly, this poor king has earned some punishment; but it seems to me that what he's suffering here is quite cruel enough."

"In any case," replied Aramis, "the punishment shouldn't fall on the king but on his ministers, since the first law of the English constitution is, the king can do no wrong."

As for me, thought Porthos, looking at Mordaunt and thinking of nothing but him, if it wouldn't disrupt the solemnity of this occasion, I'd jump from the gallery to the floor, be on Mordaunt in three bounds, and wring his neck. Then I'd swing him by the feet and knock down all those phony musketeers, those mockeries of the Musketeers of France. In the meantime d'Artagnan, who's smart and quick, would have found a way to rescue the king. Maybe I should speak to him about it.

Meanwhile Athos, with his face flushed, fists clenched, and lips bitten bloody, was squirming on the bench, enraged by this protracted parliamentary insult and royal torment; the man of iron arm and mighty heart was reduced to a trembling frame with shaking hands. Finally, the prosecutor finished his indictment, saying, "These charges are brought in the name of the English people."

There were murmurs from the galleries, and another voice, not female this time but male and furious, thundered from behind d'Artagnan: "You lie! And nine-tenths of the English people hear your words in horror!"

It was the voice of Athos, who was beside himself, standing with arm outstretched, pointing in accusation at the accuser. At this disruption king, judges, spectators, all turned their eyes to the gallery containing the four friends. Mordaunt turned like the others and recognised the gentleman around whom the other Frenchmen had risen, pale and menacing. His eyes flashed with grim joy as he realised he'd found those to whose death his life was devoted. With a furious gesture he called his twenty musketeers to arms, pointed to the benches where his enemies stood, and said, "Fire into that gallery!"

But then, quick as thought, d'Artagnan lifted Athos bodily, Porthos grabbed up Aramis, and they jumped down the steps, rushed out the corridor, hustled down the stairs, and lost themselves in the crowd outside. Meanwhile within, lowered muskets threatened three thousand spectators, whose loud cries for mercy defused the incident before it escalated into mayhem. Charles had also recognised the four Frenchmen; he put one hand to his heart to control its beating, and the other to his eyes so as not to see his faithful friends slaughtered. Mordaunt, pale and trembling with rage, naked sword in hand, dashed out of the hall at the head of ten halberdiers, searching the crowd, interrogating everyone but finally returning empty-handed. The uproar was hard to suppress, and it was half an hour before anybody could be heard once again. The judges thought the galleries were going to erupt. The spectators in the galleries saw the muskets pointed their way, and, caught between fear and anger, continued to be loud and agitated. Finally, calm was restored. "And what have you to say in your defence?" asked Bradshaw of the king.

Then, in the tone of one judging rather than being judged, his head still covered, and rising, not in humility but in majesty, Charles said, "Before questioning me, answer me this: I was free at Newcastle, where by negotiation I had concluded a treaty with these Houses. Instead of fulfilling your part of this treaty, as I fulfilled mine, you bought me from the Scots – and cheaply, I know that speaks well for your government's thrift. But having bought me like a slave, do you really hope that means I am no longer your king? It does not. To answer you would be to forget that. I will not answer until you have established your right to question me. To answer you would be to acknowledge you as my rightful judges and I see in you only my executioners." And in the midst of a deathly silence, Charles, calm, proud, his head still covered, sat back down in his chair. "Where are they, my Frenchmen?" murmured Charles, turning his eyes toward the gallery where he'd seen them for a moment. "I would like them to see that their friend, living, is worth defending – and dead, is worth weeping for."

But in vain he scanned the crowd, asking God where to find those noble and consoling countenances – but he saw only stunned and fearful faces, and felt he was trapped between horror and hatred.

"Well, then," said the president, seeing that Charles was determined to remain unmoved, "we will judge you despite your silence. You are accused of treason, abuse of power, and assassination. The witnesses will swear to it. Therefore go but at the next session we will address what you refuse to acknowledge this time."

Charles rose and turned toward Parry, whom he found pale and sweating. "But, my dear Parry," he said, "what's wrong? What agitates you so?"

"Oh, Sire!" said Parry, in a trembling voice, and with tears in his eyes. "Sire, while leaving the hall, please don't look to your left."

"Why is that, Parry?"

"Never mind, just do as I beg, my King!"

"But what is it?" said Charles, trying to see through the hedge of guards that surrounded him.

"It's just – you won't look, Sire, will you? – It's just that they've placed, on a table there, the axe they use to execute criminals. I beg you, Sire, don't look. It's hideous!"

"The fools!" said Charles. "Do they think I'm as cowardly as they are? Still, it was good of you to warn me; thank you, Parry." And then the time having come to withdraw, the king went out amidst his guards. To the left of the door, in fact, placed on a red carpet on a long table, shone the great white headsman's axe with its long haft well-polished by the hands of the executioner. Arriving in front of it, Charles stopped, turned toward it with a laugh, and said, "Ah ha! The axe! Trying to play scarecrow might seem a good idea to those who don't understand gentlemen – but you can't frighten me with an executioner's axe," he sneered, whipping it with his riding crop. "Thus, I strike you, and will now wait patiently like a Christian for you to return the blow." And shrugging his shoulders he continued on his way, leaving stupefied those who'd crowded around the table to see what the king's face would look like when he saw the axe that was to separate his head from his body. "Really, Parry," continued the king, “God forgive me! But these people seem to take me for a cotton merchant from the Indies rather than a gentleman accustomed to the shine of steel; do they think I have less nerve than a butcher?”

As he said these words, he arrived at the door to the street. A long line of people pressed forward, folk who, unable to gain admittance to the galleries, still wished to see the end of the spectacle even if they’d missed the most interesting part. The sight of this numberless multitude, studded with menacing faces, drew a sigh from the king. So many people, he thought, and not a single faithful friend! But just as he thought these words of doubt and discouragement, a voice rang out from nearby, “Long live his fallen Majesty!”

The king turned eagerly, heart leaping and tears springing to his eyes. Before him was an old soldier of his guards who hadn’t wanted to see his captive king pass by without paying him this final tribute. But the next moment the unlucky man was struck down by the pommel of a sword wielded by a man the king recognised as Captain Groslow. “Alas!” said Charles. “Such a severe punishment for a minor fault.” Then with a heavy heart, he went on his way but he hadn’t gone a hundred paces more before a furious fanatic, bursting between two soldiers in his hatred, spat in the king’s face, as once an infamous Jew had spat in the face of Jesus of Nazareth. Bursts of laughter and bitter insults sounded out together; the crowd surged back, then forward, heaving like a stormy sea, and for a moment it seemed to the king that in the middle of this living wave he saw the sparkling eyes of Athos. Charles wiped his face and said with a sad smile, “The poor churl! For a half-crown he’d have done the same to his own father.”

He hadn’t been mistaken; he really had seen Athos who, with his friends, were mingling with the mob to escort the royal martyr for a final time. When the old soldier had saluted Charles, Athos’s heart had swelled with joy, and when the beaten man came to, he found ten guineas in his pocket that had been placed there by the French gentleman. However, when the insolent churl spat in the prisoner’s face, Athos had put his hand on his dagger. But d’Artagnan clapped his hand over Athos’s and said in a hoarse voice, “Wait!” Never before had d’Artagnan given a direct command to the Count La Fère. Athos stopped himself. D’Artagnan gripped Athos by the arm, gestured to Porthos and Aramis to stay close, and took a position behind the angry lout, who was still laughing about his crude jest and being congratulated by some other fanatics. The man began making his way toward the City of London. D’Artagnan followed, still gripping Athos’s arm, beckoning Porthos and Aramis to follow as well. The churl, who looked like a butcher’s apprentice, went with a couple of companions down a lonely and narrow street that ran toward the river. D’Artagnan released Athos’s arm and marched up behind the man who’d spat on the king. Arriving at the river bank, the three men realised they were being followed, stopped, and looked insolently at the Frenchmen, exchanging some mocking jests with each other. “I don’t speak English, Athos,” said d’Artagnan, “but you do, so you must act as interpreter.” As he spoke, they rushed past the three men, then immediately turned and d’Artagnan marched up to the butcher’s apprentice. He prodded the man’s chest with his index finger and said, “Tell him this, Athos. You’ve behaved like a coward; you’ve insulted a defenceless man; you’ve defiled the face of your king; and you’re going to die.” Athos, pale as a spectre, translated this speech to the man, who, seeing d’Artagnan’s preparations and the look in his eye, assumed an attitude of defence. At this movement, Aramis put his hand to his sword. “No, no steel!” said d’Artagnan. “Steel is for gentlemen.” And seizing the butcher by the throat, he said, “Porthos, punish this wretch with a single blow.” Porthos raised his mighty arm, it whistled through the air like a stone from a catapult, and the heavy mass fell with a dull thud on coward’s skull, crushing it. The man fell like an ox under a sledgehammer. The man’s comrades wanted to cry out, to flee but their voices failed them, and their trembling legs folded beneath them. “Tell them this, Athos,” continued d’Artagnan. “Say, ‘Thus die all those who forget that the life of a prisoner is sacred, and that a captive king is therefore twice the representative of the Lord.’”

Athos repeated d’Artagnan’s words. The two men, mute, their hair standing on end, stared at the corpse of their comrade, who was swimming in a pool of his own black blood. Then, coming out of their paralysis, they clasped their hands in supplication, turned and ran. “Justice is done!” said Porthos, wiping his forehead.

“And now,” said d’Artagnan to Athos, “doubt me no more, and trust me on this: I hereby assume responsibility for our efforts on behalf of the king.”

239 Whitehall

The Parliament condemned Charles Stuart to death, as was all too predictable. Political trials are always mere formalities, for the same passions that drive the accusations result in condemnations. Such is the terrible logic of revolutions. Though our friends expected this condemnation, it filled them with grief. D’Artagnan, whose wits were never as resourceful as in these extreme situations, swore anew that he would try every possible means to avoid a bloody outcome to this tragedy. But how? So far, he had only vague ideas. Everything depended on the nature of the circumstances. The judges had decided the execution was to take place the next day, so to gain time it was essential to prevent that execution until a proper plan could be made. The only recourse seemed to be to abduct the official London executioner. With the executioner gone, the sentence couldn’t be carried out. No doubt they would send for one from the nearest city but at least it would gain them a day, and a day gained in such a case might be salvation! D’Artagnan charged himself with this difficult task. It was just as essential to warn Charles Stuart of the attempt to save him, so that he might assist his rescuers as much as possible, or at least do nothing to thwart their efforts. Aramis took on this dangerous task. Charles Stuart had asked that Bishop Juxon be permitted to visit him in his prison at Whitehall. Mordaunt had gone to the bishop that very evening to acquaint him with the king’s religious wishes, and to inform him of Cromwell’s assent. Aramis resolved to obtain from the bishop, by persuasion or intimidation, whatever he might need in sacerdotal clothing or regalia that would enable him to penetrate the palace of Whitehall. For his part, Athos undertook to arrange a means for them to leave England in a hurry, whether they succeeded or failed. As night fell, they arranged to meet back at the inn at eleven o’clock, and then each went on his way to execute his hazardous mission. Whitehall Palace was guarded by three regiments of cavalry, as well as the constant attention of Cromwell, who used it as his headquarters and was continually marching from one chamber to another, meeting his agents or generals. The condemned monarch, alone in the inner of his two rooms, lit only by a pair of candles, mused sorrowfully upon his former grandeur, as one in his last hour recalls scenes from his life at their most vivid and sweet. Parry, in the next room, never left his master, and since his condemnation had been weeping constantly. Charles Stuart sat, leaning on a table, looking at a locket containing pictures of his wife and daughter. He was waiting, first for Bishop Juxon, and after Juxon, for martyrdom. Sometimes his thoughts strayed to those brave French gentlemen who already seemed a hundred leagues away, fabulous, chimerical, like those figures from dreams that fade once we awake. In fact sometimes Charles wondered if everything that had happened to him wasn’t just a dream, or perhaps a delirium from fever. At this thought he got up, and to break out of his trance took a few steps toward the window; but beneath the window he saw the gleam of his guards’ muskets and was forced to admit that he was awake and his bloody dream was real. Charles returned silently to his chair, leaned once more on the table, let his head fall on his hand, and thought. “Alas!” he said to himself. “If I had at least as a confessor one of those lights of the Church whose soul has plumbed all the mysteries of life, from great to small, perhaps his words could silence the dark voice that laments in my soul. But they’ll send me a priest of mean spirit, someone whose career and fortune I unwittingly thwarted. He’ll speak to me of God and death as if I were any other dying man, without caring or understanding that this doomed king is leaving a throne to a usurper, while his children don’t even have bread to eat.” Then lifting the locket to his lips, he whispered the names of his children one by one. It was a night of fog and gloom. The hour slowly tolled from the belfry of a neighbouring church. The pale flames of the two candles were reflected in the corners of the tall chamber as flickering glints that shivered like ghosts. These phantoms were the painted ancestors of King Charles, whom the flickers seemed to draw out from their gold-framed portraits. Their reflections joined the last bluish flickers of the hearth’s dying coal fire. A great sadness took hold of Charles. He buried his face in his hands, thinking of the world and how beautiful it seems when we’re about to leave it, of the caresses of his children so soft and so sweet, whom he’d never see again, and of his wife, that noble and courageous creature who’d supported him to the very end. He drew from his bosom the diamond cross and the Star of the Garter that she’d sent him by those generous Frenchmen, and kissed them; then, thinking she would see these objects again only once he was lying cold and mutilated in his tomb, he felt pass through him one of those icy shudders that death sends when he begins to wrap us in his mantle. Then, in that royal chamber which recalled to him so many memories, in which so many courtiers had uttered so many flatteries, alone but for a broken servant too frail to help him, the king despaired and allowed his courage to succumb to weakness, darkness, and the winter cold; and then, sad to say, this king who’d resolved to die grandly, with a smile of noble resignation on his lips, wept in the shadows tears that fell on the table and dropped to the gold embroidered carpet below. Suddenly there were footsteps from the corridor, the door opened, torches filled the room with smoky light, and an ecclesiastic, garbed in episcopal robes, entered, followed by two guards to whom Charles made an imperious gesture. The guards withdrew, and the chamber returned to its former gloom. “Juxon!” cried Charles. “Juxon! Thank you, my final friend – you arrive just in time.” The bishop cast an anxious sidelong glance at the man who sobbed in the corner of the foyer. “Come, Parry,” said the king, “cry no more, for the consolation of God’s come to us.”

“If that’s just Parry,” said the bishop, “then I won’t worry – but, Sire, permit me to salute Your Majesty and tell him who I am, and why I’ve come.”

At that sight, and that voice, Charles was about to exclaim but Aramis put a finger to his lips, and bowed deeply to the King of England. “The knight,” murmured Charles.

“Yes, Sire,” interrupted Aramis, and then raising his voice, said, “Yes, it’s Bishop Juxon, loyal knight of Christ, who comes at Your Majesty’s request.”

Charles clasped his hands; he’d recognised d’Herblay, and was stunned by these men who though foreigners, with no motive other than the duty imposed by their own conscience, struggled almost alone against the will of a people and the destiny of a king. “You!” he said. “How did you come here? My God, if they recognise you, you’re lost.”

Parry was on his feet, his entire person expressing his feeling of simple and profound admiration. “Don’t worry about me, Sire,” said Aramis, gesturing to the king for quiet. “Just worry about yourself. Your friends are watching out for you. What we’ll do, I don’t know yet – but four determined men can do much. In the meantime, don’t close your eyes tonight, be surprised by nothing, and expect almost anything.”

Charles shook his head. “Friend,” he said, “don’t you know there’s no time to lose, and that if you wish to act, it must be now? Don’t you know that at ten tomorrow morning I must die?”

“Sire, something will happen between now and then that will make the execution impossible.”

The king looked at Aramis in astonishment. Just then there was a strange noise beneath the king’s window, like a cartload of wood being dumped, “Do you hear that?” said the king.

The sound was followed by a cry of pain. “I hear it,” said Aramis, “but I don’t understand the noise, and especially the cry.”

“I don’t know who made that cry,” said the king, “but I can account for the noise. Do you know that they plan to perform the execution right outside this window?”

And Charles gestured toward the sombre and empty courtyard, peopled solely by soldiers and sentries. “Yes, Sire,” said Aramis. “I know it.”

“Well, that pile of lumber is made up of beams and planks to construct my scaffold. Some worker must have been hurt unloading it.” Aramis shuddered in spite of himself. “So, you see,” said Charles,

“there’s no point in being so stubborn; I am condemned, let me submit to my fate.”

“Sire,” said Aramis, recovering his composure, “though they may erect a scaffold, they won’t find an executioner.”

“What do you mean?” asked the king.

“I mean that as we speak, Sire, the executioner is being bribed or abducted. Tomorrow the scaffold will be ready but the executioner will be missing, and they’ll postpone it another day.”

“And then?” said the king.

“And then,” said Aramis, “tomorrow night we will carry you off.”

“But how?” cried the king, whose face lit with joy in spite of himself.

“Oh, Sir!” murmured Parry, clasping his hands. “Be blessed, you and yours.”

“But how?” repeated the king. “I must understand, so I can assist you, if necessary.”

“I don’t know, Sire,” said Aramis, “but the most skilful, brave, and devoted of us said to me as I left, ‘Knight, tell the king that by ten o’clock tomorrow night he’ll be free.’ If he said it, it will happen.”

“Tell me the name of this devoted friend,” said the king, “that I may think of him with gratitude, whether he succeeds or not.”

“D’Artagnan, Sire, the same man who nearly saved you before Colonel Harrison made his untimely entrance.”

“You are indeed wonderful men,” said the king. “If I’d been told such things were possible, I wouldn’t have believed them.”

“Now, Sire,” Aramis replied, “listen to me. Don’t forget for a single instant that we’re preparing to save you. Take note of every gesture, every whistled song, every tiny sign that we’re near you; see all, hear all, and be ready.”

“Oh, Knight!” said the king. “What can I say to you? No words, even from the depths of my heart, can express my gratitude. If you succeed, your success won’t be that you saved a king – for royalty is not so very great a thing. It will be that you saved a husband for his wife, a father for his children. Take my hand, Knight – this is the hand of a friend who will love you till his last breath.” Aramis wished to kiss the king’s hand but the king seized the knight’s hand and pressed it to his heart. Just then a man entered without even bothering to knock; Aramis tried to pull his hand away but the king held onto it. He who entered was one of those Puritans, half-preacher and half-soldier, who clustered around Cromwell. “What do you wish, Sir?” the king said to him.

“I want to know if the confession of Charles Stuart is finished,” said the newcomer.

“What does that matter to you?” said the king. “We’re not of the same religion.”

“All men are brethren,” said the Puritan. “One of my brethren is going to die, and I come to prepare him for death.”

“Enough,” said Parry. “The king doesn’t need your preparations.”

“Be careful, Sire,” Aramis said in a low voice, “he’s probably a spy.”

“After the reverend bishop leaves,” said the king, “I shall hear you with pleasure, Sir.”

The man narrowed his eyes and withdrew but not before taking a good look at the supposed Juxon, a look that hadn't escaped the king. When the door was closed, he said, "Knight, I think you were right, and that man entered with evil intentions. Take care, and watch yourself on your way out."

"I thank Your Majesty," said Aramis, "but don't worry: under this robe I wear a coat of mail and a dagger."

"Go then, Sir, and may God keep you in safety, as I used to say when I was king."

Aramis went out; Charles escorted him to his door. Aramis pronounced his holy blessing, at which the guards bowed, passed majestically through the antechambers filled with soldiers, entered his carriage, followed by his two guards, who rode with him back to the bishopric, where they left him. Juxon was waiting there anxiously. "Well?" he said upon seeing Aramis.

"Well!" said the latter. "Everything went as planned; spies, guards, sentries, all took me for you, and the king blesses you while waiting for you to bless him."

"God protects you, my son, and your example has given me both hope and courage."

Aramis returned Juxon his robes and mantle and went out, after warning the bishop that they might have to rely upon him again. He'd gone no more than ten steps up the street before he noticed he was being followed by a man wrapped in a large cloak. He stopped and put his hand on his dagger. But the man came straight up to him – and it was Porthos. "My dear friend!" said Aramis, taking his hand. "You see, friend" said Porthos, "each of us has his mission; mine was to guard you, so you've been guarded. Have you seen the king?"

"Yes, and all is well. Now, where are the others?"

"We're to rendezvous at eleven o'clock at the inn."

"Then we have no time to lose," said Aramis.

In fact, half past ten was tolling from the bells of Saint Paul. The two friends hurried, and so arrived first. Athos came in right behind them. "All is well," he said before they had a chance to ask him.

"What have you been doing?" said Aramis.

"I've hired a little sloop, slim as a felucca and light as a swallow. It awaits us at Greenwich, across from the Isle of Dogs; it has a captain and four crew, who, for fifty pounds sterling, will be at our disposal for the next three nights. Once we board with the king, we'll sail with the tide, slip down the Thames, and be on the open sea within two hours. Then like true pirates we'll hug the coast, or if the sea is clear we'll make for Boulogne. In case I'm killed, the name of the captain is Rogers, and the sloop is the Lightning. A handkerchief with its four corners knotted is the recognition sign."

A moment later d'Artagnan came in. "Reach into your pockets," he said, "because we need a hundred pounds sterling – and as for mine..."

He turned his empty pockets inside out. Within seconds, the sum was collected. D'Artagnan took it, went back out, and returned again a moment later. "There!" he said. "That's done. Whew! This is no easy task."

"The executioner has left London?" asked Athos.

"Well, no! That was too uncertain a solution – he might go out one door and come back in another."

"So, where is he?" asked Athos.

"In the cellar."

"In what cellar?"

"In the cellar of our inn! Mousqueton is posted in front of the door, and here's the key."

"Bravo!" said Aramis. "But how did you persuade the man to disappear?"

"The way you persuade everyone in this world, with money. It cost me dearly but he agreed."

"And how much did it cost you, friend?" said Athos. "Because you know, now that we're once again like poor musketeers without house or home, all our expenses should be shared."

"It cost me twelve thousand livres," said d'Artagnan.

"Where ever did you find that?" asked Athos. "You had that much money?"

"No but I had the queen's famous diamond!" d'Artagnan said with a sigh.

"Ah, that's true!" said Aramis. "I'd recognised it on your finger."

"You bought it back from Sir Des Essarts?" asked Porthos.

"In a way," said d'Artagnan. "But it's written on high that it's fated not to stay with me. What would you have? Diamonds, as I understand it, have their sympathies and antipathies just like people – and it seems this one just doesn't like me."

"Well, maybe it will like the executioner," said Athos. "So much for him – but mightn't he have an apprentice or an assistant?"

"Yes, he had one but we got lucky there."

"How's that?"

"Just when I thought I was going to have to strike yet another bargain, the young buck returned home with a broken leg. In an excess of zeal, he'd gone all the way to the courtyard under the king's window with the lumber cart carrying the planks and beams for the scaffold, and one of those beams had fallen on his leg and broken it."

"Ah!" said Aramis. "That explains the cry I heard from the king's chambers."

"Probably," said d'Artagnan. "Anyway, when leaving, he promised the carpenters he'd send some hard-working friends to take his place and help them get the scaffold done in time. And so, upon returning to his master's house, wounded though he was, he wrote to his friend Tom Low, who has a crew of woodworkers, asking them to go to Whitehall to fulfil his promise. Here's the letter he sent by a courier – he paid the messenger ten pence but I bought the message for a guinea."

"And what the devil do you want with this letter?" asked Athos.

"Don't you get it?" said d'Artagnan, his eyes shining with intelligence.

"No, upon my soul!"

"Well, my dear Athos, since you speak English like John Bull himself – you're Master Tom Low and we're your three woodworkers. Do you get it now?" Athos uttered a cry of joy and admiration, ran to a wardrobe, and began drawing out an assortment of work clothes and throwing them to his friends. As soon as they were properly dressed they left the inn, Athos carrying a saw, Porthos a vice, Aramis an axe, and d'Artagnan a hammer and nails. At Whitehall, the letter from the executioner's apprentice proved to the master carpenter that these were the men he'd been expecting.

240
The Workers

Toward the middle of the night, Charles heard a commotion beneath his window, a great racket of hammering, chopping, and sawing. As he had thrown himself fully dressed on his bed, and was just falling asleep, the noise woke him with a start. And, as in addition to its physical repercussions the sounds struck a blow to his soul, the awful thoughts of the day just ended returned to assail him again. Alone in the face of darkness and isolation, he didn't have the strength to endure this new torment that wasn't supposed to be part of his punishment, so he sent Parry to tell the sentry to please ask the labourers to work more quietly, and have pity on the final sleep of he who used to be their king. The sentry didn't want to leave his post but he allowed Parry to pass. After going out and around the palace to approach the window, Parry saw built to the level of the balcony, from which the railing had been removed, a large unfinished wooden scaffold, around which the workers were beginning to hang black serge drapery. This scaffold, raised to the height of the window, that is, about twenty feet, had two lower levels beneath it. Parry, though repelled by this sight, looked over the eight or ten workers who were building this sombre structure, the noise of which was disturbing the king, and on the second level he saw two men using a crowbar to remove the last metal anchors of the railing from the balcony; one of them, a veritable colossus, was like a human battering-ram, shattering stone at every stroke. The other, who stood just below him, cleared the debris as it fell. It was apparently these two who were making the noise of which the king complained. Parry climbed a ladder and approached them. "My friends," he said, "you'd work a little more gently, I pray you? The king's trying to get some sleep that he desperately needs."

The man pounding with the crowbar stopped and half turned but as the man was standing above him in shadow, Parry couldn't make out his face in the darkness under the scaffold. The man below him also turned, and as he was nearer and his face was lit by the lantern, Parry could see him. The man looked him in the eye and raised a finger to his lips. Parry recoiled, stupefied. "Sure, right," said the worker in excellent English. "Return and tell the king that if he sleeps poorly tonight, he'll sleep better tomorrow night."

These harsh words that, if taken literally, had a terrible meaning, were greeted by the other workers on the scaffold with a burst of mocking laughter. Parry withdrew, walking like a man in a dream. Charles was waiting for him impatiently. As Parry re-entered, the sentry at the door peeked in curiously through the opening to see what the king was doing. Charles was in bed, sitting up and leaning on one elbow. Parry shut the door and went to the king, the valet's face radiant with joy. "Sire," he said in a low voice, "do you know who those workers are who are making so much noise?"

"No," said Charles, shaking his head sadly. "How could I know that? Do I know those men?"

"Sire," said Charles, his voice even lower as he leaned on the bed toward his master, "it's the Count La Fère and his comrades."

"They're building my scaffold?" the king said, astonished.

"Yes, and while doing so, they're making a hole in the wall."

"Hush!" said the king, looking around him in terror. "Did you see them?"

"I talked to them."

The king clasped his hands and raised his eyes to heaven; then, after a short but fervent prayer, he jumped out of bed, went to the window, and drew aside the curtain. The sentries on the balcony were still there but beyond the balcony extended a dark platform upon which human shadows moved. Charles couldn't make out any details but beneath his feet he felt the thump of the blows struck by his friends. And each of these blows was now repeated by his heart. Parry hadn't been mistaken, he had in fact recognised Athos. It was he who, aided by Porthos, was carving a hole that was supposed to anchor the end of one of the transverse framing beams. This hole opened into a sort of crawlspace just beneath the floor of the royal bedchamber. Once in this narrow crawlspace, one could, with a crowbar and a good set of shoulders that Athos had, loosen one of the floorboards; the king could then slip through this opening, emerge under the scaffold which was surrounded by black drapes, dress in the worker's outfit they'd brought for him, and then simply walk out with his four companions. The unsuspecting sentries, seeing only workers coming from the scaffold, would let them pass. And then, as we said, the sloop was ready and waiting. The plan was bold, easy, and simple, like all the best plans born of desperate resolution. Enacting it, Athos lacerated his beautiful, aristocratic hands in clearing the stone shards ripped out by Porthos. Already he could fit his head through the gap beneath the carvings that edged the balcony. In two more hours, it would be big enough to admit his entire body. Before dawn, the opening would be finished, hidden behind the folds of an interior curtain d'Artagnan would hang. D'Artagnan had passed himself off as a French tapestry hanger and was nailing up the black cloth with the care of the most skilful draper. Aramis was cutting off the excess where it hung to the ground, concealing the framework of the scaffold. Daylight crept over the roofs of the houses. A bonfire of coal and peat had helped the workers pass that cold night of 29 and 30 January 1649; at any given moment several of the labourers were taking a break from the work and gathering near it to warm themselves. Only Athos and Porthos never interrupted their labours. And so, at morning's first gleam, the opening was finished. Athos crawled inside, carrying with him the clothes intended for the king, wrapped in a bolt of black cloth. Porthos passed him the crowbar, and d'Artagnan hung over the hole a large but essential luxury, the curtain that concealed the opening. Athos now had no more than two hours' work ahead of him before reaching the king – but thanks to the precautions taken by the four friends, they thought they had the whole day ahead of them, since, with the executioner missing, another would have to be summoned from Bristol. Their work done, d'Artagnan resumed his brown suit, and Porthos his red doublet; as to Aramis, he went to visit Juxon, to go in with him, if possible, to visit the king. The three agreed to rendezvous at noon outside Whitehall to see what was going on. Before leaving the scaffold, Aramis had approached the opening behind which Athos was hidden, to tell him he was going to try to visit Charles. "Goodbye then, and take heart," said Athos. "Tell the king what's happening and ask him to rap on the floor when he's alone, so I can continue my work in safety. If Parry could assist me by removing or loosening the hearthstone at the base of the chimney that is probably a marble slab, that would be a big help. You, Aramis, should try to stay near the king. Speak loudly, very loudly, because they'll be listening beyond the door. When the time comes, if there's a single sentry inside the suite, kill him out of hand. If there are two, have Parry kill one while you kill the other; if there are three, die yourself if you must but save the king."

"Never fear," said Aramis. "I'll bring two poniards so I can give one to Parry. Is that all?"

"Yes, go. But advise the king not to succumb to false generosity. If there's a struggle, while you're fighting, he must flee. With the hearthstone replaced over his head, and you dead or alive on top of it, it will take them at least ten minutes to find the hole by which he escaped. In ten minutes we can go far, and the king will be saved."

"It will be done as you say, Athos. Give me your hand, for we may never see each other again."

Athos threw his arms around Aramis's neck and hugged him tightly. "That's for you," he said. "Now, if I die, tell d'Artagnan that I love him like a son, and embrace him for me. Embrace also our good and brave Porthos. Goodbye."

“Goodbye,” said Aramis. “I’m as sure now that the king will be saved as I’m sure that I’ve just shaken the most loyal hand in the world.”

Aramis left Athos, went down from the scaffold in his turn, and returned to the inn whistling a popular pro-Cromwell tune. He found the other two seated near a good fire, drinking a bottle of port and eating cold chicken. Porthos ate while muttering insults about the infamous parliamentarians; d’Artagnan ate in silence, while reviewing the situation and considering contingency plans. Aramis told them what he and Athos had agreed; d’Artagnan nodded in approval, and Porthos said, “Bravo! Besides, we’ll be nearby when he makes his escape; there’s plenty of room to hide under the scaffold. Between d’Artagnan, me, Grimaud, and Mousqueton, we can kill eight of his pursuers while you get away with the king; I don’t count Blaisois, as he’s only good for holding the horses. At a minute a man, that’s eight minutes – though Mousqueton will kill only one, so that’s seven. Still, in seven minutes you’ll be able to ride a quarter of a league.”

Aramis quickly ate a few bites, downed some honey, and went to change his clothing. “I’m off to the bishop’s. Take charge of readying the weapons, Porthos; d’Artagnan, keep an eye on that executioner.”

“Don’t worry, Grimaud has relieved Mousqueton, and he’s got it in hand.”

“Nonetheless, redouble your watch, and don’t be idle for a moment.”

“Idle! My dear Aramis, ask Porthos: I don’t stop for a moment, and I’m on my feet so much, I might as well be a dancer. God be with you! How I love France at this moment, and how good it is to have a country of one’s own, when one finds life so hard elsewhere.”

Aramis left them as he’d left Athos, by embracing them. Then he went to see Bishop Juxon, to whom he made his request. Juxon quickly consented to bringing Aramis with him, as he’d foreseen the need to bring a deacon in the event the king wished to receive communion, and perhaps even hear mass said. Dressed as Aramis had been the day before, the bishop got into his carriage. Aramis, disguised more by his pallor and sadness than by his deacon’s robes, got in with him. The carriage halted at the gates of Whitehall at about nine o’clock in the morning. Nothing seemed changed; the antechambers and corridors, like the day before, were filled with guards. Two sentries were watching at the king’s door, two others marched back and forth outside on the balcony and platform of the scaffold, on which the headsman’s block had already been placed. The king was filled with hope; on seeing Aramis again, this hope became joy. He embraced Juxon and shook Aramis’s hand. The bishop spoke loudly enough for all to hear of their interview the day before. The king replied that the discussion they’d had the day before had borne fruit, and he desired to continue it. Juxon turned to his assistants and asked them to leave him and the deacon alone with the king. Everyone withdrew. Once the door was firmly shut, Aramis said rapidly, “Sire, you are saved! The executioner of London has disappeared, and his apprentice broke his leg under Your Majesty’s window – it was his cry we heard yesterday. Doubtless they’ve already noticed the absence of the executioner but there’s no replacement closer than Bristol, and it will take time to bring him, so we have until tomorrow at least.”

“But the Count La Fère?” asked the king.

“He’s two feet below you, Sire. Take the poker from the fireplace and rap the floor three times, and you’ll hear him reply.”

The king, with trembling hand, took the tool and knocked three times at equal intervals. Immediately, responding to the signal, three raps rang out from below. “So,” said the king, “he who answers me there…”

“Is the Count La Fère, Sire,” said Aramis. “He’s preparing the way for Your Majesty’s escape. Parry, for his part, will raise this marble hearthstone, and the passage will be open.”

“But I don’t have a pry-bar,” said Parry.

“Take this stout dagger,” said Aramis, “only take care not to dull the edge; you may need to cut something other than stone.”

“Oh, Juxon!” said Charles, turning to the bishop and grasping his hands. “Juxon, hear the prayer of one who was once your king…”

“Who still is and who will always be,” said Juxon, kissing the prince’s hand.

“Pray all your life for this gentleman you see here, for another we hear beneath our feet, and for two others who, no matter where they are, work for my salvation, I am certain.”

“Sire,” replied Juxon, “you will be obeyed. Every day, so long as I live, I’ll pray to God for these loyal friends of Your Majesty.”

The miner continued his work for a time, sounding ever nearer. Suddenly a noise was heard from out in the antechamber. Aramis seized the poker and sounded the signal to stop working. The noise approached, a march of equal and regular steps. The four men stood frozen, their eyes fixed on the door that opened slowly and with a sort of solemnity. Guards entered and formed two lines in the king’s outer room. A commissioner of Parliament, dressed in black and with a gravity that augured ill, entered, saluted the king, and unrolling a parchment, read to him his sentence, as is customary when the condemned is about to be marched to the scaffold. “What does this mean?” asked Aramis of Juxon.

Juxon just shrugged to show he was as ignorant as Aramis. “So, it’s for today?” asked the king with an emotion perceptible solely to Juxon and Aramis.

“Weren’t you warned, Sire, that it would be this morning?” replied the man dressed in black.

“And,” said the king, “I must die like a common criminal by the hand of the London executioner?”

“The London executioner has disappeared, Sire,” said the Commissioner of Parliament, “but a man has offered to take his place. The execution, therefore, will be delayed only so long as it takes you to put your affairs in order, temporal and spiritual.”

A light sweat that beaded the roots of Charles’s hair was the only trace of emotion he showed at this news. But Aramis went livid. His heart ceased to beat; he closed his eyes and leaned hard on a table. Seeing this deep sorrow, Charles seemed to forget his own. He went to him, lifted his hands and embraced him. “Come, friend,” he said with a sad and gentle smile. “Courage.”

Then, turning to the commissioner, he said, “Sir, I am ready. I desire only two things that won’t delay you long, I think: first, to take communion, and second, to embrace my children and to tell them goodbye for the final time. Will that be permitted me?”

“Yes, Sire,” replied the Commissioner of Parliament.

And he went out. Aramis, gripping the top of a chair, got hold of himself, and groaned from deep in his chest. “Oh, my Lord!” he cried, seizing Juxon’s hands. “Where’s God?”

“My son,” said the bishop firmly, “you do not see him because earthly passions hide him from you.”

“My child,” said the king to Aramis, “don’t despair so. You ask where is God? God beholds thy devotion and my martyrdom, and, believe me, both will have their reward. Blame men, therefore, for what happens, and not God. It is men who put me to death, and men who make you weep.”

“Yes, Sire,” said Aramis, “yes, you’re right; it’s men whom I shall blame for this, and who shall be held to account.”

“Now sit, Juxon,” said the king, falling to his knees, “for it remains for you to hear me, and it remains to me to confess. Stay, Sir,” he said to Aramis, who’d started to withdraw. “And you, Parry, stay. I have nothing to say, even in the privacy of penitence that cannot be said before all. Stay – and I’ve but one regret that the whole world cannot hear me as you hear me.” Juxon sat and the king, kneeling before him like the humblest of the faithful, began his confession.

241 Remember!

When the royal confession was finished, Charles received communion, and then asked to see his children. Ten o’clock was tolling; as the king had said, he hadn’t delayed events by much. However, the people crowding the streets surrounding the palace were already eager and ready; they knew that ten o’clock was the time fixed for the execution, and the king began to recognise that sound made by both a crowd and the sea, the one when agitated by its passions, the other by its storms. The king’s children arrived, first Princess Elizabeth, then the Duke of Gloucester – that is, a pretty blond girl with her eyes moistened with tears, and a young boy of eight or nine whose dry eye and disdainful look bespoke his proud birth. The boy had been crying all night but before the world’s eyes he would cry no more. Charles felt his heart melt at the sight of these two children, whom he hadn’t seen for two years and now met again only at the moment of his death. A tear rose in his eye and he turned to wipe it away, for he wanted to be strong before these two to whom he bequeathed such an inheritance of suffering and misfortune. Beckoning to the young girl, he spoke first to her, recommending piety, resignation, and filial love. Then he took the young Duke of Gloucester and sat him on his knee, so that at the same time he could kiss his face and press him to his heart. “My son,” he said, “you have seen in the streets and halls many people coming here; they come to take your father’s head, and you must never forget it. Because you are among them and under their control, they may someday propose to make you king, advancing you ahead of the Prince of Wales or the Duke of York, your older brothers who are away, the one in France, the other I know not where. But you are not the king, my son, and cannot be while they live. Swear to me, then, that you will never place the crown on your head unless you have a legitimate right to that crown; for hear me, my son, if you did that, then a day would come when they would take away both head and crown, and you wouldn’t be able to die at peace, as I do. Swear it, my son.”

The child put his small hand on that of his father and said, “Sire, I swear it to Your Majesty.”

Charles interrupted: “Henry,” he said, “call me your father.”

“Father,” the child replied, “I swear to you they will have to kill me before I’ll be made king.”

“Good, my son,” said Charles. “Now kiss me – you too, Elizabeth – and do not forget me.”

“Never! No, never!” cried the two children, throwing their arms around the king’s neck.

“Goodbye,” said Charles, “goodbye, my children. Take them away, Juxon; their tears would steal from me the courage to die.”

Juxon pried the poor children from their father’s arms and returned them to those who’d brought them. Once the children were outside the doors were opened, and everyone in the antechamber was allowed in. The king, finding himself alone in the crowd of guards and the curious who were beginning to invade the chamber, remembered that the Count La Fère was nearby, under the room’s parquet floor, unable to see and perhaps still hopeful. He was afraid that any noise might be taken by Athos as a signal to resume his task, thus betraying himself, so the king stood immobile, hoping that by his example the others around him would do the same. The king was right, Athos really was just below his feet. He listened carefully, and, despairing at not hearing the signal to resume, he nearly began, in his impatience, to once more pry at the stone but stopped at once, fearing to be heard. This horrible inaction lasted for two hours, during which a silence like death reigned in the royal chamber above. Then Athos made up his mind to determine the cause of that sombre silence that was troubled only by the surging sound of the crowd. He opened the hanging that hid the hole in the outer wall and climbed down to the first stage of the scaffold. Only four inches above his head were the planks of the platform that was the top of the scaffold. The roar of the crowd, deep and menacing that he had only distantly heard till then, made him start with terror. He crept to the edge of the scaffold, opened the black curtain at eye level, and looked. There was the cavalry ranked around the terrible structure, beyond the cavalry the rank of halberdiers, and beyond the halberdiers, the musketeers – and beyond the musketeers, the first lines of the people who, like a restless ocean, were seething and roaring. “What’s happened, then?” Athos asked himself, trembling like the curtain whose edge he held. “The people press forward, the soldiers are under arms, and there, among the spectators, all eyes fixed on the window, I see d’Artagnan! What’s he waiting for? What does he see? Great God, have they allowed the executioner to escape?”

Suddenly the drums rolled, stark and funereal, across the square, and the sound of steps, heavy and deliberate, resounded from above his head. It seemed a procession was marching across the floor of Whitehall, out onto the balcony, and then making the scaffold creak as it emerged into the square. Athos cast a final glance out into the yard, and the attitude of the spectators told him what the last hope in his heart had kept him from guessing. The murmurs in the square had altogether stopped. All eyes were fixed on the window of Whitehall, all mouths hanging half-open, breath suspended as all awaited the terrible spectacle. The sound of footsteps echoed from the hole beneath the king’s apartment, and then from the scaffold above Athos’s head, as the planks bent under added weight almost to the top of that distraught gentleman’s head. It seemed two lines of soldiers had marched into place. And then a noble voice, one Athos knew, pronounced these words from just above his head: “Colonel, I wish to address the people.”

Athos shuddered from head to foot – for it was the king who spoke from above him on the scaffold. In fact, after taking a few sips of honey and breaking a loaf of bread, Charles, weary of waiting for Death, had decided to go to meet him, and had given the signal to march. Then a second window on the balcony was opened, and from the depths of the chamber within, the people could see a masked man advancing silently, who from the axe in his hand they recognised as the executioner. This man approached the block and laid down his axe, with a sound that Athos heard clearly. Then, from behind this man, visibly pale but calm and marching steadily, Charles Stuart came forward flanked by two priests, between the two lines of halberdiers ranked along both sides of the scaffold, followed by some superior officers charged with presiding over the execution. The sight of the masked man had provoked the crowd to murmurs. All were curious to know the identity of this unknown executioner who’d come forward to enact the terrible spectacle promised to the people, when they’d thought the spectacle postponed to the following day. The crowd devoured him with their eyes but all they could see was a man of medium height, garbed entirely in black, and apparently of a certain age, for the tip of a greying beard extended past the bottom of the mask that covered his face. But at the sight of the king, so calm, so noble, and so dignified, silence fell once again, and everyone heard him express his desire to speak to the people. To this request, the person to whom it was addressed apparently responded with an affirmative gesture, for in a firm and resonant voice that struck Athos to the heart, the king began to speak. He explained his conduct to the people and gave them advice for the future good of England. “Oh!” Athos said to himself. “Is it really possible I’m hearing what I hear and seeing what I see? Is it possible for God so to abandon his representative on Earth to such a miserable death? And I can’t even see him! I can’t even bid him farewell!”

A noise came that sounded like the instrument of death being moved on the block. The king interrupted: “Don’t touch the axe,” he said. And he resumed his speech where he’d left off. When the speech ended, an icy silence seemed to chill the air around the count’s head. He touched his hand to his brow, and it ran with streams of sweat, though the air seemed frozen. This silence was the sign of the final preparations. When his address was over, the king looked over the crowd with an expression full of mercy, and then removed the medallion he wore that was none other than the diamond plaque the queen had sent to him, and which he handed to the priest who accompanied Juxon. Then he drew from his breast a small diamond-crusted cross which, like the plaque, had come from Madam Henriette. "Sir," said the king, addressing the priest next to Juxon, "I'll keep this cross in my hand until the final moment; you'll take it from me once I'm dead."

"Yes, Sire," said a voice that Athos recognised as that of Aramis.

Then Charles, who until then had kept his head covered, removed his hat and set it down near him. He undid the buttons of his doublet, removed it and placed it near his hat. Then, as it was cold, he asked for his dressing gown that he donned. All these preparations were made with a frightful calm. It was as if the king were preparing to lie in his bed, not his coffin. Finally, lifting his hair from his neck with his hand, he said to the executioner, "Will this bother you, Sir? If so, it could be tied up with a cord." Charles accompanied these words with a look that seemed to penetrate the unknown's mask. This look, so noble, so calm and self-assured, forced the man to turn his eyes away. But beyond the penetrating eyes of the king he met the fiery gaze of Aramis. The king, receiving no answer, repeated his question. "It will suffice," said the man in a hollow voice, "if you spread the hair on your neck."

The king spread his hair with his hands, and then looked at the block. "This block seems quite low," he said. "Is there none higher?"

"It's the usual block," replied the masked man.

"Do you think you can cut off my head with a single blow?" asked the king.

"So I hope," replied the executioner.

There was in this phrase: So I hope, such a strange intonation that everyone shivered, except the king.

"Very well," said the king. "And now, executioner, listen." The masked man took a step toward the king and leaned on his axe. "I don't want you to surprise me," Charles said to him. "I'm going to kneel to pray, so don't strike just yet."

"And when shall I strike?" asked the masked man.

"When I lay my neck on the block, stretch out my arms, and say, Remember, strike and boldly." The masked man nodded. "Now is the time to leave the world," said the king to those around him.

"Gentlemen, I leave you in the midst of a tempest, and precede you into that country that knows no storms. Goodbye." He looked at Aramis and gave him a significant nod. "Now," he continued, "step away, and allow me a quiet prayer. You, too," he said to the masked man. "This will take just a moment and then I'll be all yours. But remember to wait for my signal." Then Charles kneeled, made the sign of the cross, and leaned his lips toward the planks as if he would kiss the platform. He put one hand on the planks, the other on the block, and then whispered in French, "Count La Fère, are you there, and can you hear me?"

This voice struck straight through Athos's heart and pierced it like a blade of ice. "Yes, Majesty," he said shakily.

"Faithful friend and generous heart," said the king, "I couldn't be saved, and indeed, didn't deserve it. Now, though it be a sacrilege, I tell you: I have spoken to the people, and I have spoken to God but I speak my final words to you. To support a cause I believed was sacred, I lost the throne of my fathers and the heritage of my children. But there remains a million in gold that was buried in the cellars of the keep at Newcastle just before I left that city. You alone know that this money exists, for you to use when you think the time is right in the best interests of my eldest son. And now, Count La Fère, bid me goodbye."

"Goodbye, M-majesty, saint, and martyr," stammered Athos, frozen with terror.

There was a moment of silence, during which it seemed to Athos that the king rose and changed his position. Then in a clear and resonant voice, so he could be heard not just on the scaffold but across the square, the king said, "Remember." Charles had scarcely finished the word before a terrible blow shook the planks of the scaffold; dust billowed from the black curtain and blinded the wretched count. Then quickly and mechanically, Athos turned up his eyes, just as a drop of hot liquid fell on his forehead. He drew back with a shudder of horror as the drops turned into a black cascade from above. Athos, fallen to his knees, remained for some moments stricken with weakness and dismay. Gradually, as the murmurs died away, he realised that the crowd was leaving the square but he remained a while longer, stunned and mute. Then, turning about, he dipped the corner of his handkerchief in the blood of the martyred king, before he descended, parted the curtain, and slipped out between two horses to merge with the departing crowd, in clothing similar to theirs. He was the first to arrive back at the inn. Going up to his room, he looked at himself in a mirror, and saw his forehead was marked by a large red blot. He raised his hand to his brow, drew it away stained with the king's blood, and swooned.

242
The Masked Man

Though it was only four o'clock in the afternoon, it was dark as night, the snow falling thick and damp. Aramis made his way to the inn where he found Athos, though not unconscious, thoroughly dazed. But at his friend's first words, the count emerged from the stunned lethargy into which he'd fallen. "Outdone!" said Aramis. "Vanquished by fate."

"Defeated!" said Athos. "That noble and unhappy king!"

"Are you wounded?" asked Aramis.

"No, the blood is his."

The count wiped his forehead. "Where were you?"

"Where you left me, under the scaffold."

"And you saw it all?"

"No but I heard everything. God defend me from another hour like the one I've just passed. Has my hair turned white?"

"Then you were aware I never left him?"

"I heard your voice up until the final moment."

"Here is the plaque he gave me," said Aramis, "and here the cross I took from his hand. He asked that they be returned to the queen."

"And here is a handkerchief to wrap around them," said Athos. And he drew from his pocket the handkerchief he'd soaked in the king's blood. "Now," he asked, "what has become of his poor cadaver?"

"By Cromwell's order, it's to be rendered royal honours. We put the body in a leaden coffin; the doctors are busy embalming the remains, and when they're done, the body will be taken to a chapel to lie in state."

"A mockery!" Athos muttered darkly. "Paying royal honours to one they assassinated!"

"It proves that though the king may die, royalty lives on."

"Alas!" said Athos. "It may be that the last king of ancient chivalry has passed from the world."

"Come, don't despair, Count," said a loud voice from the stairway, above the heavy footsteps of Porthos. "We're all but mortal, my poor friends."

"You're late, my dear Porthos," said the Count La Fère.

"Yes," said Porthos, "there were some people along my way who delayed me. They were dancing, the wretches! I took one by the neck and choked him a bit. Just then the Watch arrived. Fortunately, the one I'd been toying with wasn't able to speak for several minutes, and I took advantage of that to dash up a back street. The back street led to an alley, and that to another, and soon I was lost. I don't know London, I don't speak English, and I thought I'd never see you again – but here I am."

"But d'Artagnan," said Aramis, "what of him? Have you seen him?"

"We got separated in the crush, and I lost track of him," said Porthos.

"Oh," said Athos bitterly, "I saw him! He was in the front row of the crowd, admirably situated so he'd miss nothing. And as the spectacle was curious, no doubt he stayed to see the end."

"What? Now, Sir La Fère," said a voice, calm but breathing hard from exertion, "is it like you to slander the absent?"

This reproach struck Athos to the quick. But the sight of d'Artagnan at the front of the crowd had hit him hard so he replied, "I don't slander you, my friend. We're just worried about where you're and I said where I'd seen you. You didn't really know King Charles well enough to love him, he was almost a stranger to you."

As he said these words he extended his hand to his friend but d'Artagnan pretended not to see the gesture and kept his hand under his cloak. Athos allowed his hand to drop slowly away. "Whew! I'm tired," d'Artagnan said and sat down.

"Have a glass of port," said Aramis, taking a bottle from the table and filling a glass. "Drink, it'll restore you."

"Yes, let's drink," said Athos who, aware of the Gascon's resentment, hoped to touch glasses with him and amend it. "Let's drink, and then get out of this abominable country. The sloop awaits us; let's leave tonight. We have no more business here."

"You're in a great hurry, Sir Count," said d'Artagnan.

"This bloody soil burns my feet," said Athos.

"The snow doesn't have that effect on me," said the Gascon quietly.

"But what would you have us do now that the king is dead?" said Athos.

"So, Sir Count," said d'Artagnan airily, "you don't find that you have anything left to do in England?"

"Not a thing," said Athos, "other than to doubt in divine grace and curse my own weakness."

"Indeed!" said d'Artagnan. "Well, I, rustic that I am, who stood thirty feet from the scaffold the better to watch the fall of the head of this king I hardly knew, to whom I was apparently quite indifferent – I see things otherwise than Sir Count. I intend to stay."

Athos turned pale; these reproaches from his friend went straight to his heart. "Really! So, you're staying in London?" said Porthos to d'Artagnan.

"I am. And you?"

"Dame!" said Porthos, looking awkwardly at Athos and Aramis. "Dame! Since I came with you, if you're staying, then I'll stay with you. I wouldn't leave you alone in this abominable country."

"Thanks, my good friend. Then I have a little enterprise to propose to you that we shall undertake together once the count has departed, an idea that came to me while watching that spectacle you heard mentioned."

"What's that?" said Porthos.

"It's to find out the identity of that masked man who so obligingly offered to cut off the king's head."

"A masked man!" cried Athos. "Then you didn't allow the executioner to escape?"

"The executioner?" said d'Artagnan. "He's still in the cellar, where I assume he's making free with our host's bottles. But now that you mention it..." He went to the door. "Mousqueton!" he called.

"Sir?" replied a voice that seemed to come from the depths of the earth.

"You can leave the prisoner," said d'Artagnan. "It's all over."

"But then," said Athos, "who was the wretch who presumed to lay hands on the king?"

"An amateur executioner," said Aramis, "but one who, nonetheless, manages an axe with ease, for as the king hoped, it took only one blow."

"Were you able to see his face?" asked Athos.

"He wore a full mask," said d'Artagnan.

"But weren't you near to him, Aramis?"

"I saw only a bit of grey beard that stuck out below the mask."

"So, he was a man of some maturity?" asked Athos.

"Oh, that doesn't mean anything," said d'Artagnan. "One who wears a mask can wear a beard as well."

"I'm sorry now that I didn't follow him," said Porthos.

"Fortunately, my dear Porthos," said d'Artagnan, "that idea occurred to me while watching."

Athos understood everything. He rose. "Pardon me, d'Artagnan," he said. "When I doubted God, I even doubted you. Forgive me, my friend."

"We can probably find the time for that, at some point," said d'Artagnan with a half-smile.

"Well?" said Aramis.

"Well!" replied d'Artagnan. "I was looking, not at the king, as Sir Count thought – for I know what it's like for a man who's about to die, and though you'd think I'd be used to that sort of thing, it still dismays me – but rather at the masked executioner, and the idea came to me, as I mentioned, that I'd like very much to know who he was. Now, as we're in the habit of relying on each other, one hand calling for the others to join in and help, I automatically looked around to see if I could spot Porthos; I'd already recognised you near the king, Aramis, and I knew you, Count, were under the scaffold. And this is the part where I forgive you," he added, holding out his hand to Athos, "for I know how you must have suffered. Anyway, I looked around and saw standing to my right someone with a head that had been split open and then sewn back up, as well as it could be, anyway, with black silk thread. 'For God's sake,' I said to myself, 'that work looks familiar – in fact I think Grimaud did that sewing job.' And indeed, it was that unlucky Scotsman, Parry's brother – you remember, the one on whom Groslow amused himself by trying his strength, and who had only half a head when we found him." "Absolutely," said Porthos. "The man with the black chickens."

"Just as you say! He was gesturing to someone on my left; I turned and recognised our honest Grimaud, completely occupied like me in staring at the masked executioner. Hey, I said to him and as this is one of the abbreviations the count uses when speaking with him, Grimaud thought it was his master who'd called, and turned like a clockwork. Seeing me instead, he pointed toward the masked man and said, 'Hein?' which meant, 'Do you see him?'"

"For God's sake!" I replied. We knew we were in perfect accord. I turned back to our Scotsman, whose look said he understood as well. In the event, it all ended sadly, as you know. The people filed away as, little by little, evening came on. I'd withdrawn to a corner of the square with Grimaud and the Scotsman, whom I'd signalled to join us, and from there we watched the executioner. We could see him retire into the king's chamber to change his outfit that was doubtless bloodstained. Then he clapped a black hat on his head, wrapped himself in a cloak, and disappeared further within. I guessed he was going to go through and come out and I ran around to the front entrance. In fact, a few moments later he came out and went down the stairs."

"You followed him?" cried Athos.

"We did!" said d'Artagnan. "Though not without some difficulty, I'll tell you! Every few minutes he turned to look behind him, and we had to hide ourselves or pretend indifference. If I'd been here on my own account, I'd have just killed him but I'm not that selfish, so I saved that pleasure for you, Aramis, and you, Athos, as a small consolation. Finally, after half an hour's twisting march through the smallest and most crooked streets in the City of London, he arrived at a small, lonely house that seemed entirely deserted. Grimaud reached into his belt and drew a pistol. 'Hein?' he asked, pointing. 'No,' I said, and put a hand on his arm. As I said, I had my own ideas. The masked man stopped in front of a low door and pulled out a key but before putting it in the lock, he turned suddenly to see if he'd been followed. I huddled behind a tree, Grimaud ducked behind a lamppost, and the Scotsman, who had nowhere to hide, threw himself face down in the street. No doubt our prey thought himself quite alone, for I heard the turning of the key; the door opened, and he disappeared."

"The wretch!" said Aramis. "In the time since you've returned, he'll have fled, and we'll never find him again."

"Come, Aramis," said d'Artagnan, "who do you think you're dealing with?"

"However," said Athos, "in your absence..."

"Well, in my absence, don't I have Grimaud and the Scot in my place? Before the man had time to take ten steps inside I'd circled around the house. At one of its doors, the one by which he'd entered, I posted the Scotsman and ordered that if the man in the black mask came out, he was to follow him. Grimaud would follow in his turn, and when the man reached his destination, Grimaud would come back and wait for us at the deserted house. Then I stationed Grimaud at the house's second door, with the same orders, and here I am. The prey is in the trap; now, who's in for the death blow?"

Athos threw himself into the arms of d'Artagnan, who was catching his breath and wiping his forehead. "Friend," Athos said, "in truth I don't deserve your forgiveness – I was wrong, a hundred times wrong. I should have trusted you but deep inside us there's a wicked will that leads us to doubt."

"Hmmm!" said Porthos. "Might the executioner by any chance be Sir Cromwell, who, to be sure the work was done right, decided to do it himself?"

"Maybe – but no. Cromwell is short and stout, while the masked man is slender, and tall if anything."

"Some condemned soldier, perhaps, who was offered amnesty as payment," said Athos, "as was done with poor Chalais."

"No, no," continued d'Artagnan. "He didn't march like an infantryman or step out like a man of the cavalry. He walked with dignity and stood with poise. Unless I'm badly mistaken, we're dealing with a gentleman."

"A gentleman!" cried Athos. "Impossible! It would be a disgrace to the entire aristocracy."

"A pretty prey!" said Porthos, with a laugh that made the windowpanes shake. "A pretty prey, Mordieu!"

"Are you still leaving the country, Athos?" asked d'Artagnan.

"No, I'm staying," replied the gentleman, with a gesture so menacing it promised no good for the one he was staying for.

"Then, swords all!" said Aramis. "And let's lose not a moment."

The four comrades quickly resumed their gentlemen's clothing and buckled on their swords. They called up Mousqueton and Blaisois, ordered them to settle accounts with their host, and to prepare for immediate departure, as in all probability they'd be leaving London that very night. Dark night had fully arrived, while the snow continued to fall, drawing a vast white shroud across the regicide city; it was about seven in the evening, and there were few passers-by still in the streets, talking with friends and family in low voices about the terrible events of the day. The four comrades, enveloped in their cloaks, made their way through the squares and streets of the city, so busy during the day, so deserted at night. D'Artagnan led the way, pausing from time to time to take note of the crosses he'd scratched on the walls they passed but the night was so dark it was often difficult to make out the shallow marks. However, d'Artagnan had so carefully memorized each post, sign, and fountain along the way that within half an hour he and his three companions came within sight of the lonely house. D'Artagnan thought for a moment that Parry's brother had disappeared but he was mistaken; the robust Scotsman, accustomed to winters in his mountains, had sat down with his back against a borne, and like a statue that had fallen from its pedestal, insensible to the weather, lay covered in snow; but at the approach of the four men he rose. "Come," said Athos, "here's another true and loyal servant. God's truth! The good folk are less rare than we think. That's encouraging."

"Don't be in such a hurry to plait garlands for our Scotsman," said d'Artagnan. "I think the fellow is here on his own account. I've heard that the men who hail from the north side of the Tweed are a vengeful sort. Let Master Groslow beware! He'll have a bad quarter of an hour if this man catches up with him."

He separated from his friends, approached the Scot and made himself known. Then he beckoned the others to join him. "Well?" said Athos in English.

"No one has come out," replied Parry's brother.

"Good. Stay with this fellow, Porthos, and you too, Aramis. D'Artagnan is going to lead me to Grimaud." Grimaud, no less wily than the Scotsman, had pushed himself into the hollow of a bare willow tree that he'd converted to a sentry-box. Failing at first to see him, d'Artagnan worried for a moment that the masked man had moved on and Grimaud had followed him. Then a head emerged from the tree and he heard a light whistle. "Hey!" said Athos.

"Hein," replied Grimaud.

They approached the willow. "So," d'Artagnan asked, "has anyone gone out?"

"No – but someone has gone in," said Grimaud.

"A man or a woman?"

"A man."

"Ah ha!" said d'Artagnan. "Then they are two."

"I wish they were four," said Athos. "It would make it more equal."

"Maybe there are four," said d'Artagnan.

"How's that?"

"Couldn't other men have been in the house when these later two arrived?"

"You could look," said Grimaud, pointing to an upper window through whose shutters a few rays of light shone out.

"True enough," said d'Artagnan. "Let's call the others."

And they returned to the first door to beckon the others, who hastily rejoined them. "Have you seen anything?" they asked.

"No but we're about to," replied d'Artagnan, indicating Grimaud who clinging to crevices in the wall, was already five or six feet off the ground. The four drew nearer as Grimaud continued his ascent with the dexterity of a cat. Finally, he got a hand around one of the hooks used to hold one of the shutters open against the outer wall, while his feet found purchase on a moulding that gave him solid support, and he made a sign to say that he'd reached his goal. Then he leaned toward the gap in the shutter. "Well?" asked d'Artagnan.

Grimaud raised a hand with two fingers extended. "Speak," said Athos. "We can't see your signs. How many are there?"

With an effort, Grimaud forced himself to talk. "Two," he said. "One is facing me but the other has his back turned."

"Good. Which one is facing you?"

"The man I saw enter second."

"Do you know him?"

"I thought I'd recognised him, and I wasn't wrong; he's short and stout."

"Who is he?" the four below hissed urgently.

"General Oliver Cromwell."

The four friends looked at each other. "And the other?" asked Athos.

"Slim and rather tall."

"It's the executioner," said d'Artagnan and Aramis at the same time.

"I see only his back," replied Grimaud. "But wait, he's turning, and if he's removed his mask, I'll see him ... Ah!"

Grimaud, as if stabbed to the heart, let go of the iron hook and fell backward with a muffled groan. Porthos caught him. "You saw him?" asked the four friends.

"Yes," said Grimaud, hair standing on end and sweat bursting from his brow.

"The tall, slender man?" said d'Artagnan.

"Yes."

"Was it the executioner?" asked Aramis.

"Yes."

"Well, who is he?" said Porthos.

"Him! Him!" stammered Grimaud, pale as death, grasping for his master's hands with his own trembling fingers.

"Him? Who?" demanded Athos.

"Mordaunt ...!" whispered Grimaud.

D'Artagnan, Porthos, and Aramis gasped with joy and gratification. But Athos recoiled, passed his hand across his brow, and murmured, "It's fate."

It was indeed Mordaunt that d'Artagnan had followed without recognising him. After entering the house, he had removed his mask and false beard, climbed the stairs, opened a door, and, in a chamber lit by a single lamp hung with dark-coloured curtains, found himself facing a man who was sitting at a desk and writing. This man was Oliver Cromwell. As we now know, Cromwell kept two or three of these retreats in London, safe houses known only to his most loyal aides. Mordaunt, it will be recalled, could be counted among the latter. When he entered, Cromwell raised his head. "It's you, Mordaunt," he said. "You come late."

"General," replied Mordaunt, "I wanted to see the ceremony through to the end, and that delayed me."

"Oh?" said Cromwell. "I didn't think you such a curious man."

"I'm always curious to see the fall of one of Your Honour's enemies, and this one was not the least of them. But you, General – weren't you at Whitehall?"

"No," Cromwell said.

There was a moment of silence. "Have you heard the details?" asked Mordaunt.

"No. I've been here since the morning. I know only that there was a conspiracy to save the king."

"Ah! How do you know that?" asked Mordaunt.

"No matter. Four men disguised as workers were to spirit the king away from prison and escort him to Greenwich, where a ship awaited them."

"And knowing that, Your Honour chose to remain here, far from Whitehall, quiet and passive!"

"Quiet, yes," replied Cromwell, "but what do you mean, passive?"

"But what if the plot had succeeded?"

"That would have been fine with me."

"I thought Your Honour regarded the death of Charles as a surgery, an operation necessary for the good of England."

"Well!" said Cromwell. "That's still my opinion. But so long as he died, that was all that mattered. It might have been better, perhaps, if he'd died somewhere other than on a scaffold."

"Why's that, Your Honour?"

Cromwell merely smiled. "Your pardon," said Mordaunt, "but as you know, General, I'm just a novice to politics, and wish to learn from all the lessons my master provides."

"Because it would have been said that I'd had him condemned out of justice but had let him escape out of mercy."

"But what if he'd actually gotten away?"

"Impossible."

"Impossible?"

"Yes, my precautions were in place."

"And does Your Honour know these four men who plotted to save the king?"

"It was those four Frenchmen, two of whom were sent by Madam Henriette to her husband, and two by Mazarin to me."

"And do you think, Sir that Mazarin ordered them to do what they've done?"

"It's possible but he'll just disavow them."

"You believe so?"

"I'm sure of it."

"Why is that?"

"Because they failed."

"Your Honour had given me two of these Frenchmen when they were merely guilty of having borne arms for Charles I. Now that they're guilty of a conspiracy against England, will Your Honour give me all four?"

"Take them," said Cromwell.

Mordaunt bowed with a smile both fierce and triumphant. "Stop," said Cromwell, seeing that Mordaunt was about to begin thanking him. "Let's return, if you please, to the unlucky King Charles. Did the people shout and cry out much?"

"Very little, except to say, 'Long live Cromwell!'"

"Where were you located?"

Mordaunt studied the general for a moment to try to read whether he was asking a rhetorical question and actually knew the whole truth. But Mordaunt's burning gaze couldn't penetrate the dark depths of Cromwell's mind. "I was located where I could see and hear everything," replied Mordaunt.

It was Cromwell's turn to start fixedly at Mordaunt and Mordaunt's turn to be inscrutable. After a few seconds' regard, he turned his eyes away indifferently. "It seems," said Cromwell, "that the amateur executioner did his job well. The blow, or so I'm told at least, was struck as if by the hand of a master."

Mordaunt recalled that Cromwell had said he knew no details, and was now convinced that the general had attended the execution in secret, watching from behind some curtain or tapestry. "In fact," Mordaunt said, voice calm, face impassive, "one blow was enough."

"Perhaps it was a man who knew the trade," said Cromwell.

"You think so, Sir?"

"Why not?"

"The man didn't carry himself like an executioner."

"And who but an executioner," asked Cromwell, "would take on such a dreadful task?"

"Perhaps," said Mordaunt, "some personal enemy of King Charles, who had taken a vow of vengeance and has now accomplished his vow; perhaps some gentleman who had grave reasons to hate the late king, and who, knowing he was about to flee and escape, undertook the task of wearing the mask and wielding the axe less as an executioner than as an instrument of fate."

"That's possible," said Cromwell.

"And if it were so," said Mordaunt, "would Your Honour condemn such an act?"

"It's not for me to judge," said Cromwell. "That would be a matter between him and God."

"What if Your Honour knew this gentleman?"

"I do not know him, Sir," replied Cromwell, "and I will not know him. What does it matter whether it was this man, that man, or some other? From the moment Charles was condemned, it's not a man who'd take his head but the axe."

"And yet," said Mordaunt, "but for this man, the king would've been saved." Cromwell smiled. "But you said so yourself – they'd have carried him off."

"They'd have taken him to Greenwich, where the four saviours had a sloop awaiting. But the sloop was crewed by four men of mine, with five barrels of black powder in the hold. Once at sea, my four men would have left in the longboat – and you're not such a novice, Mordaunt, as to need me to explain the rest."

Mordaunt nodded. "The sea would have taken them all."

"Exactly. The explosion would have done what the axe had not. King Charles would have disappeared, annihilated. It would be said that, fleeing from human justice, he'd been overtaken by heavenly vengeance; we'd been his judges but God had been his executioner. That's what your masked gentleman cost us, Mordaunt. You see, I'm right in not wanting to know him – for in truth, despite his excellent intentions, I can't be grateful to him for what he's done."

"Sir," said Mordaunt, "as always I humbly bow before you. You are a profound thinker, and the idea of the powder-packed sloop is sublime."

"Rather, it's absurd, since it's become useless. No idea in politics is sublime unless it bears fruit; an aborted or incomplete plan is just a folly." Cromwell rose. "You will go to Greenwich tonight, Mordaunt, and ask for the master of the sloop Lightning. You will show him a white handkerchief with a knot in each corner that is the agreed-upon signal. Tell his men to go ashore and arrange to have the powder returned to the arsenal – unless..."

"Unless..." replied Mordaunt whose face lit up with mad joy at Cromwell's words.

"Unless this sloop as prepared would be useful for your own purposes."

"Ah, Milord! Milord!" cried Mordaunt. "God, in choosing you to do his will, has given you his vision that sees everything and misses nothing!"

"I think you just called me milord," Cromwell laughed. "That's fine, since we're amongst ourselves but be careful not to let such a word slip out in front of our fools of Puritans."

"Won't Your Honour be called by that title soon?"

"I hope so," said Cromwell, "but that time has not yet come." Cromwell turned and took up his cloak.

"You're going now, Sir?" asked Mordaunt.

"Yes," said Cromwell. "I slept here last night and the night before that, and you know it's against my policy to sleep in the same bed three nights in a row."

"Then," said Mordaunt, "Your Honour gives me liberty for the rest of the night?"

"And even through tomorrow if need be," said Cromwell, smiling. "Today you've done enough in my service that, if you have personal affairs to settle, you should be granted the time to do it."

"Thank you, Sir. I hope to spend this time well."

Cromwell nodded to Mordaunt, turned away, and then turned back again. "Are you armed?" he asked.

"I have my sword," said Mordaunt.

"And who awaits you at the door?"

"No one."

"Then you should come with me, Mordaunt."

"Thank you, Sir but your long route through the underground passage will cost me too much time, and from what you told me, I may not have any to spare. I'll use the outer door."

"Go, then," said Cromwell.

He pressed a concealed lever that opened a door so hidden behind a tapestry not even the sharpest eye could spot it. He went past the open door that then moved by a steel spring, closed behind him. This was one of those secret exits that, as history tells us, Cromwell had installed in all of his safe houses. It led to an underground tunnel a hundred paces long that passed under the street and opened in the garden grotto of another house, one that faced away from the house the future Protector had just left. It was during the latter part of this scene that, through the gap in the shutters, Grimaud had spied on the two men whom he eventually recognised as Cromwell and Mordaunt. We have seen the effect of his news on the four friends. D'Artagnan was the first to come to his senses. "Mordaunt!" he said. "By heaven! It's God himself who sends him to us."

"Yes," said Porthos. "Let's break down the door and get at him."

"On the contrary," said d'Artagnan, "do nothing, and make no noise; if Mordaunt is, as Grimaud says, with his worthy master, there must be some hard men in iron armour not fifty paces from here. Whoa! Grimaud, stop shaking and come here."

Grimaud approached. He was firm again, fury in him having replaced fear. "Good man," said d'Artagnan. "Now go back up to that window and tell us if Mordaunt still has company. If he does or is about to go to bed, we'll just have to wait until he's alone. If he comes out, we'll take him as he leaves. If he turns in alone, we'll enter by the window – that's always quieter and less difficult than a door."

Grimaud began to climb quietly back up to the window. "Guard the other exit, Athos and Aramis," said d'Artagnan. "I'll stay here with Porthos."

His two friends obeyed. "Well, Grimaud?" hissed d'Artagnan.

"He's alone," said Grimaud.

"You're sure?"

"Yes."

"We didn't see his companion come out."

"Maybe he left by the other door."

"What's he doing?"

"He's donned his cloak and is putting on his gloves."

"He's ours!" murmured d'Artagnan.

Porthos put his hand to his poniard and began to draw it from its sheath. "Not so fast, friend Porthos," said d'Artagnan. "This is not a case of striking first. We've got him and must do things in the proper order. We have questions to ask, and explanations to make, because this is the final outcome of that business in Armentieres. Let's hope Mordaunt doesn't have any offspring – but if he does, this time we exterminate the entire nest."

"Hush!" said Grimaud. "He's getting ready to leave. He approaches the lamp – blows it out – I can see nothing."

"Come down, then!"

Grimaud leapt down and landed on his feet, the snow absorbing the sound. D'Artagnan said, "Go and warn Athos and Aramis to stand one to each side of the door, as Porthos and I will do here. Let them clap their hands if they get him, and we'll do the same."

Grimaud disappeared.

"Porthos, Porthos," said d'Artagnan, "better hide those big shoulders of yours against the wall, friend – if he sees them, he won't come out."

"Oh, I do so hope he comes out this way!"

Porthos flattened himself against the wall to one side of the door and d'Artagnan did the same on the other. Mordaunt's footsteps could be heard coming down the staircase. A door somewhere inside creaked on its hinges; within, Mordaunt looked out suspiciously but thanks to the pair's precautions, he saw nothing. He turned the key in the lock, opened the outer door and stepped onto the threshold – where found himself face-to-face with d'Artagnan. He tried to pull the door shut but Porthos grabbed the knob and jerked it open. Porthos clapped three times. Athos and Aramis came running. Mordaunt was livid but he didn't say a word or call out for help. D'Artagnan marched straight in on Mordaunt, thrusting him back bodily, to the foot of the staircase and up it. The light from a hanging lamp enabled the Gascon to keep an eye on Mordaunt's hands in case he went for a weapon but Mordaunt knew that even if he killed d'Artagnan, he'd just have to face the other three, so he was careful not to make any threatening moves, or even to defend himself. Reaching the landing, Mordaunt, his back against the door, felt cornered, and no doubt thought it was all over with him but he was wrong – d'Artagnan merely reached around him and opened the door. He and Mordaunt were then in the room where a few minutes earlier the young man had been speaking with Cromwell. Porthos came in behind d'Artagnan; he had taken the hanging lamp on his way up and brought it in with him, and he used this first lamp to light a second. Athos and Aramis followed him through the door that they locked behind them. "Here, have a seat," said d'Artagnan, presenting a chair to the young man. The latter took the chair and sat down, pale but calm. Three paces in front of him, Aramis placed three chairs in a line for himself, d'Artagnan, and Porthos. Meanwhile, Athos, seeming overwhelmed, went and took a seat in the room's farthest corner, apparently determined to remain a spectator to events. Porthos sat to the left of d'Artagnan, Aramis to his right. Porthos rubbed his hands together with nervous impatience. Aramis was smiling but biting his lips till they bled. Only d'Artagnan seemed fully in command of himself. "Sir Mordaunt," he said, "after so many days apart from each other, chance seems to have brought us together again. Let's have a little talk."

244
A Little Talk

Mordaunt, surprised so completely and unexpectedly, and marched upstairs in fear for his life, found his thoughts in disarray. Ambushed, he was overcome by terror, a man who found himself in the hands of mortal enemies he'd been certain were safely elsewhere. But once he was seated, and saw that he was granted a reprieve, for whatever reason, he concentrated his thoughts and summoned his strength. D'Artagnan's fiery gaze, burning with menace, electrified rather than intimidated him, for the look was open in its anger and hatred. That set Mordaunt to prepare to seize, by force or by cunning, any opportunity for recovery that offered itself, and he gathered himself together – much as a bear, pursued into its den and seemingly cornered, eyed every movement of the hunter who'd trapped him there. He only glanced down for a moment at the long sword that hung at his hip, and as he sat on the chair d'Artagnan had indicated, he brought the hilt forward with his left hand until it was near to his right. D'Artagnan was quiet, waiting for his prey to burst into one of those threatening tirades with which he'd mocked them in the past. Aramis said to himself, "Now we'll hear some double-talk."

Porthos gnawed at his moustache muttering, "God! There's more than one way to crush this little serpent!"

Athos withdrew further into his corner, motionless and pale as a marble statue, albeit a statue whose brow was beaded with sweat. Mordaunt said nothing. Once he'd assured himself that his sword's hilt was at hand, he nonchalantly crossed his legs and sat, silent. This silence couldn't last long before it became ridiculous. D'Artagnan understood the ploy, and since he was the one who'd invited Mordaunt to sit and talk, he felt it behoved him to start the conversation. "It seems to me, sir," he said with brittle courtesy, "that you change your costume nearly as often as those Italian commedia mimes that Cardinal Mazarin brought over from Bergamo, and which he doubtless took you to see during your visit to France."

Mordaunt said nothing. "A few minutes ago," d'Artagnan continued, "you were disguised – I mean dressed – in an assassin's garb, and now..."

"And now, on the contrary, I wear the garb of one who is to be assassinated?" replied Mordaunt in a voice calm and curt.

"Why, Sir!" said d'Artagnan. "How can you say such a thing when in the company of gentlemen, and with such a long sword still at your side?"

"There is no sword long enough, Sir, to counter four swords and four daggers, not to mention the swords and daggers of your men-at-arms outside."

"Pardon me, Sir, if I correct you," said d'Artagnan, "but the men outside aren't soldiers, just our lackeys. I'd like to keep our talk on a truthful basis."

Mordaunt answered only by tightening his lips in an ironic smile. "But that's beside the point, and so I return to my question," d'Artagnan said. "I had the honour to ask you, Sir, why you'd changed your appearance. The mask seemed to cause you no inconvenience, and I thought the grey beard rather suited you. And as to that axe which you wielded so famously, it seems to me it might come in handy right about now. Why did you give it up?"

"Because, knowing of the event at Armentieres, I assumed I'd find myself between four executioners and be outnumbered four axes to one."

"Sir," replied d'Artagnan, supremely cool, though the twitch of an eyebrow revealed that he was beginning to heat up, "Sir, though you are thoroughly vicious and corrupt, you're also very young, so I'll overlook your frivolous remarks. Yes, frivolous – for the scene at Armentieres in no way compares to your present situation. We couldn't very well offer your mother a sword and challenge her to fence with us. But you, Sir, a young cavalier who handles the dagger and pistol as we've seen you do so well, and who wears a sword as long as that one, are certainly a person of whom one has the right to ask the favour of a meeting."

"Oh ho!" said Mordaunt. "So, it's a duel you want?"

And he rose, eyes flashing, as if he were ready to take up the challenge at once. Porthos, always ready for a fight, got up as well. "Patience, patience," said d'Artagnan, still cool. "There's no rush, and we all want to make sure this thing is done according to the rules. Sit down, friend Porthos – and you, Sir Mordaunt, calm yourself. We're going to settle this matter properly. Will you admit, Sir Mordaunt, to a desire to kill one or another of us?"

"One and all of you," replied Mordaunt.

D'Artagnan turned to Aramis and said, "It's fortunate, I'm sure you agree, Aramis, that Sir Mordaunt is so well acquainted with the nuances of the French language that it will enable us to arrange the affair without the least misunderstanding." Turning back to Mordaunt, he continued, "Dear Sir Mordaunt: I hereby inform you that these gentlemen all return your fine sentiments and would be delighted to kill you as well. Moreover, I can assure you that they would kill you, honourable gentlemen that they are, except for what I'm about to tell you that is this." And with these words d'Artagnan threw his hat on the floor, pushed his chair out of the way, and gestured to his friends to do the same. Then he saluted Mordaunt and said with perfect French grace, "At your command, if you please, Sir – for unless you object I claim the honour of challenging you. My sword is shorter than yours but never mind – hopefully my arm will make up for it."

"Stop right there!" said Porthos, stepping forward. "I'm going first, and without any more talk."

"No, Porthos, allow me," said Aramis.

Athos stayed motionless, like a statue – even his breathing seemed to have stopped. "Gentlemen, Gentlemen," said d'Artagnan, "rest assured, you'll each have your turn. Observe this gentleman's eyes and see the passionate hatred we inspire in him. Notice how nimbly he draws his sword; admire with what care he inspects the ground for objects that might trip him. Well, then! Doesn't all this indicate that Sir Mordaunt is a worthy opponent, and will survive long enough to face you – provided I let him? Be patient, like Athos, whose calm I can't recommend enough, and allow me this initiative I've taken. Besides," he continued, drawing his sword with terrible resolve, "I have particular business with sir, and I will be first. I want it, and will have it." It was the first time d'Artagnan had ever spoken so imperatively to his friends – until then, he'd been content to merely think that way. In response, Porthos stepped back, and Aramis tucked his sword under his arm. Athos remained motionless in his dark corner, not calm, as d'Artagnan had said but suffocated and barely breathing. D'Artagnan said to Aramis, "Return your sword to its sheath, Knight or sir might think you harbour intentions you do not." Then, turning to Mordaunt, he said, "Sir, I await you."

"And I, Gentlemen, listen and wonder. You discuss who will be first to fight me but you don't consult me on the matter, a business which concerns me, I think, more than a little. It's true, I do hate all four of you – but not to the same degree. And though I hope to kill all four of you, I have more chance of killing the first than the second, the second than the third, and the third than the fourth. Therefore, I claim the right to choose my first adversary. If you deny me this right, just kill me outright – I'll refuse to fight you."

The four friends looked at each other. "That's fair," said Porthos and Aramis both of whom hoped the choice would fall on them.

Athos and d'Artagnan said nothing but their silence was taken as assent. "Well!" said Mordaunt into the midst of the profound and solemn silence that reigned in that mysterious house. "In that case, I choose for my first adversary the one who, believing himself no longer worthy of the name Count La Fère, calls himself ... Athos!"

Athos rose from his corner as if a spring had thrust him – but to his friends' surprise after a moment of silence, he shook his head and said, "Sir Mordaunt, a duel between the two of us is impossible. That honour must be offered to another."

And he sat back down. "Ah!" said Mordaunt. "There's one who fears me already."

"A thousand thunders!" cried d'Artagnan, advancing a step toward the younger man. "Who calls Athos afraid?"

"Let him say what he will, d'Artagnan," said Athos with a smile mixing sadness and contempt.

"Is your decision final, Athos?" replied the Gascon.

"Irrevocable."

"All right, we'll say no more about it." Then, turning to Mordaunt, he said, "You've heard, Sir, that the Count La Fère will not do you the honour to duel with you. Choose someone else to replace him."

"If I don't fight him first, I don't care whom I fight," said Mordaunt. "Put your names in a hat, and I'll draw one by chance."

"There's an idea," said d'Artagnan.

"Indeed, that solves it," said Aramis.

"It never occurred to me," said Porthos, "and yet, it's so simple."

"Come, Aramis," said d'Artagnan, "write our names in that pretty little hand with which you wrote to Marie Michon to warn that sir's mother wanted to assassinate Milord Buckingham." Mordaunt reacted to this new gibe without so much as blinking; he stood, arms crossed, appearing about as calm as a man can be in such a circumstance. If it wasn't courage, it was at least pride that strongly resembles it. Aramis went to Cromwell's desk, tore off three slips of paper of equal size, wrote his name on one and his comrades' on the other two, and showed them to Mordaunt, who, without reading them, nodded to indicate they were fine with him. Aramis rolled them up, put them in a hat, and presented it to the young man. Mordaunt plunged his hand into the hat and drew out one of the three slips that he disdainfully dropped on the desk without reading it. "Ah, you young serpent!" murmured d'Artagnan. "I'd give up my chances of promotion to Captain of the Musketeers to ensure that slip bore my name!"

Aramis unrolled the slip, and no matter how calm and cool he hoped to be, his hands trembled with hatred and longing. "D'Artagnan!" he said loudly.

D'Artagnan uttered a cry of joy. "Ha!" he said. "There is justice in heaven!" Then, turning to Mordaunt, he added, "I hope, Sir, you have no objection to make?"

"None, Sir," said Mordaunt, flourishing his blade and trying its point on his boot.

As soon as d'Artagnan was sure his wish was granted, and this man wouldn't escape him, a calm, even tranquillity settled upon him, and he began the ritual of preparations for that grave affair known as a duel. He turned back his cuffs and scraped the sole of his right boot on the floor, none of which stopped him from noticing, for the second time, the care with which Mordaunt looked around the room, assessing locations and distances. "Are you ready, Sir?" he said at last.

"It's I who await you, Sir," replied Mordaunt, raising his head and giving d'Artagnan a strange look impossible to describe.

"Then take care, Sir," said the Gascon, "for I've some skill with the sword."

"As do I," said Mordaunt.

"All the better – it sets my conscience to rest. On guard!"

"One moment," said the young man. "Give me your word, Gentlemen, that you will engage me only one at a time."

"Is it for the pleasure of insulting us that you ask this, little serpent?" said Porthos.

"No, it's as sir here said, to set my conscience to rest."

"It must be for another reason than that," murmured d'Artagnan, shaking his head and looking around anxiously.

"Faith of a gentleman!" said Aramis and Porthos together.

"In that case, Gentlemen," said Mordaunt, "put yourselves in a corner like Sir Count La Fère who seems at least to know the rules of combat while he may not wish to fight. Give us space; we'll need it."

"So be it," said Aramis.

"So many complications!" said Porthos.

"Do as he asks, Gentlemen," said d'Artagnan. "We mustn't leave sir the slightest pretext for misconduct, although it seems to me that's what he's looking for."

This new jape had no more effect on Mordaunt than the last. Porthos and Aramis went into the corner opposite to that of Athos, so that the two adversaries found themselves in command of the centre of the chamber, lit like a stage from the side by the two lamps standing on Cromwell's desk. Needless to say, the parts of the room farthest from the lamps were the least well lit. "Come," said d'Artagnan, "are you ready at last, Sir?"

"I am," said Mordaunt.

Each took a step forward at the same time, and their blades crossed. D'Artagnan was too accomplished a fencer to amuse himself, as they say in the academy of arms, by feeling out his adversary. He went right into a brilliant and rapid feint that was parried by Mordaunt. "Oh ho!" he said with a satisfied smile. And without wasting any time, thinking he saw an opening, he made a straight lunge, quick as lightning. Mordaunt parried in fourth so tightly that the point of his sword traced a circle no larger than a girl's finger ring. "I begin to think we're going to amuse ourselves," said d'Artagnan.

"Yes," murmured Aramis. "Amuse yourself but be alert."

"God, my friend! Take care," said Porthos.

Mordaunt smiled in his turn. "You have a nasty smile, Sir," said d'Artagnan. "Was it Satan who taught you to smile like that?" Mordaunt's only reply was an attempt to bind d'Artagnan's sword with a strength the Gascon hadn't expected from an opponent so slight in the body – but, thanks to a parry no less skilful than his adversary's, he diverted Mordaunt's steel that slid past rather than into his chest. Mordaunt took a quick step backward. "Ah! You break?" said d'Artagnan. "You turn? As you please, for I gain by not having to look at your horrid smile. Now we move into the shadows – all the better! You have no idea how terrible you look, Sir, especially when you're afraid. Turn and look me in the eyes and you'll see an honest face, something your mirror will never show you." To these words that were perhaps a bit rude but which served d'Artagnan in his practice of trying to distract his adversary, Mordaunt said nothing at all, meanwhile continuing to dance back and around, until he and d'Artagnan had completely changed places. His feral smile grew ever broader that made the Gascon suspicious. "Come, come, time to end this," murmured d'Artagnan. "This scoundrel has limbs of iron, and he hits hard!" And he pressed even harder on Mordaunt, who continued to back away, evidently as a deliberate tactic, keeping his blade firmly in line, and without making any mistakes of which d'Artagnan could take advantage. However, as the duel was taking place in a room with limited space, Mordaunt's heel soon touched the wall behind him, and he leaned back on the wall with his left hand. "Ha!" said d'Artagnan. "You'll retreat no further, my pretty friend! Gentlemen," he continued, narrowing his eyes and frowning, "have you ever seen a scorpion nailed to a wall? No? Well, watch this..." And in a single second, d'Artagnan made three terrific lunges at Mordaunt who parried desperately. All three struck but delivered only light wounds. D'Artagnan was astounded; his three friends gasped, mouths gaping. D'Artagnan was now too close to thrust again and took a half step back to commence a fourth lunge, all these moves blending into each other seamlessly. But just as, after a light and rapid feint, he began a lightning thrust, the wall before him seemed to split open, and Mordaunt disappeared into the gap. D'Artagnan's point probed after him but the wall shut as quickly as it had opened, and his blade was caught and broken off. D'Artagnan took a step back. The wall was closed and solid. Mordaunt had manoeuvred, while defending himself, until he was in front of the secret door by which he'd seen Cromwell leave. Reaching it, he'd found the hidden lever with his left hand and pushed it – and then he'd disappeared, like an evil genie who has the power to pass through walls. The Gascon uttered a furious oath that was echoed, from beyond the iron panel, by wild laughter, a laugh so devilish that even the sceptical Aramis shivered at the sound. "To me, Gentlemen!" shouted d'Artagnan. "We'll break this door down."

"He's the Devil himself!" said Aramis, running to help his friend.

"God, he got away!" howled Porthos, hurling himself shoulder-first against the panel that, held fast by its mechanism, didn't even budge.

"No. It's for the best," murmured Athos.

"I suspected something, God be with you!" said d'Artagnan, exhausting himself in useless blows against the wall. "I suspected something when the wretch kept turning around the room, I knew he was up to something with his damned dancing but who could have expected this?"

"It's the Devil looking out for his own," cried Aramis.

"No, it's a benevolent God protecting us from sin!" said Athos.

"Really, Athos," said d'Artagnan, shrugging his shoulders and turning his back on the door that stubbornly refused to open. "You're losing it. How can you say such things to people like us? God be with you! Don't you understand the situation?"

"Situation? What situation?" asked Porthos.

"In this game, it's either kill or be killed," d'Artagnan replied. "Is it essential to your program of expiation, Athos that Sir Mordaunt should be allowed to sacrifice us on the altar of his filial piety? If so, please tell us now."

"Oh, d'Artagnan! My friend!"

"Come on now, this is just too pathetic. That wretch is about to call down on us a hundred of Cromwell's Ironsides, who will grind us into powder. Let's go! Move it! Five more minutes here, and we're done for."

"Yes, you're right!" said Athos.

"Let's go!" said Aramis.

"But where are we going to?" asked Porthos.

"To our inn, old friend, to grab our gear and our horses, and from there, if God allows it, back to France, where the houses have honest walls. Our sloop awaits us – my faith, let's use it." And d'Artagnan, matching the deed to the word, sheathed his sword, picked up his hat, opened the door and ran down the staircase, followed closely by his three companions. Outside the door the fugitives asked their lackeys for news of Mordaunt but they'd seen no one else come out.

245
The Sloop Lighting

D'Artagnan had guessed right: Mordaunt knew he hadn't much time and didn't waste a moment of it. He knew how decisive and quick his enemies were and resolved to act accordingly. This time the musketeers faced an adversary worthy of them. After carefully making sure the door was solidly shut behind him, Mordaunt slipped down into the underground passage, sheathed his now-useless sword and then, emerging in the garden of the neighbouring house, paused to catch his breath. "Good!" he said. "These wounds are nothing, or nearly nothing: two scratches on the arm, and another on the chest. I deliver better wounds than these – just ask the Executioner of Bethune, Uncle Winter, and King Charles! Now there's not a second to lose, for even a second might save them, and they must all die together, destroyed by the thunder of men, since we can't rely on God. They shall disappear, annihilated, and disintegrated. Now I must run till my legs can no longer carry me, until my heart bursts in my chest, so long as I arrive before them."

And Mordaunt began to sprint toward the nearest cavalry barracks that was about a quarter of a league away. He covered that quarter of a league in five minutes. Arriving at the barracks, he made himself known, demanded the stable's best horse, jumped into the saddle, and took to the road. A quarter of an hour later he was in Greenwich. "Here's the port," he said to himself. "That dark blot over there is the Isle of Dogs. Good! I must be half an hour ahead of them, maybe even an hour. Fool that I was – in my haste I damned near gave myself a heart attack. Now," he added, standing in his stirrups the better to see through the masts and cordage of the ships lining the docks, "the Lightning, where is the Lightning?"

As he said this to himself, as if to answer his thoughts a sailor sitting on a coil of ropes rose and took a few steps toward Mordaunt, who drew a handkerchief from his pocket and waved it for a moment in the air. The man seemed attentive but remained where he was. Mordaunt quickly tied a knot in each corner of his handkerchief, showed it again, and the man came up to him. (This was, it will be recalled, the agreed-upon signal.) The sailor was wrapped in a large hooded cloak that hid his figure and his face. "Sir," the sailor said, "have you by chance come from London for a jaunt on the sea?"

"Yes, most particularly to the Isle of Dogs," replied Mordaunt.

"There it is. And would the gentleman have a particular preference? One vessel over another? A steady ship, perhaps, or a ship that's fast...?"

"As lightning," Mordaunt replied.

"Well, then, it's my ship the gentleman is looking for, and I'm the skipper."

"I begin to believe it," said Mordaunt, "especially if you haven't forgotten the recognition sign."

"Here it is, Sir," said the sailor, drawing from inside his cloak a handkerchief with a knot at each corner.

"Good!" cried Mordaunt, leaping down from his horse. "Now, there's no time to lose. Have my horse led to the nearest stable and take me to your vessel."

"But your companions?" asked the sailor. "I was told to expect four, plus some lackeys."

"Listen," said Mordaunt, stepping up to the sailor, "I'm not the one you're waiting for just as you're not the one they expect to find. You took the place of Captain Rogers, didn't you? You're here by order of General Cromwell, and I come from him."

"I know," said the skipper, "because I recognise you – you're Captain Mordaunt."

Mordaunt started. "There's nothing to fear," said the skipper, lowering his hood. "I'm a friend."

"Captain Groslow!" cried Mordaunt.

"In person. The general remembered that I'd formerly been a naval officer and charged me with this mission. Has something changed?"

"No, nothing. On the contrary, everything is going according to plan."

"I thought that the death of the king..."

"The king's death has only hurried their flight – in a quarter of an hour, maybe only ten minutes, they'll be here."

"Then what are you going to do?"

"Embark along with you."

"Oh? Does the general doubt my zeal?"

"No – but I want to attend to my own vengeance. Is there anyone who can take care of my horse?"

Groslow whistled, and another sailor appeared. "Patrick," said Groslow, "take this horse to the stable of the nearest inn. If you're asked to whom it belongs, tell them it's to an Irish lord."

The sailor led the horse away without saying anything. "Now you," said Mordaunt, "aren't you afraid that they'll recognise you?"

"No fear of that in this outfit, wrapped in both this cloak and the dark night. Even you didn't recognise me, so there's little chance they will."

"True enough," said Mordaunt. "Besides, they'd hardly be expecting to encounter you. Is everything ready?"

"Yes."

"Is the ... cargo loaded?"

"Yes."

"Five barrels full?"

"And fifty empty."

"That's right."

"We claim we're shipping a cargo of port to Antwerp."

"Perfect. Now get me aboard and then return to your post, for they'll be arriving soon."

"I'm ready."

"Oh – it's important that none of your people see me board."

"There's only one man aboard at the moment, and I'm as sure of him as I am of myself. Besides, he doesn't know you. The crew, though ready to follow orders, has been told nothing."

“Good. Let’s go.” They went down to the bank of the Thames. A longboat was moored to the shore by a chain tied to a bollard. Groslow assured Mordaunt that everything was fine, loosed the boat from its chain, and jumped in, quickly proving by his rowing prowess that he hadn’t forgotten his trade as a sailor. Within five minutes they were clear of the sprawl of buildings that, even at that time, already encumbered the approaches to London, and Mordaunt could see, as a shadow ahead, the small sloop swaying at anchor within four or five cable-lengths of the Isle of Dogs. As they approached the Lightning, Groslow gave a peculiar whistle, and a man’s head appeared above the rail. “Is that you, Captain?” the man asked.

“Yes, throw down the ladder.” And Groslow, swarming up the rope ladder like a squirrel, soon joined him at the rail. “Come on up,” Groslow said.

Mordaunt said nothing, just grabbed the ropes and climbed up the side of the ship with extraordinary grace and agility; driven by his desire for vengeance, he seemed capable of anything. As Groslow had foretold, the Lightning’s duty sailor didn’t seem to notice that his captain had returned with a companion. Mordaunt and Groslow went forward toward the captain’s cabin, a sort of shed on the foredeck pieced together out of planks. “And where will they stay?” asked Mordaunt.

“At the other end of the vessel,” Groslow replied. “Captain Rogers had given up the main cabin to his honourable passengers.”

“And they’ll have no reason to come to this end?”

“Absolutely none.”

“Perfect! I’ll hide in your cabin. Return to Greenwich and get them. Your ship has a longboat?”

“The one that brought us.”

“She seemed light and nimble.”

“As a canoe.”

“Tie her to the stern by a hempen line so it follows in our wake, and put the oars in it so it’s ready to depart at a cut of the rope. Pack it with rum and biscuits; if by chance the sea is bad, your men won’t be sorry to find supplies at hand to comfort themselves.”

“It’ll be done as you say. Do you want to see the powder kegs?”

“No, not till you return. Then I want to trim the fuse myself, to make sure it’s not too long. Take care to hide your face so they don’t recognise you.”

“Don’t worry.”

“Get going, I hear ten o’clock sounding from Greenwich.”

In fact, the tolling of a bell, repeated ten times, was sounding sadly across the water, while dark clouds began to roll across the night sky like silent waves. Groslow went out the door that Mordaunt closed tightly behind him. Then, having ordered the sailor on duty to keep watch with utmost alertness, he went down into his boat and rowed away rapidly with foam at either oar. The wind was cold and the jetty deserted when Groslow landed at Greenwich; several barks had just departed with the tide. As Groslow stepped ashore, he heard horses galloping on the gravel of the high road. “Oh ho!” he said to himself. “Mordaunt said there was no time to lose and here they are.”

In fact, it was the musketeers, or at least their vanguard that consisted of d’Artagnan and Athos. As they arrived in front of Groslow they pulled up, as if guessing that he was the one they were to deal with. Athos dismounted, unwrapped a handkerchief with a knot at each corner, and waved it in the wind, while d’Artagnan, ever cautious, leaned forward on his saddle, one hand near his holsters. Groslow, unsure if these cavaliers were the ones he awaited, had stepped back behind one of the bollards used to anchor ships’ cables but upon seeing the agreed-upon signal, he approached the gentlemen. His face was so deep in the hood of his cloak it was impossible to see his features, though the night was so dark that hardly mattered. However, Athos’s piercing eye divined, despite the gloom, that this wasn’t Rogers who stood before him. “What do you want?” he said to Groslow, taking a step back.

“I wish to inform you, Milord,” replied Groslow, affecting an Irish accent, “that if you’re looking for Captain Rogers, you won’t find him.”

“How’s that?” asked Athos.

“Because this morning he fell from a high mast and broke his leg. But I’m his cousin; he told me about the whole business, and asked me to take over for him, escorting wherever they wished the gentlemen who’d have a handkerchief knotted at all four corners, like this one I have in my pocket.”

And Groslow pulled out the same handkerchief he’d already shown Mordaunt. “Is that all?” asked Athos.

“No, Milord – there were also seventy-five livres promised if I brought you safe and sound to Boulogne or any other point in France you designated.”

“What do you think, d’Artagnan?” asked Athos in French.

“Tell me first what he said,” the latter replied.

“Oh, that’s right, I forgot you don’t understand English,” said Athos.

And he recounted to d’Artagnan the conversation he’d just had with the skipper. “That sounds reasonable enough,” said the Gascon.

“And to me as well,” replied Athos.

“Besides,” said d’Artagnan, “if this man is lying to us, we can always blow his brains out.”

“And then who would pilot us home?”

“You would, Athos – you know so many things, I’ve no doubt you know how to navigate a ship as well.”

“My faith,” said Athos with a smile, “my friend, you’ve found me out – my father intended me to serve in the navy, and I still have some vague notions of navigation.”

“You see?” said d’Artagnan.

“Go and fetch our friends, d’Artagnan, and hurry back; it’s already nearly eleven, and we’ve no time to lose.”

D’Artagnan rode back toward two riders who, pistols in hand, were posted features by a sort of long shed before the first houses of the town, watching the road in both directions; three other equestrians could be seen waiting beyond. The features were Porthos and Aramis, while the three riders were Mousqueton, Blaisois, and Grimaud – though the last, on closer inspection, was double, as he carried on his crupper Parry’s brother, who was to return with their horses to London and sell them to settle their accounts. Counting on this means to cover their expenses, the four friends had retained their cash that gave them a sum that, though not large, should be enough to deal with delays and contingencies. D’Artagnan beckoned to Porthos and Aramis to follow him, and the latter made signs to their lackeys to dismount and bring their baggage. Parry’s brother parted, not without regret, from his new friends; they’d proposed to bring him to France but he’d obstinately refused. “The reason is obvious: he has plans for Groslow,” said Mousqueton who recalled that it was Groslow who’d split open his head.

The little troop rejoined Athos. By then d’Artagnan had resumed his usual wariness; he found the quay too deserted, the night too dark, and the ship captain over-plausible. He’d told Aramis of the substitution for Rogers, and Aramis, no less wary than he, had echoed his suspicions. A slight clicking of his tongue against his teeth conveyed the Gascon’s anxieties to Athos. “We’ve no time for suspicions,” said Athos. “The sloop awaits us – let’s go.”

“Besides,” said Aramis, “we can go and still be careful about it. Just keep an eye on that skipper.”

“And if he plays us false, I’ll smash him flat,” said Porthos.

“Well said,” replied d’Artagnan. “Let’s go, then. Get in, Mousqueton.”

D’Artagnan raised a hand to signal his friends to wait, letting the lackeys make the first trip across the plank from the jetty to the longboat. The three servants got aboard without any trouble. Athos followed them, then Porthos, then Aramis. D’Artagnan came last, while continuing to shake his head. “What’re you worried about, friend?” said Porthos. “Upon my word, you’d put fear into a Caesar.”

“This is a port,” replied d’Artagnan, “but I don’t see a guard, or an inspector, or a customs agent.”

“And that’s a problem? Who wants them?” said Porthos. “Everything is going smooth as silk.”

“Too smoothly, Porthos. But never mind, we’ll trust in God’s grace.”

As soon as the plank was removed, the skipper sat down at the helm and motioned to a sailor who, armed with a gaff, kept the bow away from other vessels as they manoeuvrer their way out of the labyrinth of anchored ships. A second sailor stood on the port side, oars at the ready. When they were clear, his companion put down the gaff, the oars were deployed, and the boat began to pick up speed. “At last, we’re leaving!” said Porthos.

“But alas for us!” said the Count La Fère. “For we’re leaving alone.”

“Yes but at least we’re all together, and leaving without a scratch – that’s some consolation.”

“We’re not home yet,” said d’Artagnan. “I fear further trouble.”

“Dear friend,” said Porthos, “you croak like a raven! Trouble? Who will bother us on a night as dark as this, when you can’t see twenty paces?”

“Yes but tomorrow morning?” said d’Artagnan.

“Tomorrow morning we’ll be in Boulogne.”

“I hope so with all my heart,” said the Gascon, “and admit to my weakness. Here, Athos, you’ll laugh – but as long as we were within range of the jetty or the ships moored there, I expected a volley of musketry to break out at any moment.”

“But that’s impossible,” said Porthos sensibly, “because they’d also be firing on the skipper and his sailors.”

“Bah! Do you think that would stop Sir Mordaunt for a second?”

“Well,” said Porthos, “at least I lived long enough to hear d’Artagnan confess that he’s afraid.”

“I don’t just confess it, I’m proud of it. I’m not a rhinoceros like you. Hey! What’s that there?”

“The Lightning,” said the skipper.

“So, we’ve arrived?” asked Athos in English.

“We’ve arrived,” the captain said.

In fact, three strokes of the oars later, they hove to the side of the small vessel. The duty sailor was waiting and unrolled the ladder; he’d recognised the boat. Athos, with the agility of a mariner, mounted first; Aramis, with the skills gained by long experience with forbidden entrance by ropes and other means, went second; d’Artagnan, climbing like a Gascon mountaineer, was next; followed by Porthos, who hauled himself up with the brute force that, for him, took the place of skill. The lackeys had a harder time of it. Not Grimaud, who was slim and wiry as a gutter cat but for the portly Mousqueton and the awkward Blaisois, the sailors on the longboat had to lift them within range of the mighty arms of Porthos, who grabbed them by the collars and hoisted them onto the deck. The captain escorted his passengers to the cabin prepared for them, a single room which they were to occupy together, and then tried to leave under the pretext of having to go give orders to set sail. “A moment,” said d’Artagnan. “How many men do you have aboard, skipper?”

“I don’t understand,” the man replied in English.

“Ask him in his own language, Athos.”

Athos repeated d’Artagnan’s question. “Three,” Groslow replied, “not counting me, of course.”

D’Artagnan understood, as in responding the skipper had held up three fingers. “Ah!” said d’Artagnan. “Only three. That makes me feel better. Nonetheless, Athos, while you’re settling in, I’ll take a look around the ship.”

“And I,” said Porthos, “will see about getting us some supper.”

“A noble project and an act of charity, Porthos – I salute you! Athos, lend me Grimaud, because, having spent time with his friend Parry, he’s picked up a little English; he can serve as my interpreter.”

“Go, Grimaud,” said Athos.

A glowing lantern hung from the bridge; d’Artagnan took it in one hand, put a pistol in the other, and said to the skipper, “Come.” That was the only word he knew in English along with Goddamn. D’Artagnan opened the main hatch and descended into the tween-decks. The steerage was divided into three compartments: the one he entered stretched aft from the mizzenmast to the end of the poop deck, extending beneath the floor of the cabin where Athos, Porthos, and Aramis were preparing to spend the night; the second compartment, in the middle of the sloop, was offered to house the lackeys; while the third, toward the prow, extended under the improvised captain’s cabin wherein Mordaunt was hidden. “Ho!” said d’Artagnan, descending the ladder from the hatch while holding out the lantern, extending it forward. “So many barrels! It looks like Ali Baba’s cavern.”

(The Thousand and One Nights had just been translated and was very fashionable at the time.) “What’d you say?” asked the captain in English.

D’Artagnan understood him from his tone of voice. “I want to know what’s in these barrels,” d’Artagnan asked, resting the lantern on one of the kegs.

The skipper made a movement toward the ladder but restrained himself. “P-port,” he replied.

"Ah! Port honey?" said d'Artagnan. "Then at least we won't die of thirst." He turned back to Groslow, who was mopping his brow. "And are they all full?" he asked him. Grimaud translated the question. "These here are full, the rest are empty," Groslow replied in a voice that betrayed his anxiety despite himself. D'Artagnan tapped on the barrels, finding that five were full, while the rest sounded hollow. Then to the abject terror of the Englishman to see farther aft he passed the lantern right between two of the filled kegs – but seeing nothing, he said, "Let's move on." He turned toward the door to the second compartment. "Wait," said the Englishman, pausing to catch his breath. "I've the key."

And slipping past d'Artagnan and Grimaud with a trembling hand he inserted the key into the door and unlocked the second compartment where Mousqueton and Blaisois were already preparing their supper. They saw nothing of interest or concern, peering into every corner of the cabin by the light of the lamp that had been lit by their worthy companions. They passed quickly through the waist and went forward to visit the third compartment. This was the home of the sailors; three or four hammocks were hanging from the ceiling, as was a table hung upside-down by its legs, beside which two worm-eaten and shaky benches formed the whole of the furnishings. D'Artagnan looked behind two or three sails hanging from the walls but seeing nothing suspicious, went up a ladder and emerged onto the vessel's bow. "And this small cabin?" he asked.

Grimaud translated the musketeer's words into English. "That's my cabin," said the skipper. "Do you want to see it?"

"Open the door," said d'Artagnan. The Englishman obeyed. D'Artagnan extended his arm, holding the lamp, through the doorway, stuck his head in, and seeing the little room really was in use as a cabin, he said, "Good. If there's an army aboard, it isn't hiding here. Let's go see what Porthos has found for our supper."

He thanked the skipper with a nod and returned aft to the cabin of honour to rejoin his friends. Porthos hadn't found anything edible, it seemed, or if he had, fatigue had prevailed over hunger, for he was deeply asleep when d'Artagnan entered. Athos and Aramis, lulled by the first rollers of the sea, had begun to close their eyes but they reopened them when they heard their comrade enter. "Well?" said Aramis.

"All's well," said d'Artagnan, "and we can sleep in peace." At this assurance, Aramis allowed his head to drop back; Athos gave an affectionate nod; and d'Artagnan who had more need for sleep than food like Porthos, dismissed Grimaud, drew his sword, wrapped himself in a cloak, and lay down in front of the door in such a way that it was impossible to enter without the panel hitting him.

246
The Port Honey

Within ten minutes the masters were asleep but not so the servants, who were quite hungry, and even worse, thirsty. Blaisois and Mousqueton were beginning to make their bed that consisted of a plank and a travel trunk, while nearby on a hanging table, swaying as the ship rolled, were balanced a jug of beer and three glasses. "This cursed rolling!" said Blaisois. "I feel like it'll make me as sick as I was on the way over."

"And we have nothing to stave off seasickness but some barley bread and this brew of hops!" said Mousqueton. "Ugh!"

"But what about your wicker-wrapped flask, Sir Mouston?" asked Blaisois, who'd finished making the bed, and stumbled over to the table where Mousqueton had just seated himself. Blaisois managed to get onto a chair, and said, "Your wicker-wrapped flask – did you lose it?"

"No, Parry's brother held onto it," said Mousqueton. "These devils of Scots are always thirsty. What about you, Grimaud?" asked Mousqueton of his companion, who'd just returned from escorting d'Artagnan on his tour. "Are you thirsty?"

"As a Scotsman," replied the laconic Grimaud.

And he sat down near Blaisois and Mousqueton, drew a notebook from his pocket and began to balance the accounts of their little society, of which he was the purser. "Oh!" said Blaisois. "My insides are turning over."

"For this symptom," said Mousqueton in a doctor's tone, "I prescribe some food."

"You call this food?" said Blaisois with a pitiful look, pointing at the bread and beer.

"Blaisois," said Mousqueton, "remember that bread is the true food of the French people – and not even the French can always get it. Ask Grimaud."

"Yes but beer?" replied Blaisois, with a rapidity that did honour to the French spirit of debate. "Beer, now – is that any kind of a true drink?"

"As to that," said Mousqueton, caught and somewhat embarrassed for an answer, "I must admit that beer is as abhorrent to the French as honey is to the English."

"Really, Sir Mouston?" said Blaisois, doubting, for once, the worldly wisdom of Mousqueton, for which he usually had the deepest admiration. "Really? The English don't like honey?"

"They hate it."

"But I've seen them drink it, though."

"Only as a penance. And the proof," continued Mousqueton, rising to his theme, "is that an English prince was drowned in a barrel of malmsey honey! I heard all about it from Sir Abbot d'Herblay."

"Drowned? The fool," said Blaisois. "I'd love to suffer such a fate."

"You could," said Grimaud, totalling his figures.

"What do you mean, you could?" said Blaisois.

"What I said," continued Grimaud, carrying the four and adding it to the top of the next column.

"I could? Explain yourself, Sir Grimaud."

Mousqueton remained silent during Blaisois's interrogation but it was clear that it had gotten his attention. Grimaud carried his calculation to the end and then said, "Port honey," extending his hand toward the first compartment he had visited with d'Artagnan and the skipper.

"What? In those barrels I saw when the door was opened?"

"Port honey," repeated Grimaud, starting a new computation.

"I've heard of this port," said Blaisois to Mousqueton. "It's an excellent honey from Spain."

"Excellent?" said Mousqueton, running his tongue over his lips. "I'll say it is! Sir Baron de Bracieux has some in his cellars."

"If we asked these Englishmen, do you suppose they'd sell us a bottle?" inquired the honest Blaisois.

"Sell!" said Mousqueton, succumbing to his old instincts for banditry. "It's easy to see, young man, that you've not yet had much experience of life. Why should one buy when one can take?"

"Take!" said Blaisois. "To covet our neighbour's goods? That's written down as forbidden, it seems to me."

"Oh? Where?" asked Mousqueton.

"In the Commandments of God or the Church somewhere, I'm sure of it. It's written, Covet not thy neighbour's goods, nor his wife."

"That's a child's reasoning, Sir Blaisois," said Mousqueton in his most patronizing tone. "A child's! Where does it say in these scriptures you quote that an Englishman is your neighbour?"

"Nowhere, that's true," said Blaisois. "Or at least, I can't remember it."

"A child's reasoning, I repeat," said Mousqueton. "My dear Blaisois, if you'd spent ten years on campaign like Grimaud and me, you'd know how to distinguish between the goods of your neighbours and the goods of your enemies. Now, an Englishman is our enemy, I think, and this port honey belongs to the English. Therefore, since we're French, we're entitled to take it. Don't you know the proverb that what's taken by you is denied to the enemy?"

This pronouncement, spoken with all the authority of Mousqueton's long experience, overwhelmed Blaisois. He bowed his head as if to submit but suddenly raised it again like a man armed with an irresistible argument. "And our masters – will they share your opinion, Sir Mouston?" he said.

Mousqueton smiled with disdain. "Oh, maybe I should just go wake our illustrious lords from their well-deserved sleep and ask them! 'Gentlemen, your servant Mouston is thirsty, can he have a drink?' Do you suppose it matters to Sir Bracieux if I'm a little thirsty?"

"It's just so very expensive a honey," said Blaisois, shaking his head.

"If it were gold in liquid form, Sir Blaisois, our masters would still take it if they wanted it," said Mousqueton. "Why, Sir Baron de Bracieux alone is rich enough to drink a cellar-full of port, even at a pistole per swallow. I can't see why," continued Mousqueton, magnificent in his pride, "if our noble masters would partake of it, that we, their loyal servants, should be deprived of it."

And Mousqueton, rising, took the jug of beer, emptied it out a porthole to the last drop, and advanced majestically toward the door of the aft compartment. "But no! Locked!" he cried. "These English devils, how suspicious they are!"

"Locked!" said Blaisois, no less disappointed than Mousqueton. "Plague take it! What rotten luck! And now I feel my insides heaving more and more."

"Locked!" repeated Mousqueton with a face whose expression showed Blaisois he fully shared the younger man's disappointment.

"But didn't I hear you say, Sir Mouston," ventured Blaisois, "that once in your youth, at Chantilly I think it was, you fed both your master and yourself by taking partridges by snare, carp by fishing line, and bottles by lasso?"

"Yes, indeed," Mousqueton replied. "It's the honest truth, as Grimaud here can tell you. But that honey cellar had an air-vent, and the honey was in bottles. I can't throw a lasso through a solid bulkhead or use it to lift a keg that weighs twice what you do."

"No but you can pry two or three planks out of the wall," said Blaisois, "and make a hole with a hand-drill into a barrel."

Mousqueton stared wide-eyed at Blaisois, amazed to discover in the man unexpected qualities. "That's true," he said, "but I'd need a chisel to pry the planks, and a gimlet to drill the hole."

"Tool case," said Grimaud, drawing a line under his final balance.

"Oh, right! Our tool case," said Mousqueton. "I forgot about that."

Grimaud, in fact, was not just the purser of the troop but also its handyman, equipped with a tool bag as well as a ledger. Now, as Grimaud was a man of both foresight and caution, this canvas case that was rolled up in his baggage, contained an assortment of tools of the finest quality. In it Mousqueton quickly found a gimlet of suitable size that he appropriated. For a chisel, he drew from his belt his dagger that was stout and sharp. Mousqueton picked a section of the bulkhead where the planks were loose and went right to work. Blaisois watched him working with an admiration tinged by impatience, making recommendations from time to time about how to pull a nail or pry a plank, advice notable for its intelligence and clarity. After five minutes, Mousqueton had removed three boards.

"There," said Blaisois.

But Mousqueton was the opposite of the frog in the fable who thought himself larger than he was. Unfortunately, though he'd managed to decrease his name by a third, the same wasn't true of his body. He tried to pass through the opening but was dismayed to find that to do so he'd have to remove three or four additional boards. He sighed and picked up his tools to go back to work. But Grimaud, who'd finished his computations, had joined them, showing a great interest in the operations underway, and had noted Mousqueton's thwarted attempt to reach the Promised Land. "Let me," said Grimaud.

These two words were worth more from Grimaud than a whole sonnet from anyone else, so Mousqueton paused and turned around. "What, you?" he asked.

"I can get through."

"So you could," said Mousqueton, looking over his friend's long, slender body. "You could get through, and easily."

"That's right, and he knows which barrels are the full ones," said Blaisois, "since he was in the cellar already with Sir Knight d'Artagnan. Let Sir Grimaud pass, Sir Mouston."

"I could do it just as well as Grimaud," said Mousqueton, a little piqued.

"Yes but it'll take longer, and I'm thirsty. My inwards are getting worse and worse."

"Go ahead, Grimaud," said Mousqueton, giving the jug and the gimlet to the man assuming his place on the mission.

"Rinse out the glasses," said Grimaud.

Then he gave a little bow to Mousqueton, as if asking his pardon for finishing the expedition he'd so brilliantly begun, and then, lithe as a snake, he slipped through the opening and disappeared. Blaisois was thoroughly delighted. Of all the exploits accomplished in England by the extraordinary members of their little troop, this one seemed to him the most miraculous. "Now, Blaisois," said Mousqueton, with a look of superiority he didn't even try to conceal, "now you'll see how old soldiers can find drink when they're thirsty."

"The cloak," said Grimaud, from within the cellar.

"Ah, right," said Mousqueton.

"What does he want?" asked Blaisois.

"To have the opening concealed with a cloak."

"Why do that?" asked Blaisois.

"Oh, innocent one!" said Mousqueton. "What if someone comes in?"

"Ah! That is right," said Blaisois, in even greater admiration. "But he won't be able to see in there."

"Grimaud will be fine," replied Mousqueton. "He has eyes like a cat."

"Lucky for him," said Blaisois. "If I don't have a candle, I can't take two steps without barking my shins."

"You were never in the service," said Mousqueton, "or you'd have learned how to find a needle in a dark closet. But hush! I think I hear someone coming."

Mousqueton gave out a low whistle of alarm, familiar to all the lackeys from their younger days, sat back down at the table and gestured to Blaisois to do the same. Blaisois obeyed. The door opened. Two men came in, both wrapped in cloaks. "Oh ho!" said one of them. "A quarter past eleven, and not yet asleep? That's against the rules. Make sure that in another quarter of an hour everyone's in bed and snoring."

The two men crossed to the doorway to the compartment Grimaud had gone into, opened the door, entered, and closed it behind them. "Woe!" whispered Blaisois, trembling. "Grimaud is doomed!"

"He's a canny fox, that Grimaud," murmured Mousqueton.

And they waited, holding their breath with heads cocked to listen. Ten minutes passed, during which no noise was heard that indicated Grimaud was discovered. Then Mousqueton and Blaisois saw the door open again, the two cloaked men came out, locked the door with the same care they'd taken to unlock it, and went out, renewing the order to go to bed and put out the lights. "Should we obey?" asked Blaisois. "There's something strange about all this."

"They said in a quarter of an hour, so we still have five minutes," replied Mousqueton.

"Should we warn our masters?"

"Let's wait for Grimaud."

"What if they killed him?"

"Grimaud would have cried out."

"You know he's practically a mute."

"We'd have heard the blow."

"What if he doesn't come back?"

"Here he comes now."

In fact, at that moment Grimaud drew back the cloak that concealed the opening and his face appeared, pale, his eyes wide with fright, and their pupils like pinpoints in dishes of white milk. He crawled in, carefully holding the beer jug in one hand. It was filled with some substance that he brought near the smoky lamp to see well. Then he murmured a single syllable – "Oh!" –

With an expression of such profound terror that Mousqueton recoiled in fear and Blaisois nearly fainted. Nevertheless, they both glanced curiously into the beer jug. It was full of black powder. Now convinced that the vessel's cargo was gunpowder rather than honey, Grimaud leapt up and out the hatch and rushed to the cabin wherein slept the four friends. He gently pushed open the door that immediately awakened d'Artagnan, who was sleeping against it. Seeing Grimaud's dismayed expression he began to cry out but Grimaud quickly raised a finger to his lips, and then, with a puff of breath one wouldn't have thought could issue from such a slim body, from a distance of three feet he blew out the night-lamp. D'Artagnan raised himself on one elbow, Grimaud knelt next to him, and then, quivering, Grimaud whispered into d'Artagnan's ear a story so dramatic it needed neither gesture nor expression to emphasise it. During this account, Athos, Porthos, and Aramis continued sleeping like men who hadn't slept for a week while in the tween-decks, Mousqueton did up his doublet as a precaution, as Blaisois, gripped by terror, the hair standing up on his head, tried to do the same. Here is what had happened: scarcely had Grimaud disappeared through the opening into the aft compartment before, searching, he encountered a barrel. He knocked, and it echoed, empty. He tried another, also empty but the third that he thumped twice to make sure he wasn't mistaken, gave back a sound so dull that Grimaud recognised it had to be full. Feeling the keg for a good place to set the gimlet, his hand struck a spigot. "Good!" said Grimaud. "That saves me the trouble."

He positioned his beer jug, opened the tap on the keg, and felt the contents flow from one to the other. Having first closed the spigot as a precaution, Grimaud was lifting the jug to his lips, so as not to bring his companions a brew he couldn't answer for, when he heard Mousqueton's low alarm whistle. He expected some watchman on a night round, so he slipped between two barrels and hid himself behind a crate. A moment later the door opened, then closed again after admitting the two cloaked men we saw passing Blaisois and Mousqueton and giving the order for lights out. One of them had a dark-lantern, its glass sides carefully closed, and tall enough that the flame burned well below its top. In addition, the glass was wrapped in thick paper that absorbed most of the light. This man was Groslow. The other, his face shaded by a broad-brimmed hat, had in his hand something long, flexible, and coiled like a whitish rope. Grimaud, thinking they'd come to the cellar following the same urge as he, to sample the port honey, nestled further back behind his crate, while thinking that if he was discovered, his crime was no worse than theirs. Arriving at the barrel in front of Grimaud's crate, the two men stopped. "Do you have the fuse?" asked the one carrying the lamp, speaking English.

"Right here," said the other.

At the voice of the latter, Grimaud felt a cold shiver shake him to the marrow of his bones. He slowly raised his head above the edge of the crate until he could see, under the broad brim of the hat, the pale features of Mordaunt. "How long will it take to burn down?" asked Mordaunt.

"Five minutes, more or less," said the skipper.

This was another voice that was no stranger to Grimaud. He glanced from one to the other and recognised Mordaunt's companion as Groslow. "All right, then," said Mordaunt. "Warn your men to be ready to go, without telling them why. The longboat is trailing the sloop?"

"Like a dog on the end of a leash."

"Then, when the clock shows a quarter past midnight, gather your men and go quietly down into the longboat..."

"After first having lit the fuse?"

"I'll handle that. I want to be certain of my vengeance. The oars are in the boat?"

"Everything is ready."

"Good."

"That's it, then."

Mordaunt knelt down and inserted one end of the fuse into the spigot, so he'd only have to light the other end. Then he drew out his watch. "You understand? At a quarter past midnight, in other words..." He rose and looked at his watch. "In twenty minutes."

"Yes, Sir," replied Groslow. "Only, I must point out that the part of this mission you've reserved for yourself is dangerous, and it would be safer to have one of the men set off the fireworks."

"My dear Groslow," said Mordaunt, "you know the French proverb: If you want something done right, do it yourself. I intend to put that into practice."

Grimaud had heard everything, and understood most of it, while what he saw made the situation quite clear: for there was Mordaunt, laying the fuse, and uttering that proverb that for fidelity he'd spoken in French. In final confirmation, Grimaud carefully reached into the jug that Mousqueton and Blaisois were waiting so impatiently for, rubbed its contents between his fingers, and felt the grains of a coarse powder. Mordaunt and the skipper moved away. At the door they paused, listening. Mordaunt said, "Listen to how soundly they sleep!"

Through the ceiling could be heard the snores of Porthos. Groslow said, "They've been placed in our hands like a gift from God."

"And this time," said Mordaunt, "not even the Devil could save them!"

Smiling, the pair went out. Grimaud waited until he had heard the key turn in the lock and when he was sure he was alone, he slowly rose against the wall. "Oh!" he said, wiping huge beads of sweat from his forehead with his sleeve. "How lucky it was that Mousqueton was thirsty!"

He scurried back through the opening in the bulkhead, hoping it had just been a dream – but when he saw the black powder in the jug, he knew it was no dream but instead a deadly nightmare. D'Artagnan as one might imagine, listened to this story with increasing attention and without even waiting for Grimaud to finish, he got swiftly up, put his mouth near the ear of Aramis who slept on his left, put a hand on his shoulder to prevent sudden movement, and whispered, "Get up, Knight but quietly." Aramis awoke. D'Artagnan repeated his warning and lifted his hand. Aramis got up. "You have Athos to your left," d'Artagnan said. "Warn him as I warned you." Aramis easily awoke Athos, who was a light sleeper, as is usually the case with those of a refined nature. They had a more difficult time awakening Porthos, who was inclined to resist being drawn from sleep and ready to protest aloud, until d'Artagnan placed a firm hand over his mouth. When all were up, our Gascon extended his arms around them and drew their heads close together, nearly touching. "Comrades," he said, "we must get off this vessel immediately, or we're all dead."

"Bah!" said Athos. "Now what?"

"Do you know who the skipper of this ship is?"

"No."

"Captain Groslow."

The shudder that ran through the three musketeers told d'Artagnan he was beginning to get their attention. "Groslow!" said Aramis. "The devil!"

"Who is this Groslow?" asked Porthos. "I don't remember him."

"The one who broke open Parry's head and is about to take our own."

"Oh ho!"

"And his lieutenant, can you guess who he is?"

"His lieutenant? He has none," said Athos. "There's no lieutenant on a sloop with a crew of four."

"Yes but our Sir Groslow is no ordinary captain. He has a lieutenant, and his lieutenant is Sir Mordaunt."

This time it was more than a shudder that passed through the musketeers, it was a spasm. These invincible men were nonetheless subject to a single mysterious and fatal influence, a terror which only that name could produce in them. "What do we do?" said Athos.

"Take over the sloop," said Aramis.

"And kill him," said Porthos.

"The sloop is mined," said d'Artagnan. "Those barrels I took for barrels of port are kegs of powder. When Mordaunt is confronted, he'll blow everything up, friends and enemies together, and by my faith as a gentleman, he's such bad company that I have no desire to go anywhere with him, especially to heaven or hell."

"Do you have a plan?" asked Athos.

"Yes."

"What is it?"

"Do you have confidence in me?"

"Command us," said the three musketeers together.

"Then, let's go!" D'Artagnan went to the stern window that was low but broad enough to allow passage, and opened it gently on its hinges. "This is our road," he said.

"Devil!" said Aramis. "That's a cold road, dear friend."

"Stay here if you like – it will be hot soon enough!"

"But we can't swim to land."

"The longboat trails in our wake on a rope – see it there? When we're all in the boat, we'll cut the rope. That's the whole plan. Let's go, Gentlemen."

"One moment," said Athos. "The lackeys?"

"Here we are," said Mousqueton and Blaisois whom Grimaud had brought up quietly through the hatch to concentrate all their forces in the cabin.

Meanwhile the three friends stood motionless, contemplating the grim spectacle d'Artagnan had revealed by opening the window. It was a daunting scene indeed, and anyone who's seen it knows there's nothing more striking than a stormy night sea, dark waves rolling and crashing under the flickering light of a midwinter moon. "God!" said d'Artagnan. "Are we hesitating? If we're afraid to go, how will the lackeys manage it?"

"I won't hesitate," said Grimaud.

“Sir,” said Blaisois, “I must warn you, I can swim only in rivers.”

“And I, I don’t swim at all,” said Mousqueton.

Meanwhile d’Artagnan was slipping over the sill. “You’re decided, then, friend?” said Athos.

“Yes,” replied the Gascon. “Come, Athos, you who are the superior man, put your mind over matter. You, Aramis, command the lackeys. You, Porthos, kill anyone who tries to stop us.”

And d’Artagnan, after shaking hands with Athos, chose a moment when the sloop’s bow pitched up so its stern sank down, and slipped into the water that was already up to his waist. Athos followed immediately before the sloop could pitch down again; when the stern came up, the tow-rope rose out of the water, and they could see where it led to the longboat. D’Artagnan swam toward the rope and grabbed it. He clung to the rope by one hand, just his head out of the water, until a second later Athos joined him. Two more bodies plunged into the water behind the sloop. They saw the heads of Aramis and Grimaud. “Blaisois worries me,” said Athos. “Did you hear what he said, d’Artagnan, about swimming only in rivers?”

“If you can swim at all, you can swim anywhere,” said d’Artagnan. “To the boat! To the boat!”

“But Porthos? I don’t see him yet.”

“Oh, Porthos will come, don’t worry – he swims like Leviathan himself.”

In fact, Porthos was delayed, as a scene, half drama, half comedy, played out between him, Mousqueton, and Blaisois. The latter two, frightened by the roaring wind, alarmed by the sound of the waves, and terrified of the roiling black water, were backing away rather than advancing. “Come on!” said Porthos. “Into the water!”

“But, Sir, I can’t swim,” said Mousqueton. “Leave me here.”

“And me too, Sir,” said Blaisois.

“I’d just be an embarrassment, taking up room in the boat,” said Mousqueton.

“And I’d just drown before I even got to it,” said Blaisois.

“Why, I’ll strangle you both if you don’t get going,” said Porthos, grabbing them by their throats. “Forward, Blaisois!” Blaisois’s only answer was a groan stifled by Porthos’s mighty hand, as the giant, taking him by the neck and the ankles, slid him like a plank out the window and into the sea face-first. “Now, Mouston,” said Porthos, “I hope you won’t abandon your master.”

“Ah, Sir!” said Mousqueton with tears in his eyes. “Why did you have to return to the service? We were doing so well at the Château de Pierrefonds!”

And without further reproach, having turned philosophical and obedient, thanks to the example of Blaisois’s fate, Mousqueton jumped headlong into the sea – an act of supreme loyalty, as he considered himself already drowned. But Porthos wasn’t a man to abandon a faithful companion. The master followed his servant so closely that their double impact made a single great splash – and when Mousqueton returned to the surface, blind and blinking, he found himself borne up by Porthos’s great hand, effortlessly advancing toward the rope with the majesty of a sea god. At the same time Porthos felt something thrashing near his other arm and seized it by the hair: it was Blaisois, for whom Athos was already coming. “Don’t bother, Count,” said Porthos. “I don’t need you.”

And indeed, with a vigorous kick of his mighty legs, Porthos rose like the giant Adamastor above the waves, and three seconds later found himself among his companions. D’Artagnan, Aramis, and Grimaud helped Mousqueton and Blaisois to climb into the boat. Then it was the turn of Porthos, who, throwing himself across the bow, managed to avoid causing the craft to capsize. “And Athos?” asked d’Artagnan.

“Here I am!” said Athos, who, like a general commanding the rear guard, had waited until everyone else was aboard the longboat. “Are we all together?”

“All,” said d’Artagnan. “And you, Athos, do you have your poniard?”

“Yes.”

“Then sever the rope and get in.” Athos drew his poniard from his belt and cut the tow-rope, and the sloop sailed onward, while the longboat stayed where it was, with no motion but that given it by the waves. “Come aboard, Athos!” said d’Artagnan. And he offered his hand to the Count La Fère who found a place on a thwart in the middle. “Just in time,” said the Gascon, “as I think we’re about to see something interesting.”

247 Destiny

In fact, d’Artagnan had scarcely spoken when a low whistle was heard from the sloop that was beginning to disappear into the mist and gloom. “That must mean something,” said the Gascon.

Just then a lantern appeared on deck, making shadows dance at the stern. Suddenly a terrible cry, a cry of despair, echoed over the water – and as if this cry had chased away the clouds, the veil that had wreathed the moon slid away, and in the pale, silver moonlight the sloop was silhouetted against the horizon. On the ship shadows ran back and forth, crying out seemingly at random. From the midst of this chaos Mordaunt appeared on the after deck with a torch in his hand. The shadows flitting to and fro across the ship were Groslow and his men who’d gathered at the time appointed by Mordaunt, who, after listening at the cabin door to make sure the musketeers were asleep, had been reassured by the silence. Indeed, how could he have suspected what had happened? Mordaunt had then opened the aft hatch and hurried down, where, burning with vengeance and blinded by God, he’d set fire to the fuse. Meanwhile, Groslow and his sailors had gathered at the stern. “Grab the rope,” Groslow ordered, “and pull in the longboat.”

One of the sailors put a leg over the rail, seized the rope and pulled – and it came right up without resistance. “The tow-rope is cut!” the sailor cried. “The boat’s gone!”

“What! The boat’s gone!” said Groslow, rushing to the rail. “That’s impossible!”

“Maybe so,” said the sailor, “but see for yourself – there’s nothing in our wake, and here’s the end of the rope.”

It was then that Groslow uttered that cry of despair heard by the musketeers. “What is it?” demanded Mordaunt, coming up from the hatch, torch in hand, and darting toward the stern.

“Our enemies have escaped – they’ve cut the rope and fled in the longboat!”

Mordaunt leapt to the cabin door and kicked it open. “Empty!” he cried. “Oh, the demons!”

“We’ll go after them,” said Groslow. “They can’t have gotten far, and we can ram and sink them.”

“But no, the fire!” said Mordaunt. “I set the fire!”

“To what?”

“To the fuse!”

“A hundred hells!” Groslow shouted, racing toward the hatch. “Maybe there’s still time!”

Mordaunt’s only reply was a horrific laugh. Then, his face twisted by hatred more than by terror, raising his eyes to the sky to howl a final blasphemy, he threw the torch into the sea and followed it, hurling himself into the waves. Just as Groslow set foot on the ladder into the hold, the ship erupted like the mouth of a volcano. A jet of fire exploded into the sky like a hundred cannon firing at once; the air was alight with flaming debris, and then the sloop Lightning was gone, blown to burning splinters that flew and fell and went out as they touched the sea. Except for a fading hiss, it was as if nothing had been there at all. The sloop had disappeared beneath the surface, and Groslow and his men were annihilated. The four friends had seen every detail of the drama. For an instant the sea had been lit up for at least a league, and they could have been glimpsed each frozen in a different attitude, showing the terror they couldn’t help but feel, despite their hearts of bronze. Next the rain of fire fell all around them but the volcano was quickly extinguished, and darkness rushed back to swallow them, a small boat tossing on a stormy sea. For a moment they remained stunned and silent. Porthos and d’Artagnan, each of whom had taken an oar, held them out mechanically over the water, leaning heavily on them, hands clenched. “My faith,” said Aramis, the first to break the deathly silence, “this time I think it’s finally over.”

“Help me, Milords! Help! Save me!” came a lamenting voice that seemed to the four friends to rise from the waves like some spirit of the seas.

They looked at each other. Athos trembled. “It’s him!” he said. “It’s his voice!”

They all remained silent, for they all, like Athos, had recognised that voice. They only stared, eyes wide, toward where the sloop had disappeared, trying to peer through the darkness. After a moment they could distinguish a man swimming vigorously toward them. Athos extended his arm, pointing him out to his companions. “Yes, yes,” said d’Artagnan, “we see him all right.”

“Him again!” said Porthos, breathing like a bellows. “What! Is he made of iron?”

“My God!” murmured Athos.

Aramis and d’Artagnan were whispering to each other. Mordaunt made a few more strokes, and then, raising a hand from the water in distress, he called, “Have pity, Gentlemen, in the name of heaven! I feel my strength ebbing away – I’m going to die!”

That voice pleading for help was so vibrant, so penetrating, that it awakened compassion in Athos’s heart. “How pitiful,” he murmured.

“Great!” said d’Artagnan. “And you’re falling for it! Look, he’s swimming toward us again. Does he think we’re going to take him aboard? Row, Porthos, row!”

And setting the example, d’Artagnan plunged his oar into the water. Two long strokes sent the boat another twenty paces. “Oh! You can’t abandon me like that! You can’t leave me to drown! You can’t be so cruel!” Mordaunt wailed.

“Oh?” said Porthos to Mordaunt. “I think we’ve got you at last, my lad, and there’s no way out for you but through the gates of hell!”

“Oh, Porthos,” murmured the Count La Fère.

“Leave me alone, Athos – you’re becoming ridiculous with your misplaced charity! If he gets within ten feet of the boat, I swear I’ll break his head open with this oar.”

“Have mercy! Oh, don’t leave me, Gentlemen – have mercy, have pity on me!” cried the young man, panting and blowing out water whenever a wave passed over his head.

D’Artagnan who had completed his colloquy with Aramis, rose and said without taking his eye off Mordaunt for a second, “Mordaunt, be gone if you please. Your repentance’s too recent for us to have any confidence in it. Allow me to point out that the ship in which you intended to fry us all still steams just below the surface, and your current situation is a bed of roses compared to what you had in mind for us, and actually brought upon Groslow and his men.”

“Gentlemen!” pleaded Mordaunt, even more despairingly. “I swear to you my repentance is real. Gentlemen, I’m so young, I’m barely twenty-three! I was carried away by a natural resentment, I just wanted to avenge my mother! You, oh, surely you would have done no differently.”

“Pfah!” said d’Artagnan, seeing that Athos was weakening. “That’s as may be.”

Mordaunt was only three or four strokes from the boat and the approach of death seemed to grant him supernatural strength. “Alas!” he cried. “I’m doomed to die! You’ll murder the son as you murdered the mother! But think, by all laws human and divine, a son must avenge his mother. Besides,” he added, joining his hands in prayer, “if it’s a crime since I repent of it and I ask to be pardoned, I must be forgiven.”

Then as if his strength was failing, he sank until a wave passed over his head, silencing his pleas. “Oh! It tears me apart!” said Athos.

Mordaunt reappeared, blinking and blowing. “And I say that now we finish this,” replied d’Artagnan. “Sir the assassin of your uncle; Sir the executioner of King Charles; Sir the incendiary saboteur, I urge you to allow yourself to sink quietly – because if you come a single stroke closer, I’ll break your head with my oar.”

Mordaunt, as if in despair, swam a stroke nearer. D’Artagnan took his oar in both hands and Athos rose. “D’Artagnan! D’Artagnan!” he cried. “My son, I beg of you. This unhappy man’s about to die, it’s abominable to let a man die when you can extend your hand, and by doing so save him. Oh, my heart revolts against such cruelty, I can’t resist it – he must live!”

“Mordieu!” swore d’Artagnan. “Why not just turn yourself over to this wretch with your hands and feet already tied? It would at least be quicker. Ah, Count La Fère, do you want to die by his hand? Well! I, your son, as you call me, I don’t want it.”

It was the first time d’Artagnan had ever resisted a plea when Athos had called him his son. Aramis coldly drew his sword and gripped it between his teeth. “If the regicide puts his hand on the gunwale,” he gritted, “I’ll cut it off.”

“And I,” said Porthos, “listen...”

“What are you going to do?” asked Aramis.

“I’m going to jump in the water and strangle him.”

“Oh, Gentlemen!” cried Athos feelingly. “Be men, be Christians!” D’Artagnan uttered a sigh that ended in a groan, Aramis laid down his sword, and Porthos sat down. “Look,” continue Athos, “see how death is painted on his face. His strength is at its end, and in a minute more, he’ll sink to the bottom of the abyss. Ah, do not inflict this terrible remorse upon me, don’t force me to die of shame in my turn. My friends, grant me the life of this unhappy man, and I’ll bless you, I’ll...”

“I’m dying,” gasped Mordaunt. “Help me! Help...”

“Hold on a minute,” said Aramis, addressing d’Artagnan. Then, turning to Porthos, “One more pull at the oars,” he said.

D'Artagnan didn't reply by word or gesture – he was beginning to feel overwhelmed, half by the appeals of Athos, half by the scene playing out before him. So Porthos plied his oar alone, and since it had no counterweight, the boat pivoted in place, a motion that brought Athos closer to the dying man. “Count La Fère!” wheezed Mordaunt. “Sir Count! It's you I implore, you I beg, have pity on me .... Are you there, Sir? Everything grows dark .... I'm dying! Oh, help me!”

“Here I am, Sir,” said Athos, leaning forward and extending his arms toward Mordaunt with his innate air of nobility and dignity. “Here I am. Take my hand and enter our vessel.”

“I can't watch this,” said d'Artagnan. “I'm nauseated.”

He turned toward his two friends, who were leaning away from his side of the boat, as if they feared the man to whom Athos extended his hand. Mordaunt made a supreme effort, lifted himself, seized the hand stretched out to him and clung to it as if it was his last hope. “Good!” said Athos. “Put your other hand here.” And he offered his shoulder as another point of support, so that his head nearly touched that of Mordaunt, and the two mortal enemies embraced like two brothers. Mordaunt grabbed Athos by the collar. “Easy, Sir,” said the count. “You're saved now, rest easy.”

“See, Mother!” shrieked Mordaunt with flaring eyes and an accent of hatred impossible to convey. “I can offer you only one victim but at least it's the one you'd have chosen!”

And as d'Artagnan shouted, Porthos raised his oar and Aramis sought an opening for a thrust, the boat tipped alarmingly and dumped Athos into the water. Then Mordaunt wrapped his arms around his victim's neck with a cry of triumph and his legs around his arms, paralysing him like a serpent constricting its prey. Struggling for a moment, without crying out or calling for aid, Athos tried to stay on the surface but jerk by jerk he disappeared, until all they could see was his long floating hair. And then there was only a bubbling whirlpool to show where the sea had swallowed them both. Mute with horror, frozen, paralysed by outrage and fear, the three friends gaped helplessly, eyes dilated, arms outstretched. They were like statues, yet despite their immobility, the pounding of their hearts was audible, almost visible. Porthos was the first to come to himself, and tearing his hair out with his hands, he cried with a sob, “Oh, Athos! Athos! Noble heart! Woe! Woe to us who let you die!”

“Ah! Woe!” repeated d'Artagnan.

“Woe,” murmured Aramis.

At that moment, in the middle of a vast circle of sea lit by the light of the moon, four or five strokes from the longboat, a whirlpool like that which had formed at the sinking appeared and enlarged, and they saw reappear first a swirl of hair, then a pale face with staring but dead eyes, then a body that having risen chest-high from the sea, settled on its back and tossed limply at the whim of the waves. A poniard was embedded in the cadaver's chest, its pommel glinting with gold. “Mordaunt! Mordaunt!” cried the three friends. “It's Mordaunt!”

“But Athos?” said d'Artagnan. All at once the boat leaned to port under a new and unexpected weight, and Grimaud gave a cry of joy. All turned to where Athos, pale, eyes dull and hand trembling, clung to the gunwale. Eight eager arms immediately drew him up and into the boat, where Athos was warmed, reanimated, and reborn beneath the attentions and embraces of his friends, drunk with joy. “You're not hurt, I hope?” asked d'Artagnan.

“No,” said Athos. “What about ... him?”

“Oh! This time, thank God, he's dead. Look!”

And d'Artagnan, forcing Athos to gaze in the direction he pointed, showed him the corpse of Mordaunt tossing on the waves, a body that, sometimes floating, sometimes submerged, still seemed to pursue the four friends with a look of fury and mortal hatred. Finally, the body rolled over and sank. Athos followed it with a gaze filled with pity and melancholy. “Well done, Athos. Bravo!” said Aramis with an effusion that was rare for him.

“A mighty blow!” said Porthos.

“I have a son,” said Athos. “I wanted to live.”

“At last,” said d'Artagnan, “God has spoken!”

“It wasn't I who killed him,” murmured Athos. “It's destiny.”

248

Mousqueton escapes being eaten, having avoided being roasted

A deep and lengthy silence reigned in the longboat after the terrible scene just recounted. The moon that had revealed itself for a moment as if God willed that no detail of this event should escape the sight of the viewers, disappeared again behind the clouds. Everything returned to that darkness which is so frightful in desert areas, especially so on that liquid desert called the ocean, and nothing could be heard but the whistle of the west wind as it crested the waves. Porthos was the first to break the silence. “I've seen many things,” he said, “but nothing has disturbed me as much as what I just saw. And yet, though I'm troubled, I must confess I'm also very, very happy. I feel like a hundred pounds has been removed from my chest, and I can breathe again at last.”

And Porthos breathed in and out with a sound that did honour to the power of his mighty lungs. “As for me,” said Aramis, “I can't yet join you in that feeling, Porthos – I'm still appalled. It's as if I can't believe my own eyes, I must doubt what I've seen, and I keep looking around the boat, expecting every minute to see that wretch rising up, the poniard in his hand that he's drawn from his heart.”

“Oh, no fear of that!” replied Porthos. “The blade went in just under the sixth rib and was buried to the hilt. That's not a reproach, Athos, there's no shame in that blow. That was a proper stab, and no mistake. And so, I'm alive, and I'm breathing, and I'm happy.”

“Not so quick to the victory parade, Porthos!” said d'Artagnan. “We've never been in more danger than we are now – for while a man can kill another man, he can't fight the elements. Now we're lost at sea, at night, without a pilot, in a frail boat; if we're capsize by wind or wave, we're done for.”

Mousqueton sighed sadly. “You, d'Artagnan, are ungrateful,” said Athos. “Yes, ungrateful to doubt Providence at the very moment when it's saved us all so miraculously. Do you think we would be guided by His hand through so many perils only to be abandoned? Not so. We were sailing on a west wind, and that wind still blows.” Athos looked up and found the North Star. “There's the Plough, and therefore east, and France, are to starboard. We'll sail before the wind, and if it doesn't change it will bring us near either Calais or Boulogne. If the boat capsizes, we're strong enough and good enough swimmers, five of us anyway, to right it again, or at least to hang on to it if that's beyond our strength. Plus, we are in the shipping lane of all the vessels that sail from Dover to Calais and from Portsmouth to Boulogne; if the water retained ruts like the land, we'd be in a valley carved by their keels. It's impossible for us not to be picked up by some fishing boat.”

“But what if we aren't picked up, and the wind turns to blow from the north?”

“Ah. In that case,” said Athos, “we wouldn't reach land until we'd crossed the Atlantic.”

“Before that happened, we'd die of hunger,” said Aramis.

“Yes, that's very probable,” said the Count La Fère.

Mousqueton uttered a second sigh more doleful than the first. “Oh that, Mouston,” said Porthos, “why must you sigh like that? I'm getting tired of it.”

“I'm just cold, Sir,” said Mousqueton.

“That's impossible,” said Porthos.

“Impossible?” said Mousqueton, astonished.

“Certainly. You're coated with so many layers of fat it's impossible for the air to penetrate it. It's something else – speak up, tell me.”

“Well, yes, it is, Sir. It's these very layers of fat that you admire that frighten me so.”

“And why's that, Mouston? Speak freely, these gentlemen will permit it.”

“Because, Sir, I remember that in the library at the Château de Bracieux there are a number of travel books, including the accounts of Jean Mocquet, the famous explorer for King Henry IV.”

“Well?”

“Well, Sir,” said Mousqueton, “in those books are many stories of nautical misadventures much like the one that threatens us now!”

“Go on, Mouston,” said Porthos, “you interest me.”

“Well, Sir, in such cases, Jean Mocquet says that the starving travellers have the frightful habit of eating each other, starting with...”

“With the fattest!” cried d'Artagnan, unable to contain his laughter, despite the gravity of the situation.

“Yes, Sir,” replied Mousqueton, somewhat abashed by this hilarity, “and allow me to say I don't see what's so funny about it.”

“Here you see devotion personified by my brave Mouston!” replied Porthos. “In your imagination, did you already see yourself dismembered and eaten by your master?”

“Yes, though my joy at the thought of thus saving Sir is not unmixed with some sadness. But I wouldn't regret my death too much, Sir, so long as I could be sure it would be useful to you.”

“Mouston,” said Porthos, touched, “if we ever again see my estate of Pierrefonds, you shall have, for yourself and all your descendants, the vineyard on top of the hill.”

“And you'll name it the Vineyard of Devotion,” said Aramis, “Mouston, to pass down through the years the memory of your near-sacrifice.”

“Knight,” said d'Artagnan, still laughing, “you'd join in partaking of Mouston, wouldn't you, after fasting for two or three days?”

“My faith, no,” replied Aramis. “I'd much rather eat Blaisois; we haven't known him nearly as long as Mouston.”

It must be assumed that this exchange of pleasantries, though mainly aimed at lifting Athos's spirit after what had just happened, made the lackeys more than a little uncomfortable, with the exception of Grimaud, who knew that in the event of famine he'd be the last chicken plucked. So Grimaud, silent as usual, was taking no part in the conversation, and was rowing as best he could, an oar in each hand. “Are you rowing, then?” said Athos.

Grimaud nodded. “Why are you rowing?”

“To keep warm.”

In fact, though the other castaways shivered with cold, the silent Grimaud was sweating from exertion. Suddenly Mousqueton uttered a cry of joy and raised a bottle over his head. “Oh!” he said, passing the bottle to Porthos. “Oh, Sir, we're saved! The boat is stocked with provisions.”

And rummaging under the bench from which he'd already drawn that precious specimen, he brought out a dozen such bottles, followed by bread loaves and salted beef. Needless to say, this discovery cheered everyone, except for Athos. “Mordieu!” said Porthos who it will be remembered, had been already hungry when he boarded the sloop. “It's amazing how hungry one gets after such an emotional episode!”

And he emptied a bottle without pausing and then ate a third of the bread and beef himself. “Now sleep, Gentlemen” said Athos, “or at least try. I'll take the first watch.”

To men other than our hardy adventurers such a proposal would have been absurd. They were wet to the bone, there was an icy wind, and the emotional storm they'd passed through should have been more than enough to deprive them of rest – but for these swashbucklers, with iron nerves and exhausted bodies, sleep was easily found despite the circumstances, coming almost as soon as it was called. Each of them, confident in their pilot, found what comfort he could and tried to profit from the advice of Athos, who, sitting at the tiller with his eyes fixed on the stars, sought not only the path toward France but perhaps also the face of God. Through the night he sat and watched alone, as he'd promised, thoughtful and alert, steering the small boat on its proper route home. After some hours of sleep, the travellers were awakened by Athos. The first glimmers of dawn were lightening the blue sea, and about ten musket-shots off the bow they could see a black mass on the waves beneath a tall triangular sail, long and slim like a swallow's tail. “A ship!” said the four friends in one voice, followed by those of their lackeys. In fact, it was a Dunkirk flute sailing toward Boulogne. The four musketeers, Blaisois, and Mousqueton all raised their voices in a single cry that rang out across the heaving waves, while Grimaud, without saying a word, put his hat on the end of an oar and waved it to attract the attention of anyone who might not have heard the shouts. A quarter of an hour later, the flute's boat took them in tow, and shortly after that they set foot on the ship's deck. On the behalf of his master, Grimaud offered twenty guineas to the skipper for passage, and with a favourable wind, by nine o'clock that morning our Frenchmen set foot on the soil of their native land.

“Mordieu! How strong one is on his own ground!” said Porthos, pushing his large feet deep into the sand. “Let them come at me now, whoever they may be, and they'll see who they're dealing with! Morbleu! I could defy a whole kingdom!”

“And I say, Porthos,” said d'Artagnan, “be careful what you ask for. It seems to me we're attracting attention here.”

“Of course!” said Porthos. “They admire us!”

“That doesn't comfort me, Porthos,” replied d'Artagnan. “I see men in outfits of official black, and I must confess that in our situation the sight of officials worries me.”

“They're the port's customs agents,” said Aramis.

“Under the old cardinal, the great one,” said Athos, “they'd have paid more attention to us than to cargo and merchandise. But under the current regime, rest assured, friends, they're more interested in duties and tariffs than in passengers.”

“I don't trust them,” said d'Artagnan. “I'm heading into the dunes.”

“Why not the town?” said Porthos. “I'd rather rest in a comfortable inn than in these godforsaken sandy wastes that are no use to anyone but rabbits. Besides, I'm hungry.”

“Suit yourself, Porthos!” said d'Artagnan. “But as for me, I think people in our situation are safest in the open country.”

And d'Artagnan, certain he'd be followed by the others, plunged into the dunes without waiting for a response from Porthos. The little troop followed him and soon slipped behind the dunes without attracting any further attention. "And now," said Aramis, after they'd gone about a quarter of a league, "let's talk."

"No," said d'Artagnan, "let's flee. We've escaped from Cromwell, from Mordaunt, and from the sea, three abysses that nearly swallowed us – but there's no escaping from Sir Mazarin."

"You're right, d'Artagnan," said Aramis, "and my advice is that, for safety, we should split up."

"Indeed, Aramis, we must separate," said d'Artagnan.

Porthos wanted to speak in opposition to this idea but d'Artagnan persuaded him by a hand gesture to remain silent. Porthos was usually obedient to these signals from his comrade, whom he good-naturedly recognised as his intellectual superior. So he swallowed his words before speaking them. "But why should we separate?" said Athos.

"Because Porthos and I were sent to by Sir Mazarin to serve Cromwell," said d'Artagnan, "and instead of serving Cromwell we served King Charles I that is not at all the same thing. If we return as companions of Gentlemen de La Fère and d'Herblay, our guilt is proven – whereas if we return by ourselves, our guilt remains in doubt, and doubt is something we can work with. I hope to lead Mazarin up the garden path."

"He's right, so he is!" said Porthos.

"You forget that we're your prisoners," said Athos. "We've given you our parole, and as prisoners we could go with you to Paris ...."

"Really, Athos," interrupted d'Artagnan, "it's shameful for a man of sense like you to reason like a third-grade schoolboy. Knight," he continued, addressing Aramis, who, hand proudly on his sword, seemed to have been won over to Athos's opinion at his first words, "Knight, please understand that in this situation, my wary nature is fully aroused. By ourselves, Porthos and I risk nothing at the end of the day – but if they tried to stop the four of us to arrest you two, well! Seven swords would come out, and this business, already bad enough, would be made infinitely worse for all of us. Look, if one pair of us gets into trouble, isn't it better to have the other pair at liberty to get them out of it, by bribery, ruse, or force? Besides, we might be able to obtain separately – you from the queen, we from Mazarin – the pardon we'd be refused as a group. Come, Athos and Aramis, you take the road to the right, and Porthos and I will take the road to the left. You gentlemen can make your way through Normandy, while we take the direct route to Paris."

"But if one pair gets taken along the way, how can they warn the other of the disaster?" asked Aramis.

"That's easy enough," d'Artagnan replied. "Let's agree on itineraries from which we won't deviate. You go by Saint-Valery, then Dieppe, then follow the direct route from Dieppe to Paris; we'll go by way of Abbeville, Amiens, Péronne, Compiègne, and Senlis, and at each inn or tavern where we stop, we'll write on the wall with a dagger point, or scratch on a window with a diamond, directions that will guide any comrade who comes looking for us."

"Ah, my friend," said Athos, "how I would admire the resources of your head if I weren't so occupied with adoring your heart."

And he offered his hand to d'Artagnan. "Does the fox have genius, Athos?" said the Gascon, shrugging. "No, he just knows a few tricks, like how to steal chickens, evade hunters, and find his way by day or night, that's all. So, is the matter settled?"

"It's settled."

"Then let's divide the money," said d'Artagnan. "We must have around two hundred pistoles left. What's the tally, Grimaud?"

"One hundred and eighty half-louis, Sir."

"That'll do. Ah, cheers! Here comes the sun! Welcome, friend sun! Though you're not as bright as you are in Gascony, at least here I can recognise you. Hello! You make me blink."

"Come, come, d'Artagnan," said Athos, "don't pretend to be such an iron man, we see those tears in your eyes. Be honest with us, as we all are – it's one of our greatest strengths."

"I guess," said d'Artagnan, "that it just isn't possible, Athos, to take leave of such friends as you and Aramis without feeling it when you're riding into danger."

"Of course not," said Athos, "so come into my arms, my son!"

"Mordieu!" said Porthos, sobbing. "I think I'm weeping. How foolish!"

And the four friends wrapped themselves in a circle of their arms. At that moment these four men, united in a fraternal embrace, had but a single soul. Blaisois and Grimaud were to follow Athos and Aramis; Mousqueton would suffice for both Porthos and d'Artagnan. They divided the money equally, as they always had; then, after each had clasped hands with all the others, the four gentlemen separated and set off on the agreed-upon routes, though not without turning back to call out final farewells that echoed across the dunes. At length they lost sight of each other. "Damn it, d'Artagnan!" said Porthos. "I must get this off my chest right now, because I can't stay angry with you in my heart – I have to say I think, for once, you've made a mistake!"

"How so?" asked d'Artagnan with his sly smile.

"Because if, as you say, Athos and Aramis are in real danger, this is no time to abandon them. I confess I was about ready to go with them, and may yet despite all the Mazarins in the world."

"And you'd be right to do so, Porthos, if that were the case," said d'Artagnan. "But consider this small fact which is nonetheless large enough to change everything: it's not our friends who are in the greatest danger, it's us – and it's not to abandon them that we separate but to protect them."

"Really?" said Porthos, eyes wide in astonishment.

"No doubt about it. If they're taken, they just spend some time in the Bastille – whereas if we fail to make our case and are imprisoned, we lose our heads on the Place de Grève."

"Oh!" said Porthos. "That's not exactly the barony you promised me, d'Artagnan!"

"Bah! That may not be as out of reach as you think, Porthos. Remember the proverb: all roads lead to Rome."

"But why are we in greater danger than Athos and Aramis?" asked Porthos.

"Because all they did was try to carry out the rescue mission given them by Queen Henriette, while we betrayed the assignment Mazarin gave us. Sent as envoys to serve Cromwell, instead we served King Charles; instead of helping to bring down that crowned head, condemned as he was by all those villains, Mazarin, Cromwell, Joyce, Pride, Fairfax, and so forth, we nearly saved him."

"Faith, that's true," said Porthos. "But do you really think, my friend, that in the midst of all these great events that Cromwell has had time to think of notifying..."

"Cromwell thinks of everything; Cromwell has time for everything; and believe me, dear friend, we'd better lose no time ourselves, for every minute is precious. We won't be safe until we've had a chance to talk to Mazarin, and even then..."

"The devil!" said Porthos. "What are we going to tell Mazarin?"

"Let me handle it – I have a plan. He who laughs last laughs best, after all. Sir Cromwell is powerful, and Sir Mazarin is cunning but I'd rather bandy words with those two than juggle fire with the late Sir Mordaunt."

"Ah!" said Porthos. "How pleasant it is to say the late Sir Mordaunt." And the two set off on the road to Paris without wasting a moment, followed by Mousqueton who was too hot inside a quarter of an hour after having been too cold all night long.

249 The Return

Athos and Aramis followed the route outlined for them by d'Artagnan, travelling as rapidly as they could. It seemed to them that if they might be arrested, they'd be better off if it happened near Paris. Every evening, afraid of being taken during the night, they traced the agreed recognition sign on a wall or a window – but every morning they awoke still free, to their continuing surprise. As they approached Paris, the great events they'd witnessed in England, culminating in the execution of her king, began to fade like last night's dreams, while the events that had taken place in Paris and the provinces in their absence began to seem real and urgent. During their six weeks' absence, so many little things had happened that together they almost constituted a single great event. The Parisians, when they awoke to find themselves without queen regent or king, had been dismayed by their departure, and the absence of Mazarin, so long desired, didn't make up for the loss of the royal fugitives. The first emotion the Parisians felt when they learned of the flight to Saint-Germain, an escape we allowed our readers to witness, was like the terror felt by a child when he awakens in the night to find himself alone. Even the Parliament was moved, and it decided to send a deputation to the queen to ask her not to deprive Paris of her royal presence. But the queen was still under the double influence of the triumph at Lens and the pride of having so well executed their escape. The deputation was not only denied the honour of seeing her, they were kept waiting in the street, where the chancellor – that same Chancellor Séguier whom we saw in the first book in this series stubbornly pursuing a letter right into the queen's corset – presented the deputies with the Court's ultimatum that stated that if parliament didn't humble itself by repealing all the resolutions to which the throne objected, then on the following day Paris would find itself besieged. At that very moment, in preparation for this siege, Gaston, the Duke of Orléans, had occupied the bridge to Saint-Cloud, while Sir Prince, emboldened by his victory at Lens, garrisoned Charenton and Saint-Denis. Unfortunately for the Court that could have won considerable support with a moderate response, this threatening reply produced an effect opposite to what was intended. It wounded parliament in their pride, and, feeling themselves supported by the citizenry after the release of Broussel had shown their strength, they replied to this ultimatum with a statement that since Cardinal Mazarin was the notorious source of all these conflicts, he was therefore declared an Enemy of the State, and commanded to leave the Court that very day and all of France within a week – after which, if he didn't obey, he was fair game for attack by every subject of the crown. This aggressive response that the Court never expected, put both the Parisians and Mazarin beyond what could be resolved by the law. It only remained to be seen which side would prevail by force, the Parliament or the Court. The Court began preparations for attack, and Paris for defence. The citizens had begun undertaking the work that's always theirs in times of unrest that is, erecting barricades and tearing up the streets, when they saw aid arrive in the persons of the Prince de Conti, brother of the Prince de Condé, and of the Duke Longueville, Condé's brother-in-law, both escorted by the coadjutor. The citizens were encouraged by both the leadership of two Princes of the Blood and by the strength of their numbers. By this time, it was January 10, 1649. After a heated debate among the rebel princes, the Prince de Conti was named generalissimo of the King's Armies of Paris, with the Dukes of Elbeuf and Bouillon and Marshall de La Mothe as his lieutenant generals. The Duke Longueville, without office or title, had to content himself with assisting his brother-in-law the Prince de Conti. As for Sir Beaufort, he arrived from the Vendômois, bringing his haughty demeanour, his long, shining hair, and that popularity with the common Parisians that earned him the title of King of the Markets. The Parisian army quickly organised itself with that speed the bourgeois could show when some strong feeling prompted them to adopt the guise of soldiers. On the 19th, this improvised army had attempted a sortie beyond the walls, more to announce their existence rather than for any serious purpose. They marched beneath a flag bearing this singular motto:

We Seek our King

The last few days of January were occupied in petty raids outside the city that had no result but the theft of some livestock and the burning of a few houses. It was on February 1 that our four companions disembarked at Boulogne and began their journey toward Paris in two pairs, each taking its own route. Athos and Aramis, toward the end of the fourth day, found themselves skirting Nanterre to avoid encountering anyone from the queen's faction. Athos was impatient with such ignoble precautions but Aramis had tactfully pointed out to him that they had no right to be reckless given the mission they were charged with by King Charles on his scaffold, a mission supreme and sacred that could only be discharged at the feet of Queen Henriette. Athos conceded the point. The travellers found the capital's outer Faubourg guarded and under arms. At the city gate the sentry refused to let the two gentlemen proceed further and called for his sergeant. The sergeant came out right away, puffed up with the officious pride of the citizen playing soldier. "Who might you be, Gentlemen?" he demanded.

"Two gentlemen," Athos replied.

"Where do you come from?"

"From London," said Aramis.

"What are you doing coming to Paris?"

"Completing a mission for Her Majesty the Queen of England."

"Oh! Today everyone is the Queen of England's friend!" replied the sergeant. "I've got three other gentlemen inside with passes to enter to visit Her Majesty. Where are your passes?"

"We don't have any."

"What? You don't have any!"

"No, we've just arrived from England, as we told you. We know nothing of the current state of political affairs, having left Paris before the king's departure."

"Ha!" said the sergeant, with a knowing look. "You're Mazarinists who want to sneak in to spy on us."

"My good man," said Athos, who till now had been letting Aramis do the talking, "if we were Mazarinists, we'd have every pass possible, all stamped and correct. In your situation, believe me, it's those whose papers are perfectly in order of whom you should be most suspicious."

"Go into the guardhouse," said the sergeant. "You can tell your story to the post commander."

He gestured to the sentry who stepped aside; the sergeant entered first, and the two gentlemen followed him into the guardhouse. The guardhouse was packed with bourgeois and labourers; some played cards, others drank and danced. In one corner, almost out of sight, were the three gentlemen the sergeant had said had already entered, and who were waiting while the commander reviewed their passes. That officer occupied the next room, his high rank and importance earning him a chamber to himself. The first activity upon the entry of the newcomers was, from opposite sides of the guardroom, a quick and inquiring look at each other from both groups of gentlemen. Those first to enter were wrapped in long cloaks and hidden by collars and cowls; one of them, the shortest of the three, kept himself behind the other two. At the sergeant's announcement that the men he escorted in were probably Mazarinists, the three earlier gentlemen turned their heads and paid closer attention. The shortest of the three took a step backward further into the shadows. Hearing the declaration that the newcomers had no passes, the unanimous opinion of the guards on hand seemed to be that they should be denied entry. "On the contrary," said Athos, "since I can see we're dealing with reasonable people, I think it quite likely we will be allowed to enter. It will be easy enough to send our names in to Her Majesty the Queen of England, and if she deigns to recognise us, it won't inconvenience you in the least to let us pass."

At that these words the short gentleman in the shadows started with surprise. He pulled his collar up even higher but this knocked off his hat; he bent down, grabbed it, and quickly replaced it on his head. "Good God!" said Aramis, nudging Athos with his elbow. "Did you see that?"

"What?" asked Athos.

"The face of the shortest of those three gentlemen?"

"No."

"It looked to me like – but that's impossible ...!"

At that moment the sergeant, who had gone into the officer's chamber to consult with his commander, came out, beckoned to the three gentlemen, and gave them some papers. "These passes are in order," he said, "and you may enter, Gentlemen."

The trio nodded, and hastened to take advantage of the opening that, upon the order of the sergeant, appeared before them. Aramis followed them with his eyes, and when the shortest of them went by, he gripped Athos's hand. "What is it, old friend?" the latter asked.

"I ... I could almost swear..." Then, addressing the sergeant, he said, "Tell me, Sir, do you know the three gentlemen who just passed through?"

"Only by the names on their passes, of Gentlemen Flamarens, Châtillon, and Bruy, three gentleman Frondeurs on their way to rejoin the Duke Longueville."

"How strange," said Aramis, speaking mainly to himself. "I thought I recognised the short one as Mazarin himself."

The sergeant burst out laughing. "Him, to come in here at the risk of being hanged? Not likely!"

"Ah!" said Aramis. "I may have been mistaken; I don't have the infallible eye of d'Artagnan."

"Who speaks the name of d'Artagnan?" demanded the commanding officer who just then appeared on the threshold of his chamber.

"Oh!" blurted Grimaud, his eyes widening.

"What?" asked Aramis and Athos at the same time.

"Planchet!" replied Grimaud. "Planchet in an officer's collar!"

"Gentlemen de La Fère and d'Herblay, returned to Paris!" cried the officer. "What joy! No doubt you've come to join the party of the princes!"

"As you see, my dear Planchet," said Aramis while Athos smiled to see how high the old comrade of Mousqueton, Bazin, and Grimaud had risen in the ranks of the citizen army.

"And Sir d'Artagnan, whom I just heard you mention, Sir d'Herblay, dare I ask if you have news of him?"

"We parted from him four days ago, my dear friend, and were under the impression he would precede us to Paris."

"No, Sir, I'm sure he hasn't returned to the capital. Perhaps he went instead to Saint-Germain."

"I don't think so, as we're supposed to meet him at the Hôtel de La Chevrete."

"I just passed by there today."

"And the lovely Madeleine had no news of him?" asked Aramis with a smile.

"No, Sir, and I don't mind telling you she seemed anxious about it."

"In fact, we moved quickly, and didn't lose any time getting here," said Aramis. "So, if you'll permit me, Athos, I'll forego further questions about our friend, and pay my compliments to Officer Planchet."

"Oh, Sir Knight!" said Planchet, bowing.

"Lieutenant?" said Aramis.

"Lieutenant, and with the promise to be a captain."

"And very handsome you look," said Aramis. "How did all these honours come about?"

"Well, Gentlemen, do you recall that it was me who rescued Sir Rochefort?"

"Yes, for the love of God! He told us himself."

"Thanks to that deed I was nearly hanged by Mazarin that naturally made me very popular with the people."

"And thanks to that popularity, you've become..."

"No, thanks to something even better. You know, Gentlemen that I served in the Piedmont Regiment, where I rose to the rank of sergeant."

"Yes."

"Well, one day, when no one could get the ranks of citizen militia to line up, some putting their left foot forward and the others their right, I succeeded in getting them to all march together. They made me a drill officer on the spot."

"That explains it," said Aramis.

"So," said Athos, "you have a crowd of nobles on your side now?"

"Indeed! To lead us as you've no doubt heard, we've Sir Prince de Conti, the Duke Longueville, Sir Duke Beaufort, the Duke Elbeuf, the Duke Bouillon, plus the Duke Chevreuse, Sir Brissac, the Marshall of La Mothe, Sir Luynes, the Marquis de Vitry, the Prince de Marcillac, Marquis de Noirmoutiers, Count Fiesque, Marquis de Laigues, Count Montresor, Marquis de Sevine, and others I think."

"And Sir Raoul de Bragelonne?" asked Athos, voice full of emotion. "D'Artagnan told me he'd commended him to your care upon parting, my good Planchet."

"He did, Sir Count, as if Raoul was his own son, so I haven't lost sight of him for a moment."

"Then," Athos said in a voice edged with joy, "he is well? No accident has befallen him?"

"None, Sir."

"And he's residing...?"

"At the Grand Charlemagne, as always."

"How does he pass the time?"

"Sometimes with the Queen of England, sometimes with Madam de Chevreuse. He and the Count Guiche never leave one another's sides."

"Thank you, Planchet, thank you!" said Athos, offering him his hand.

"Oh, Sir Count!" said Planchet, taking his hand and shaking it.

"Really, Count! Familiarity with an old lackey?" said Aramis in a low voice. "What are you thinking?"

"But, friend," said Athos, "he gives me news of Raoul."

"And now, Gentlemen," asked Planchet, who'd missed the exchange, "What are your intentions?"

"To re-enter Paris, if you give us your permission, my dear Sir Planchet," said Athos.

"I? Grant permission to you! You're mocking me, Sir Count, for I'm entirely at your service."

And he bowed. Then, turning to his men, "Let these gentlemen pass," he said. "I know them – they're friends of Sir Beaufort."

"Long live Sir Beaufort!" cried every voice in the post, and a way was opened for Athos and Aramis.

The sergeant approached Planchet and whispered, "What! Without a passport?"

"Even without a passport," said Planchet.

"Take care, Captain," continued the sergeant, addressing Planchet by the promised title, "take care – one of the three men who passed through just now warned me in a low voice to be wary of these gentlemen."

"But I," said Planchet majestically, "I know them personally, and will answer for them."

Having said this, he then shook hands with Grimaud, who seemed honoured by the attention. "Au revoir, Captain," said Aramis in his bantering tone. "If we run into trouble, we'll just drop your name to get us out of it."

"Sir," said Planchet, "in this as in all things, I am your servant."

"That fellow has wit, and plenty of it," said Aramis as he mounted his horse.

"And how could he not?" said Athos, mounting his own steed. "After years of brushing d'Artagnan's hat, some brains were bound to rub off on him."

250 The Ambassadors

The two friends immediately left the guardhouse, following the slope of the street down into Paris but upon arriving at the foot of the hill, they saw with astonishment that the streets had become rivers, and the squares were lakes. Following the endless rains of the month of January, the Seine had overflowed, and the river had invaded half of the capital. Athos and Aramis bravely entered the flood on their horses but soon the poor animals were in water up to their breasts, and the two gentlemen decided they'd be better off taking a boat. They hired one and ordered the lackeys to take the horses and wait for them in the markets of Les Halles. It was thus by boat that they made their way to the Louvre. By that time, it was full night, and with the light of a few pale lanterns flickering across the water from patrol boats and glittering from the steel of their crews' weapons, their challenges and replies echoing between them, Paris appeared in a new aspect that enthralled Aramis, who was always susceptible to the martial appeal of warlike scenes. They arrived at the queen's suite but were compelled to wait in the antechamber, as just then Her Majesty was giving an audience to some gentlemen who had news from England. "As do we," Athos said to the servant who'd made this announcement. "We not only have news from England, we've just come from there."

"What are your names, Gentlemen?" asked the servant.

"Sir Count La Fère and Sir Knight d'Herblay," said Aramis.

"Ah! In that case, Gentlemen," said the servant, hearing the names that the queen had so often hopefully uttered, "it's another matter entirely, and I think Her Majesty would be displeased if I delayed you even a moment. Follow me, if you will."

And he went on ahead, followed by Athos and Aramis. Arriving at the queen's chamber, he gestured to them to wait, and then opened the door. "Madam," he said, "I hope Your Majesty will pardon me for disobeying her orders when she hears I enter to announce Sir Count La Fère and the Knight d'Herblay."

At these names the queen let out a cry of joy that the two gentlemen could hear from where they waited. "Poor queen!" murmured Athos.

"Oh! Have them enter! Have them enter!" shouted the young princess as she dashed to the door. The poor child never left her mother the queen, trying by her filial attentions to help her forget the absence of her sister and two brothers. "Come in, come in, Gentlemen," she said, opening the door herself.

Athos and Aramis presented themselves. The queen was seated in an armchair, and before her stood two of the three gentlemen they'd encountered in the guard house. These were Sir Flamarens and Gaspard de Coligny, Duke Châtillon, brother of that Coligny who'd been killed seven or eight years earlier in a duel in the Place Royale – a duel over Madam de Longueville. At the announcement of the newcomers, they stepped back and anxiously exchanged a few words in low voices. "Well met, Gentlemen!" called the Queen of England, seeing that it really was Athos and Aramis. "Here you are, our faithful friends but state couriers travel even faster than you. The Court was informed of affairs in London before you reached the gates of Paris, and here are Gentlemen de Flamarens and de Châtillon come from Her Majesty Queen Anne of Austria to bring us the latest news."

Aramis and Athos looked at each other, the serenity and joy that shone from the queen's eyes filled them with surprise and dismay. "Please continue," she said, addressing Flamarens and Châtillon.

"You said that His Majesty Charles I, my august husband, was condemned to death despite the wishes of the majority of his English subjects?"

"Y-yes, Madam," stammered Châtillon.

Athos and Aramis looked at each other in even greater astonishment. “And that, led to the scaffold,” continued the queen, “at the very scaffold, my lord and king was saved by his outraged people?”

“Yes, Madam,” replied Châtillon in a voice so low the two gentlemen, though listening closely, could scarcely hear him.

The queen joined her hands in pious thanks, while her daughter wrapped her arms around her mother’s neck and embraced her, eyes overflowing with tears of joy. “Now, it only remains for us to present Your Majesty our humble respects, and withdraw,” said Châtillon who seemed abashed, and flushed when he met Athos’s fixed and piercing gaze.

“Not just yet, Gentlemen,” said the queen, detaining them with a gesture. “A moment, please! For here are Gentlemen de La Fère and d’Herblay, who, as you may have heard, have just come from London, and who might, as eyewitnesses, know details you haven’t yet heard. You could share these new details with my royal sister the queen. Speak, Gentlemen, speak – I’m listening. Don’t hide anything from me or spare me a single detail. So long as His Majesty still lives, and his royal honour is safe, nothing else can bother me.”

Athos turned pale and clutched at his heart. “What is it?” said the queen, who saw this movement and his pallor. “Tell me, Sir, I beg you.”

“Pardon me, Madam,” said Athos, “but I don’t wish to add anything to these gentlemen’s account before giving them the chance to acknowledge that perhaps they were mistaken.”

“Mistaken!” gasped the queen, nearly choking. “Mistaken! What’s happened? Oh, my God!”

“Sir,” said Flamarens to Athos, “if we are mistaken, the error comes from Queen Anne of Austria, and you wouldn’t presume, I suppose, to contradict her. You wouldn’t be so bold as to give Her Majesty the lie.”

“From the queen, sir?” replied Athos in his calm and sonorous voice.

“Yes,” murmured Flamarens, dropping his gaze.

Athos sighed sadly. “Would it not come instead from the man who accompanied you, and whom we saw with you at the guardhouse of the Barrière du Roule?” said Aramis, with his mocking politeness.

“For, unless we’re mistaken, the Count La Fère and I, there were three of you when you entered Paris.”

Châtillon and Flamarens winced. “Oh, explain yourself, Count!” cried the queen, her anguish growing from moment to moment. “On your forehead I read despair, your hands tremble, your mouth hesitates to announce some terrible news .... Oh, my God, my God! What’s happened?”

“Dear Lord, have pity on us!” said the young princess, falling on her knees beside her mother.

“Sir,” said Châtillon, “if you bear deathly news, no true man would have the cruelty to announce such news to the queen.”

Aramis approached Châtillon almost near enough to touch him. “Sir,” he said, lips tight and eyes glinting, “I’m sure you wouldn’t presume to try to tell Sir Count La Fère and myself what we can and cannot say here. Or would you?”

During this brief altercation, Athos, still with his head bowed and his hand on his heart, approached the queen and said, in a voice choked with emotion, “Madam, those of royal blood, who by their nature are superior to other men, have been granted hearts able to bear greater misfortunes than those of common people, for their hearts partake of their superiority. Therefore, it seems to me we must not act toward a great queen like Your Majesty as we would toward a woman of our own lesser state. O Queen, fated to join the martyrs of the earth, these tokens are the result of the mission with which you honoured us.”

And Athos, kneeling before the trembling, paralysed queen, drew from within his doublet, in its original case, the Order set in diamonds the queen had given to Lord Winter upon his departure, and the wedding ring which, before his death, Charles had entrusted to Aramis; since Athos had received them, these objects had never left his side. He opened the case and handed it to the queen with a mute and profound sorrow. The queen reached out her hand, took up the ring, brought it convulsively to her lips, and then without even a sigh or a sob, she turned pale, half rose, and fell unconscious into the arms of her daughter and her ladies. Athos kissed the hem of the dress of the unlucky widow, and then stood tall with a majesty that impressed all who saw him. “I, the Count La Fère,” he said, “a gentleman who has never lied, swear before God first, and this poor queen second, that all that it was possible to do to save the king we did, on the soil of England. Now, Knight,” he added, turning to Aramis, “let us go – our duty here is finished.”

“Not just yet,” said Aramis. “We have a message to give these two gentlemen.” And turning back to Châtillon, he said, “Sir, would you care to step out, if only for a moment, to receive the message I can’t convey in front of the queen?”

Châtillon bowed without a word as a sign of assent. Athos and Aramis went out first, followed by Châtillon and Flamarens; they crossed the antechamber silently but beyond, in the gallery, Aramis led them all to a window embrasure at the far end. Before the window he stopped, turned to the Duke Châtillon, and said, “Sir, you have permitted yourself, it seems to me, to treat us with some disrespect. This was not at all proper, especially in men who came to deliver to the queen the message of a liar.”

“Sir!” cried Châtillon.

“What have you done with Sir Bruy?” asked Aramis mockingly. “Has he gone to change his face that too closely resembled that of Sir Mazarin? We know there are a selection of Italian comedy masks in the wardrobes of the Royal Palace from Harlequin to Pantaloon.”

“I think you’re deliberately provoking us!” said Flamarens.

“Do you? Well, you’re smarter than your reputation, then.”

“Knight! Knight!” said Athos.

“Let me do this,” said Aramis, peeved. “You know very well I don’t like leaving unfinished business behind me.”

“Be it so, then, Sir,” said Châtillon, no less haughty than Aramis.

Aramis bowed. “Gentlemen,” he said, “another man than I or Sir Count La Fère would have you arrested, for we have some friends here in Paris – but we offer you a way out that avoids such concerns. Come out into the garden with us for five minutes.”

“Willingly,” said Châtillon.

“Hold on, Gentlemen,” said Flamarens. “Your offer is tempting but at the moment it’s impossible for us to accept it.”

“And why is that?” said Aramis, sarcastically. “Has spending time with Mazarin made you too cautious?”

“Oh! Listen to him, Flamarens,” said Châtillon. “Not to reply would be a stain on my honour and my name.”

“On that we agree,” said Aramis.

“But you won’t reply, nonetheless,” said Flamarens, “and I think these gentlemen will support me on this.”

Aramis shook his head in a gesture of incredible insolence. Châtillon’s eyes widened and he put his hand to his sword. “Duke,” said Flamarens, “you forget that tomorrow you’re commanding an expedition of the highest importance, one appointed by Sir Prince and approved by the queen. Until tomorrow evening you belong to them.”

“Very well – on the morning of the day after tomorrow,” said Aramis.

“The day after tomorrow,” said Châtillon. “That’s a long way off, Gentlemen.”

“I’m not the one asking for a delay,” said Aramis, “though it seems to me it might not be as long you think, if we happen to meet you on this ‘expedition.’”

“Indeed, Sir, we might meet then, and with great pleasure,” said Châtillon, “if you will take the trouble to look for us at the gates of Charenton.”

“So near, Sir? To have the honour of meeting you I’d go, not just a league or two but to the end of the world.”

“Very well! Until tomorrow, Sir.”

“I count upon it. Go, then, and rejoin your cardinal. But first swear on your honour that you won’t inform him of our return.”

“You make conditions?”

“Why not?”

“Because that’s the right of the victors, and you’ve not yet won, Gentlemen.”

“Then let’s draw and finish this now. It doesn’t matter to us who does or doesn’t command this expedition tomorrow.”

Châtillon and Flamarens looked at each other; there was so much mockery in Aramis’s words and attitude that Châtillon could barely maintain control but after a word from Flamarens he restrained himself. “All right, so be it,” he said. “Our companion, whoever he was, will be told nothing of these events. But you promise you’ll find me at Charenton tomorrow, won’t you, Sir?”

“Count on it,” said Aramis.

The four gentlemen then bowed, and this time it was Châtillon and Flamarens who led the way out of the Louvre, followed by Athos and Aramis. “Who’s all this anger for, Aramis?” asked Athos.

“By God! For those who’ve earned it.”

“What did they do to you?”

“What did they ... you mean you didn’t see it?”

“No.”

“They sneered when you swore we’d done our duty in England. Sneered! Now, either they believed it, or they didn’t; if they believed it, then they did it to insult us; and if they didn’t believe it, that’s an even worse insult, so it’s important to show them that we’re good at something. Anyway, I’m not sorry they’ve postponed our meeting until tomorrow, as I think we have an even tastier task for tonight than drawing swords.”

“What would that be?”

“What, by God? We have to detain Mazarin.”

Athos curled his lip in disdain. “Aramis, you know that sort of thing doesn’t suit me.”

“Why not?”

“It’s too much like a surprise attack or ambush.”

“Really, Athos, you’d make a pretty strange army commander; you’d insist on fighting only in broad daylight, you’d warn your adversary of the hour when you planned to attack him, and you’d be careful not to let any combat occur at night, lest you be accused of taking advantage of the darkness.”

Athos smiled. “Everyone must be true to his nature,” he said. “Besides, you don’t know the current situation, and whether arresting Mazarin would be good or bad, a travesty or a triumph.”

“Just say right out, Athos that you disapprove of my proposal.”

“No, on the contrary it sounds like good strategy, however...”

“However, what?”

“I think you shouldn’t have made those gentlemen swear to say nothing about us to Mazarin, because by doing so, you essentially commit us to doing nothing against him.”

“I’ve committed nothing to anyone, I swear. I regard myself as completely free to act. Come on, Athos, let’s go!”

“Where?”

“To find Sir Beaufort or Sir Bouillon; we’ll inform them of the matter.”

“All right but on one condition: that we start with the coadjutor. He’s a priest, an expert in matters of conscience, so we can share our secret with him.”

“Him?” said Aramis. “He’ll spoil everything, do it himself and take all the credit. Let’s go to him last.”

Athos smiled. There seemed to be something behind his smile that he was thinking but didn’t say. “Well, so be it!” he said. “Who shall we start with, then?”

“With Sir Bouillon, if you please; he’s the closest.”

“Very well but may we make another visit first?”

“What?”

“I’d like to stop by the Hôtel du Grand Charlemagne to embrace Raoul.”

“Of course! I’ll go in with you and we’ll embrace him together.” They returned to their hired boat and were rowed back to Les Halles. There they found Grimaud and Blaisois, who’d held their horses for them, and all four made their way to Rue Guénégaud. But Raoul wasn’t at his hôtel – during the day he’d received a message from Sir Prince and had departed with Olivain shortly thereafter.

The 3 Lieutenants of the Generalissimo

As they'd agreed, upon leaving the Grand Charlemagne, Athos and Aramis made their way toward the hôtel of Sir Duke Bouillon. The sky was dark, and though it was approaching the usually quiet hours of the depths of the night, the town buzzed with the myriad sounds of a city under siege. There were barricades every few yards, chains stretched from borne to borne, and a bivouac in every square; patrols met and exchanged passwords, couriers rode between the headquarters of the different commanders, while the more peaceful citizens, at their windows, had animated and anxious conversations with their more militant neighbours in the streets, who loitered with halberds on their shoulders or arquebuses on their arms. Athos and Aramis hadn't gone a hundred paces before they were stopped by the sentries at a barricade, who demanded the evening's password but they replied that they were on their way to Sir Bouillon's to bring him important news, and the militia were contented with giving them a guide who, under the pretext of accompanying them and opening the way, could keep an eye on them. This guide went before them, singing:

The brave Sir Bouillon's afflicted by the gout

This was one of the latest trio-lets, or satirical street songs, popular tracker-el with innumerable verses that mocked everyone of importance on all sides. As they neared the Hôtel de Bouillon, they passed a little troop of three equestrians who must have known all the passwords, since they rode without guide or escort. Upon reaching the next barricade they just whispered a few words that enabled them to pass, with the deference due to their apparent rank. When Athos and Aramis noticed the trio, they pulled up short. "Oh ho!" said Aramis. "Do you see that, Count?"

"Yes," said Athos.

"What do you think of those riders?"

"What do you think, Aramis?"

"I think those are our three shadows."

"Yes, I definitely recognise Sir Flamarens."

"And I, Sir Châtillon."

"Which makes the cavalier in the brown cloak..."

"None other than the cardinal."

"In person."

"But how the devil do we happen to encounter them in the neighbourhood of the Hôtel de Bouillon?" asked Aramis.

Athos smiled but said nothing. Five minutes later they were knocking on the duke's gate. The door was guarded by a sentry, as was appropriate for a superior of high rank, and a courier was posted in the courtyard, waiting to carry any orders that might be issued by the lieutenant general of Sir Prince de Conti. As the trio-let had said, the Duke Bouillon was a martyr to the gout, and was laid up in bed but despite this grave condition that had kept him out of the saddle for a month – in other words, since Paris had been under siege – he nonetheless sent word he was ready to receive Gentlemen le Count La Fère and Knight d'Herblay. The two friends were admitted into the chambers of the Duke Bouillon. The invalid was in bed in his room, surrounded by an array of the most martial décor imaginable. All around, hanging on the walls, were swords, pistols, cuirasses, and arquebuses, and one might easily think that, once he was no longer crippled by gout, Sir Bouillon would be eager to take the battle to the enemies of parliament. Meanwhile, to his great regret, he said, he was forced to keep to his bed. "Ah, Gentlemen!" he exclaimed upon seeing his two visitors and making an effort to half-rise from his bed that caused him to wince in pain. "You are fortunate men! You can go forth, ride, and fight for the cause of the people. But I, as you see, am nailed to my bed. Ah, the devil take this gout!" he said, grimacing anew. "Devil take it!"

"My Lord, we've just arrived from England," said Athos, "and our first concern upon reaching Paris was to come and get news of your health."

"Many thanks, Gentlemen, many thanks!" replied the duke. "It's bad, my health, as you can see ... devil take this gout! But you say you've come from England? And King Charles is well, from what I've just heard?"

"He is dead, My Lord," said Aramis.

"What?" said the duke, astonished.

"He died on the scaffold, condemned by the Parliament."

"Impossible!"

"We were present at his execution."

"Then what of this story from Sir Flamarens?"

"Sir Flamarens?" said Aramis.

"Yes, he was just here."

Athos smiled. "With two companions?" said he.

"Yes, with two companions," the duke replied. Then, with some anxiety, he asked, "Did you encounter them?"

"Yes, I think we passed them in the street," said Athos.

And he smiled at Aramis, who looked back in some surprise. "Devil take this gout!" hissed Sir Bouillon, apparently rather ill at ease.

"My Lord," said Athos, "it must call on all your devotion to the Parisian cause for you to continue, suffering as you're, at the head of their armies, and we greatly admire your perseverance, Sir d'Herblay and I."

"What would you have, Gentlemen? One does what one must, as you show by your own examples, so brave and devoted. It's thanks to you that my dear colleague the Duke Beaufort has his liberty and perhaps his life but one must sacrifice oneself to public affairs. And so, as you see, I do sacrifice myself – but I swear, I'm nearly at the end of my strength. My heart and my head are fine but this devilish gout is killing me, and I confess that if the Court complied with my demands – which are quite justified, since I'm only asking for an indemnity promised me by the old cardinal himself when he confiscated my principality of Sedan – yes, if I were compensated by domains of equal value, along with a back payment for the non-enjoyment of my property during the period since it was taken from me, that is, for eight years – and if the title of prince was accorded to my house, and if my brother Turenne was reinstated to his command, why, I'd retire immediately to my estates and leave the Court and the Parliament to settle things between them however they may."

"And you would be quite right, My Lord," said Athos.

"Is that your true opinion, Sir Count La Fère?"

"Absolutely."

"And you as well, Sir Knight d'Herblay?"

"Indeed."

"Well! I assure you then, Gentlemen, that in all probability that's the course I'll adopt," replied the duke. "Right now, the Court is making overtures to me, and I must decide whether to accept them. Heretofore I've rejected them but if men like you tell me I've been wrong, and moreover since this devilish gout makes it impossible for me to render any service to the Parisian cause, then by my faith, I believe I'll follow your advice and accept the proposition made to me by Sir Châtillon."

"Accept, Prince, accept," said Aramis.

"My faith, yes. I'm even sorry I didn't take it tonight ... but there's a conference tomorrow, so we'll see."

The two friends saluted the duke. "Go, Gentlemen," said the latter, "you must be very tired from your journey. Poor King Charles! But in the end, it was partly his own fault, and at least we can console ourselves that France has nothing to reproach itself for in this, and that we did everything we could to save him."

"We can bear witness to that," said Aramis, "as I'm sure Sir Mazarin will be happy to hear."

"Well, there it is! I'm glad you can provide him such a testimony. He has a good heart, the cardinal, and if he weren't a foreigner, well! The people would do him justice. Aiee! Devil take this gout!" Athos and Aramis went out, followed down the corridors by Sir Bouillon's cries; it was evident the poor duke was suffering like the damned. Arriving at the door, Aramis asked Athos, "Well! What do you think?"

"About what?"

"About Sir Bouillon, for the love of God!"

"My friend, I think I agree with that trio-let sung by our guide: the brave Sir Bouillon's afflicted by the gout."

"Quite so," said Aramis. "And that's why I didn't say a word to him about the object of our visit."

"Very prudent – it just would have given him a fresh attack. Let's go see Sir Beaufort."

And the two friends set out for the Hôtel de Vendôme. Ten o'clock was sounding as they arrived. The Hôtel de Vendôme was guarded as well as that of de Bouillon and presented just as warlike an appearance. There were sentries, couriers posted in the courtyard, stands of weapons, and horses saddled and holstered. Two riders were coming out of the gate as Athos and Aramis entered, obliging them to step their horses back to let them pass. "Oh ho, Gentlemen," said Aramis, "what a night this is for meetings. I confess that, having met so much tonight, I'll be truly dismayed if we fail to meet tomorrow."

"Oh, as to that, Sir," replied Châtillon, for it was indeed he and Flamarens who were coming out of the Duke Beaufort's gate, "I think you can rest easy on that score – for if we meet so often when we're not looking for each other, I'm sure we'll find each other when we are."

"I hope so, Sir," said Aramis.

"Me, I don't hope, I'm sure of it," said the duke.

Flamarens and Châtillon continued on their way, while Athos and Aramis entered and dismounted. They had scarcely handed their bridles to their lackeys and removed their cloaks when a man approached, peered at them by the flickering light of the lantern hung above the middle of the courtyard, gave a cry of surprise, and leaped into their arms. "Count La Fère!" said the man. "Knight d'Herblay! How do you happen to be in Paris?"

"Rochefort!" said the two friends together.

"The same! As you probably know, we just arrived from the Vendômois four or five days ago and are preparing some trouble for Mazarin. You're still with us, I presume?"

"More than ever. And the duke?"

"He's furious with the cardinal. You know our dear duke! And he's riding high – he's practically the King of Paris and can't go anywhere without being mobbed."

"Ah, good for him!" said Aramis. "But tell me, wasn't that Gentlemen de Flamarens and de Châtillon who left just now?"

"Yes, they came for an audience with the duke, coming from Mazarin, no doubt but I'm sure they found out exactly who they're dealing with here."

"I'm sure they did!" said Athos. "Could one have the honour of calling on His Highness?"

"This very moment! You know that for you he'll always be in. Follow me – I claim the honour of presenting you."

Rochefort marched ahead, and all doors were opened for him and the two friends. They found Sir Beaufort about to sit down to the table; the thousand interruptions of the evening had delayed his supper until just then but despite the gravity of that circumstance, the moment the prince heard the names Rochefort announced, he slid back his chair, rose, and eagerly advanced toward the pair.

"Ah, for the love of God!" he said. "You're always welcome, Gentlemen. You'll join me for supper, won't you? Boisjoli, notify Noirmont that I have two guests. You know Noirmont, don't you Gentlemen? He's my maître d'hôtel, the successor to Father Marteau, who baked those excellent pies you remember. Boisjoli, have him send one in, though not like the one he made for La Ramée. Thank God, we've no use tonight for rope ladders, daggers, or choke-pears!"

"My Lord," said Athos, "though we're well aware of his talents, don't bother your illustrious maître d'hôtel on our account. Tonight, with the permission of Your Highness, we just desire the honour of asking news of his health and seeing if he has orders for us."

"Oh, as to my health, it's as you see, Gentlemen, excellent. A constitution that can resist five years in Vincennes under the hospitality of Sir Chavigny can withstand anything. As for giving you orders, my faith, I swear I don't know what orders I'd give you, since there are so many others giving orders in their own names that, soon enough, I doubt I'll be giving any at all."

"Really?" said Athos. "I thought the Parliament was counting on the unity between the people's commanders."

“Ah, yes, our unity – there’s a thing of beauty. There’s no conflict with the Duke Bouillon, since he has the gout and can’t get out of bed that is one way of getting along but with Sir d’Elbeuf and his ox-like sons ... Have you heard the trio-let about the Duke d’Elbeuf, Gentlemen?”

“No, My Lord.”

“Really!” The duke began to sing:

*Sir d'Elbeuf and his beefy sons
Are awfully fierce in the Place Royale
They stomp their feet and shake their fists
Sir d'Elbeuf and his beefy sons
But comes the call to the battlefield
Their warlike bluster disappears
Sir d'Elbeuf and his beefy sons
Are awfully fierce in the Place Royale*

“But that’s not the case with the coadjutor, I hope,” said Athos.

“It’s the opposite with the coadjutor that is even worse. Lord protect us from pugnacious prelates who wear armour under their vestments! Instead of biding in his archbishopric chanting Te Deums for victories we haven’t won yet, or praying for us in our defeats, do you know what he’s done?”

“No.”

“He’s raised a regiment he’s named the Corinthian after his archbishopric and he’s appointing lieutenants and captains like a Marshal of France, and colonels like a king.”

“Yes,” said Aramis, “but when it comes to fighting, surely he stays in his episcopal palace?”

“Not in the least, my dear d’Herblay! When it’s time for battle, he fights. Now, since the death of his uncle has given him a seat in parliament, he’s everywhere at once: in parliament, in council, in battle. Of course, the Prince de Conti is the general in appearance but what an appearance that is – a hunchbacked general! Everything’s going wrong, Gentlemen, everything’s going wrong.”

“And therefore, My Lord, Your Highness is discontented?” said Athos, exchanging a look with Aramis.

“Discontented, Count? Say instead that My Highness is furious. We’ve reached the point, I don’t mind telling you, though I wouldn’t say it to others, the point where if the queen acknowledged the wrongs she’s done me, revoked my mother’s exile, and restored me to the Admiralty that belonged to my father and was promised me upon his death, well! I’d be just about ready to train some dogs to say that in France there are some thieves even greater than Sir Mazarin.”

This time it was more than a glance Athos and Aramis exchanged, it was a significant look and a smile. Now even if they hadn’t met them outside, they’d have known that Gentlemen de Châtillon and de Flamarens had been there – so they didn’t breathe a word about Mazarin’s presence in Paris. “My Lord, we are satisfied,” said Athos. “We came to visit Your Highness at this late hour with no other object than to prove our devotion, and to tell him we are at his disposal as his most loyal servants.”

“And you have proven to be my most faithful friends, Gentlemen! If I’m ever reconciled with the Court, I’ll show you, I hope, that I’ll still be a friend to you and to those gentlemen, what the devil are they called – d’Artagnan and Porthos?”

“Yes, d’Artagnan and Porthos.”

“Yes, that’s it! But most of all, you understand, to you, Count La Fère and Knight d’Herblay.”

Athos and Aramis bowed and withdrew. “My dear Athos,” said Aramis, “I do believe you consented to accompany me, God be thanked, just to teach me a lesson.”

“We’re not done, though,” said Athos. “The evening isn’t complete until we’ve seen the coadjutor.”

“Then let’s go see our archbishop,” said Aramis. And they turned toward the Île de la Cité.

As they once more approached the centre of Paris, Athos and Aramis were again blocked by the flood and had to hire a boat. It was now after eleven o’clock but everyone knew there was no wrong time to visit the coadjutor; his inexhaustible energy turned night into day and day into night. The episcopal palace rose before them out of the water, and one would have said, from the number of boats swarming around the mansion, that this wasn’t Paris but Venice. The skiffs came and went in every direction, poling into the labyrinth of the streets of the Cité, or pulling away toward the Arsenal or over to Quai Saint-Victor, as if skimming across a lake. Some of these boats were mute and mysterious but others were noisy and gleaming with lanterns. The two friends glided through this aquatic traffic and joined those approaching their destination. The ground floor of the episcopal palace was inundated but ladders had been placed against the walls, so that the chief result of the flood was that, instead of entering by the doors, they went in through the windows. In this way Athos and Aramis ended up in the prelate’s antechamber, a hall crowded with lords and lackeys, for a dozen lords were on hand awaiting their turn. “My God, Athos!” said Aramis. “Are we going to give this fop of a coadjutor the pleasure of making us wait in his antechamber?”

Athos smiled. “My friend,” he said, “we must be patient with the inconveniences of dealing with the important. Since the coadjutor’s one of the seven or eight kings reigning in Paris, naturally he’s a court.”

“Maybe so,” said Aramis, “but we’re no mere courtiers.”

“Then we’ll send in our names, and if he won’t receive us, well! We’ll leave him to his affairs and the affairs of France. It’s just a matter of finding the right lackey and slipping a half-pistole into his hand.”

“You’re right,” said Aramis, “but if I’m not mistaken ... yes, it’s him. Bazin! Over here, you clown!”

Bazin, who, resplendent in his church vestments, was just then majestically crossing the antechamber, stopped and turned, frowning, to see who was so insolent as to address him in such a manner. But as soon as he recognised Aramis the tiger became a lamb, and approaching the two gentlemen, he said, “What! It’s you, Sir Knight! You arrive just when we were most anxious about you! Oh, I’m so happy to see you again!”

“Fine, fine, Master Bazin but a truce to compliments,” said Aramis. “We’ve come to see Sir Coadjuteur, and as we’re pressed for time, we need to see him at once.”

“Of course!” said Bazin. “Right away – the waiting room is no place for lords of your standing. Only he’s locked in a secret conference right now with a Sir Bruy.”

“De Bruy!” said Athos and Aramis together.

“Yes! I’m the one who announced him, so I remember the name perfectly. Do you know him, Sir?” added Bazin, turning to Aramis.

“I believe so.”

“That’s more than I could say,” said Bazin. “He was so wrapped up in his cloak and hat that I couldn’t see his face no matter how I tried. But I’ll go in to announce you, and maybe this time I’ll get a glimpse.”

“Never mind that,” said Aramis. “We’ll give up on seeing Sir Coadjuteur tonight – isn’t that so, Athos?”

“As you like,” said the count.

“Yes, his business with Sir Bruy is far too important for us to interrupt.”

“Shall I inform the archbishop that Gentlemen had stopped by?”

“No, it isn’t worth the trouble,” said Aramis. “Let’s go, Athos.”

And the two friends marched out through the crowd of lackeys, followed by Bazin, who emphasised their importance with the effusiveness of his farewells. “Well, then?” asked Athos when he and Aramis were once more in their boat. “Do you begin to see that we would have been doing our good friends no favour by calling out the guards to arrest Sir Mazarin?”

“You are wisdom incarnate, Athos,” replied Aramis.

Discussing the matter, what particularly struck the two friends was of how little importance to the Court of France were those terrible events in England that seemed to occupy the attention of the rest of Europe. In fact, in all of Paris, except for a poor widow and a royal orphan who wept in a dark corner of the Louvre, no one seemed aware that a king called Charles I had ever existed, and that this king had just died on the scaffold. The two friends arranged to meet again at ten the next morning, for, though the night was well along, when they arrived at the door of their lodgings Aramis announced that he still had several important visits to make, and left Athos to enter alone. As ten was sounding the next morning they were reunited. For his part, Athos had been out and about since six. “Any news?” he asked.

“None – no one has seen d’Artagnan anywhere, and Porthos has yet to show himself. You?”

“Nothing.”

“The devil!” said Aramis.

“This delay isn’t natural,” said Athos. “They took the most direct route, and should have arrived before us.”

“Plus, we both know how quickly d’Artagnan travels,” added Aramis. “He’s not the man to lose any time, knowing we’re waiting for him ....”

“He was figuring, you remember, on being here by the fifth.”

“And here it is the ninth. The agreed-upon waiting period expires tonight.”

“What do you intend to do,” asked Athos, “if we have no news by tonight?”

“For the love of God! We should head out looking for them.”

“Very well,” said Athos.

“What about Raoul?” asked Aramis.

A cloud passed over the count’s expression. “I admit I’m anxious about Raoul,” he said. “He’d a message yesterday from the Prince de Condé, went to rejoin him at Saint-Cloud, and hasn’t been back.”

“Have you seen Madam de Chevreuse?”

“She wasn’t at home. And you, Aramis – I imagine you must have gone by Madam Longueville’s?”

“I did indeed.”

“Well?”

“She wasn’t at home either but at least she left the address of her new lodgings.”

“Where is that?”

“You’d never guess in a thousand tries.”

“How can I guess where she’d be at midnight? For I presume you went straight there after you left me last night. How am I supposed to guess the nighttime abode of the most lovely and energetic of all the lady Frondeurs?”

“At the Hôtel de Ville, my dear!”

“The Hotel de Ville? Has she been appointed the new Merchants’ Provost?”

“No, she’s appointed herself the Acting Queen of Paris – and since she didn’t dare establish her court in the Royal Palace or the Tuileries, she’s installed herself in the Hôtel de Ville, where at any moment she’s due to present an heir to our dear Duke Longueville.”

“You didn’t inform me she was in that condition, Aramis,” said Athos.

“Oh, really? It must have slipped my mind – I beg your pardon.”

“Now what are we going to do until tonight?” asked Athos. “It sounds like we have some time on our hands.”

“Not at all, my friend, we have our work cut out for us.”

“Really? Where?”

“Just outside Charenton, Morbleu! I hope, as promised, to meet there a certain Sir Châtillon whom I’ve long detested.”

“Why is that?”

“Because he’s the brother of a certain Sir Coligny.”

“Ah, right, I forgot – that Coligny who presumed to be your rival. He was cruelly punished for his audacity, you know and ought to be satisfied with that.”

"Yes but what would you have? It's not enough for me. I'm hot-blooded by nature; it's the only thing that's holding me back from advancement in the Church. Of course, you know, Athos that you don't have to go with me."

"Come, now," said Athos, "you're joking!"

"In that case, my dear, if you're going with me, we've no time to lose. The drums are beating, the cannons are rolling, and I saw the militia lining up for battle in front of the Hôtel de Ville. There's certainly going to be a battle beyond Charenton, as the Duke Châtillon told us yesterday."

"I would have thought," said Athos, "that last night's conferences would have changed those warlike plans."

"It will change what follows but they have to fight regardless, if only to cover for the conferences."

"Those poor people!" said Athos. "Going out to get themselves killed so Sedan can be returned to Sir Bouillon, Sir Beaufort can enjoy the Admiralty, and the coadjutor can be made a cardinal!"

"Come, now, my dear," said Aramis. "Admit you wouldn't be so concerned about this battle if it didn't look like Raoul will be mixed up in it."

"You may be right, Aramis."

"Well, then, let's go to where the fighting is – it's the best way to find d'Artagnan, Porthos, and maybe even Raoul."

"Alas!" said Athos.

"My good friend," said Aramis, "now that we're in Paris, you really must lose this habit of sighing ruefully. When it's wartime, Athos, Morbleu, go to war! Are you a man of the sword, or are you turning priest? Here, look how gloriously the militia marches by. It stirs the blood! And their captain, look there – what could be more warlike?"

"They're coming out of the Rue du Mouton – sadly appropriate for such sheep."

"But with a drummer leading the way, just like real soldiers! Look at that officer, the way he struts and swaggers!"

"Hey!" said Grimaud.

"What?" asked Athos.

"Planchet, Sir."

"Ha! Lieutenant yesterday, captain today, and doubtless a colonel tomorrow," said Aramis. "Within a week the fellow will be a Marshal of France."

"Let's ask him what's going on," said Athos.

And the two friends approached Planchet, who, prouder than ever of his new rank, deigned to explain to the gentlemen that he was ordered to take up position in the Place Royale with two hundred men, there to act as a reserve and rear guard for the Parisian army until ordered to advance on Charenton. Since Athos and Aramis were on his side, they escorted Planchet to his position. Planchet manoeuvred his men on the Place Royale very skilfully, arranging them in echelon behind a long column of militia that stretched to the Rue Saint-Antoine, awaiting the signal for battle. "This day will be a hot one," said Planchet in an aggressive tone.

"Yes, no doubt," said Aramis, "but you're a long way from the enemy."

"Oh, you'll see, Sir – we'll decrease that distance," replied a citizen soldier.

Aramis bowed, then turned toward Athos. "I don't care to park myself all day in the Place Royale with these people," he said. "What do you say to going to the front? We'll get a better view from there."

"And Sir Châtillon isn't going to come looking for you in the Place Royale, is he? Let's go forward, my friend."

"And don't you also have a couple of words to say to Sir Flamarens?"

"Friend," said Athos, "I've resolved not to draw my sword again unless it's absolutely necessary."

"And since when have you decided that?"

"Since I last drew my poniard."

"Oh, fine! Another souvenir of Sir Mordaunt. My dear, the last thing you need is to feel remorse for having killed that devil."

"Hush!" said Athos, putting a finger to his mouth with that sad smile that was unique to him. "Let us speak no more of Mordaunt – it will bring only misfortune." And Athos spurred his horse toward Charenton, skirting the Faubourg Saint-Antoine, then the valley of Fécamp that teemed with armed bourgeois. It goes without saying that Aramis was less than an arm's-length behind.

252
The Battle of Charenton

As Athos and Aramis rode forward, passing various units formed in columns on the road, they saw men in shining cuirasses bearing rusty weapons, and bright new muskets next to ancient halberds. "I think we've found the actual battlefield," said Aramis. "Do you see that cavalry unit standing there at the foot of the bridge, pistols at the ready? ... Ah, take care – horse artillery coming toward us!"

"Ah çà!" said Athos. "Where have you taken us? It looks to me like we're now in the middle of the royal army. Isn't that Sir Châtillon himself riding forward with his staff?"

And Athos put his hand on his sword, while Aramis, thinking that perhaps they had ridden beyond the Parisian lines, reached for his pistols. "Hello, Gentlemen," said the duke, pulling up. "I can see you don't know the current situation, so allow me to enlighten you. We're under truce during negotiations; Sir Prince is talking things over with the coadjutor, Sir Beaufort, and Sir Bouillon. Now, either affairs will be settled, and we'll meet another day, Knight, or they won't be settled, and we'll meet on the battlefield."

"Sir, you get right to the point," said Aramis. "Permit me to ask you one question."

"Do so, Sir."

"Where is this diplomacy taking place?"

"In Charenton itself in the second house on the right, as you go in toward Paris."

"And this conference comes as a surprise?"

"Not exactly, Gentlemen. It seems to stem from the new proposals made to the Parisians by Sir Mazarin last night."

Athos and Aramis looked at each other and laughed. They knew better than anyone what those proposals were, to whom they'd been made, and who had made them. "And this house where the diplomats are meeting," asked Athos, "it belongs to...?"

"To Sir Clanleu who commands your troops at Charenton. I say your troops, because I presume you gentlemen are Frondeurs."

"More or less," said Aramis.

"What do you mean, more or less?"

"It's hard for anyone to say what they are nowadays, as you should know better than anyone, Sir."

"We are for the king and the princes," said Athos.

"That doesn't tell me much," said Châtillon. "I mean, the king is with us, and his generals are Prince Gaston and the Prince de Condé."

"Perhaps," said Athos, "but His Majesty's true place is with us and the Princes de Conti, de Beaufort, d'Elbeuf, and de Bouillon."

"That's as may be," said Châtillon. "It's no secret that I have little sympathy for Sir Mazarin, and all my interests are in Paris; I'm in the middle of a litigation there that all my fortunes depend upon. I was just consulting with my lawyer ...."

"In Paris?"

"No, in Charenton, with Sir Viole. You may have heard his name, as he's an excellent lawyer – a bit stubborn perhaps but he's not a Member of Parliament for nothing. I'd hoped to meet him last night but our business prevented me from attending to my own affairs. But affairs must be attended to, so I took advantage of the truce, and that's how you come to see me here now."

"Sir Viole conducts his consultations in the open air?" asked Aramis, laughing.

"Indeed, Sir, and on horseback, as today he's commanding a hundred gunners for the Parliament. I paid him a visit and to do him honour, I brought with me these two small cannon at the head of which you seemed so astonished to see me. I must admit I didn't recognise him at first, wearing a long sword over his lawyer's robe and with two pistols thrust through his belt. It gives him a warlike air that would amuse you should you happen to meet him."

"If he's that curious a sight, we might take the time to go look for him," said Aramis.

"You'll have to hurry, Sir, for the conference can't go on much longer."

"And if it ends without agreement," said Athos, "are you going to try to take Charenton?"

"Those are my orders; I command the attacking troops and will do my best to succeed."

"Then, Sir," said Athos, "since you command the cavalry..."

"Pardon me! I'm the commander in chief."

"Better still! You must know all your officers, I mean all those who are of good extraction."

"I do, or nearly so."

"Be good enough to tell me whether you have under your command the Knight d'Artagnan, Lieutenant of the Musketeers."

"No, Sir, he's not among us. It's been six weeks since he departed Paris and is said to be on a mission to England."

"I knew that but I thought he was back."

"No, Sir, and as far as I know no one has seen him return. I can speak with authority on this subject as the King's Musketeers are one of our units, commanded by Sir Cambon in the absence of Sir d'Artagnan."

The two friends looked at each other. "As I feared," said Athos.

"It's strange," said Aramis.

"They must have run into trouble on the way."

"It's been eight days, and tonight the deadline expires. If no news comes tonight, then tomorrow we go looking for them."

Athos nodded, then turned back to the duke. "And Sir Bragelonne, a young man of fifteen attached to Sir Prince?" asked Athos, almost embarrassed to expose his paternal feelings before the cynical Aramis. "Has he the honour to be known to you, Sir Duke?"

"Yes, certainly," replied Châtillon. "He arrived this morning with Sir Prince – a charming young man! Is he a friend of yours, Sir Count?"

"Yes, Sir," said Athos, warmly. "So much so, that I wonder if I might see him. Is that possible?"

"Entirely possible, Sir. Just follow me and I'll escort you to headquarters."

"Whoa!" said Aramis, turning. "There's some new commotion behind us, I think."

"In fact, I see a large troop of riders approaching!" said Châtillon.

"I recognise Sir Coadjuteur under his Frondeur's hat."

"And I, Sir Beaufort with his white plumes."

"They're coming at the gallop. Sir Prince is with them. Ah! Now he's separated from them."

"They're sounding the tattoo!" cried Châtillon. "Do you hear? We must find out what's happening."

Indeed, the soldiers were running to their arms, the cavalymen were getting back into their saddles, the trumpets sounded, and the drums beat as Sir Beaufort drew his sword. On his side, Sir Prince gave the signal for recall, and those officers of the royal army who'd been visiting the Parisian troops rode toward him. "Gentlemen," said Châtillon, "the truce is over, it seems. We're going to fight. Withdraw into Charenton, as I'll be attacking shortly. Look, there's the signal from Sir Prince."

In fact, a cornet waved the standard of the prince back and forth three times. "Au revoir, Sir Knight!" cried Châtillon.

And he departed at a gallop to rejoin his escort. Athos and Aramis turned toward their side and saluted the coadjutor and Sir Beaufort as they approached. As for Sir Bouillon, at the end of the conference he'd had a terrible attack of gout and had to be carried back into Paris on a litter. In exchange the Duke d'Elbeuf, accompanied by his four sons as a staff, was roaming the ranks of the Parisian army as a marshal-at-large. Meanwhile, between Charenton and the royal army there opened a broad gap, a region emptied out as if to prepare it to receive an imminent carpet of corpses. "Truly, this Mazarin is the shame of France,” said the coadjutor as he tightened the sword belt he wore, in the fashion of the old military prelates, atop his episcopal robes. “He’s nothing but a farmer who wants to harvest all France like a crop. The realm has no hope for peace and happiness until he’s gone from it.”

“Apparently they couldn’t agree on a new colour for the coadjutor’s hat,” Aramis said behind his hand.

Sir Beaufort approached, sword waving. “Gentlemen,” he said, “diplomacy has proven useless. We proposed exile for this coward of a Mazarini but the queen was quite emblematic in her refusal. She absolutely stands by her minister, so we have but one reservoir, and that’s to congruously defeat him!”

“Hear, hear!” said the coadjutor. “Sir Beaufort speaks with all his usual eloquence.”

“Fortunately,” said Aramis, “he corrects the defects of his speech with the effects of his sword.”

“Pfah!” said the coadjutor with contempt. “He’s done precious little so far in this war, I swear.” And he drew his own sword. “Gentlemen,” he cried, “there’s the enemy coming on hard – now let’s show him he can’t have our half of this road!”

And without seeming to care whether he was supported or not, he charged off to lead the advance. His regiment that was named the Corinthian after his archbishopric, followed close behind him – and the battle was joined. For his part, Sir Beaufort sent the cavalry, under the command of Sir Noirmoutiers, toward Étampes, where they were to meet and escort in a convoy of supplies desperately needed by the Parisians. Sir Beaufort intended, as always, to support the citizens. Sir Clanleu, in command of Charenton, stood waiting with the best of his troops, prepared to resist any assault, and even, in the event the enemy was repulsed, to attempt a sortie. Within half an hour the combat was raging on all sides. The coadjutor, envious of Beaufort’s reputation for bravery, had hurled himself into the fray, and had performed marvels of courage. His true vocation, as we know, was for the sword, and he was happy whenever he could draw it from its sheath, whatever the reason. But on this occasion, if he performed well as a soldier, he did a terrible job as a commander. With seven or eight hundred men he’d launched an attack on three thousand, who maintained a disciplined formation and smashed the coadjutor’s attacking soldiers, who fell back in disorder onto the town’s ramparts. There a barrage from Clanleu’s artillery checked the advance of the royal troops, shaking them but they quickly regrouped behind a cluster of houses and a small stand of trees. Clanleu thought to seize the moment and charged the royal army at the head of two regiments – but as we said, the royalists had regrouped, and counter-charged, led by Sir Châtillon himself. This charge was so fierce and well-disciplined that Clanleu and his men were thrown back and almost enveloped. Clanleu sounded the retreat, and his troops were regaining their order as they fell back, step by step, when suddenly Clanleu fell, mortally wounded. Châtillon saw him fall and announced far and wide that he was killed that heartened the royal army, while the two regiments who’d been led out by Clanleu were completely demoralized. As a result, Clanleu’s soldiers thought only of saving themselves and regaining Charenton’s ramparts, where the coadjutor was trying to reform his own broken regiment. Suddenly a squadron of Parisian cavalry bore in on the flank of the victors, who were pursuing the fugitives’ right into the town’s entrenchments. Athos and Aramis charged at their head, Aramis with sword and pistol in his hand, Athos with his sword in its scabbard and his pistol in its holster. Athos was as calm and cool as if on parade, though his handsome and noble face was saddened at the sight of so many men slaughtering each other, sacrificed on the one hand to royal obstinacy, and on the other to the resentment of the princes. Aramis, on the other hand, was a killing machine, inflamed by fury. His eyes blazed, his lips, so finely drawn, curved in a grim smile, and his nostrils flared at the smell of blood. Every one of his sword thrusts went home, and every blow with his pistol’s pommel hit hard, dropping a wounded man trying to rejoin the fight. On the opposing side, in the ranks of the royal army, two cavaliers, one wearing a gilded cuirass, the other a simple buff coat over a blue velvet doublet, charged to the fore. The cavalier in the gilded cuirass collided with Aramis and aimed a sword-thrust at him that Aramis parried with his usual skill. “Ah, it’s you, Sir Châtillon!” cried the knight. “Greetings, I was waiting for you!”

“I hope I didn’t keep you waiting too long, Sir,” said the duke. “In any case, here I am.”

“Sir Châtillon,” said Aramis, drawing from his saddle holster a second pistol which he’d reserved for this contingency, “if you’ve already emptied your pistol, I think you might be a dead man.”

“But I haven’t, thank God!” said Châtillon.

And the duke, raising his pistol at Aramis, cocked it and fired. But Aramis tilted his head just as he saw the duke pull the trigger, and the ball passed over him. Aramis shook his head. “You missed me. But by God, I won’t miss you.”

“If I give you the chance!” roared Châtillon, spurring his horse into Aramis’s and raising his sword high.

Aramis awaited his moment with the terrible smile that was peculiar to him at such times. Athos, seeing Châtillon closing with Aramis like lightning, opened his mouth to cry, “Shoot!” just as the pistol was fired. Châtillon threw his arms wide and fell back on his horse’s crupper. The ball had entered his chest just above the edge of his cuirass. “I’m dead!” murmured the duke.

And he slid from his horse to the ground. “Ah, Sir, I warned you, and now I’m sorry I kept my word so well!” said Aramis. “Is there anything I can do for you?”

Châtillon beckoned him with a gesture, and Aramis was preparing to dismount, when suddenly he was struck hard in the side. It was a sword thrust but his own cuirass turned the blade. He swiftly turned and seized his attacker by the wrist, and then cried out, at the same time as Athos: “Raoul!”

The young man simultaneously recognised the face of the Knight d’Herblay and the voice of his father and dropped his sword. Several Parisian cavalrymen closed in on Raoul but Aramis covered him with his rapier. “This man is my prisoner! Ride on!” he cried.

Athos, meanwhile, grabbed his son’s horse by the bridle and drew it out of the mêlée. At the same time Sir Prince, supporting Sir Châtillon’s advance, appeared in the fray, easily recognisable by his shining eagle’s eye and shrewd and skilful attacks. Seeing him, the regiment of the Archbishop of Corinth that despite his efforts he hadn’t been able to regroup, turned and routed, fleeing through the Parisian cavalry into Charenton that they ran through without stopping. The coadjutor, carried on by the general retreat, passed near Athos, Aramis, and Raoul. “Alas!” said the jealous Aramis who couldn’t resist enjoying the embarrassment of the coadjutor. “But in your capacity as archbishop, My Lord, you must recognise the aptness of the Scriptures.”

“And what the devil do the Scriptures have to do with what’s happening here?” asked the coadjutor.

“Why, Sir Prince is treating you today as Saint Paul did the first of the Corinthians.”

“Say, now!” said Athos. “That’s not a bad joke but we have no time for such witticisms. Onward, onward – or rather backward, for it looks to me like the Frondeurs have lost the battle.”

“It’s all the same to me!” said Aramis. “I just came here to meet Sir Châtillon. And meet him I did, so I’m content – a duel with a Châtillon, now, that’s something!”

“Plus, you took a prisoner,” said Athos, indicating Raoul.

And the three cavaliers went on their way at a gallop. The young man had been overcome by joy when he’d found his father. They rode as close as they could, the young man’s left hand in Athos’s right. Once they were clear of the battlefield, Athos asked the young man, “What’re you doing in the midst of that mêlée? That’s not where you belonged, it seems to me and you’re not armed for it.”

“I wasn’t supposed to be in the fight today, Sir. I was sent as a courier to the cardinal, and was heading toward Rueil, when I saw Sir Châtillon ride to the charge, and was moved to charge along with him. On the way he told me that two cavaliers of the Parisian army were looking for me, and one was named the Count La Fère.”

“What? You knew we were there but still tried to kill your friend the knight?”

“I didn’t recognise the knight all armoured for war,” said Raoul, colouring, “though I should have known him by his coolness and skill.”

“Thanks for the compliment, my young friend,” said Aramis, “and it’s clear where you learned your manners. But you say you were going to Rueil?”

“Yes.”

“To the cardinal?”

“Yes, Sir. I have a dispatch from Sir Prince for His Eminence.”

“Then you must take it to him,” said Athos.

“Not so fast with the chivalry, Count. What the devil! Our fate, and more importantly the fate of our friends, may be in this dispatch.”

“But this young man must not fail in his duty,” said Athos.

“First of all, Count, this young man is a prisoner, don’t forget. This is all in accord with the rules of war. The loser doesn’t get to dictate terms to the victor. Give me this dispatch, Raoul.”

Raoul hesitated, looking toward Athos for guidance. “Give him the dispatch, Raoul,” said Athos. “You are the prisoner of the Knight d’Herblay.”

Raoul gave up the dispatch with some reluctance. Aramis, less scrupulous than the Count La Fère, took the dispatch and opened it, looked it over, and handed it to Athos, saying, “You’re a believer, Athos – read this letter, and you’ll see in it something that Providence thought we should know.” Athos frowned but the idea that the letter might have something to say about d’Artagnan persuaded him to overcome his distaste and read it. What he read was as follows:

My Lord, in order to reinforce Sir Comminges’s guards, I send to you this evening the ten men you requested. They are picked men, soldiers quite capable of restraining that dangerous duo now in Your Eminence’s custody.

“Oh ho!” said Athos.

“Well?” said Aramis. “And what dangerous duo might this be, that needs ten men added to those of Comminges to restrain them? Who could that be but d’Artagnan and Porthos?”

“We’ll spend the rest of the day searching Paris for them,” said Athos, “but if we have no news by nightfall we take the road to Picardy, and I’ll answer for it that, given d’Artagnan’s quick mind, we’ll soon know if we’re on the right track.”

“Search Paris we shall then, starting with Planchet, who ought to know if his old master is in town.”

“Ah, poor Planchet! You speak of him so lightly, Aramis, when he was probably massacred in today’s fiasco. All these belligerent bourgeois were probably cut down like wheat.”

As this was all too likely, the two friends were anxious as they re-entered Paris through the Porte du Temple and made their way to the Place Royale to learn the fate of that poor militia. But to their surprise they found the whole unit, soldiers and captain, still drinking and dicing in the Place Royale, while their families, who’d heard the sound of cannon toward Charenton, probably despaired of their lives. Athos and Aramis inquired once again with Planchet but he’d heard nothing of d’Artagnan, and told them he couldn’t leave his post without orders from his superiors. At five o’clock they were released to go home, where they told everyone they were returning from the battle, though they’d never been out of sight of the bronze equestrian statue of Louis XIII in the Place Royale. “A thousand thunders!” said Planchet, returning to his shop in the Rue des Lombards. “We got our arses kicked today! I’ll never get over it.”

253
The Road to Picardy

Athos and Aramis were safe in Paris, and knew very well that as soon as they set foot outside the city walls they were in great danger – but what was danger to such men as these? Instinctively, they felt that the climax of this second Odyssey was drawing near, and this was no time to hang back and give less than their all. Besides, Paris was by no means a tranquil refuge. Provisions were beginning to run short, riots were breaking out, and when one of the Prince de Conti’s generals felt the need to assert himself, putting down a small riot gave him the opportunity. Sir Beaufort had taken advantage of one of these riots to plunder the personal library of Sir Mazarin – for money, he said, to buy food for the suffering people. Athos and Aramis left Paris during this disturbance that took place on the evening of the same day the Parisians were beaten at Charenton. They left behind a Paris in misery, stalked by famine, plagued by fear, and divided into rival factions. As Parisians and Frondeurs, they expected to find the same misery, fears, and intrigues in the enemy camp. But on their way to Saint-Denis, they were surprised to hear that in Saint-Germain the Court was laughing, singing, and carrying on happily. The two gentlemen took the back roads, at first to avoid the Cardinalists while they were in the Île-de-France, and later to avoid the provincial Frondeurs once they passed into Normandy, where they would have been brought before Sir Longueville, who would then decide whether they should be treated as friends or enemies. Once they’d avoided these two perils, they rejoined the main road from Boulogne to Abbeville, following it step by step, trace by trace. For a while they were empty-handed; several innkeepers had been interrogated without yielding so much as a clue, when in Montreuil Athos’s sensitive fingers detected something rough on a tavern table. Lifting the tablecloth, he found beneath it the following letters deeply incised with the edge of a blade:

Port ... d’Art ... 2 February.

“Good news,” said Athos, showing the inscription to Aramis. “We’d planned to stay here tonight but now that we have some evidence, let’s continue.”

They remounted their horses and rode to Abbeville. There they were stymied by the city’s large number of inns. They could hardly visit them all – how could they guess in which one their friends had stayed?

“Believe me, Athos,” said Aramis, “we’re not going to find anything at Abbeville. If we’re stumped by which inn to choose, our friends would have been the same. If it was only Porthos we were after, well, Porthos would have picked the most magnificent hôtel, and we’d be sure to find traces of his passage. But d’Artagnan has no such weakness, and though Porthos would plead that he was dying of hunger, d’Artagnan would press on, inexorable as fate. We’ll have to seek for him elsewhere.”

They continued on their way but found nothing more. This was the most distressing and tedious task ever undertaken by Athos and Aramis, and without the triple motivation of honour, friendship, and gratitude to drive them, our two travellers would soon have given up looking for tracks, questioning passers-by, searching for signs, and examining every face. Their search brought them to Péronne. Athos was beginning to despair; his noble and sensitive nature blamed himself for the dilemma in which he and Aramis found themselves. He must have missed something obvious – no doubt they hadn’t pressed their questions persistently enough, or pursued their investigations cleverly enough. They were ready to leave the town and turn back the way they had come, when, just inside the city gates, on a white wall at a street corner near the ramparts, Athos spotted something. It was a drawing in black as if made with a clinker, a childish sketch depicting two cavaliers galloping in a frenzy, one of whom held up a sign on which was written in Spanish, "They're after us."

"Ah ha!" said Athos. "That's as clear as day. Pursued though he was, d'Artagnan paused here for five minutes and put his time to good use. This shows that their pursuers couldn't have been too close behind them; maybe they got away."

Aramis shook his head. "If they'd escaped, we would have caught up with them by now, or at least heard of them."

"You're right, Aramis. Onward!"

The anxiety and impatience of the two gentlemen was now beyond description. The anxiety was in the tender and generous heart of Athos, the impatience in the nervous spirit of Aramis, so easily distraught. They galloped for three or four hours with the frenzy of the two cavaliers on the mural. Suddenly, in a narrow gorge between two steep cliffs, they found the road half blocked by an enormous boulder. Its point of origin could be seen halfway up the slope, where a fresh hole in the cliff face showed where it had been pried out. The size and mass of the thing proved that it would have taken the arm of a giant like Enceladus or Briareus to move it. Aramis stopped. "This is clear enough!" he said, looking at the boulder. "If Ajax of Telamon hasn't passed here, then it must have been Porthos. Count, let's examine this prodigious rock."

They dismounted and went to look. The boulder had clearly been placed to bar the road to equestrians but there had evidently been enough riders in pursuit to shift it partway to the side. The two travellers examined every inch of the boulder they could see but found nothing of interest. They called Blaisois and Grimaud to help, and between the four of them, they were able to roll it enough to expose its underside. There they found inscribed, "We're pursued by eight light horse. If we reach Compiegne, we'll stop at the Peacock and Crown; the host is a friend."

"Positive news at last, and now we have a course to follow," said Athos. "On to the Peacock and Crown!"

"Yes," said Aramis, "but if we actually intend to arrive there, we'd better rest the horses first – they're nearly done in."

Aramis was right. They stopped at the next hostel; each horse was given a double ration of oats soaked in honey, allowed three hours to rest, and then they set out again. The men themselves were staggering with fatigue but hope sustained them. Six hours later, Athos and Aramis entered Compiegne and asked directions to the Peacock and Crown. They were shown to an inn with a sign representing the god Pan with a crown on his head. The two friends dismounted from the horses without pausing to puzzle out the meaning of the sign that at any other time Aramis would have criticized. They found the inn's honest host, a man as broad and bald as a Chinese Buddha, and asked if recently he'd had two gentlemen lodgers who'd been pursued by light horse. The host opened a chest and drew out a broken rapier without saying a word. "Do you recognise this?" he said.

Athos knew it at a glance. "That's d'Artagnan's sword," he said.

"The larger man or the smaller?" asked the host.

"The smaller," Athos replied.

"I see you are friends of those gentlemen."

"Well! What happened to them?"

"They came into my courtyard on dying horses but before they had time to shut the gate eight light horse cavalrymen came in after them."

"Eight!" said Aramis. "I'm astounded that men of the stature and ability of d'Artagnan and Porthos could be arrested by only eight men."

"No doubt, Sir, and these eight men would have failed if they hadn't been reinforced by twenty soldiers from the Royal Italian Regiment that is garrisoned in this town. Your friends were literally overwhelmed by numbers."

"Arrested!" said Athos. "Do you know on what grounds?"

"No, Sir, they're taken away at once, and had time to say nothing. Only once they were gone, I found this broken sword on the battlefield while helping to pick up the two dead and five or six wounded."

"And the two captives," asked Aramis, "were they injured at all?"

"No, Sir, I don't think so."

"Well, that's some consolation," Aramis said.

"And do you know where they were taken?" asked Athos.

"Toward Louvres."

"Let's leave Blaisois and Grimaud here," said Athos. "They can return tomorrow to Paris with the horses that in any event have had it for today. We can continue by post-horse."

"Post-horse it is," said Aramis.

They sent for the hired horses. While they were waiting, the two friends took a quick meal; they hoped, if they learned anything at Louvres, to be able to follow it up immediately. They arrived at Louvres, where there was only one inn that served Ratafia, that famous local liqueur whose reputation survives even today. "Let's look around," said Athos. "D'Artagnan won't have missed the opportunity to ask to be allowed a glass of Ratafia, and in the process leave us a clue."

They entered, stepped up to the counter, and asked for two glasses of the local liqueur, hoping that d'Artagnan and Porthos had done the same. The counter of the bar was covered with tinplate, one part of which was marred by scratches made by the prong of a buckle: "Rueil. D."

"They're at Rueil!" said Aramis who was the first to spot the inscription.

"Then let's go to Rueil," said Athos.

"That's stepping into the jaws of the wolf," said Aramis. "Rueil is the cardinal's headquarters."

"If I were as much Jonah's friend as I'm D'Artagnan's," said Athos, "I'd have followed him into the belly of the whale – and you would too, Aramis."

"Decidedly, my dear Count, I think you make me better than I am. If I were alone, I'm not at all sure I'd go to Rueil without first taking a number of precautions – but where you go, I go as well."

They got fresh horses and set out for Rueil. Athos, without knowing it, had given Aramis the best advice they could follow. The deputies of parliament had just arrived at Rueil for those famous conferences that were to last for three weeks, resulting in the Lame Peace that was later broken when Sir Prince was arrested. So, the town of Rueil was crowded with Parisians: advocates, presidents, councillors, and parliamentarians of all sorts, jostling against, from the Court, any number of gentlemen, officers, and guards; it was easy, in all that confusion, to remain as anonymous as one liked. Besides, the conferences were occurring under truce, and arresting two gentlemen at that moment, even if they were prominent Frondeurs, would have violated the laws of diplomacy. The two friends thought that everyone would be as concerned with their problems as they were, so they mingled with both sides, expecting to hear something about d'Artagnan and Porthos but all they heard was talk about articles and amendments. Athos was in favour of going straight to the prime minister. "My friend," said Aramis, "that's a fine idea, except for the fact that our safety lies in our obscurity. If we draw attention to ourselves, we'll immediately join our friends in the depths of some dark dungeon where not even the Devil could get us out. Let's find them, by all means but on purpose, not by accident. They were arrested at Compiegne, and certainly brought to Rueil, as we confirmed at Louvres; once at Rueil, they would have been interrogated by the cardinal, who would then either hold them nearby under guard or send them on to Saint-Germain. They're not in the Bastille, because that's in the hands of the Frondeurs with Broussel's son as its governor. And they didn't execute them, as the death of d'Artagnan would make a big noise. As to Porthos, I think he's as immortal as God, though less patient. So let's not despair, be patient ourselves, and wait here at Rueil, for I'm convinced they're being held somewhere nearby. But what's wrong? You've turned pale!"

"I just remembered," said Athos, in a voice that almost trembled, "that when this château was the country headquarters of Sir Richelieu he equipped it with some frightful oubliettes, some prison-pits..."

"Not to worry," said Aramis. "Sir Richelieu was a nobleman, our equal in birth and our superior in position. He could, like the king, tap the head of even the greatest grands, and shake those heads on their shoulders. But Sir Mazarin is a peasant who at best can have us taken by the collar like a policeman. Believe me, d'Artagnan and Porthos are here at Rueil somewhere, alive and well kept."

"In that case," said Athos, "we should go to the coadjutor and get official credentials for the conference, so we can enter the château itself."

"And mingle with all those frightful Men of the Robe? What are you thinking, my dear? Do you believe we'd hear a single word about where d'Artagnan and Porthos are being held? No, I think we need to find some other means."

"Well!" said Athos. "In that case I return to my first thought that is that the best means is to be open and direct. I'll go not to Mazarin but to the queen, and I'll say, 'Madam, release to us your two good servants and our two good friends.'"

Aramis shook his head. "As a last resort that's always there, Athos but believe me, don't try it unless you have to. It will still be available if needed. In the meantime, let's continue our investigations."

Thus, they continued their search, and learned many things under a thousand pretexts, each more ingenious than the last, and spoke to so many people, that at last they found a light horse cavalryman who admitted he was one of the troop who'd escorted d'Artagnan and Porthos from Compiegne to Rueil. With the testimony of this light horseman, they were finally certain that they were in the right town. Athos kept coming back to his idea of an audience with the queen. "To see the queen," said Aramis, "you must first see the cardinal, and as soon as you see the cardinal, mark what I say to you, Athos, we will be reunited with our friends but not in a way we'll enjoy. And I confess, that's a method of reunion I'd prefer to avoid. Let's keep our liberty so we have freedom to act."

"I'm determined to see the queen," said Athos.

"Very well, my friend but if you're set on this madness, warn me, I beg you, a day in advance."

"Why is that?"

"So, I can take advantage of the warning to make a trip to Paris."

"To see who?"

"Dame! How do I know? Probably Madam de Longueville; she's all-powerful there, and will help me. Just make sure you find a way to inform me that you've been arrested, and I'll do my best to return."

"Why not risk the arrest with me, Aramis?" said Athos.

"No, thank you."

"Once arrested the four of us will be reunited, and then I think we'll be fine. Within twenty-four hours all four of us will be free."

"My dear, since I killed Châtilion, who was the darling of the ladies of Saint-Germain, I'm too notorious to risk being put in prison. The queen would listen to Mazarin's advice about me, and Mazarin's advice would be to put me on trial."

"Do you really think, Aramis, that she loves this Italian as much as they say?"

"She once loved an Englishman a great deal."

"Ah, my friend, she truly is a woman!"

"Not at all, Athos, and don't fool yourself: she's a queen."

"Dear friend, I'm going to pay my respects and ask for an audience with Anne of Austria."

"Then goodbye, Athos – I'm going to go raise an army."

"To do what?"

"To come back and besiege Rueil."

"Where shall we meet again?"

"At the foot of the cardinal's gallows." And the two friends separated, Aramis to return to Paris, and Athos to take the first steps necessary to be granted an audience with the queen.

Athos found it easier than he expected to see Anne of Austria – at the first request he was granted an audience, for the following day after her morning lever, to which he was entitled to attend by right of birth. The halls of the château at Saint-Germain were thronged with courtiers; never at the Louvre or the Royal Palace had Anne of Austria had more. But this crowd mainly consisted of the secondary nobility, as all the highest-ranking gentlemen of France were aligned with Sir Conti, Sir Beaufort, and the coadjutor. Nonetheless, gaiety ruled the day at this Court. A peculiarity of this civil war was that more couplets were fired off than cannon. The Court wrote verses mocking the Parisians, who replied with trio-lets mocking the Court, and the wounds inflicted, though not mortal, were still deeply felt, for they were the burning wounds of ridicule. But in the midst of this general hilarity and frivolous futility, one question preoccupied every mind: would Mazarin remain the minister and favourite, or would Mazarin, who seemed to have blown in from the south like a cloud, be blown away again now that the winds were against him? Everyone hoped for and wanted that – so much so that the minister came to feel that all the flattery and homage paid to him by the courtiers were mere lies covering hatred disguised by fear and self-interest. He was anxious, not knowing what to expect or whom he could rely upon. Sir Prince himself, who commanded for him, never missed a chance to mock or humiliate him. After two or three occasions when Mazarin had tried to exert his authority in the presence of the victor of Rocroi, and the prince had looked away coldly, that made it clear that, if he defended the minister, it was with neither conviction nor enthusiasm. So, the cardinal fell back on his relationship with the queen, who was his only reliable support. But there had been several minor incidents that made him feel like even this support was wavering. When the hour for his audience arrived, the Count La Fère was told that though it would take place, he would have to wait a few minutes, as the queen was consulting with her minister. This was true: Paris had just sent a new deputation which was intended at last to move negotiations forward, and the queen was consulting with Mazarin as to how she should receive these deputies. Matters of State were at a fever pitch among the high and mighty, and Athos could hardly have chosen a worse time to inquire after his friends, tiny atoms lost in the whirlwind of great affairs. But Athos was unyielding once his mind was made up, especially when his decision derived from his conscience and was dictated by his duty. He insisted on being introduced, saying that, though he was no deputy of Sir Conti, de Beaufort, de Bouillon, d'Elbeuf, or the coadjutor, nor of Madam de Longueville, Broussel, or parliament, and came on his own account, he nonetheless had matters of importance to speak of to Her Majesty. Her consultation completed, the queen summoned Athos to her study. The audience-controller introduced and named him. His was a name that had been too often heard in the ears of Her Majesty and too often felt in her heart for Anne of Austria not to recognise it; yet she remained impassive, regarding this gentleman with that direct and challenging gaze that is accepted only from those women who are queens, by beauty or by blood. "Do you come to offer to render us a service, Count?" asked Anne of Austria after a moment of silence.

"Yes, Madam, a service yet again," said Athos, shocked that the queen appeared not to recognise him.

Athos had a great and generous heart, and thus made a very poor courtier. Anne furrowed her brow. Mazarin, seated at a side table and leafing through a stack of papers like a simple secretary, raised his head. "Speak," said the queen.

Mazarin resumed leafing through his papers. "Madam," replied Athos, "two of our friends, two of the most intrepid servants of Your Majesty, Sir d'Artagnan and Sir du Vallon, who were sent to England by Sir Cardinal, suddenly disappeared the moment they set foot back in France, and no one knows what has become of them."

"Well?" said the queen.

"Well!" said Athos. "I request Your Majesty in her benevolence to discover what has happened to these gentlemen – reserving the option, if need be, to appeal to her for justice."

"Sir," replied Anne of Austria, with that haughtiness that, toward the undeserving, became arrogance, "this is the matter with which you choose to disturb us in the midst of our consideration of great affairs? A matter for the police? Well, Sir, as you know, or should know, since we are no longer in Paris, we have no involvement with the police."

"I think that Your Majesty," said Athos, bowing with frosty respect, "would have no need to inquire of the police to discover what has become of Gentlemen d'Artagnan and du Vallon; she has only to question the cardinal about these two gentlemen, as Sir Cardinal could inform her without having to consult anything other than his recollections."

"Why, God be my witness!" said Anne of Austria, with that disdainful curl of the lips unique to her. "I believe you are questioning me."

"Yes, Madam, and I have nearly the right to do so, for it involves Sir d'Artagnan – Sir d'Artagnan, if you understand me, Madam," he said, hoping to reach the conscience of the woman behind the mask of the queen.

Mazarin saw that it was time to come to Anne of Austria's aid. "Sir Count," he said, "I will inform you of something Her Majesty is unaware of that is what has become of those two gentlemen. They disobeyed orders and have been arrested."

"I implore Your Majesty," said Athos, firmly and without replying to Mazarin, "to rescind these judgements regarding Gentlemen d'Artagnan and du Vallon."

"What you request is a matter of discipline and does not concern me, Sir," the queen said.

"Sir d'Artagnan never made such a reply when acting in the service of Your Majesty," said Athos, bowing with dignity.

He backed two steps toward the door, when Mazarin stopped him. "You have also come from England, Sir?" he said while gesturing to calm the queen who had visibly paled and was about to issue a stern order.

"Where I attended the final moments of King Charles I," said Athos. "Poor king! Guilty at most of weakness, for which his subjects punished him severely. But thrones are trembling at the moment, and it's a difficult time for those with devoted hearts who serve the interests of princes. That was the second time that Sir d'Artagnan had travelled to England; the first time was for the honour of a great queen, the second for the life of a great king."

"Sir," said Anne of Austria to Mazarin, in a tone that couldn't conceal her true feelings, "see if anything can be done for these gentlemen."

"Madam," said Mazarin, "I'll do what I can to please Your Majesty."

"Do as Sir Count La Fère asks. Isn't that how you name yourself, Sir?"

"I have had another name, Madam, and am also known as Athos."

"Madam," said Mazarin, with a smile that indicated he understood her true desires, "you can rest assured that your wishes shall be fulfilled."

"Do you hear, Sir?" said the queen.

"Yes, Madam, and I expected nothing less from Your Majesty's justice. Then I'll soon see my friends again, isn't that so, Madam? That is what Your Majesty intends?"

"Yes, Sir, you shall see them again. These days, you're with the Fronde, aren't you?"

"Madam, I serve the king."

"Yes but in your own way."

"My own way is that of all true gentlemen, and I know no other," said Athos haughtily.

"Go then, Sir," said the queen, dismissing Athos with a gesture. "You've obtained what you wanted, and we've learned all we needed to know."

Then, once the door had closed behind Athos, she said to Mazarin, "Cardinal, have this insolent gentleman arrested before he leaves the Court."

"That had already occurred to me," said Mazarin, "and I'm glad Your Majesty has given the order before I could even ask for it. These hard-heads who persist in our time with the high-handed practices of the previous reign are a nuisance, and since we already have two of them under lock and key, let's add the third."

Athos had not been entirely taken in by the queen. There was something in her tone that had seemed to threaten even while promising. But he was not a man to act upon mere suspicion, especially since he'd been told straight out that he would see his friends again. He waited, therefore, in the antechamber adjacent to the study, thinking that d'Artagnan and Porthos might be brought to him, or he might be escorted to where they were. While waiting, he strolled to the window and gazed mechanically down into the courtyard. There he saw a deputation of Parisians entering, coming to set the final agenda of the conferences and to pay their respects to the queen. It was a crowd of councillors and presidents of parliament, advocates and attorneys, with a few Men of the Sword mixed in with the Men of the Robe. An imposing escort awaited them outside the gates. Athos was looking more closely, as he thought he saw someone he recognised when he felt a tap on his shoulder. He turned and said, "Ah, Sir Comminges!"

"Yes, Sir Count, in person, and charged with a mission for which I hope you will accept my apologies."

"What's that, Sir?" asked Athos.

"To ask you to please give me your sword, Count."

Athos smiled and opening the window, he shouted, "Aramis!"

A gentleman turned around – the man Athos thought he'd recognised was, in fact, Aramis. He made the count a friendly salute. "Aramis," called Athos, "I'm arrested."

"Indeed," Aramis replied coolly.

Athos turned back to Comminges, politely presented him the hilt of his sword, and said, "Here is my sword; please keep it with care and return it to me when I'm released from prison. It was given to my grandfather by King Francois I. In his time, they armed gentlemen, rather than disarming them. Now, where are you taking me?"

"Well ... to my room, first," said Comminges. "The queen will designate your destination later." Athos followed Comminges out without saying another word.

255 The Royalty of Sir Mazarin

The arrest had made no noise, caused no scandal, and gone virtually unnoticed. It had in no way hindered the course of events, and the deputation sent by the City of Paris was solemnly informed that they would be duly admitted to an audience with the queen. The queen received them, silent and superb as always, and she heard the grievances and pleas of the deputies; however, when the speeches were finished, no one would have been able to say, based on Anne of Austria's impassive expression, whether she had listened to them. On the other hand, Mazarin, who was also present at the audience, understood very well what the deputies wanted: it was, clearly and simply, his dismissal. With the speeches completed, since the queen remained mute, Mazarin said, "Gentlemen, I join you in imploring the queen to put an end to the troubles of her subjects. I've done all I can to help them, and yet you say the people believe that I'm responsible for their ills – I, a poor foreigner who has failed to please the French. Alas! I'm misunderstood by all, and the reason is clear: as prime minister I followed in the footsteps of the greatest man ever to support the sceptre of the Kings of France. The memory of Sir Richelieu overwhelms me. If I were ambitious, I'd fight the weight of that memory but I'm not, and I'll prove it to you. I surrender. I'll do what the people ask. If the Parisians have done wrong – as who has not, Gentlemen? – Well, Paris has been punished. Enough blood has flowed, enough misery has stricken a capital deprived of both king and justice. It's not for me, a private citizen, to be so audacious as to come between a queen and her realm. Since you demand that I retire, well, then! I'll retire."

"In that case," Aramis said into the ear of his neighbour, "peace is declared and further conferences are needless. All we have to do is send Sir Mazarini under guard across the nearest foreign border, and make sure he doesn't return there or elsewhere."

"Not so fast, Sir, not so fast," said the Man of the Robe to whom Aramis had spoken. "Plague! Such haste! It's clear you're a Man of the Sword. First there's a whole list of compensations and indemnities to be settled."

"Sir Chancellor," said the queen, turning to our old acquaintance Séguier, "you will chair the conferences, to be held at Rueil. Sir Cardinal has said things that have deeply moved me that is why I will not address the deputation here. As to who is to stay and who is to go, I owe the cardinal too much to constrain him in any way. Sir Cardinal shall do as he sees fit."

A fleeting pallor crossed the intelligent visage of the prime minister, and he looked at the queen anxiously. Her face was so impassive that, like the others, he couldn't read what was passing in her heart. "But while awaiting Sir Mazarin's decision," the queen added, "I ask you to think only of the interests of the king."

The deputies bowed and withdrew. "What was that?" said the queen, when the last of them had left the hall. "Would you yield to these councilmen and lawyers?"

"For Your Majesty's happiness, Madam," said Mazarin, fixing the queen with his piercing gaze, "there is no sacrifice I wouldn't make."

Anne lowered her head and fell into one of those reveries increasingly common with her. The memory of Athos arose in her mind. His brave demeanour, his tone at once so firm and dignified, the ghosts he conjured with a word, reminded her of a past intoxicating and poetic: of youth, of beauty, of love at the age of twenty; of the brutal battles of those who'd fought for her, of the heroism of those obscure defenders who'd saved her from the double hatred of Richelieu and the king – and of the bloody death of Buckingham, the only man she'd ever truly loved. Mazarin watched her, and now that she thought she was alone and no longer had a world of enemies spying upon her, he easily followed her thoughts as they passed across her face, as one sees in a clear lake the reflections of clouds passing in the heavens. "Must we yield to the storm," murmured Anne of Austria, "bargain for peace, and wait patiently and religiously for better times?"

Mazarin smiled bitterly at these words that indicated that she'd taken her minister's proposal seriously. Anne's head was bowed, and she didn't see his smile but hearing no answer, she looked up.

"Well! You say nothing, Cardinal; what are you thinking?"

"I think, Madam, that this insolent gentleman we had Comminges arrest for us alluded to Sir Buckingham, whom you allowed to be assassinated, to Madam de Chevreuse, whom you allowed to be exiled, and to Sir Beaufort, whom you had imprisoned. But if he alluded to me, it was because he doesn't really know what I am to you."

Anne of Austria trembled as she did when struck in her pride; she blushed and, to suppress a reply, ground her sharp nails into her beautiful hands. "He's a man of sound advice, of honour and of spirit, and a man of great resolve," Mazarin continued. "But you're aware of that, aren't you, Madam? Well, I wish to show him, as a personal favour, the extent to which he is mistaken about me. Because what his allies just proposed to me is close to an abdication, and an abdication requires careful consideration."

"An abdication!" said Anne. "I thought, Sir, that it was only kings who abdicated."

"And I'm not almost a king and King of France at that?" replied Mazarin. "Thrown over the foot of the royal bed at night, Madam, my minister's robe looks no different than a monarch's mantle, I assure you."

This was one of the humiliations to which Mazarin most often subjected her, and before which she always bowed her head. Only Elizabeth and Catherine II were able to be both mistresses and queens for their lovers. Anne of Austria looked with a touch of terror at the menacing presence of the cardinal who at times like these could exert a domineering bravado. “Sir,” she said, “didn’t I say and you heard me tell those people that you’ll do as you please?”

“Ah! In that case,” said Mazarin, “I think it shall please me to remain. It may be in my interest but even more than that, I dare say it will be your salvation.”

“Stay then, Sir, I desire nothing else – but preserve me from insults.”

“You mean the pretensions of those rebels and the tone in which they express them? Patience! They’ve chosen to fight upon my own ground: the conference. We will defeat them with delay. Already they grow hungry; it will be worse a week from now.”

“Oh, my God, yes, Sir, I know how that will turn out. But it’s not them I refer to; they’re not the ones who inflict the deepest injuries.”

“Ah, now I understand you! You speak of the memories perpetually evoked by those three or four gentlemen. But now they’re our prisoners, and they’re just guilty enough that we can hold them as long as is convenient. Only one is still beyond our power and defies us. But what the devil! He’ll join his companions soon enough. We’ve done harder things than that, it seems to me. I already have the most intractable pair locked up at Rueil, where I can keep an eye on them, and today they’ll be joined by the third.”

“So long as they remain prisoners, all will be well,” said Anne of Austria, “but some day they must be free.”

“Yes ... if Your Majesty sets them free.”

“Ah!” continued Queen Anne, half to herself. “This is where I regret Paris.”

“Why’s that?”

“Because the Bastille, Sir, is so strong and so discreet.”

“Madam, with the conferences we’ll have peace, with peace we’ll have Paris, and with Paris we’ll have the Bastille! And there our four myrmidons will rot.”

Anne of Austria frowned lightly, while Mazarin kissed her hand to take his leave of her. With this act, half humble, half gallant, Mazarin departed. Anne followed him with her eyes, and as he walked away one might have seen a disdainful smile curl her lips. “In my time,” she murmured, “I once rejected the love of a cardinal who never said, ‘I will do,’ but rather ‘I have done.’ That one knew retreats safer than Rueil, darker and more silent than the Bastille. Ah! Everything decays!”

256
Precautions

After leaving Anne of Austria, the cardinal took the road to his estate at Rueil. Mazarin always travelled well accompanied in those times of trouble, often in disguise. The cardinal, as we’ve said, looked very well in the outfit of a Man of the Sword. In the courtyard of the old château at Saint-Germain, he entered a carriage that followed the road that crossed the Seine at Chatou. Sir Prince has furnished him with an escort of fifty light horse, not so much to protect him as to show the deputies that Condé had troops to spare, and could deploy them however he thought best. Athos, on horseback but unarmed and guarded by Comminges, followed the cardinal’s carriage without saying a word. Grimaud, who’d been left at the gate of the château by his master, had realised he’d been arrested when Athos called out to Aramis, and at a gesture from the count he’d followed Aramis when he’d left, silently and as if nothing had happened. For a fact, Grimaud, who’d served his master for twenty-two years, had seen him survive so many adventures that nothing worried him anymore. The deputies, immediately after their audience, had taken the road that returned to Paris, preceding the cardinal’s party by about five hundred paces. Athos, therefore, could see ahead of him the back of Aramis, whose gilded baldric and proud demeanour drew his eye quite as much as the habits of long friendship and the hopes of deliverance he placed in him. Aramis, for his part, didn’t seem the least bit interested in whether he was being followed by Athos, and turned to look only when they arrived at Chatou. He thought Mazarin might leave his prisoner in the little fort that guarded the bridge that an officer commanded for the queen. But no: Athos continued past Chatou in the cardinal’s entourage. Where the road forked toward Paris or Rueil, Aramis turned again. This time his expectations were fulfilled, as Mazarin turned toward Rueil, and Aramis could see his prisoner, following, as he disappeared into the wood. At just that moment Athos, as if moved by an identical thought, also turned to look back. The two friends exchanged a slight nod, and Aramis raised a finger to his head as if in salute. Athos understood that his friend was telling him that he had an idea. Ten minutes later Mazarin entered the courtyard of the Château de Rueil that had been bequeathed to him by the cardinal his predecessor. As he was stepping down from his carriage at the foot of the main staircase, Comminges approached him and asked, “Where would it please your Eminence for the Count La Fère to be lodged?”

“In the pavilion of the orangery, facing the guards’ post. I want the Count La Fère treated with honour while he’s a prisoner of Her Majesty the queen.”

“My Lord,” ventured Comminges, “he requests the favour of being allowed to join Sir d’Artagnan, who occupies, as Your Eminence has ordered, the hunting pavilion across from the orangery.” Mazarin thought for a moment; Comminges could see that he was calculating. “It’s a strong post,” the officer said, “forty reliable men, veteran soldiers all, mostly German mercenaries who have no connections to the Frondeurs and no interest in the Fronde.”

“If we put those three men together, Sir Comminges,” said Mazarin, “we’d have to double that guard, and we don’t have enough men for such prodigality.”

Comminges smiled; Mazarin saw his expression and understood it. “You don’t know them, Sir Comminges – but I do know them, both directly and by tradition. I sent them to aid King Charles, and by performing miracles they very nearly saved him; it’s only due to an accident of fate that dear King Charles is not amongst us today.”

“But if they served Your Eminence so well, why’s Your Eminence had them imprisoned?”

“In prison?” said Mazarin. “Since when is Rueil a prison?”

“Since it holds prisoners,” said Comminges.

“These gentlemen aren’t my prisoners, Comminges, they’re my guests,” said Mazarin, smiling his sly smile. “Guests so precious I keep their windows barred and their doors locked for fear that they’ll tire of keeping me company. But though they seem like prisoners, I esteem them nonetheless, and the proof is that I’d like to visit Sir La Fère for a little private talk. To make sure our conversation will remain undisturbed, you will escort him, as I’ve already requested, to the pavilion of the orangery. You know that’s along the route of my usual evening walk; well, on my walk, I’ll stop in and have a talk with him. As much as he seems my enemy, I have a good deal of sympathy for him, and if he’s disposed to be reasonable, we may get somewhere.”

Comminges bowed and returned to where Athos was waiting, apparently calmly but anxious underneath. “And so?” he asked the Lieutenant of the Guards.

“Sir,” replied Comminges, “it seems it can’t be done.”

“Sir Comminges,” said Athos, “I’ve been a soldier all my life, so I know what it means to follow orders – but beyond your orders, there might still be a favour you could do me.”

“With all my heart, Sir,” replied Comminges, “since I know who you are, and what services you formerly rendered Her Majesty, and since I know how close you are to that young man who so bravely came to my rescue the day Broussel was arrested. I’m your man, so far as I can be within the limits of my orders.”

“Thank you, Sir, I desire nothing more, and will ask for nothing of you that will compromise you in any way.”

“If it’s only a small compromise, Sir,” said Comminges, smiling, “ask anyway. I don’t much care for Sir Mazarini; I serve the queen, and it’s only that that leads me to serve the cardinal. I serve the one with joy but the other only reluctantly – so speak, and I’ll listen.”

“If it isn’t inconvenient that I know Sir d’Artagnan is here,” said Athos, “then can I presume it wouldn’t be inconvenient to let him know that I’m here?”

“I have received no orders regarding that, Sir.”

“Well! In that case, do me the favour of giving him my regards, and informing him that I’m now his neighbour. You can tell him at the same time what I overheard just now, that Sir Mazarin has placed me in the pavilion of the orangery so he can visit me, and that I intend to profit from this honour he grants me to seek to mitigate our captivity.”

“It can’t last long,” said Comminges. “The cardinal himself told me this place is no prison.”

“There are those notorious oubliettes,” Athos said with a smile.

“Oh, that’s out of the question!” said Comminges. “Yes, I’ve heard the stories but a man of low birth, like the cardinal, an Italian who’s come to find his fortune in France, wouldn’t dare to commit such an outrage against men like you. Things were different in the time of the old cardinal, who was a great lord but Sir Mazarin? Come, now! Such dungeons are only for enemies of the crown, and a coward like him wouldn’t dare call you such. Your arrest is known, Sir, and that of your friends will soon be known, and all France would hold him accountable if he contrived for you to disappear. No, rest easy, for years the oubliettes of Rueil have been no more than a story to frighten children. Abide here without fear. For my part, I’ll inform Sir d’Artagnan of your arrival. Why, a fortnight from now you might be doing a similar favour for me!”

“I, Sir?”

“No doubt about it! Couldn’t I just as easily end up a prisoner of Sir Coadjuteur?”

“Believe me, Sir, in that case I should do my best to oblige you,” said Athos, bowing.

“Will you do me the honour of dining with me, Sir Count?” asked Comminges.

“Thank you, Sir but I’m in a dark mood, and would be a sad guest this evening. But the invitation is appreciated.”

Comminges then led the count to a chamber on the ground floor of the pavilion adjacent to the orangery, the approach to which was a grand courtyard crowded with soldiers and courtiers. This courtyard was surrounded by halls in the shape of a horseshoe; at its centre were the apartments of Sir Mazarin, one of its wings ended in the hunting pavilion, where d’Artagnan was held, and the other ended in the pavilion of the orangery, where Athos was lodged. Beyond these two wings stretched the park. Athos, arriving in the room he was to occupy, saw through its single barred window other walls and a roof across the way. “What is that building?” he said.

“That’s the back of the hunting pavilion where your friends are detained,” said Comminges. “Unfortunately, its windows on this side were blocked up in the time of the old cardinal, as these buildings have been used to hold prisoners more than once, so Sir Mazarin is really just restoring them to their old uses. If those windows weren’t blocked up, you’d have the consolation of being able to communicate with your friends by gestures.”

“Are you sure, Sir Comminges,” said Athos, “that the cardinal will do me the honour of visiting me?”

“At least that’s what he said, sir.”

Athos sighed, looking at his barred window. “In fact, it might as well be a prison,” said Comminges. “It even has bars on the window. But really, what came over you, a flower of the nobility, to commit your courage and loyalty to those toadstools of the Fronde! If there was any gentleman I expected to see on the staff of the royal army, Count, it was you. But you, the Count La Fère, a Frondeur of the party of Broussel, Blancmesnil, Viole! Pooh, so! You don’t belong with those Men of the Robe. You, of all people!”

“My faith, Sir, one must be either a Frondeur or a Mazarinist,” said Athos. “I considered both names and chose the former – it at least has a French ring to it. Besides, I’m not a Frondeur with Broussel, Blancmesnil, and Viole but with Sir Beaufort, Sir Bouillon, and Sir d’Elbeuf – with princes, not with presidents, councillors, and attorneys. And you, just look at that blank wall over there and see for yourself the pleasant result of serving the cardinal! That, Sir Comminges, should tell you something about the gratitude of a Mazarin.”

“Yes,” replied Comminges with a smile, “especially if I repeat what Sir d’Artagnan has been saying about him for the last week.”

“Poor d’Artagnan!” said Athos, with that charming melancholy that was one of the features of his character. “A man so brave, so good, and so terrible to anyone who threatens those he loves. You have two difficult prisoners there, Sir, and I pity you if you’re responsible for holding those indomitable men.”

“Indomitable!” said Comminges, still smiling. “Now, sir, you’re just trying to frighten me. It’s true that on the first day of his incarceration, Sir d’Artagnan issued challenges to all the soldiers and lower officers, doubtless in hopes of getting a sword in his hand. He kept it up for another day but then became as calm and as sweet as a lamb. Now he sings Gascon ditties that have us doubled over with laughter.”

“And Sir du Vallon?” asked Athos.

“Ah! Now that’s different. I admit I find him a fearsome gentleman. On the first day he forced open the door with a single thrust of his shoulder, and I half expected to see him break out of Rueil the way Samson came out of Gaza. But his mood changed along with Sir d’Artagnan’s, and now he seems so accustomed to his captivity, he makes jokes about it.”

“So much the better,” said Athos.

“Were you expecting something else?” asked Comminges suddenly recalling what Mazarin had said about these prisoners in light of what the Count La Fère had said and beginning to feel anxious. For his part, Athos was thinking that this cooperative behaviour on the part of his friends was certainly due to some plan of d’Artagnan’s and thought it best not to continue calling them dangerous.

“What? From them?” he said. “They’re just a pair of hotheads – one’s a Gascon, the other a Picard. They catch fire easily but burn out quickly. The proof is in the story you just told me.” That matched Comminges’s own opinion and he withdrew somewhat reassured, leaving Athos alone in that broad chamber where he was to be treated with the consideration due to a gentleman according the cardinal’s orders. Athos expected to get a better idea of his real situation after the promised visit from Mazarin.

Brains &amp; Brawn

Now let's pass from the orangery to the hunting pavilion. At the end of the courtyard, past a portico of Ionic columns that led to the dog kennels, an oblong building capped the end of the wing opposite the orangery that ended the other wing of the half-circle. It was on the ground floor of this pavilion that Porthos and d'Artagnan were confined, sharing the long hours of a captivity abhorrent to both their temperaments. D'Artagnan paced like a captive tiger, eyes narrowed, growling when he passed the bars of a window that looked out onto a back courtyard. Porthos lay quietly digesting an excellent dinner, the remains of which had just been taken away. The one seemed to have lost his mind but was thinking; the other seemed to be thinking but was asleep – though his sleep was a nightmare, if his broken and incoherent snores were any indication. “See there?” said d'Artagnan. “The light is failing. It must be nearly four o'clock. We've been here for a hundred and eighty-three hours.”

“Hum!” said Porthos, pretending to answer.

“Do you hear me, Enchanted Sleeper?” said d'Artagnan, annoyed that anyone could sleep in the daytime when he could barely sleep at night.

“What?” said Porthos.

“Did you hear me?”

“Did you say something?”

“I said,” resumed d'Artagnan, “that we've been in here a hundred and eighty-three hours.”

“It's your own fault,” said Porthos.

“How is it my fault?”

“I offered to get us out.”

“By bending the bars or smashing the door?”

“That's right.”

“Porthos, people like us don't just purely and simply walk away.”

“My faith,” said Porthos, “I'm pure and simple enough to just walk away.”

D'Artagnan shrugged. “There's more to the matter than just getting out of this pavilion.”

“Dear friend,” said Porthos, “since your mood seems a little better today, explain to me why there's more to the matter than getting out of this pavilion.”

“Because we don't have weapons or the password, that's why, and won't get fifty paces across the courtyard before we're stopped by a sentry.”

“Well!” said Porthos. “We'll knock out the sentry, and then we'll have weapons.”

“Yes but they're tough nuts, these Germans, and before we knock him out he'll give a shout, and then the hounds will be after us. We'll be taken like foxes, we who are lions, and then we'll be thrown into the oubliettes, where we won't even have the consolation of seeing the frightful grey sky over Rueil that no more resembles the sky of Tarbes than the moon resembles the sun. God be with you! If we had an ally outside, someone who could give us information on the moral and physical layout of the château, what Caesar called the mores locaque, or so I've been told, at least ... bah! To think that I had time on my hands for twenty years, and yet never thought to study the defences of the Château de Rueil.”

“So what?” said Porthos. “Let's go anyway.”

“Old friend,” said d'Artagnan, “do you know why master pastry chefs never work with their own hands?”

“No,” said Porthos, “but I'd be flattered to have you tell me.”

“They're afraid that, in front of their students, they might make cakes that are over-baked or fallen soufflés.”

“Because?”

“Because then they'd be laughed at, and no master pastry chef should be an object of mockery.”

“And what do master pastry chefs have to do with us?”

“Because we, in our adventurous exploits, must never fail so badly that it's laughable. In England we failed, we were beaten, and that's enough of a blot on our reputation.”

“By whom were we beaten?” asked Porthos.

“By Mordaunt.”

“Oh, yes, by Sir Mordaunt. But then we drowned him.”

“So we did, and that will restore us somewhat in the eyes of posterity, assuming posterity pays any attention to us. But listen to me, Porthos – though Sir Mordaunt was no one to take lightly, Sir Mazarin is of a very different order than Mordaunt and isn't someone we can just drown. Therefore, let's just keep our eyes open and await our chances, because,” d'Artagnan added with a sigh, “while we two may be the equal of eight, we'd be better off if we were four. You know what I mean.”

“Isn't that the truth,” said Porthos, adding his sigh to that of d'Artagnan.

“Well, then, Porthos, do as I do, and march back and forth until our friends come to us or, failing that, we get a good idea. Just don't go on sleeping all the time – nothing addles the mind like too much sleep. As for what awaits us, I think it's not as bad as I feared at first. I don't think Sir Mazarin is considering removing our heads, because our heads can't be removed without a trial, a trial would make a lot of noise that noise would attract our friends, and they wouldn't let Sir Mazarin do it.”

“You sure can think a thing through,” said Porthos, admiringly.

“Yes, I'm not bad,” said d'Artagnan. “And then, you see, if we're not tried, and hold onto our heads, they have to either keep us here or transport us elsewhere.”

“Yes, that's so,” said Porthos.

“Well! Either way, it's impossible that neither Aramis, that shrewd schemer, nor Athos, that wise sage, will figure out where we are. And then, my faith, it will be time!”

“True, and we're pretty well off here, all things considered – except for one.”

“What's that?”

“Didn't you notice, d'Artagnan, that they've fed us braised mutton three days in a row?”

“I hadn't but if they do it a fourth time, rest assured that I shall personally lodge a complaint!”

“And sometimes I miss my home; it's been a long time since I've seen my châteaux.”

“Bah! No need to worry about those, you'll see them again. Do you think Sir Mazarin is going to have them knocked down?”

“You don't suppose he's capable of such an outrage, do you?” asked Porthos anxiously.

“No, though it wouldn't have been beyond the old cardinal. This one's too small to take big risks.”

“You reassure me, d'Artagnan.”

“Then put the best face on things that you can: make jokes with the guards; befriend them since we can't bribe them; speak pleasantly to them when they go past our window. So far, you've only shown them your fist, and the more you show it, Porthos, the less they'll respect it. Ah, what I wouldn't give to have just five hundred Louis.”

“Me, too,” said Porthos, determined not to be less generous than d'Artagnan. “Why, for that I'd give a hundred pistoles.” The two prisoners had just reached this point in their conversation when Comminges came in, preceded by a sergeant and two men who brought supper in a basket full of bowls and plates. “Oh, great!” said Porthos. “Mutton again!”

“My dear Sir Comminges,” said d'Artagnan, “I warn you that my friend, Sir du Vallon's been driven to extremity by the torment of Sir Mazarin feeding him the same meal every day and is capable of anything.”

“I'll eat only half of this unless the rest is taken away immediately!” declared Porthos.

“Away with the mutton,” said Comminges. “Bring something Sir du Vallon will find appetizing, especially since the good news I'm about to share is bound to give him an appetite.”

“Has Sir Mazarin died?” asked Porthos.

“No, I'm sorry to say he's in good health.”

“Too bad,” said Porthos.

“Then what's your news?” asked d'Artagnan. “It's a meal so rare in prison that I hope you'll excuse my impatience, Sir Comminges. Especially since you say the news is good.”

“Would you be pleased to hear that the Count La Fère is also in good health?” replied Comminges.

D'Artagnan's eyes widened. “I'd be delighted to hear that!” he said. “More than delighted.”

“Well! I'm charged by him to give you his best compliments and report that he's in fine fettle.”

D'Artagnan nearly jumped for joy. A quick glance at Porthos shared his thought: If Athos knows where we are, and sends us word of it, he's about to act on it.

Porthos wasn't usually very good at reading such glances but he knew Athos, and was struck by the same idea as d'Artagnan, so this time he got it. “But,” asked the Gascon tentatively, “did the Count La Fère tell you personally to convey his compliments to myself and Sir du Vallon?”

“Yes, Sir.”

“Then you saw him?”

“Certainly.”

“Where was that? If it's not too much to ask.”

“Right nearby,” replied Comminges, smiling.

“Right nearby!” repeated d'Artagnan, eyes sparkling.

“So near that if the windows that face the orangery weren't bricked up, you could see where he is from here.”

He's scouting out the environment of the château, thought d'Artagnan, and then said aloud, “You met him in the park, perhaps, while hunting?”

“Oh, much closer than that – there, beyond that wall,” said Comminges, knocking on the plaster.

“Beyond that wall? What's beyond that wall? They brought me here by night, so devil take me if I have any idea where I am.”

“Then imagine this,” said Comminges.

“I'll imagine whatever you like.”

“Imagine there was a window in this wall.”

“All right. And?”

“And then you could see the Count La Fère at his own window!”

“Sir La Fère is staying at the château?”

“Yes.”

“In what capacity?”

“In the same capacity as you.”

“Athos is a prisoner?”

“You know very well,” said Comminges, laughing, “that there are no prisoners at Rueil, since it isn't a prison.”

“Enough wordplay, Sir: Athos was arrested?”

“Yesterday, at Saint-Germain, after leaving an audience with the queen.”

D'Artagnan's arms dropped limp to his sides. He looked like he'd been struck by lightning. Pallor slowly drained his sun-browned complexion. “Prisoner!” he repeated.

“Prisoner!” Porthos repeated after him, crushed.

Suddenly d'Artagnan raised his head but only Porthos saw the brief light in his eyes. Then he lowered it again in apparent dejection. "Come, come," said Comminges, who had a real affection for d'Artagnan, after he'd rescued him from the Parisians on the day of Broussel's arrest. "Don't be upset, it's not sad news I bring you, I promise. These are just the chances of war. Be pleased at the chance that brings your friend closer to you and Sir du Vallon, and don't be cast down."

But this exhortation did nothing to cheer up d'Artagnan, who continued apparently stricken with gloom. "And how did he look?" asked Porthos who put in a word of his own, seeing that d'Artagnan was letting the conversation drop.

"He looked well," said Comminges. "At first, like you, he took it hard but when he heard that the cardinal was planning to visit him this evening..."

"Oh?" said d'Artagnan. "Sir Cardinal is going to pay a visit to the Count La Fère?"

"Yes, so he said, and the Count La Fère, hearing that, charged me to tell you that he would take advantage of this favour to plead your cause, and his."

"Ah, our dear count!" said d'Artagnan.

"Some cause," growled Porthos, "some favour! For the love of God! The Count La Fère, whose family ranks with the Montmorencys and the Rohans, is to plead with Sir Mazarin."

"No matter," said d'Artagnan, in a soothing tone. "When you think about it, my dear du Vallon, it's quite an honour for the count. It's a hopeful sign, such an honour for a prisoner – so great in fact that Sir Comminges must be mistaken about it."

"What? Me, mistaken?"

"Surely it isn't Sir Mazarin who will visit the Count La Fère but the Count La Fère who will visit Sir Mazarin."

"No, not at all," said Comminges, who insisted on the accuracy of his statements. "I just repeat what the cardinal told me: it is he who will visit the Count La Fère."

D'Artagnan tried to catch Porthos's eye to convey to him the importance of this but failed. "Is it then the habit of the cardinal to take an evening walk through the orangery?" he asked.

"Every night," said Comminges. "It seems that's where he goes to meditate on affairs of state."

"Then I begin to believe that Sir La Fère will receive a visit from His Eminence," said d'Artagnan. "He'll be accompanied, of course."

"Yes, by two soldiers."

"And he conducts business in front of soldiers?"

"The soldiers are Swiss from those cantons where they speak only German. Besides, they'll probably wait outside the door."

D'Artagnan ground his fingernails into the palms of his hands so his face would show only what he wanted it to show. "Sir Mazarin should take care not to visit the Count La Fère alone," said d'Artagnan, "as the count is liable to be furious."

Comminges laughed. "Oh that! What is it with you? Are you all cannibals? Sir La Fère is a perfect gentleman – besides, he has no weapons. And at the first cry from His Eminence, the two soldiers would come running."

"Two soldiers," said d'Artagnan, seemingly consulting his memory. "Two soldiers – yes, that's why I hear two men called every evening, and why I see them pacing back and forth for a half an hour sometimes outside my window."

"That's when they're waiting on the cardinal, or rather Bernouin, who summons them when the cardinal comes out."

"They look like good men," said d'Artagnan.

"They're from a regiment that was at Lens, and which Sir Prince has given to the cardinal to do him honour."

"Ah, Sir," said d'Artagnan, as if to sum up this whole conversation, "perhaps His Eminence will be lenient, and grant our liberty to Sir La Fère."

"I desire it with all my heart," said Comminges.

"Then, if he forgot to make this visit, you wouldn't find it inconvenient to remind him of it?"

"Not at all."

"Ah! That makes me feel a bit better." Anyone who'd have read the Gascon's soul would've seen how much of an understatement this was. "Now," he continued, "if I'd ask a final favour, Sir Comminges."

"I'm at your service, Sir."

"When will you see the Count La Fère again?"

"Tomorrow morning."

"Will you wish him good day for us, and ask him to request from the cardinal the same favour he's obtained?"

"You'd like the cardinal to visit you here?"

"No, I'm not so bold or as demanding as that. If His Eminence would just do me the honour to listen to me, that's all I ask."

"Oh!" murmured Porthos, shaking his head. "I would never have believed d'Artagnan could sink so low! How far we have fallen."

"I'll see to it," said Comminges.

"And also assure the count that you've seen I'm in good health, and that though sad, I'm resigned."

"It pleases me, Sir, to hear you say that."

"And say the same thing about Sir du Vallon."

"What, me? Not at all!" cried Porthos. "I'm not resigned at all."

"But you will be resigned, my friend."

"Never!"

"Oh, he will be resigned, Sir Comminges," said d'Artagnan. "I know him better than he knows himself, and I know he has a thousand excellent qualities he doesn't even suspect – including resignation. Now shut up, my dear du Vallon, and resign yourself."

"Goodbye, Gentlemen," said Comminges, "and have a good night!"

"We'll try."

Comminges bowed and went out. D'Artagnan watched him with downcast eyes and a resigned expression – but as soon as the door was shut behind the guard officer, he leapt toward Porthos and hugged him with such joy that no one could doubt it. "Oh ho!" said Porthos. "What now? Are you losing your mind, my poor friend?"

"I am," said d'Artagnan, "because we're saved!"

"And how can you say that?" said Porthos. "On the contrary, it looks to me like we're all taken, except for Aramis, and that our chances of getting out are diminished by one-half now that Athos is in Mazarin's mousetrap."

"Not at all, Porthos, old friend. That mousetrap was strong enough for two but it's too weak for three."

"I have no idea what you're talking about," said Porthos.

"No matter," said d'Artagnan. "Let's sit down to supper and fortify ourselves – we're going to need all our strength tonight."

"We are? What are we doing tonight?" said Porthos, intrigued in spite of himself.

"Travelling, most likely."

"But..."

"Let's sit down and eat, my friend – ideas come to me when I'm eating. After supper, when my ideas are complete, I'll share them with you." However impatient Porthos was to hear d'Artagnan's plan, he knew his friend's methods, so he sat down to supper without another word, and ate with an appetite that showed the confidence he had in d'Artagnan's imagination.

258
Brawn & Brains

Their supper was silent but by no means sad, for from time to time d'Artagnan's face was illuminated by one of those shrewd smiles that lit his expression when he was in good humour. Porthos didn't miss a single one of these smiles, and to each one he laughed or made some remark to show his friend that, while he had no idea what d'Artagnan was thinking, he could at least acknowledge the process. At dessert d'Artagnan sat back in his chair with his legs crossed with the look of a man well satisfied with himself. Porthos placed his elbows on the table, his chin on his hands, and looked at d'Artagnan with an admiring gaze that was the perfect expression of his unflinching good nature. "Well?" said d'Artagnan after a moment.

"Well?" repeated Porthos.

"You were saying, old friend?"

"Me! I said nothing."

"You did. You said you wanted to get out of here."

"Oh, that! Yes, I'd love to do that."

"And you added that it was only a matter of breaking down a door or a wall."

"It's true, I did say that, and I'd even say it again."

"And I answered you, Porthos that it's a bad idea, and we wouldn't get a hundred paces before we were taken again, without clothes to disguise ourselves and weapons to defend ourselves."

"It's true, we'd need clothing and weapons."

"Well!" said d'Artagnan, rising. "In that case we must get them, friend Porthos, and something else as well."

"Where?" said Porthos, looking around.

"Don't bother searching, it's too soon; everything will come to us at its proper time. When was it we saw those two Swiss guards last night?"

"An hour after sunset, I think."

"Then if they return when they did last night, we won't have more than another quarter of an hour to wait before we have the pleasure of seeing them."

"Yes, a quarter of an hour at the most."

"Your arm is in pretty good shape, isn't it, Porthos?"

Porthos unbuttoned his cuffs, rolled up his sleeves, and looked complacently at his brawny arms, as big around as most men's thighs. "But yes," he said, "pretty good."

"Strong enough to twist, without too much trouble, these fire tongs into a hoop and this ash shovel into a corkscrew?"

"Certainly," said Porthos.

"Show me," said d'Artagnan.

The giant took the two indicated objects and, with the greatest ease and without apparent effort, performed the feats his companion had requested. "You see?" he said.

"Magnificent!" said d'Artagnan. "You are truly gifted, Porthos."

"I once heard," said Porthos, "of a certain Milo of Croton who did some extraordinary things, such as breaking a rope that was tightened around his brow by flexing his head muscles, killing an ox with his fist and carrying it home on his shoulders, stopping a horse by grabbing its hind feet, and so forth. When I was at Pierrefonds I made them read to me about all these feats, and I did everything he did, except for bursting a rope by swelling my temples."

"Your strength has never been in your head," said d'Artagnan.

"No, it's in my arms and shoulders," replied Porthos naively.

"Well, my friend! Let's see you go to the window and take out one of the bars. Wait a moment until I put out the lamp."

Porthos approached the window, took a central bar in both hands, gripped it tightly, pulled it toward him, and bent it in the middle like a bow, so that both ends came out of the stone sill where for thirty years they'd been sealed in cement. "And there, my friend," said d'Artagnan, "is something even the old cardinal could never have done, man of genius though he was."

"Should I yank the others?" asked Porthos.

"No, I think that will do it; a man should be able to pass through that gap."
Porthos thrust his shoulders and chest through the opening. "Yes," he said.
"Indeed, a very pretty opening, just what we need. Now stick out your arms."
"Where?"
"Through the gap in the window."
"What for?"
"You'll see when the time comes. Try it."
Porthos obeyed, as obedient as a soldier, thrusting his arms out between the bars. "Perfect!" said d'Artagnan.
"Our plan goes forward?"
"On wheels, old friend."
"Good. Now what do I do?"
"Nothing."
"Then we're done?"
"Not yet."
"I'd like to understand," said Porthos.
"All right, old friend, I'll catch you up. The door of the guardroom over there opens out, as you see."

"Yes, I see."
"They're going to send out into our courtyard that Sir Mazarin crosses to get to the orangery, the two guards who will accompany him."
"They're coming out now."
"Hopefully they'll close the door behind them ... good, they did!"
"And now?"
"Hush! They might hear us."
"But how will I know what to do?"
"I'll tell you each step as the time comes."
"All right but I'd rather..."
"What, and lose the pleasure of surprise?"
"Good point," said Porthos.
"Hush!"

Porthos stood mute and motionless. In fact, the two soldiers were approaching the window, rubbing their hands, because it was February and cold. Just then the door to the guardhouse reopened and one of the soldiers was called back. He left his companion and went back through the door. "Is the plan still on?" whispered Porthos.
"Better than ever," replied d'Artagnan in the same tone. "Now, listen: I'll call this soldier over and chat with him, as I did last night with one of his comrades, remember?"
"Yes, though I didn't catch a word of what he said."
"He did have a pretty thick accent. But don't miss a word of what I'm about to tell you, Porthos: it's all in the execution."
"Good. Execution is my strong suit."
"Don't I know it; I'm counting on that."
"Tell me."
"So, I'll call the soldier over to chat with him."
"You already said that."
"I'll lean to the left, so as he steps up on that bench under the window to talk to me, he'll be on your right."

"What if he doesn't step up?"
"He will, don't worry. When he steps up on the bench, you reach your mighty arm through the gap and grab him by the neck. Then like Tobias grabbing the great fish by the gills, you'll drag him into our room, squeezing him tightly so he can't scream."
"Got it," said Porthos. "But what if I strangle him?"
"At worst, it'll mean one less Swiss but I doubt you'll strangle him. Just lay him down gently on the floor so we can tie and gag him. Then we'll have one uniform and a sword."
"Wonderful!" said Porthos, regarding d'Artagnan with deep admiration.
"Eh!" shrugged the Gascon.
"Fine – but a single uniform and sword aren't enough."
"Well! Doesn't he have a comrade?"
"Good point," said Porthos.
"Now, when I cough, you reach out for him."
"All right!"

The two friends took their appointed positions, with Porthos out of sight around the edge of the window. "Good evening, comrade," said d'Artagnan in his friendliest voice, not too loudly.
"Gut evening, Sir," replied the soldier.
"It's not too warm for a walk," said d'Artagnan.
"Brrr," said the soldier.
"Then I imagine a glass of honey would sound good to you?"
"A glass of vine would be welcome."
"The fish bites!" d'Artagnan murmured to Porthos.
"I understand," said Porthos.
"How about a whole bottle?" said d'Artagnan.
"A pottle!"
"Yes."

"A whole pottle?"
"I've an extra and it's all yours if you'll drink to my health."
"Ja," said the soldier, drawing nearer.
"Here, come and get it, my friend," said the Gascon.
"Villingly! Ah, gut, here is a bench."
"Now, isn't that convenient?"

"I'll just step up ... now here I am, my friend." And d'Artagnan coughed. At the same moment Porthos reached out, fast as lightning. His fingers closed like steel pincers around the soldier's neck, and he dragged him suddenly through the opening, despite the risk of skinning him on the bars, and laid him down on the floor. There d'Artagnan, giving the Swiss just enough time to take a breath, gagged him with his own scarf, and immediately began to strip him of his clothes with the speed and dexterity of a man who'd learned his trade on the battlefield. Then the soldier, bound and gagged, was stuffed into the fireplace that our friends hadn't yet lit that evening. "And now we have a sword and a uniform," said Porthos.
"I'll take these," said d'Artagnan. "If we're going to get you a set, we'll have to do that again. Watch out! The other soldier is coming from the guardhouse."
"I don't think we should try the same thing again," said Porthos. "They always say lightning doesn't strike twice. If I missed my grab, all would be lost. I'll slip out, jump him when he goes by, and pass him in already bound and gagged."
"Even better," replied the Gascon.
"Get ready," said Porthos, sliding out through the opening.

It worked out just as Porthos had promised. The giant crouched behind a topiary, and when the soldier passed, he grabbed him by the neck, gagged him, shoved him like a mummy between the window bars, and then followed him inside. The second prisoner was stripped as they had the first. He was laid down on the bed and bound to it with belts, and as the bed was solid oak, and the belts were doubled, he was as firmly restrained as the other. "There," said d'Artagnan, "that's perfect. Now, try on his coat, Porthos, and see if it fits; if it doesn't, the baldric will be enough, along with this hat with its red feather." By chance the second Swiss was a large fellow, so Porthos split only a few seams when he donned the man's coat, and everything else was fine. For several minutes nothing was heard but the rustling of cloth as Porthos and d'Artagnan hastily donned their disguises. "Ready," both said at the same time. "As for you, comrades," added d'Artagnan, turning toward the two soldiers, "so long as you lie there gently, nothing will happen to you – but if you make a fuss, you're dead." The soldiers didn't budge. They were still feeling the effects of Porthos's grip, and knew this was a serious matter, and no joke. "Now," said d'Artagnan, "are you ready to understand the rest, Porthos?"
"Yes," said Porthos. "I am alert."
"Well, we go down into the courtyard."
"Yes."
"We take the place of these two fellows."
"Good."
"We patrol back and forth."
"That's fine, it will keep us warm."
"When the valet calls, like last night and the night before, we obey."
"What do we say?"
"We don't say anything, if possible."
"Fine. I like that better."
"We say nothing, we just pull our hats down and escort His Eminence."
"To where?"
"To his meeting with Athos. Do you think he'll be happy to see us?"
"Oh ho!" cried Porthos. "I get it now!"
"Be careful how loud you say so, Porthos, because we haven't done it yet," said the Gascon cheerfully.
"What happens when we've done it?" said Porthos.
"Follow me," replied d'Artagnan. "Time will tell."

And passing through the opening in the bars, he slipped into the courtyard. Porthos followed him, though with more difficulty. The two bound soldiers in the room could be heard shivering in fear. Scarcely had d'Artagnan and Porthos touched the ground before a door opened across the courtyard and the voice of the valet cried, "Attention!"

The next moment the door to the guardroom opened and a voice called, “La Bruyère and Barthois, on duty!”

“It seems my name is La Bruyère,” said d’Artagnan.

“And mine is Barthois,” said Porthos.

“Where are you?” called the valet whose eyes hadn’t yet adjusted to the darkness, so he couldn’t make out our two heroes in the gloom.

“Here we are,” said d’Artagnan. Then turning to Porthos, he whispered, “How goes it, Sir du Vallon?”

“My faith, it goes well! I just hope it lasts.”

The two soldier-impostors fell in gravely behind the valet. He led them into a vestibule, then into an antechamber that seemed to be a waiting room, and indicating two stools, he said, “Your orders are simple: let no one enter here but one – and that one you must obey in everything. Do you hear me? And stay here until I relieve you.”

D’Artagnan was well known to this valet who was none other than Bernouin who had admitted him to the cardinal’s presence a dozen times over six or eight months. Instead of replying, he looked down and muttered something that he hoped sounded German rather than Gascon. As for Porthos, d’Artagnan had made him promise that under no conditions would he speak. If pushed to extremities, he was allowed to solemnly swear, “The Devil.”

Bernouin went out, shutting the door behind him. “Uh-oh,” said Porthos, hearing a key turn in the lock. “It appears to be the fashion here to lock people up. It looks to me like we’ve just traded one prison for another, the orangery. I’m not sure we’re any better off.”

“Porthos, my friend,” said d’Artagnan in a low voice, “trust in Providence, and let me think this through.”

“Think all you want,” said Porthos, soured by the way things were going.

“We came about eighty paces, and climbed six steps,” murmured d’Artagnan. “And now, as the illustrious Sir du Vallon says, we must be in the pavilion of the orangery. The Count La Fère can’t be far but the doors are all closed.”

“That’s no problem!” said Porthos. “With a shove of my shoulder…”

“Good God, Porthos, settle down,” said d’Artagnan. “Save your strength until we need it. Didn’t you hear him say someone will be coming here?”

“I did.”

“Well, that someone will open the doors for us.”

“But listen,” said Porthos, “if that someone recognises us, and starts shouting, all is lost. Because I don’t imagine you want me to strangle a man of the Church like I would a German or Englishman.”

“God save us, no!” said d’Artagnan. “While the young king might be grateful, the queen would never forgive us, and we really should spare her feelings. Besides, to spill blood unnecessarily? Never! I have my plan – let’s stick to it, and later we’ll laugh.”

“Fine by me,” said Porthos. “I could use a laugh.”

“Hush!” said d’Artagnan. “Here comes the: someone.”

The sound of a light step was heard from the vestibule. The hinges of the door squealed, and a man appeared dressed in a cavalier’s outfit beneath a large brown cloak, with a wide felt hat over his eyes and a lantern in his hand. Porthos backed against the wall but he couldn’t make himself so small the man in the cloak couldn’t see him. He held out his lantern and said, “Light this from the ceiling lamp.”

Then addressing d’Artagnan, he said, “You have your orders.”

“Yes,” replied the Gascon, determined to confine himself to that specimen of the German language.

“German,” said the cavalier, “all right.”

And advancing to the door opposite to the one from which he’d entered, he opened it and passed through, closing it behind him. “And now what do we do?” asked Porthos.

“Now, friend Porthos, if that inner door is locked, we’re going to put your shoulder to use. But everything in its time, when all is prepared. First let’s barricade the outer door before we follow the cavalier.”

The two friends then went to work using all the room’s furniture to blockade the outer door that fortunately opened inward, making the effort worthwhile. “There,” said d’Artagnan. “That will make sure we can’t be surprised from behind. And now, forward!”

259 The Oubliette of Sir Mazarin

Upon trying the door through which Mazarin had disappeared, d’Artagnan found that it was locked. “Here’s where we put your shoulder to work,” said d’Artagnan. “Push, friend Porthos but gently, quietly – don’t break anything, just pry it open.”

Porthos pressed his broad shoulder against the door panel that bent enough that d’Artagnan could get the point of his sword between the bolt and the lock’s faceplate. The bolt gave way, and the door opened. “As I’ve always said, friend Porthos, doors, like women, yield best to sweet persuasion.”

“You, Sir,” said Porthos, “are a philosopher.”

“In we go,” said d’Artagnan.

In they went, to a small chamber. Beyond, through a glass door, glowed the cardinal’s lantern that rested on the ground outside. By its light they could see the potted orange trees of the Château de Rueil extending off in two double lines, with a wide path down the centre and a small alley to each side. “But no cardinal,” said d’Artagnan, “only his lantern. Where the devil did he go?”

He went out to explore one side of the path, pointing Porthos toward the other, then suddenly saw that one of the tree-tubs on the left was out of line, and in its former place was a gaping hole. Ten men would have had difficulty lifting that great ceramic pot but by some mechanism it had rotated away from the slab it stood upon. D’Artagnan, as we’ve said, saw the cavity the tree had concealed, and in this hole the steps of a narrow spiral staircase. He called Porthos over with a gesture and showed him the pit and the stairs. The two looked at each other in astonishment. “If all we wanted was gold,” said d’Artagnan, “we’d have just made our fortune, and would be rich for the rest of our lives.”

“How’s that?”

“Don’t you understand, Porthos? In all probability at the foot of these stairs is the famous treasure trove of the old cardinal that everyone talks about. All we’d have to do is go down, tie up the cardinal, fill a box, drag it up the stairs, and put the orange tree back in its place. No one in the world would know where our fortune had come from – and the cardinal would be in no position to tell.”

“That would be quite a coup for a mercenary or rogue,” said Porthos, “but unworthy, it seems to me, of two gentlemen.”

“Agreed,” said d’Artagnan. “That’s why I said, ‘if all we wanted was gold’ – but we’re after something else.”

At that moment there was a noise from the pit. D’Artagnan started, and then leaned forward to listen, hearing a hard and metallic sound, like the clanking of a sack of gold. A door closed below, and the first glimmers of a light shone up the stairs. Mazarin had left his lantern in the orangery to make it look like he’d gone for a walk, then had lit a wax taper to carry into his underground vault. “Say hey!” he said in Italian as he mounted the stairs, hefting a bulging sack of Spanish reals. “This is enough to buy off five Councillors of Parliament and two Parisian generals. I, too, am a great general, though I make war in my own way…”

D’Artagnan and Porthos crouched in the side aisles of the orangery, each behind a potted tree, and waited. Mazarin emerged within three steps of d’Artagnan and pressed a lever hidden in the wall. The slab rotated, and the orange tree atop it returned to its original location. Then the cardinal snuffed out his candle and replaced it in his pocket, picked up his lantern, and said to himself, “Now to go see Sir La Fère.”

Good, that’s our destination as well, thought d’Artagnan. We’ll all go together.

All three began to march, Sir Mazarin down the middle aisle, and Porthos and d’Artagnan, quietly, along the side alleys. The two hung back just enough to avoid the bars of light that shone from the cardinal’s lantern between the rows of trees. Mazarin reached a second glass door without noticing he was followed, the soft sand of the paths deadening the footsteps of his unseen companions. He turned left, into a corridor Porthos and d’Artagnan hadn’t noticed before, then stopped, thoughtfully, before a door. “Ah! Diavolo! I forgot Comminges’s advice that I should bring the soldiers and place them outside the door in case of trouble with this devil. Back we go.”

And, with an impatient gesture, he turned to retrace his steps. “Don’t trouble yourself, My Lord,” said d’Artagnan, smiling, with a courtly bow and his hat in his hand. “We followed Your Eminence each step of the way, and here we are now.”

“Yes, here we are,” said Porthos, with the same polite gestures.

Mazarin darted bewildered looks from one to the other, recognised them both, and dropped his lantern with a moan of terror. D’Artagnan picked it up; luckily it hadn’t been extinguished by its fall. “Oh! Such imprudence, My Lord,” he said. “We can’t go about without a light! Your Eminence might bump into some crate or fall down a hole.”

“Sir d’Artagnan!” murmured Mazarin, paralysed with astonishment.

“Yes, My Lord, in person, and I also have the honour to present Sir du Vallon, my dear friend, whom Your Eminence has been so kind as to take such an interest in.”

And d’Artagnan shone the lamp onto the delighted face of Porthos, who was beginning to understand everything, and was quite proud of it. “You were on your way to see Sir La Fère,” said d’Artagnan. “Far be it from us to interfere with that, My Lord. Please lead on, and we’ll follow.”

Mazarin began to get hold of himself. “Have you been in the orangery for long, Gentlemen?” he asked in a trembling voice as he thought of the visit he’d just made to his treasure vault.

Porthos opened his mouth to reply but d’Artagnan silenced him with a gesture, and Porthos’s mouth slowly closed. “We arrived just moments ago, My Lord,” said d’Artagnan.

Mazarin sighed in relief: he no longer feared for his treasure, merely his own life. A kind of smile passed over his lips. “Come,” he said, “I’m in the snare, Gentlemen, and admit defeat. You want your freedom, no? I give it to you.”

“Oh, My Lord!” said d’Artagnan. “You’re very good to us – but as we already have our freedom, we prefer to ask for something else.”

“You have your freedom?” said Mazarin, suddenly frightened.

“No doubt about it – while on the other hand, you, My Lord, have lost yours. That’s the way of war, My Lord; now there’s just the matter of your ransom.”

Mazarin shuddered from head to toe. His piercing gaze tried in vain to read the mocking visage of the Gascon and the impassive features of Porthos but both their faces were hidden in the shadows, and the Cumaeen Sibyl herself couldn’t have divined anything from them. “Ransom my freedom! Ransom,” repeated Mazarin.

“Yes, My Lord.”

“And how much will it cost me, Sir d’Artagnan?”

“Dame, my Lord, I don’t know yet. We’ll go ask the Count La Fère if Your Eminence will permit. If Your Eminence would deign to open the door that leads to him, we’ll have everything settled within ten minutes.”

Mazarin trembled. “My Lord,” said d’Artagnan, “Your Eminence will recognise that so far we have shown all due respect and asked politely – but we’re obliged to warn you that we have no time to lose. Open up, My Lord, if you please, and remember, above all, that at the first move you make to attempt to escape or cry out, we, who are in a very difficult situation, may be forced to go to extremes.”

“Don’t worry, Gentlemen,” said Mazarin, “I won’t try anything. I give you my word of honour.”

D’Artagnan made a sign to Porthos not to take his eye off Mazarin for a moment, and then said, “Now, my Lord, let’s all go in together.”

260 Negotiations

Mazarin unlocked the bolts and opened the double door, where just inside Athos was waiting to receive the illustrious visitor Comminges had told him to expect. Seeing Mazarin on his threshold, he bowed and said, “Your Eminence could have come without the escort; the honour of your visit is too great for me to forget myself.”

“But my dear Count,” said d’Artagnan, “it wasn’t His Eminence who wanted us along, it was du Vallon and I who insisted on it – perhaps somewhat improperly but we had a great desire to see you.”

At this voice, this mocking accent, and the familiar figure that went with that voice and accent, Athos started in surprise. “D’Artagnan! Porthos!” he cried.

“In person, dear friend.”

“In person!” repeated Porthos.

“What does this mean?” asked the count.

"What it means," replied Mazarin, trying to recover some of his self-possession by forcing a smile, "is that the roles have reversed, and that instead of these gentlemen being my prisoners, I am now theirs, so that you see me obliged to submit to the situation rather than to command it. But, Gentlemen, I warn you that unless you cut my throat, your triumph won't last long. My turn will come, and when it does..."

"Ah, My Lord, don't make threats – it's unbecoming," said d'Artagnan. "We intend to be nothing but sweet and gentle with Your Eminence! Let's set aside anger and ill-humour and try to keep it friendly, shall we?"

"I ask no better, Gentlemen," said Mazarin. "But if we're negotiating my ransom, I don't want you to think your situation is better than it is. By taking me in the snare, you took yourselves with me. How will you get out of it? You can see the bars and the locked gates, see, or rather guess at, how many sentries guard these bars and gates, how many soldiers throng the courtyards, and take stock of your true position. As you can see, I'm being frank with you."

Good! D'Artagnan thought. He's bargaining. Now hold on, for here comes the tricky part.

"I offered you your freedom," continued the minister. "I offer it to you again. If you don't take it, within the hour you'll be discovered, attacked, and probably forced to kill me that would be a horrible crime, unworthy of loyal gentlemen like yourselves."

He's right, thought Athos.

And like every noble idea that passed through his elevated mind, his thought could be read in his eyes. "And therefore," said d'Artagnan, to counter the hope that Athos's silent agreement had given Mazarin, "we recognise that we turn to violence only as an absolute last resort."

"On the other hand," continued Mazarin, "if you accept your freedom from me and let me go..."

"What?" interrupted d'Artagnan. "You want us to accept our freedom from you, even though, as you said yourself, you can take it back again five minutes later? And knowing you, My Lord," added d'Artagnan, "that's exactly what you'd do."

"No, really, faith of a cardinal! ... You don't believe me?"

"My Lord, I don't believe cardinals who were never ordained as priests."

"All right, then – faith of a minister!"

"But you're not a minister now, My Lord, you're a prisoner."

"Then, faith of a Mazarin! I'm still that, I hope."

"Hmm!" said d'Artagnan. "I once heard of a Mazarin who didn't keep his promises, and I fear he might have been one of Your Eminence's ancestors."

"Sir d'Artagnan," said Mazarin, "you have no shortage of wits, and I regret ever quarrelling with you."

"Then, My Lord, let's make up our differences. I ask nothing better."

"Well," said Mazarin, "what if I set you free with a guaranteed security, something visible and tangible...?"

"Ah! That's another thing," said Porthos.

"Let's hear it," said Athos.

"Let's see it," said d'Artagnan.

"But first of all, do you accept?" asked the cardinal.

"Explain your proposal, My Lord, and then we'll see."

"Take note of the fact that you're locked up here."

"But you're well aware, My Lord," said d'Artagnan, "that we have, in extremity, a last resort."

"What's that?"

"We can all die together."

Mazarin shuddered. "There," he said, "at the end of that corridor, is a door to which I have the key. That door opens onto the park. Take this key and go; you're armed, alert, and quick. After a hundred paces, on your left you'll find the wall surrounding the park; go over it, and a few steps beyond it you'll be on the road and free. And as I have reason to know, if you're attacked, that won't be much of an obstacle to your escape."

"Ah! For the love of God, My Lord, that's tangible indeed!" said d'Artagnan. "Where is this key you'd like to offer us?"

"Here it is."

"Then, My Lord," said d'Artagnan, "Please lead us to this door."

"Willingly," said the minister, "if that will make you feel better."

Mazarin, who had never hoped to get off so cheaply, led them cheerfully up the corridor and unlocked the door. It opened onto the park, and the three fugitives immediately felt the chill night wind that swept down the corridor and blew snow in their faces. "The devil!" said d'Artagnan. "It's a wretched dark night, My Lord, and we don't know the way. Since Your Eminence has come so far, perhaps My Lord would go a bit further and lead us to the wall."

"So be it," said the cardinal.

And setting off without hesitation in a straight line, he led them quickly toward the wall, and in less than a minute all four were at its foot. "Are you satisfied, Gentlemen?" asked Mazarin.

"I'd say so! Plague, we're not that hard to please! What an honour – three poor gentlemen escorted by a Prince of the Church! By the way, my Lord, you noted just now that we're quick, alert, and armed?"

"Yes..."

"That's not entirely true – only I and Sir du Vallon have weapons. The count has none, and if we meet a patrol, we'll need to defend ourselves."

"That's true, I suppose."

"Then do you suppose you could find us another sword?" asked Porthos.

"My Lord will lend the count his own," said d'Artagnan, "since it's of no use to him."

"Happily," said the cardinal. "I even invite Sir Count to keep it in memory of me."

"He's very gallant, isn't he, Count?" said d'Artagnan.

"Indeed," replied Athos, "and I promise My Lord to keep it near me always."

"What an exchange of compliments!" said d'Artagnan. "It's deeply moving. Doesn't it bring tears to your eyes, Porthos?"

"Yes," said Porthos, "that, or the wind. I think it might be the wind."

"Now up you go, Athos," said d'Artagnan, "and quickly."

Athos, aided by Porthos, who lifted him like a feather, clambered onto the top of the wall. "Now jump, Athos."

Athos jumped and disappeared down the other side of the wall. "Are you on the ground?" called d'Artagnan.

"Yes."

"Safely?"

"Perfectly so."

"Porthos, keep an eye on Sir Cardinal while I go up – no, I can manage without help. Just watch the cardinal, that's all."

"I'm watching," said Porthos. "...Well?"

"You're right, it's higher than I thought; just lend me your back but without letting go of the cardinal."

"I won't let go."

Porthos lent his back to d'Artagnan, who, thanks to his support, was on top of the wall in an instant. Mazarin looked aside, concealing a smile. "Are you there?" asked Porthos.

"Yes, my friend, and now..."

"Now, what?"

"Now, pass Sir Cardinal up to me – and if he starts to shout, muffle him."

Mazarin wanted to cry out but Porthos enveloped him in both hands and lifted him up to d'Artagnan, who, in his turn, hoisted the cardinal by the collar and sat him down beside him atop the wall. "Sir," d'Artagnan said, "drop down at once, next to Sir La Fère, or I'll kill you out of hand – faith of a gentleman!"

"Sir, Sir!" cried Mazarin. "You're breaking your promise!"

"Me? And just when did I promise you anything, My Lord?"

Mazarin groaned. "I gave you your freedom, Sir," he said. "Your liberty was my ransom."

"To be sure. But what of the ransom for that great treasure buried beneath the orangery where one pushes a lever hidden in the wall that pivots a stone slab that reveals a certain staircase – what of that, my Lord?"

"God!" said Mazarin, clasping his hands together. "My God! I'm ... ruined."

Ignoring these laments, d'Artagnan gripped him under the arms and lowered him gently into the hands of Athos, who stood solid and impassive at the base of the wall. Then, turning to Porthos, d'Artagnan said, "Take my hand and come on up."

Porthos clambered up with an effort that made the whole wall shake, gaining the top. "I didn't quite understand before," he said, "but I understand now. It's pretty funny."

"Do you think so?" said d'Artagnan. "All the better! But let's go quickly, and hope it stays funny to the end."

And he leaped to the ground outside the wall. Porthos followed him. "Keep the cardinal between you, Gentlemen," said d'Artagnan, "while I take the vanguard."

And drawing his sword, he led them into the dark. After a moment he paused and said, "My Lord that way is the high road? Think carefully before replying, for if Your Eminence made a mistake, it could have serious consequences, not least for yourself."

"Follow the wall, Sir," said Mazarin, "and you can't go astray."

The three friends hastened forward but soon had to slow their pace, for the cardinal, though he tried to keep up, couldn't manage it. Suddenly d'Artagnan collided with something warm that trembled slightly. "Hey, a horse!" he said. "I just ran into a horse, Gentlemen!"

"So did I!" said Athos.

"Me, too!" said Porthos who still had the cardinal by the arm, faithful to his orders.

"Now that's what I call a stroke of luck, My Lord," said d'Artagnan, "just when Your Eminence was complaining about having to walk ...."

But as he said these words he felt the barrel of a pistol prod his chest, and heard a grave voice say, "Hands up!"

"Grimaud!" he cried. "Grimaud! What are you doing here? Has heaven sent you to us?"

"No, Sir," said the loyal old servant. "It's Sir Aramis. He posted me here to guard the horses."

"Aramis is here, then?"

"Yes, Sir, since yesterday."

"And what are you doing?"

"We're watching."

"What! Aramis is here?" repeated Athos.

"At the rear gate of the château. That was his post."

"How many men does he have?"

“Sixty.”
“Send to warn him.”
“Right away, Sir.” And thinking that no one could do a better job of it than he, Grimaud took off at full speed, while the three friends gathered themselves and waited. The only unhappy member of the group was Sir Mazarin.

We finally begin to believe that Porthos will become a Baron & D'Artagnan a Captain

Ten minutes later Aramis arrived, accompanied by Grimaud and eight or ten gentlemen. He was radiant and threw his arms around his friends' necks. "You're free then, Brothers! Free without my help! You didn't need a thing from me despite my best efforts!"
"Don't worry about that, dear friend," said d'Artagnan. "Your efforts weren't unneeded, just deferred – because this business is far from over."
"I'd laid my plans well, though," said Aramis. "I got sixty men from the coadjutor, and posted twenty around the walls of the park, twenty on the road from Rueil to Saint-Germain, and twenty scattered through the woods. Thanks to this strategy, I've intercepted two letters from Mazarin to the queen."
Mazarin perked up his ears. "Letters which you've honestly, I hope, returned to the cardinal," said d'Artagnan.
"If only I thought treating him with such forthright chivalry would shame him!" said Aramis. "In one of these dispatches the cardinal complains that the coffers are empty and that Her Majesty has no more money, while the other announces his plan to transport his prisoners to Melun, since Rueil didn't seem safe enough to him. You'll understand, dear friend, what hope I derived from the second letter! I planted my ambuscades around the château, placed my men, kept a supply of horses at hand, overseen by the intelligent Grimaud, and waited for them to bring you out. I hoped to be able to do it without even a skirmish but hadn't really expected to see any action before tomorrow morning. And now tonight you're free, with all combat avoided, and so much the better! How did you manage to escape that weasel of a Mazarin? You must have plenty to complain about his treatment of you."
"Not too much," said d'Artagnan.
"Really!"
"More than that, I'll actually praise him."
"Impossible!"
"Not at all, for it's thanks to him that we're free."
"Thanks to him?"
"Yes, he had us led to the orangery by Sir Bernouin, his valet, and then he himself escorted us to the Count La Fère. Then he offered to grant us our freedom that we accepted, and more than that he was so kind as to lead us to the wall of the park that we climbed over, and outside of which we had the great good fortune to encounter Grimaud."
"Bien," said Aramis, "you're the only one who could reconcile me to him, and I just wish he were here so I could tell him I hadn't thought him capable of such fine behaviour."
"My Lord," said d'Artagnan, unable to contain himself any longer, "permit me to introduce you to Sir Knight d'Herblay, who wishes to offer, as you've heard, his respectful compliments to Your Eminence." And he stepped aside, revealing Mazarin, looking confused and apprehensive, to the bewildered gaze of Aramis. Then Aramis grinned. "Oh ho! What've we here? The cardinal himself – a fine catch indeed! Whoa! Comrades! Bring the horses!" Several cavaliers came running. "For the love of God!" said Aramis. "I think I'll be useful after all. My Lord, I hope Your Eminence will deign to receive my respects. I'll wager it was this Saint Christopher of a Porthos who transported you! By the way, I forgot..."
And he gave an order in a low voice to one of the cavaliers. "I think it would be a good idea to get moving," said d'Artagnan.
"Yes, I'm just waiting for someone ... a friend of Athos."
"A friend of mine?" said the count.
"And here he comes, galloping through the underbrush."
"Sir Count! Sir Count!" called a young voice that made Athos tremble.
"Raoul!" the count cried.
The young man momentarily forgot his usual respect and threw his arms around the count. "You see, Sir Cardinal, what a shame it was to keep separated folk who love each other like we do?" said Aramis. "Gentlemen," he continued, addressing the gathering cavaliers, "surround yourselves carefully around His Eminence to make sure we do him appropriate honour, since he deigns to grant us the favour of his company. I'm sure he'll be grateful. Porthos, never lose sight of His Eminence."
Then Aramis put his head together with those of d'Artagnan and Athos for a brief conference. "Come," said d'Artagnan, after five minutes' discussion. "We're off!"
"But where are we going?" asked Porthos.
"To your place, old friend – to Pierrefonds! Your lovely château is quite worthy enough to offer its noble hospitality to His Eminence. Besides, it's perfectly situated, neither too near nor too far from Paris, enabling easy communication with the capital. Come, My Lord, you'll be treated there like the prince that you are."
"A fallen prince," said Mazarin piteously.
"We all take risks in war, My Lord," replied Athos, "but rest assured we won't abuse our advantage."
"No but we'll certainly use it," said d'Artagnan.
For the rest of the night, the victors rode with the untiring speed of old, with Mazarin, gloomy and pensive, bouncing along in the middle of that troop of racing phantoms. By dawn they had made twelve leagues with barely a pause; half the escort was exhausted, and some of the horses fell to their knees. "The horses of today are not like those of the old days," said Porthos. "Everything decays."
"I've sent Grimaud over to Dammartin," said Aramis. "He's to return with five fresh horses: one for His Eminence and four for us. The critical thing is to keep My Lord close to us; the rest of the escort can rejoin us later. Once we get past Saint-Denis, we've nothing more to fear."
Grimaud in fact returned with five good horses; the local lord he'd gotten them from, being a friend of Porthos, had refused to sell them and had given them as a gift. Ten minutes later they reached Ermenonville, where most of the escort stopped. But the four friends, with renewed spirits, continued on with Sir Mazarin. At noon they entered the broad drive that led to Porthos's Château de Pierrefonds, where they were met by Mousqueton. "Ah!" he said. "Believe me, Sir, this is the first time I've breathed easily since your departure from Pierrefonds."
And he ran off to announce to the other servants the arrival of Sir du Vallon and his friends. "We are four," said d'Artagnan, "so we'll watch My Lord in relays, each three hours long. Athos will inspect the château's defences, with an eye to making them impregnable in the event of a siege, Porthos will attend to the provisions, and Aramis to the barracking of the garrison. In other words, Athos will be chief military engineer, Porthos the quartermaster general, and Aramis personnel officer."
Meanwhile, Mazarin was installed in the most elegant suite in the château. "Gentlemen," he said, once he was settled in his quarters, "you don't expect, I imagine, to keep me here incognito for long?"
"No, My Lord," d'Artagnan replied, "on the contrary, we'll soon publicize the fact that we're holding you."
"Then you'll be besieged."
"We're counting on it."
"And what will you do?"
"We'll defend ourselves. If the late Cardinal Richelieu was still among us, he'd tell you the story of the bastion of Saint-Gervais, where the four of us, with one lackey and twelve dead bodies, held out against an army."
"Such feats may occur once, Sir, and then never recur again."
"But today we have no need to repeat such heroics – for tomorrow the Parisian army will be alerted, and the next day it will be here. The decisive battle will take place, not at Saint-Denis or Charenton but at Compiègne or Villers-Cotterêts."
"Sir Prince will beat you, as he always has."
"It's possible, my Lord – but before the battle we'll send Your Eminence on to another of our friend du Vallon's châteaux, as he has three like this one. We don't want to expose Your Eminence to the hazards of war."
"Come," said Mazarin, "I see that I must capitulate."
"What, before the siege?"
"Yes, the conditions will probably be better."
"My Lord, as far as conditions are concerned, you'll see how reasonable we can be."
"What, then, are your conditions?"
"Let's sleep on it, My Lord, to give us all time to reflect."
"I need no rest, Gentlemen – I need to know whether I'm in the hands of enemies or friends."
"Friends, My Lord, friends!"
"Well, then, tell me right now what you want, so I can see if we can find an agreement. Speak, Sir Count La Fère."
"My Lord," said Athos, "I have nothing to ask for myself, and too much to ask for France. I will therefore defer to Sir Knight d'Herblay."
And Athos bowed, took a step back, and leaned against the mantel, clearly determined to be no more than a spectator at this negotiation. "Speak, then, Sir d'Herblay," said the cardinal. "No evasions or ambiguities, please: be brief, clear, and precise."
"Very well, My Lord, I'll lay my cards on the table."
"Let's see them."
"I have in my saddlebag," said Aramis, "the list of concessions proposed to you the day before yesterday at Saint-Germain, by the deputation of which I was a part. Let's first address the restoration of ancient rights – the articles on this list shall be accepted."
"We were close to agreeing to those anyway," said Mazarin. "Let's pass on to the ... special conditions."
"Do you think we have some?" said Aramis, smiling.
"I think you're not all as selfless as the Count La Fère," said Mazarin, turning toward Athos and saluting him.
"Really? Well, My Lord, you're right," said Aramis, "though I'm glad to see you recognising the count's true worth. Sir La Fère's spirit is a cut above, beyond vulgar desires and human passions; his is an ancient soul, and proud. You're quite right, My Lord, that the rest of us are not of his quality, as we're the first to admit."
"Aramis," said Athos, "is this mockery?"
"No, my dear Count, no, I only say what all of us think, and all who truly know you. But you're right, it wasn't of you we were talking but of My Lord and his unworthy servant the Knight d'Herblay."
"Well! What do you desire, Sir, beyond those general conditions which we'll get back to later?"
"I desire, My Lord that Normandy be officially granted to Madam de Longueville, with full amnesty and five hundred thousand livres. I desire His Majesty the King to stand as godfather to the son to which she's just given birth – and that My Lord, after attending his baptism, shall go and pay his respects to our Holy Father the Pope."
"That is to say, you wish me to relinquish my office as minister, to leave France in self-imposed exile?"
"I wish My Lord to assume the office of pope at the first available vacancy, upon which I reserve the right to ask him for plenary indulgences for myself and my friends."
Mazarin made an indescribable grimace. "And you, Sir?" he asked d'Artagnan.
"I, My Lord," said the Gascon, "am in every respect of the same opinion as Sir Knight d'Herblay – except for the final article, on which I entirely differ. Far from wishing that My Lord should leave France, I want him to continue as prime minister, for My Lord is a great politician. I'll even do my best, as much as it depends upon me, to help him settle his differences with the Frondeurs but only on condition that he remember the king's faithful servants, and that he will give command of the first company of the musketeers to someone I shall designate. And you, du Vallon?"
"Yes, Sir, speak on your own account," said Mazarin.
"I wish," said Porthos, "that Sir Cardinal, to honour the house which has given him asylum, shall, in remembrance of this adventure, elevate my estate to a barony. I also wish the promise of a Knightly Order for one of my friends at Her Majesty's next bestowal."

"You know, Sir, that only those who've proven themselves are eligible for such an Order."

"This friend has been so proven. Besides, if it came to it, My Lord would know how to avoid such formalities."

Mazarin bit his lip; the blow was direct, and he drily replied, "It seems to me these things are hard to reconcile, Gentlemen – if I satisfy some of them, I dissatisfy others. If I stay in Paris I can't go to Rome, and if I become pope I can't remain prime minister – and if I'm not a minister, I can't make Sir d'Artagnan a captain and Sir du Vallon a baron."

"That's true," said Aramis. "Therefore, since I'm in the minority, I hereby withdraw my proposals regarding the trip to Rome and My Lord's resignation."

"I can remain a minister?" said Mazarin.

"You remain a minister; that's agreed, My Lord," said d'Artagnan. "France has need of you."

"Those proposals are withdrawn," said Aramis. "His Eminence will remain prime minister, and even the favourite of Her Majesty, if he deigns to grant me and my friends what we ask for France ... and for ourselves."

"Attend to yourselves, Gentlemen, and let France settle with me as she thinks best," said Mazarin.

"No, that won't do," replied Aramis. "There must be a treaty with the Frondeurs, and Your Eminence will sign it in front of us, while also committing to obtain the queen's ratification of it in every detail."

"I can answer only for myself, I can't answer for the queen," said Mazarin. "What if Her Majesty refuses?"

"Oh," said d'Artagnan, "My Lord knows very well that Her Majesty can refuse him nothing."

"Here, My Lord," said Aramis. "This is the treaty proposed by the deputation of the Fronde; Your Eminence may read and examine it."

"I already know it," said Mazarin.

"Then it only remains to sign it."

"You must realise, Gentlemen, that a signature obtained under these circumstances will be regarded as given under duress."

"My Lord will be available to attest that it was given voluntarily."

"But what, then, if I refuse?"

"Then, My Lord," said d'Artagnan, "Your Eminence will have no one to blame but himself for the consequences of that refusal."

"You would dare to lay hands on a cardinal?"

"You've done no less against His Majesty's Musketeers!"

"The queen will avenge me, Gentlemen!"

"I doubt that she could, though she might have the will to try. But we'll take Your Eminence to Paris, and the Parisians will rally to our defence."

"How worried they must be right now in Rueil and at Saint-Germain!" said Aramis, "Everyone must be asking where the cardinal has gone, what's become of the minister, what's happened to the favourite! They must be seeking My Lord in every nook and cranny! And if the Fronde is aware of My Lord's disappearance, how they must be rejoicing!"

"It's appalling," murmured Mazarin.

"Then sign the treaty, My Lord," said Aramis.

"But what if I sign it and the queen refuses to ratify it?"

"I'll undertake to go see Her Majesty and obtain her signature," said d'Artagnan.

"Take care," said Mazarin. "You might not get the reception at Saint-Germain that you hope for."

"Ah, bah!" said d'Artagnan. "I can arrange things to make sure I'm welcomed; I have a means to do that."

"What?"

"I'll bring Her Majesty that letter in which My Lord announces the complete depletion of the treasury."

"And then?" said Mazarin, turning pale.

"And then, when Her Majesty is at the height of her dismay, I'll escort her to Rueil, lead her to the orangery, and show her a certain lever that moves a certain slab."

"Enough, Sir, enough!" murmured the cardinal. "Where is that treaty?"

"Here it is," said Aramis.

"You see how generous we are," said d'Artagnan, "for we could do many things with such a secret."

"Sign here," said Aramis, handing the cardinal a pen.

Mazarin stood and paced back and forth for a minute, more in distraction than dejection. Then suddenly he stopped and said, "And when I've signed, Gentlemen, what will be my guarantee?"

"My word of honour, Sir," said Athos.

Mazarin trembled, examining for a moment that noble and loyal face, and then taking the pen, he said, "That's good enough for me, Sir Count."

And he signed. "And now, Sir d'Artagnan," he added, "prepare to leave at once for Saint-Germain to carry a letter from me to the queen."

262

More is accomplished with a Pen & a Threat than a Sword & Devotion

D'Artagnan knew at least this much of mythology, that Opportunity has only a tuft of hair to seize it by, and he wasn't a man to let it go by without seizing it. He arranged a means of quick and reliable travel by sending relay horses to Chantilly in advance, so that he could be in Paris in five or six hours. But before leaving he thought about the fact that he, though a man of wit and experience, was about to charge into uncertainty, leaving certainty behind. But was it certainty? "In fact," he said to himself before mounting his horse, "Athos is a hero from romance blinded by his own generosity, Porthos is good-natured but easy to influence, and Aramis is a complete hieroglyphic, impossible to read, capable of anything. What will these three elements produce when I'm not there to regulate them? The release of the cardinal, perhaps. Now, the release of the cardinal would be the ruin of our hopes, and so far, hopes are all we have to show for twenty years of labours compared to which those of Hercules were the work of a pygmy."

He went and found Aramis. "You, my dear Knight d'Herblay," he said, "are the Fronde incarnate. Beware of Athos, who won't stoop to soil his hands with business, not even his own. Be even more wary of Porthos, who, to impress the count, whom he regards as a divinity on earth, would even help Mazarin to escape, if Mazarin cries tears of distress or thinks to appeal to his chivalry."

Aramis smiled a smile that was both shrewd and resolute. "Never fear," he said, "I have my conditions to protect – though I'm working less for myself than for others. For the sake of everyone's rights, I'll make sure that those who are entitled to it reap the profit of this affair."

Good, thought d'Artagnan. I'm not worried about this flank.

He shook hands with Aramis and went to seek Porthos. "Old friend," he said, "you and I have worked hard to build our fortunes, and it would be ridiculous if, just when we're about to reap our rewards, you were tricked out of them by Aramis, who is not without cunning, and who, just between the two of us, sometimes plays his own game. Or to have them slip through our fingers because Athos, though noble and unselfish, can also be careless, because as one who desires nothing for himself, he doesn't weigh the desires of others. What would you say if one of our two friends proposed liberating Mazarin?"

"I'd say we had too much trouble getting him to think of letting him go."

"Bravo, Porthos! And you would be right, my friend, for with him would go your barony that is practically in your hands – not to mention the fact that once free, Mazarin would turn around and sentence you to hang."

"Really! You think so?"

"I'm sure of it."

"Then I'll see him dead before I allow him to escape."

"Good thinking. After all, when we made our original bargain, we weren't beholden to the Frondeurs, who anyway are a bunch of politicians who don't see things like we old soldiers do."

"Don't worry, dear friend," said Porthos. "I'll watch you from the window as you ride away until you've disappeared, and then go and station myself outside the cardinal's door that has a glass pane so I can see everything inside. One false move, and I'll exterminate him."

Bravo! D'Artagnan thought. On this flank, at least, the cardinal is well guarded.

And he shook hands with the master of Pierrefonds and went looking for Athos. When he found him, he said, "My dear Athos, I'm leaving. I have only one thing to say to you: you know Anne of Austria, and you know the continued captivity of Sir Mazarin is my only guarantee of survival. If you let him get away, I'm a dead man."

"It is only that consideration, my dear d'Artagnan that induces me to stoop to the job of jailer. I give you my word that upon your return, you'll find the cardinal where you left him."

That reassures me more than any number of royal signatures, thought d'Artagnan. Now that I have the oath of Athos, I can go.

D'Artagnan rode off alone, with no escort but his sword, and with nothing but a pass from Mazarin ordering his admittance to the presence of the queen. Six hours after leaving Pierrefonds, he arrived at Saint-Germain. Mazarin's disappearance was still unknown to anyone but Anne of Austria, who hid her anxiety from even her most intimate friends. The two Swiss had been discovered bound and gagged in the quarters of d'Artagnan and Porthos but after the use of their limbs and tongues had been restored to them, they could tell only what they knew that was that they'd been jumped, stripped, and tied up. But as to what Porthos and d'Artagnan had done after they'd gotten out, they had no more idea than the other inhabitants of the château. Except for Bernouin, who knew a bit more than the others. Bernouin, not seeing his master return by the time midnight was striking, had taken it upon himself to search the orangery. The furniture barricading the outer door had filled him with suspicions but he kept them to himself and instead undertook patiently to clear the passage. Once he'd reached the inner corridor, he found a whole series of doors standing open. Passing through them and out into the park, it was easy to follow the footprints in the snow to the outer wall. They continued on the other side until they mingled with a trampling of horses' hooves, indicating practically a whole troop of cavalry had ridden off in the direction of Enghien. From that moment he had no doubt but that the cardinal had been abducted by the three prisoners, since they had disappeared with him, and he had ridden to Saint-Germain at once to warn the queen of the cardinal's capture. Anne of Austria had commanded Bernouin to tell no one, and he'd obeyed her scrupulously. She informed only Sir Prince, to whom she told everything, and the Prince had immediately put five or six hundred riders into the environs of Rueil, ordered to detain any suspicious group riding away from the château and bring them at once to Saint-Germain. Now, d'Artagnan wasn't a group, as he was alone, and since he wasn't riding away from Rueil but rather toward Saint-Germain, no one paid any attention to him, so he didn't run into any trouble. Upon entering the courtyard of the Château de Saint-Germain, the first person our ambassador saw was Bernouin himself, who was loitering at the gates, waiting for word of his missing master. At the sight of d'Artagnan riding into the courtyard, Bernouin rubbed his eyes, thinking he must be mistaken. But d'Artagnan gave him a friendly salute, dismounted, and, tossing the bridle into the hands of a footman, advanced smiling toward the minister's valet. "Sir d'Artagnan!" cried Bernouin, like a man having a nightmare and calling out in his sleep. "Sir d'Artagnan!"

"Himself, Sir Bernouin."

"But what are you doing here?"

"Bringing you news of Sir Mazarin, news piping hot."

"And what has become of him?"

"He's as well as you or me."

"He's come to no harm, then?"

"None whatsoever. He just felt the need to take a tour of the Île-de-France, and begged Sir Count La Fère, Sir du Vallon, and myself to accompany him. We're too much his humble servants to refuse such a request. We left last night, and here we are."

"... And here you are?"

"His Eminence had something to convey to Her Majesty, something private and intimate, a mission that could be entrusted only to a proven man, so he sent me to Saint-Germain. So, my dear Sir Bernouin, if you wish to serve your master well, please inform Her Majesty that I'm coming to see her, and for what purpose."

Whether he was speaking seriously or whether these remarks were some sort of jest, it was nonetheless clear that under the circumstances d'Artagnan was the only man able to put Anne of Austria's mind at rest, so Bernouin didn't hesitate about going to inform her of his unusual request. And as he'd foreseen, the queen ordered him to admit d'Artagnan at once. D'Artagnan approached his sovereign with all the signs of deepest respect. Arriving three paces in front of her, he went down on one knee and presented his letter. This, as we’ve said, was a simple note, half of introduction, half a request for an audience. The queen, reading it, recognised the cardinal’s handwriting, though her own hand trembled slightly. But as the note said nothing of what had happened, she asked for details. D’Artagnan told her everything with that simple, forthright air he could employ so well in the right circumstances. The queen, as he spoke, regarded him with increasing astonishment; she couldn’t understand how a man could dare to conceive such an undertaking, let alone have the audacity to recount it to one who had almost a duty to punish him for it. “What, Sir!” the queen cried, red with indignation, when he’d finished his account. “You dare to confess such a crime to me! To tell me of your treason!”

“Your pardon, Madam but I must have explained things poorly, or Your Majesty has misunderstood, for there’s neither crime nor treason in this. Sir Mazarin put Sir du Vallon and myself in prison because we couldn’t believe he’d sent us to England to stand quietly aside while they cut off the head of King Charles I, the brother-in-law of your husband the late king and the spouse of Madam Henriette your sister, so we did all we could to save the life of the royal martyr. We were therefore certain, my friend and I, that there’d been some sort of mistake, and an explanation of some sort was needed between ourselves and His Eminence. Now, an explanation touching on such matters must be conducted in security and privacy, away from the eyes and ears of meddling subordinates. And so, we escorted the cardinal to my friend’s château, where we had our explanation. And, well, Madam! As we’d foreseen, there had been a mistake. Sir Mazarin had been under the impression we’d served General Cromwell instead of King Charles, a thing that would have been a disgrace that stained us, the cardinal, and even Your Majesty, an act of cowardice that might have cast a shadow even upon the royalty of our illustrious son. Now that we’ve provided him with proof to the contrary, we’re ready to give it as well to Your Majesty herself, by appealing to the august widow who weeps in the Louvre, where your royal munificence has granted her hospitality. This proof has so thoroughly satisfied the cardinal that, as evidence of his satisfaction, he’s sent me, as Your Majesty can see, to talk with Madam about what reparations are due to gentlemen so poorly appreciated and wrongly persecuted.”

“I hear you and must say I admire you, Sir,” said Anne of Austria. “In truth, I’ve rarely seen such boundless impudence.”

“Come,” said d’Artagnan. “I see that Her Majesty is, in her turn, as deceived about our intentions as Sir Mazarin was.”

“You are mistaken, Sir,” said the queen. “In fact, I am so little deceived that, within ten minutes, you will be under arrest, and in an hour I’ll leave at the head of my army to go rescue my minister.”

“I’m sure Your Majesty will commit no such imprudence,” said d’Artagnan, “because it would be useless and would result in serious consequences. Before he could be rescued Sir Cardinal would be dead, and His Eminence is so entirely convinced of the truth of what I say that on the contrary he asked me, in case Your Majesty should be inclined to make such a decision, to do everything I could to get her to reconsider.”

“Well! I can at least be satisfied by having you arrested.”

“Not really, Madam, for precautions have also been taken for that contingency, as well as for attempts to rescue the cardinal. If I haven’t returned by a certain time tomorrow, the following day the cardinal will be taken to Paris.”

“You will find, Sir, that in your situation you’ve been out of touch with people and events, or you’d know that the cardinal has already visited Paris five or six times since we left it, and that he saw Sir Beaufort, Sir Bouillon, Sir Coadjuteur, and Sir d’Elbeuf, and that not one of them even considered having him arrested.”

“Your pardon, Madam but I know all that, so it’s not to Sir Beaufort, Sir Bouillon, Sir Coadjuteur, or Sir d’Elbeuf that the cardinal would be brought, because those gentlemen make war on their own accounts, and can therefore be bought cheaply. Instead he’d be taken to parliament that can be purchased piecemeal but not even Sir Mazarin himself is wealthy enough to buy it en masse.”

“I believe,” said Anne of Austria, glaring at him, a look that would have been contemptuous in a woman but was terrible in a queen, “that you are threatening the mother of your king.”

“Madam,” said d’Artagnan, “I threaten only because I must. I speak above my station only because I must place myself on the level of people and events. But believe one thing above all, Madam, the truth that the heart in my breast beats for you, and that you have been the constant idol of our lives that we have, as you well know, risked many times for Your Majesty. Come, Madam, won’t Your Majesty have pity on her servants, who’ve been labouring for twenty years in the shade, without uttering a single syllable about the solemn and sacred secrets they had the honour to learn on your behalf? Look at me, who is speaking to you now, Madam, and whom you accuse of raising my voice and taking a threatening tone. Who am I? A poor officer without fortune, without family, and without a future if the regard of my queen that I’ve sought for so long, doesn’t fall on me for a moment. Look at Sir Count La Fère, a paragon of the nobility, who took sides with those opposing his queen – or rather, her minister – and yet makes no demands. Look, at last, at Sir du Vallon, that loyal soul, that iron arm, who’s been waiting twenty years for the word from your lips that will make him, by a coat of arms, what he is already in courage and in heart. And consider your people, who are certainly the care of a queen – your people, who love you but are starving, who ask no better than to bless you but who ... no, I’m wrong, your people will never curse you, Madam. Well! Say the word, and all is over: war gives way to peace, tears to joy, and calamity to happiness.”

Anne of Austria looked with some astonishment at the martial face of d’Artagnan that showed an unexpected look of tenderness. “Why didn’t you say all this before acting?” she said.

“Because action, it seems to me, was needed to prove to Your Majesty something which she doubted: that we still have courage and worth, and that those qualities should be valued.”

“And that courage will face any threat, from what I’ve seen,” said Anne of Austria.

“It’s never retreated from anything in the past,” said d’Artagnan. “Why should it do less in the future?”

“And this courage in the event of a refusal and consequently a struggle, would it go so far as to take me from the midst of my Court and give me up to the Fronde as you threaten to do with my minister?”

“That thought never occurred to us, Madam,” said d’Artagnan with the Gascon bombast that in him was mere candour. “But if the four of us resolved to do it, we’d certainly succeed.”

“I ought to have known that,” murmured Anne of Austria. “They are men of iron.”

“Alas, Madam!” said d’Artagnan. “That proves my point for it’s only now that Your Majesty sees us as we truly are.”

“But now,” said Anne, “If I see it at last...”

“Your Majesty will do us justice. When she does us justice, she will no longer treat us as common men – she’ll see me as an ambassador worthy to discuss the high matters he’s been entrusted with.”

“Where is the treaty?”

“Here.”

Anne of Austria cast her eyes over the treaty d’Artagnan had presented to her. “I see nothing but general conditions,” she said. “The interests of Gentlemen de Conti, de Beaufort, de Bouillon, d’Elbeuf, and the coadjutor are all addressed. But yours?”

“We render ourselves justice, Madam, without presuming to undue status. Our names aren’t worthy of appearing next to these.”

“But you’ve not, I presume, renounced your pretensions in person?”

“I believe you’re a great and powerful queen, Madam, and it would be beneath your greatness and your power not to reward properly those arms that will bring back His Eminence to Saint-Germain.”

“Such is my intention,” said the queen. “Come, speak.”

“Forgive me if I begin with myself but I must assume a priority, not that I’ve taken but was given to me: he who has negotiated the redemption of the cardinal ought to be, for the reward to be worthy of Your Majesty, appointed a chief of the royal guards, probably the Captain of the King’s Musketeers.”

“You’re asking me for Sir Tréville’s position!”

“That position is vacant, Madam, since Sir Tréville’s retirement last year, and hasn’t been filled.”

“But that’s one of the premier military offices in the king’s household!”

“Sir Tréville was a simple cadet from Gascony like me, Madam, and he held that office for twenty years.”

“You have an answer for everything, Sir,” said Anne of Austria.

And she took from a desk an order of brevet, filled it out, and signed it. “Certainly, Madam,” said d’Artagnan, taking the order and bowing, “this is a fine and noble reward – but the world is full of uncertainty, and a man who fell from Your Majesty’s favour one day would lose this office the next.”

“What do you want, then?” said the queen, blushing at the way this man’s subtle mind had read her own.

“A payment of a hundred thousand livres to the poor Captain of the Musketeers on the day when his services are no longer agreeable to Your Majesty.”

Anne hesitated. “I must point out that the Parisians, just the other day,” continued d’Artagnan, “offered, by decree of parliament, six hundred thousand livres to anyone who would deliver them the cardinal, dead or alive – to hang him if alive, and drag him through the streets if dead.”

“I suppose, then,” said Anne of Austria, “that your request is reasonable, since you ask for only one-sixth what the Parliament proposed to pay.”

And she signed a note promising a hundred thousand livres. “What next?” she said.

“Madam, my friend du Vallon is rich, and therefore seeks no monetary reward but I seem to recall that there was a discussion between him and Sir Mazarin about elevating his domain to the status of a barony. In fact, it was a promise.”

“A country bumpkin!” said Anne of Austria. “People will laugh.”

“Let them,” said d’Artagnan. “But there’s one thing I’m sure of: no one who laughs at him will do so more than once.”

“Approval for the barony,” said Anne of Austria.

She signed. “Now there just remains the Knight, or the Abbot d’Herblay, as Your Majesty prefers.”

“He wants to be a bishop?”

“No, Madam, he requests nothing so high or so difficult.”

“What, then?”

“For the king to stand as godfather to the son of Madam Longueville.” The queen smiled mockingly. “Sir Longueville is of royal blood, Madam,” said d’Artagnan.

“Yes,” said the queen, “but is his son?”

“His son should be, Madam, since his mother’s husband is.”

“And your friend has nothing more to ask for ... Madam de Longueville?”

“No, Madam – for he presumes that His Majesty the King, deigning to stand as the child’s godfather, can’t possibly present his mother a gift of less than five hundred thousand livres, as well as preserving his father’s status as governor of Normandy.”

“I think I can commit to the government of Normandy,” said the queen, “but as to the five hundred thousand livres, the cardinal never ceases to tell me that the coffers of State are empty.”

“We shall search the coffers ourselves, Madam, if Your Majesty will allow it, and I’m sure we’ll find it.”

“What else?”

“Else, Madam?”

“Yes.”

“That’s everything.”

“Don’t you have a fourth companion?”

“True, Madam, the Count La Fère.”

“What does he ask for?”

“He asks for nothing.”

“Nothing?”

“Yes.”

“Is there a man in the world who, when in a position to ask, asks for nothing?”

“There is the Count La Fère, Madam – but the Count La Fère isn’t a man.”

“What is he, then?”

“The Count La Fère is a demigod.”

“Has he not a son or a nephew, a young man whom Comminges spoke of as a brave lad, who brought the battle flags from Lens with Sir Châtillon?”

“He has, as Your Majesty says, a ward called the Viscount of Bragelonne.”

“If we offered this young man a regiment, what would his guardian say?”

“He might, perhaps, accept it.”

"Perhaps!"

"Yes, if Your Majesty asked him to do so."

"He's an unusual man, Sir, as you yourself said. Well, we'll think about it, and we may perhaps ask him to take it. Are you satisfied, Sir?"

"Yes, your Majesty. But there is one thing the queen hasn't yet signed."

"What's that?"

"The most important thing of all."

"My acceptance of the treaty?"

"Yes."

"No hurry. I'll sign the treaty tomorrow."

"The one thing I can definitely say to Your Majesty," said d'Artagnan, "is that if Your Majesty doesn't sign the treaty today, she'll never find the time to sign it later. Be so good, I beg of you, as to write at the bottom of this summary that as you can see is entirely in the handwriting of Sir Mazarin, 'I consent to ratify the treaty proposed by the Parisians.'"

Anne was caught; there was no way to back down, she had to sign it. But scarcely had she put down the plume before pride burst forth in her like a tempest, and she began to weep helplessly – for at that time queens wept like ordinary women. D'Artagnan was taken aback by these tears. The Gascon shook his head – for these royal tears burned his heart. "Madam," he said, kneeling, "behold this unhappy gentleman prostrate at your feet. He begs you to believe that at a single gesture from Your Majesty, he would be capable of anything. He has faith in himself, he has faith in his friends, all he wants is to have faith in his queen. And as proof that he fears nothing, that he threatens nothing, he will bring back Sir Mazarin without conditions. Here, Madam, take back Your Majesty's sacred signatures; if you think I should have them back again, that's up to you. But from this moment on, you're committed to nothing."

And d'Artagnan, still on his knees, his eyes flashing with pride and courage, returned to Anne of Austria that stack of papers which he had won from her one by one, and with such effort. There are moments – for if all is not good in this world, neither is all bad – when in the hardest and coldest heart there springs, watered by the tears of great emotion, a generous upwelling of feeling that calculation and pride would stifle if there was nothing noble to counter them. Anne was caught in one of those moments. D'Artagnan, by yielding to the urging of his own heart that beat in harmony with that of the queen, accomplished a great feat of diplomacy. And he was immediately rewarded for his devotion – or his wisdom, depending on whether one wishes to honour his heart or his mind. "You were right, Sir," said Anne. "I had misjudged you. Here are the signed orders that I freely return to you. Go, and as soon as you can, bring the cardinal back to me."

"Madam," said d'Artagnan, "twenty years ago – for I have a good memory – I had the honour, from behind a tapestry at the Hôtel de Ville, to kiss one of your beautiful hands."

"Here's the other," said the queen, "and that the left should be no less generous than the right" – she drew from her finger a diamond nearly as fine as the original – "take and keep this ring in memory of me."

"Madam," said d'Artagnan, rising, "I have but one desire that is that the first thing you'll ask of me is my life."

And then, with that stride that belonged to him alone, he turned and went out. "I've badly misjudged those men," said Anne of Austria, following d'Artagnan with her eyes, "and now it's too late for me to use them, for in a year the king will be old enough to rule!"

Fifteen hours later, d'Artagnan and Porthos brought Mazarin back to the queen, and received, the one his promotion to the rank of Captain-Lieutenant of the Musketeers, and the other, his elevation to the baronetcy. "Well! Are you satisfied?" asked Anne of Austria.

D'Artagnan bowed. But Porthos turned his letter patent over and over in his hands, and looked at Mazarin. "What is it, then?" asked the minister.

"It's just that, My Lord, there was talk of the promise of a knightly order at the first promotion."

"But you know, Sir Baron," said Mazarin, "that one can't become a Knight of the Order without proof of valour."

"Oh!" said Porthos. "It wasn't for me, My Lord, that I requested the cordon bleu."

"For who, then?" asked Mazarin.

"For my friend, Sir Count La Fère."

"Oh!" said the queen. "That's another thing entirely. His valour is proven."

"He'll have it?"

"It's done." That very day the Treaty of Paris was signed and it was proclaimed everywhere that the cardinal had sequestered himself for three days while he worked out the details. Here's what was gained by this famous treaty: Sir Conti got Damvilliers, and, having proven himself as a general, obtained the right to remain a Man of the Sword and not have to become a cardinal. Furthermore, there was some talk of his marrying one of Mazarin's nieces, talk that was heard with favour by the prince, since, after all, he had to marry someone. Sir Duke Beaufort returned to Court with reparations for all the injuries he'd suffered, and with all the honours due to his rank. He was granted full amnesty for all those who'd helped him to escape, the return of the admiralty once held by his father the Duke Vendôme, and an indemnity for those houses and châteaux which had been demolished by the Parliament of Brittany. The Duke Bouillon received domains equal in value to his lost principality of Sedan, an indemnity for eight years of his non-enjoyment of said principality, and the title of prince thereafter accorded to him and the descendants of his house. The Duke Longueville was made governor of Pont-de-l'Arche in Normandy, received five hundred thousand livres for his wife, and the honour of seeing his son held at the baptismal font by the young king and young Henrietta of England. (Aramis had stipulated that Bazin would officiate at this rite, and Planchet would cater the reception.) The Duke d'Elbeuf obtained the payment of certain sums due to his wife, one hundred thousand livres for his eldest son, and twenty-five thousand for each of his other three. Only the coadjutor had been given nothing. It was promised that negotiations would be opened with the pope to get him a cardinal's hat but he knew not to depend on such promises from the queen and Mazarin. Unlike Sir Conti, who had won the right not to become a cardinal, he was obliged to remain a Man of the Sword. So, while all Paris rejoiced in anticipation of the return of the king, set for the following day, Gondy alone, left out of the general joy, sent for the two men he usually called upon when in a dark frame of mind. These two men were the Count Rochefort and the beggar of Saint-Eustache. Both arrived with their usual punctuality, and the coadjutor spent most of the night talking with them.

263

It can be Harder for a King to Return to his Capital than Leaving it

While d'Artagnan and Porthos were returning the cardinal to Saint-Germain, Athos and Aramis, who had parted from them at Saint-Denis, had returned to Paris, where each of them had a visit to make. Aramis went without delay straight to the Hôtel de Ville, where Madam de Longueville held court. When she was first told of the peace the lovely duchess responded with anger and dismay. War had made her a queen, and peace would mean an abdication; she declared she'd never accept the treaty and vowed eternal conflict. But when Aramis painted this peace in its true light, pointing out its advantages, such as trading a precarious royalty in war-torn Paris for the secure vicereignty of Pont-de-l'Arche – in other words, all of Normandy – when she thought of what she could do with the five hundred thousand livres promised by the cardinal, and when she considered the honour the king would do her child by holding him at the baptismal font, she stopped being serious in her complaints, though she continued her protests in that way that pretty women have, defending herself only to make her surrender worthwhile. Aramis pretended to believe in her protests, not wanting to deny himself the merit of having won her over. "Madam," he said to her, "you're seeking a way to defeat your brother, Sir Prince, that is, the greatest commander of our age and when women of genius want something, they always succeed. And you've succeeded: Sir Prince's beaten since he can no longer wage war. Now begin to draw him to our party. Gently detach him from the queen whom he dislikes and Sir Mazarin whom he despises. The Fronde is a comedy of which we've played only the first act. We'll have our reckoning with Sir Mazarin in the finale on that day when Sir Prince turns against the Court, thanks to you."

Madam de Longueville was persuaded. The duchess had so much faith in the power of her beautiful eyes that she had no doubt they could influence even Sir Condé – and rightfully so, according to the scandalous accounts of the time. Athos, on leaving Aramis at the Place Royale, had gone to see Madam de Chevreuse. Here was another leading Frondeuse to win over but she was more difficult to convince than her younger rival, as no conditions had been stipulated in her favour. Sir Chevreuse was not to be appointed any province's governor, and if the queen agreed to be a godmother it could be only to a grandchild. Thus, at the first words of peace, Madam de Chevreuse frowned fiercely, and despite all Athos's logical arguments that to continue the war was impossible, she insisted on further hostilities. "My lovely friend," said Athos, "please hear me when I tell you everyone is sick of the war, that everyone, except perhaps you and the coadjutor, are ready for peace. You will get yourself exiled as in the time of King Louis XIII. Believe me, we're beyond the age of cabals and intrigues, and your beautiful eyes weren't made to be reddened by weeping for Paris, where there will always be two queens so long as you are here."

"Oh!" said the duchess. "I can't make war by myself but I can avenge myself on this ingrate of a queen and this upstart of a favourite ... and, faith of a duchess, I will be avenged!"

"Madam," said Athos, "I implore you, do nothing to endanger Sir Bragelonne's future. His career is launched, Sir Prince is fond of him, and he is young – let him find his footing alongside his young king. Alas! Excuse my weakness, Madam, there comes a time when a man sees himself born again in his children."

The duchess smiled, half tenderly, half ironically. "Count," she said, "you've been won over, I fear, to the party of the Court. Is that the cordon bleu of a knightly order I see there in your pocket?"

"Yes, Madam," said Athos, "I have the Order of the Garter that King Charles presented to me a few days before his death."

The count spoke the truth: he was unaware of Porthos's request on his behalf and knew of no other order. "Let's go! Then I suppose I must become an old woman," said the duchess, rueful.

Athos took up her hand and kissed it. She looked at him and sighed. "Count," she said, "it must be a charming locale, your Bragelonne. You're a man of exquisite taste: you must have water, woods, and gardens."

She sighed anew and rested her lovely head on her coquettishly curved hand, admirable as ever in contour and colour. "Madam," replied the count, "I was lost – what did you say just now? Never have you been more youthful and more beautiful."

The duchess shook her head. "Will Sir Bragelonne stay in Paris?" she said.

"Do you think he should?" asked Athos.

"Leave him to me," replied the duchess.

"No, Madam – perhaps you've forgotten the story of Oedipus but I haven't."

"How charming you are, Count. In truth, I believe I'd like to spend a month at this Bragelonne of yours."

"But wouldn't that make me too great an object of envy, Duchess?" Athos replied gallantly.

"No, I'd go incognito, under the name of Marie Michon."

"You are adorable, Madam."

"But as to Raoul, don't let him stay there."

"Why not?"

"Because he's in love."

"He, a child!"

"But it's a child whom he loves."

That made Athos thoughtful. "You're right, Duchess – this intense love for a child of seven will break his heart someday. There will be fighting in Flanders; he shall go."

"Then, when the time comes, you'll send him to me, and I'll armour him against love."

"Alas, Madam!" said Athos. "These days love is like war, and armour has become useless."

At that moment Raoul entered; he'd come to announce to the count and the duchess that he'd heard from his friend, the Count Guiche, that the solemn return to Paris of the king, the queen, and her minister was to take place the following day. The next day, at dawn, the Court made its preparations to leave Saint-Germain. The queen, on the previous evening, had sent for d'Artagnan. "Sir," she had said to him, "I've been told that Paris is still unsettled, and I fear for the king. Stay near the carriage's right door, where he will sit."

"Your Majesty can rest easy," said d'Artagnan. "I'll answer for the king."

And saluting the queen, he went out. Upon leaving the queen's quarters, Bernouin informed d'Artagnan that the cardinal awaited him on a matter of importance. He went straight to the cardinal's study.

"Sir," said the cardinal, "there's talk there may be a riot in Paris. I shall be sitting to the left of the king, and as I'm the main one who's threatened, prepare to guard the carriage's left door."

"Your Eminence can rest easy," said d'Artagnan. "They won't touch a hair of your head. The devil!" he said, once outside in the antechamber. "How do I get out of this one? I can't be at both doors of the carriage at the same time. Ah, bah! I'll guard the king and Porthos will guard the cardinal."

This arrangement suited everyone, a thing almost unprecedented. The queen had confidence in the courage of d'Artagnan, whom she knew, and the cardinal in the strength of Porthos that he'd felt personally. The procession set out for Paris in a prearranged order: Guitaut and Comminges marched in advance at the head of the guards, then came the royal carriage, with d'Artagnan at one door and Porthos at the other, and then the King's Musketeers, for twenty-two years the comrades of d'Artagnan, who'd been their lieutenant for twenty, and their captain since yesterday. On arriving at the city gate, the carriage was greeted by loud cries of "Long live the king!" and "Long live the queen!"

There were even a few lone cries of "Long live Mazarin!" But no one else took them up. They were headed for Notre-Dame, where a Te Deum was to be sung. The entire population of Paris was in the streets; the Swiss Guards lined both sides of the route but as the route was long, the line was only one man deep, with a soldier every six or eight paces. This barrier was quite insufficient; from time to time the dyke broke under the flood of people, and it took forever to reform it. At every rupture, however benevolent, since the Parisians just wanted to see their king and their queen, of whom they'd been deprived for a year, Anne of Austria glanced anxiously at d'Artagnan, who reassured her with a smile. Mazarin who'd spent a thousand Louis for the cries of "Long live Mazarin!"

And not thought the shouts he had heard worth 20 pistoles was also looking anxiously at Porthos. But his gigantic bodyguard replied to these looks in his sonorous bass voice with, "Never fear, my Lord,"

So Mazarin was less and less worried. When they reached the Royal Palace, the crowd was even thicker; it flowed toward that spot from every adjacent street, and one could see, like a cresting river, the flood of the populace surging toward the carriage, and roaring loudly down the Rue Saint-Honoré. When they reached the palace square, it resounded with loud cries of "Long live Their Majesties!" Mazarin leaned out his door, and two or three shouts of "Long live the cardinal!" greeted his appearance.

But they were followed by a storm of whistles and boos. Mazarin turned pale and fell back inside. "Rabble!" muttered Porthos.

D'Artagnan said nothing but twisted his moustache with a gesture that indicated his Gascon good humour was giving way to irritation. Anne of Austria leaned toward the ear of the young king and said in a low voice, "Salute Sir d'Artagnan graciously, my son, and say a few words to him."

The young king leaned out the window of his door. "I've not yet wished you hello today, Sir d'Artagnan," he said, "but you'd know that I recognise you – it was you behind the curtains of my bed, that night when the Parisians wanted to see me sleeping."

"And if the king will permit it," said d'Artagnan, "it will always be me who's near him whenever danger threatens."

"Sir," said Mazarin to Porthos, "what would you do if the entire mob rushed us?"

"I'd kill as many of them as I could, My Lord," said Porthos.

"Hmm!" said Mazarin. "No matter how brave and strong you are, you couldn't kill them all."

"You may be right," said Porthos, standing in his stirrups to survey the immense crowd. "It's true, there are a lot of them."

"I think I'd rather have the other bodyguard," muttered Mazarin.

And he sat farther back in the carriage. The queen and her minister were right to be worried, or at least the latter was. The crowd, while continuing to show respect and even affection for the king and the queen regent, began to grow more agitated. The procession heard a rising sound that, when heard above the sea's waves, indicated the onslaught of a tempest, and when heard above a multitude, indicated an oncoming riot. D'Artagnan turned toward the musketeers and made a small but significant nod toward the crowd, a gesture understood by his brave elite guards. The ranks of the riders tightened up, and a shudder ran through the men. At the Barrière des Sergents the procession ground to a halt. Comminges left the head of the escort and came back to the royal carriage. The queen questioned d'Artagnan with a look, and he replied the same way. "Onward. Push forward," said the queen.

Comminges returned to his post. With an effort, the vanguard pushed through the human wall, though not without some violence. Ugly shouts rose from the crowd, this time aimed not just at the minister but at the king. "Forward!" D'Artagnan loudly cried.

"Forward!" repeated Porthos.

But, as if the multitude had only waited for a single incident to change its nature, all the hostility that had formerly been restrained suddenly burst forth. "Down with Mazarin! Death to the cardinal!" Shouts came from all sides. At the same time, from the Rue de Grenelle-Saint-Honoré and the Rue du Coq came a double surge that broke though the thin line of Swiss Guards, two fierce currents that swirled right up to the sides of the horses of d'Artagnan and Porthos. This new irruption was more dangerous than anything before, for it consisted of armed men, with weapons better than those the common people usually bore. It was easy to see that this was no random movement of malcontents but rather a deliberate attack, organised by someone with a grasp of command. Each attacking column was led by a chief, one of whom seemed to be, not one of the common people but instead a ragged beggar, whereas the other, though dressed as a bourgeois, couldn't conceal the demeanour of a gentleman. The two were evidently allies. As the streams converged the royal carriage felt a tremendous jolt. Then thousands of cries were heard, the genuine clamour of a riot, punctuated by two or three gunshots. "Musketeers, to me!" cried d'Artagnan.

The troop of musketeers advanced in two lines, one to the right of the carriage, the other to the left: one to the aid of d'Artagnan, the other to the aid of Porthos. Then a pitched mêlée ensued, all the more terrible as it seemed to have no purpose, all the more desperate as it seemed no one knew whom they were fighting or why. Like all such mad movements of crowds, the shock of this savage charge was terrible. The musketeers, badly outnumbered, unable in the press to move or turn their mounts, began to get separated. D'Artagnan moved to lower the carriage's shutters but the young king waved him away, saying, "No, Sir d'Artagnan, I want to see."

"If Your Majesty wants to see, then let him look!" said d'Artagnan. And turning around with that fury that made him so terrible in battle, he spurred toward the leader of the rioters, who, with a pistol in one hand and a long sword in the other, was fighting his way toward the carriage, engaging two musketeers at once. "Give way, God be with you!" shouted d'Artagnan. "Give way!" At this voice, the man with the pistol and the long sword looked up but too late: d'Artagnan's rapier thrust took him through the chest. "Ah! By the belly of the Grey Saint!" cried d'Artagnan, withdrawing his sword too late. "Why the devil did it have to be you, Count?"

"To fulfil my destiny," said Rochefort, falling to one knee. "Ah! I've recovered from three of your sword-thrusts – but I won't recover from the fourth."

"Count," said d'Artagnan, voice choking, "I struck without knowing it's you. I'd be forever sorry if I sent you to your death and you died hating me for it." Rochefort extended a hand to d'Artagnan and d'Artagnan took it. The count tried to speak but a gush of blood filled his mouth, he stiffened in a final convulsion and died. "Back, you rabble!" snarled d'Artagnan. "Your chief is dead, and you have no more business here." In fact, as if the Count Rochefort had been the soul of the attack on the king's side of the carriage, the mob that had followed and obeyed him turned and ran when they saw him fall. D'Artagnan led a charge of twenty musketeers up the Rue du Coq and that side of the riot blew away like smoke, scattering across the Place de Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois and toward the quays. D'Artagnan turned back to assist Porthos, in case he needed it but Porthos, on his side, had done his work with the same thoroughness as d'Artagnan. The left side of the coach was cleared, and its shutter was slowly raising, as Mazarin, less bellicose than the king, tentatively took a look outside. Porthos seemed melancholy. "Why the devil do you look so glum, Porthos?" said d'Artagnan. "That's a strange attitude for a victor."

"But you yourself seem more than a little upset," said Porthos.

"And I have cause. God be with you! I just killed an old friend."

"Really?" said Porthos. "Who?"

"That poor Count Rochefort ...."

"Well, I'm in the same boat! I just killed someone whose face I thought I recognised. Unfortunately, I struck him in the head, and in a moment his face was covered with blood."

"Did he say anything as he fell?"

"He did! He said, 'Oaf!'"

"I see," said d'Artagnan, unable to contain a laugh. "If that's all he said, that didn't tell you much about him."

"Well, Sir?" asked the queen.

"Madam," said d'Artagnan, "the road is perfectly free, and Your Majesty can continue on her way."

In fact, the entire procession arrived without accident at the Cathedral of Notre-Dame, on the steps of which all the clergy, the coadjutor at their head, awaited the king, the queen, and the minister, for whose blessed return they were to sing the Te Deum. During the service, as it was approaching its end, a frightened young gamin entered the church, ran to the sacristy, quickly donned the robe of a choirboy, and, slipping through the crowded church thanks to the sacred vestments he wore, approached Bazin where the beadle, clothed in his blue robe and holding his silver-crowned staff, stood gravely across from the Swiss Guard at the entrance to the choir. Bazin felt a furtive tug at his sleeve. His eyes, beatifically raised toward heaven, slowly descended toward earth until he recognised Friquet. "What is it, little clown?" asked the beadle. "How dare you disturb me in the exercise of my holy duties?"

"Do you remember, Sir Bazin," said Friquet, "that Sir Maillard, the holy water dispenser at Saint-Eustache?"

"Yes. What of him?"

"Well, in the riot he got hit in the head by a big sword, swung by a great giant wearing gold lace on every seam."

"Indeed?" said Bazin. "In that case, he must be badly injured."

"So badly injured that he's dying, and says he wants to confess to Sir Coadjuteur, who has the power, he says, to forgive even the greatest sins."

"And does he imagine that Sir Coadjuteur will take the trouble to see him?"

"Yes, because it seems Sir Coadjuteur promised to do just that."

"And who told you that?"

"Sir Maillard himself."

"Then you've seen him?"

"Certainly, I was there when he was struck down."

"And what were you doing there?"

"Doing? I was shouting, 'Down with Mazarin! Death to the cardinal! Hang the Italian! Isn't that what you told me to shout?'"

"Not so loud, little clown!" said Bazin, looking anxiously around him.

"So, he said to me, this poor Sir Maillard, 'Go and fetch Sir Coadjuteur, Friquet – and if you do, I'll make you my heir.' He said that, Père Bazin, the heir of Sir Maillard, holy water dispenser of Saint-Eustache! I'll be set for life! I'd really like to do this for him, what do you say?"

"I'll go and inform Sir Coadjuteur," said Bazin. In fact, he slowly and respectfully approached the prelate, whispered a few words in his ear, received as reply an affirmative gesture, and then backed away with the same care and respect. "Go and tell the dying man to be patient," he said to Friquet. "My Lord will be there within the hour."

"Good," said Friquet. "My fortune is made."

"By the way," said Bazin, "where did they take him?"

"To the tower of Saint-Jacques-la-Boucherie."

And, enchanted with the success of his diplomatic mission, Friquet, without removing his choirboy robes that after all made his journey that much easier, left the basilica and ran off, as quickly as he could, to the tower of Saint-Jacques-la-Boucherie. In the same manner, as soon as the Te Deum was finished, the coadjutor, as he'd promised, and also without removing his priestly vestments, made his own way toward the old tower he knew so well. He arrived in time: though fading fast, the wounded man wasn't yet dead. They entered the room where the dying beggar lay. A moment later Friquet came back out, holding in his hands a bulging leather sack that he opened as soon as he was out of sight, and found to his astonishment was filled with gold coins. The beggar had kept his word and made him his heir. "Oh, Mother Nanette!" Friquet cried, and then choked up, unable to say another word. But his strength otherwise hadn't left him, and he ran desperately through the streets. Then, like the Greek from Marathon falling down in the market of Athens with the laurel in his hand, Friquet tripped as he arrived at Councillor Broussel's door and fell into the foyer, scattering gold everywhere as it poured from the sack. Mother Nanette started by picking up the coins and ended by picking up and hugging Friquet. Meanwhile, the procession returned to the Royal Palace. "My Mom, he's a very valiant man, that Sir d'Artagnan," said the young king.

"Yes, my son, and he did great service for your father. Manage him well and he'll do the same for you."

"Sir Captain," said the young king as he was descending from the carriage, "Madam the queen has desired me to invite you to dine with us this evening, you and your friend the Baron du Vallon."

This was a great honour for d'Artagnan and for Porthos, who lit up with delight. However, throughout the meal, the worthy baron seemed preoccupied. "What's eating you, Baron?" d'Artagnan asked him as they descended the Royal Palace's grand staircase. "You seemed anxious during dinner."

"I was racking my brains," said Porthos, "trying to remember when it was that I'd seen that beggar chief I must have killed."

“And could you recall?”
“No.”
“Ah, well! Keep at it, my friend. And when you remember, you'll tell me about it, won't you?”
“For the love of God! I should say so,” said Porthos.

264
Conclusion

Upon returning home, the two friends found a letter from Athos inviting them to meet him at the Grand Charlemagne the next morning. They both went to bed at an early hour but though tired, neither slept. One doesn't achieve all one's earthly desires and then simply fall asleep – at least not the first night. The next day, at the appointed hour, they went to visit Athos. They found the count and Aramis dressed in travelling clothes. “Oh ho!” said Porthos. “Then we're all leaving? I also made my preparations to go this morning.”
“My God, yes,” said Aramis. “With the Fronde over, there's nothing left to do in Paris. Madam de Longueville has invited me to go and spend a few days in Normandy, and has charged me, while her son is getting baptized, to go and find suitable lodgings for them in Rouen. I shall fulfil this commission, and then, if nothing else comes up, I'll go back and bury myself in my monastery at Noisy-le-Sec.”
“And I shall take myself back to Bragelonne,” said Athos. “You know, my dear d'Artagnan that I'm really nothing more these days than a provincial country gentleman. Raoul has no other fortune than my own, poor lad, so I must husband it as well as I can, as I'm really little more than its trustee.”
“And Raoul, what will he do?”
“I leave him to you, my friend. You'll be off to make war in Flanders, so take him with you; I fear a prolonged stay in Blois will only ruin him. Take him with you and teach him to be brave and forthright, as you are.”
“And I,” said d'Artagnan, “though I won't have you, Athos, at least I'll have Raoul's sweet blond head around. He may be just a child but your entire soul is reborn in him, dear Athos, and when he's with me, I can almost believe I have you yourself by my side.”
The four friends embraced each other with tears in their eyes. Then they parted, not knowing whether they would ever meet again. D'Artagnan returned to Rue Tiquetonne with Porthos, who was still preoccupied with trying to place the features of the man he'd killed. On arriving in front of the Hôtel de La Chevette, they found the baron's equipage ready to go, with Mousqueton already in the saddle. “See here, d'Artagnan,” said Porthos, “put away the sword and come with me to Pierrefonds, or Bracieux, or Vallon, and we'll grow old together talking about our adventures with our comrades.”
“Not !” said d'Artagnan. “Plague! They're about to open a new campaign, and I want to get in on it – I still have some ambitions!”
“What more could you possibly want?”
“To be a Marshal of France, for the love of God!”
“Really?” said Porthos who was never sure when to take d'Artagnan's Gasconades seriously.
“Come with me, Porthos, and we'll make a duke of you yet,” said d'Artagnan.
“No,” said Porthos. “Mouston has lost his taste for war. Besides, they've arranged for me a solemn and triumphal entry to my château that will make my neighbours die of envy.”
“I can't offer anything better than that,” said d'Artagnan, who well understood the vanity of the new baron. “Au revoir, then, my friend.”
“Au revoir, friend Captain,” said Porthos. “You know that whenever you want to see me, you'll always be welcome in my barony.”
“Yes,” said d'Artagnan. “When I return from the campaign, I'll come visit you.”
“Sir Baron's equipages are waiting,” said Mousqueton.
And the two friends parted after shaking hands. D'Artagnan remained at the gate, watching with a melancholy eye as Porthos rode away. But after about twenty paces, Porthos stopped short, smacked his forehead with his great hand, and returned. “I remembered,” he said.
“What?” asked d'Artagnan.
“Who that beggar was that I killed.”
“Really? Who was it?”
“It was that scoundrel Bonacieux!”
And Porthos, delighted at having his mind empty again, caught up with Mousqueton and disappeared around the corner of the street. D'Artagnan stood motionless for a minute, thinking to himself, then, turning, he saw the beautiful Madeleine who stood worried on the threshold, uncertain at seeing d'Artagnan in his new grandeur. “Madeleine,” said the Gascon, “I shall be moving into your best apartments on the first floor; I'm obliged to maintain a certain dignity now that I'm Captain of the Musketeers. But,” he added, “Just keep that room on the fifth floor for me as well. One never knows what might happen.”

BOOK V
THE VISCOUNT OF BRAGELONNE
265
The Letter

Toward the middle of May in the year 1660, at 9<sup>am</sup> when the already hot sun was drying the dew on the ramparts of the Château de Blois, a little cavalcade, composed of three men and two junior pages, was returning into the city across the Loire Bridge. This produced no effect on the loiterers on the span other than a movement of the hand to the head in salute, and a movement of the mouth to say, in the purest French spoken in France: “Here comes Sir returning from the hunt.”
And that was all. However, as the horses climbed the steep slope that ascends from the river to the château, several shop boys approached the last horse that bore, hanging from its saddle-tree, several bird carcasses hung by their beaks. Seeing this, the curious lads showed with rustic candour their disdain for such meagre game, and after loudly announcing that hawking was a poor sort of sport, they went back to their work. Only one of these onlookers, a chubby lad in the mood for a jest, lingered long enough to ask why Monsieur, who thanks to his vast revenues had his choice of amusements, would choose such a pathetic entertainment, and was answered, “Don't you know that Monsieur's main diversion is to be bored?”
The cheerful shop boy shrugged his shoulders in a gesture that said, plain as day, In that case, I'd rather be plain Pierre than a prince.
And everyone went about their business. Meanwhile, Monsieur continued on his way with an air at once so melancholy and so majestic that onlookers would surely have admired it, if there'd been any onlookers. But the citizens of Blois couldn't forgive Monsieur for having chosen their merry city to be bored in, and whenever they saw the royal sourpuss coming they slipped away, yawning, or withdrew inside, to escape the dour influence of that long, pale visage, those half-lidded eyes, and that slouching physique. Thus, the worthy prince was greeted by deserted streets nearly every time he ventured out. Now, this irreverence on the part of the citizens of Blois was, in truth, very improper, for Monsieur, after the young king – and maybe even before the king – was the foremost noble in the realm. In fact, God, who had granted the reigning king, Louis XIV, the happiness of being the son of Louis XIII, had granted Monsieur the honour of being the son of the great Henri IV. So, it should have been an object of pride for the city of Blois that Gaston d'Orléans* chose to hold his Court in the ancient hall of the Estates General. But it was the destiny of this exalted prince to excite indifference rather than admiration on the part of the populace. Monsieur had grown used to it. Perhaps it was even responsible for his unfailing air of ennui. It wasn't as if his early life hadn't been considerably busier; a man can't be responsible for the executioner taking the heads of a dozen of his friends without feeling some excitement. However, since the rise of Cardinal Mazarin* there had been no more decapitations, Monsieur had had to put aside his hobby of rebellion, and his morale had suffered for it. The life of the poor prince was thereafter very sad. After a morning hunt along the banks of the Beuvron or in the woods of Cheverny, Monsieur would ride across the Loire for lunch at Chambord whether he had an appetite for it or not, and the town of Blois would hear no more from its sovereign and master until he rode out for his next hunt.
So much for his boredom outside the city walls; as for his ennui inside them, let's follow his cavalcade up to the Château de Blois and the famous hall of the Estates. Monsieur was riding a smallish horse with a large saddle of red Flemish velvet and half-boot stirrups. The horse was a bay; Monsieur's doublet was of crimson velvet, the horse wore a matching blanket, and it was only by this colourful ensemble that the prince could be distinguished from his two companions, whose ensembles were purple for the one and green for the other. The one on his left, dressed in purple, was his equerry, and the one on the right, all in green, was his royal huntsman. A pair of pages followed, one carrying a perch bearing two gyrfalcons, the other a hunting horn that he winded casually as they arrived at the château. (Everyone around this indifferent prince behaved with a casual nonchalance.) At this signal, eight guards who'd been dozing in the sun in the inner courtyard hurried to grab their halberds and take their positions as Monsieur made his solemn entry into the château. When he had disappeared under the shadows of the gate, three or four busybodies, who'd followed the cavalcade to the château, commenting on the hanging birds, turned and ambled off – and once they were gone, the street outside the courtyard was deserted. Monsieur dismounted without saying a word and went into his apartments, where his valet helped him change his clothes; and as Madam had not yet sent word it was time for breakfast, Monsieur stretched out on a chaise longue and fell as fast asleep as if it had been 11<sup>pm</sup>. The 8 guards who understood that their work was done for the day, reclined on stone benches in the sun, the grooms disappeared into the stables with the horses, and except for a few birds, chasing and chirping merrily in the flowering shrubs, one would have thought that everyone in the château was sleeping as soundly as Monsieur. Suddenly, into the midst of this soft silence, a bright peal of laughter rang out that caused the dozing halberdiers to half open their eyes. This burst of laughter came from a window of the château that was now bathed by the sun that struck it at an oblique angle for a while before giving way at midday to the shadows of the chimneys on the opposite wing. The small wrought iron balcony in front of this window sported a pot of red wallflowers, another of primroses, and an early rose, whose lush green foliage was already dappled with the red that portends blossoms. In the chamber lit by this window was a square table covered by an old Haarlem floral tapestry, in the middle of that table was a long-necked sandstone vase holding irises and lilies of the valley, and at each end of the table was a young lady. These two lasses looked somewhat out of place, as they could easily be taken for two young maidens who'd escaped from a convent. One, with both elbows on the table and a plume in her hand, traced letters on a sheet of fine Dutch paper, while the other kneeled on a backward chair, a position that enabled her to lean over the table and watch her companion write. From this latter came a thousand jests, jeers, and laughs, the loudest of which had frightened the birds in the shrubberies and half-roused Monsieur's halberdiers. Since we are sketching portraits, we will present the last two of this chapter. The lass who was leaning on the chair, that is, the loud and laughing one, was a beautiful young woman of nineteen or twenty, tawny of complexion, brown of hair, and resplendent, with eyes that sparkled beneath strong arched brows and glorious white teeth that shone like pearls behind coral lips. Her every movement was a theatrical flourish, her life a vivid performance. The other, the one who was writing, regarded her energetic companion with blue eyes as limpid and pure as that day's sky. Her ash-blond hair, arranged with exquisite taste, fell in silky curls to caress her ivory cheeks; she held down the paper with a fine, slender hand that bespoke her youthfulness. At each laugh from her friend she shrugged her white shoulders that topped a slim and poetic form that lacked her companion's robust vigour.
“Montalais! Montalais!” she said at last, in a voice soft as a song. “You laugh too loudly, as loudly as a man! You'll rouse gentlemen the guards, and you won't even hear Madam's bell when she calls.” The young woman she called Montalais* without ceasing to laugh and sway, replied, “Louise,* you know better than that, my dear; when gentlemen the guards, as you call them, are taking their nap, not even a cannon could wake them. And you know that Madam's bell can be heard halfway across the river bridge, so I can hardly fail to hear it when she summons me. What really annoys you is that I laugh while you write, and what you really fear is that your worthy mother, Madam de Saint-Rémy,* will come up here as she sometimes does when we laugh too much. And then she'll see this enormous sheet of paper on which, after a quarter of an hour, you've written only two words: Monsieur Raoul.* And you're right, my dear Louise, because after those two words, Monsieur Raoul, we could add so many others, so moving and so incendiary that Madam de Saint-Rémy, your saintly mother, would burst into flame if she read them. Eh? Isn't that so?”
And Montalais redoubled her laughter and teasing provocations. The blond girl was furious; she tore up the sheet on which, in fact, Monsieur Raoul had been written in a beautiful hand, crumpled the paper in trembling fingers and threw it out the window. “Look, now!” said Miss Montalais. “Look at our little lamb, our baby Jesus, our cooing dove so very angry! Don't worry, Louise, Madam de Saint-Rémy isn't coming, and if she was, you know I'd hear her. Besides, what could be more proper than writing to a friend you've known a dozen years, especially when the letter starts so formally with Monsieur Raoul?”
“Fine, then – I won't write to him,” said the blond girl.
“Well, there's Montalais told off, and no mistake!” laughed the brunette jester. “Come on, take another sheet of paper, quickly now, and finish up our correspondence. Ah! And there's the sound of the bell! Well, too bad. This morning Madam must wait, or even manage without her first maid of honour.”
A bell was indeed ringing, a sound that signalled that Madam had finished dressing and awaited Monsieur, who was to take her hand in the salon and lead her to the refectory. Once this formality was accomplished, always with great ceremony, the couple would eat breakfast and then separate until dinner that was invariably served at two o'clock. At the sound of the bell a door opened in the wing to the left of the courtyard, out of which came two waiters, followed by eight scullions bearing a table-top laden with covered silver dishes. The first of these waiters, the premier maître d'hôtel, silently tapped with his cane on one of the guards who was snoring on a bench; he was even kind enough to hand the groggy guard his halberd that had been leaning against the nearby wall, after which the blinking soldier escorted Monsieur’s breakfast to the refectory, preceded by a page and the pair of waiters. As Monsieur’s meal passed, the door guards presented arms. Miss Montalais and her companion watched these ceremonies attentively from their window, though they must have been quite familiar with them. They were just waiting for them to be finished so they could resume undisturbed. Once the waiters, scullions, pages, and guards had all passed, they sat back down at their table, and the sun that for a moment had gilded those two charming faces, shone only on the flowers and the rosebush. “Fah!” said Montalais, resuming her position. “Madam doesn’t need my help to have her breakfast.”

“Oh but Montalais, you’ll be punished!” replied the younger girl, sitting down again.

“Punished? Oh, right, I’ll be deprived of our morning ride, going down the old steps to the big old coach that will then bounce left and right along paths so riddled with ruts that it takes a full two hours to go a league. Then we’ll return along the wall of the château under the window that once was Marie de Médicis’s, where Madam will inevitably say, ‘Can you believe that Queen Marie escaped through that, climbing down a forty-seven-foot drop! She, the mother of two princes and three princesses!’ If that’s to be my entertainment, I’d rather be punished by missing it every day, especially when my punishment is to stay with you and write such fascinating letters.”

“But, Montalais! We can’t ignore our duties.”

“That’s easy for you to say, sweetheart, when you’re largely free of them. You have all the benefits of attending Court with none of the burdens and are more truly a maid of honour to Madam than I am, since you’re here because Madam likes your father-in-law. You came into this sad château like a bird landing in a tower, sniffing the air, enjoying the flowers and pecking at the seeds, without the slightest duty to fulfil and no problems to solve. And you tell me we can’t ignore our duties! In truth, my lazy lovely, what duties do you have other than to write to the handsome Raoul? And since you’re not even doing that, it seems to me that you’re the one who’s being neglectful.”

Louise took this seriously. She rested her chin on her hand and said earnestly, “Do you really have the heart to reproach me and accuse me of being the lucky one? You’re the one with a future, since you’re officially a member of this court. The king, if he marries, will summon Monsieur to attend him in Paris; you’ll go to all the splendid festivals, and you’ll see the king himself, who’s said to be so handsome and charming.”

“Moreover, I’ll see Raoul, who attends on ‘Monsieur le Prince,.’” Montalais added maliciously.

“Poor Raoul!” Louise sighed.

“Then now is the moment to write to him, beautiful dear. Come, start again with the famous Monsieur Raoul that so prettily decorated the sheet you tore up.”

Then she handed Louise the plume, and with a charming smile, nudged her hand that quickly traced out the designated words. “And now?” asked the younger girl.

“Now write what’s on your mind, Louise,” replied Montalais.

“How do you know something is on my mind?”

“I know somebody is, and that’s even better – or rather, worse.”

“You think so, Montalais?”

“Louise, Louise, your blue eyes are as deep as the sea I saw at Boulogne last year. No, I’m wrong, for the sea is treacherous; your eyes are as deep as the azure sky above our heads.”

“Well! Since you see so deeply into me through my eyes, tell me what I’m thinking, Montalais.”

“First of all, you’re not thinking Monsieur Raoul, you’re thinking My Dear Raoul ... Oh, don’t blush over so little a thing! My Dear Raoul, you’d like to say, You beg me to write to you in Paris, where you are retained in the service of Monsieur le Prince. There you must be bored indeed to have to seek distraction by remembering a provincial girl....”

Louise rose and stopped her. “No, Montalais,” she said, smiling. “That’s not at all what I was thinking. Here, this is what I think.” And she boldly took the plume and wrote with a firm hand the following words: “I would have been very unhappy if your request for a remembrance from me hadn’t been so warm. Everything here reminds me of our first years of friendship, so quickly passed and so sweetly spent that nothing could replace their charming memory in my heart.”

Montalais, who was watching the pen dance across the page, reading upside-down as it wrote, interrupted her with applause. “Now, that’s more like it! Here is candour, here is style and true heart! Show those Parisians, my dear, that Blois is still the capital of our language.”

“He knows that, to me, Blois has been heaven,” said the younger woman.

“That’s what I meant, and you write like an angel.”

“I’ll finish now, Montalais.” And she continued: “You say you think of me, Monsieur Raoul, and I thank you but I’m not surprised. I know every beat of your heart, for our hearts beat together.”

“Whoa, there!” said Montalais. “Watch how you scatter your wool, my lamb, for there are wolves about.”

Louise was about to reply when a horse’s galloping hoof beats resounded from under the château’s gate. “What’s that?” said Montalais, rushing to the window. “A handsome cavalier, my faith!”

“Oh! It’s Raoul!” cried Louise who had followed her friend, and then, turning pale, fell back beside her unfinished letter.

“Now there’s an attentive lover, upon my word,” said Montalais, “to arrive the moment he’s beckoned.”

“Come away from there, please!” whispered Louise urgently.

“Fah! He doesn’t even know me. Let me go see what he’s doing here.”

266 The Messenger

Miss de Montalais was right: the young cavalier was quite handsome. He was a young man of twenty-four or twenty-five, tall and slender, graceful and comfortable in the charming military costume of the period. His tall cavalry boots enclosed a pair of feet that Miss de Montalais wouldn’t have been ashamed of if she’d been a man. With one of his fine and sensitive hands he drew his horse to a halt in the centre of the courtyard, and with the other he doffed the long-plumed hat that shaded his features, at once serious and naïve. The guards, at the sound of the horse, awoke and quickly stood at attention. The young man let one of them approach his saddle-bow, bowed to him, and said, in a clear and precise voice easily heard at the window where the two young ladies were hiding, “A messenger for His Royal Highness.”

“Ah ha!” the guard said, and called out, “Officer, a messenger!” However, this brave soldier knew quite well that no officer would respond, since the only one they had was in his rooms on the far, garden side of the château, so he hastened to add, “Mon Gentilhomme, the officer is on his rounds but in his absence we’ll inform Sir de Saint-Rémy,* the major-domo.”

“Sir de Saint-Rémy!” repeated the cavalier, blushing.

“You know him?”

“But yes. Please request of him that my visit be announced to His Highness as soon as possible.”

“The matter seems urgent,” said the guard as if to himself but in hopes of obtaining an answer.

The messenger nodded.

“In that case,” replied the guard, “I’ll go find the major-domo myself.”

Meanwhile, the young man dismounted, while the other soldiers admired the fine horse that had brought him. The first guard came back and asked, “Your pardon, Sir but your name, if you please?”

“The Viscount of Bragelonne, on the behalf of His Highness Sir le Prince de Condé.”*

The soldier bowed respectfully, and as if the name of the victor of Rocroi and Lens had given him wings, leapt back up the steps to the antechamber. Sir de Bragelonne scarcely had time to tie his horse to the banister of the staircase before Sir de Saint-Rémy came running, out of breath, one hand supporting his bulging belly while the other pawed the air like a angler cleaving the waves with his oar. “What, Sir Viscount, you at Blois?” he cried. “How marvellous! Hello, Sir Raoul, hello!”

“A thousand regards, Sir de Saint-Rémy.”

“How happy Miss de La Vall – I mean, how happy Madam de Saint-Rémy will be to see you. But come, His Royal Highness’s breakfast, must it really be interrupted? Is the news serious?”

“Yes and no, Sir de Saint-Rémy. However, any delay might be an inconvenience to His Royal Highness.”

“If that is so, we must make do, Sir Viscount. Come. Besides, Sir is in a charming mood today. So, then, you bring us news?”

“Big news, Sir de Saint-Rémy.”

“And the news is good, I presume?”

“Very good.”

“Then quickly, quickly!” said the worthy major-domo, straightening his clothing as he went along.

Raoul followed, hat in hand, a little nervous about the sound his spurs made as he marched through the solemn halls of the grand château. As soon as he vanished into the palace, the window across the courtyard was reoccupied, and an animated whispering betrayed the emotions of the two young ladies. Soon they came to a decision, and one of the heads, the brunette, disappeared from the window, leaving the other on the balcony, half-concealed by the shrubbery, attentively watching, between the boughs, the porch where Sir de Bragelonne had entered the palace. Meanwhile, the object of all this curiosity continued to follow in the footsteps of the major-domo. From ahead, the sound of servants’ quick steps, the aroma of honey and meat, and a rattling of crystal and crockery informed him that they were nearing their destination. The pages, valets, and officers gathered in the refectory’s antechamber welcomed the newcomer with the region’s proverbial politeness; some of them knew Raoul, and all guessed that he came from Paris. Indeed, his arrival momentarily suspended the service of breakfast, as a page who was pouring a drink for His Highness, hearing the jingle of spurs in the next room, turned like a distracted child, still pouring, not into the prince’s glass but onto the tablecloth. Madam, less preoccupied than her glorious spouse, noticed the page’s distraction.

“Well!” she said.

Sir de Saint-Rémy took advantage of the interruption to poke his head around the door. “Why are you disturbing us?” said Gaston, drawing toward himself a thick slice of one of the largest salmon ever to ascend the Loire and be caught between Paimbœuf and Saint-Nazaire.

“It’s because a messenger has arrived from Paris. But I’m sure it can wait until after Sir’s breakfast.”

“From Paris!” the prince exclaimed, dropping his fork. “A messenger from Paris, you say? And who does this messenger come from?”

“From Sir le Prince,” said the major-domo, using the common appellation for Sir de Condé.

“A messenger from Sir Prince?” said Gaston anxiously, a tone that didn’t escape the notice of his servants, redoubling their curiosity.

Sir might almost have thought himself back in the days of thrilling conspiracies, when the noise of a gate unlocking made one start, when every letter opened might betray a state secret, and every message introduce a dark and complicated intrigue. Perhaps the grand name of Sir le Prince roused in the halls of Blois a spectre of this past. Sir pushed back his plate. “Shall I ask the envoy to wait?” said Sir de Saint-Rémy.

A glance from Madam stiffened Gaston’s resolve, and he replied, “No, on the contrary, have him enter at once. By the way, who is it?”

“A local gentleman, Sir Viscount of Bragelonne.”

“Ah, yes, very good! Show him in, Saint-Rémy, show him in.”

And once he had uttered these words with his usual gravity, Sir gave his servants a certain look, and all the pages, servers, and squires left their napkins, knives, and goblets and retreated rapidly into a side chamber. This little army marched off in two files as Raoul de Bragelonne, preceded by Sir de Saint-Rémy, entered the refectory. The brief moment of solitude afforded him by the servants’ retreat had given my Lord Gaston time to assume an appropriately diplomatic expression. Rather than turn around, he waited for the major-domo to bring the messenger to a position in front of him. Raoul stopped in the middle of the far side of the table, midway between Sir and Madam, where he bowed profoundly to Sir, bowed humbly to Madam, and then stood and waited for Sir to speak to him first. The prince, for his part, waited until the outer doors were closed tightly, not turning to look that would have been beneath him but listening with both ears until he heard the click of the lock that promised at least the appearance of privacy. Once the doors were closed, Gaston raised his eyes to the Viscount of Bragelonne and said, “It seems you come from Paris, Sir?”

“This very moment, my Lord.”

“How is the king doing?”

“His Majesty is in perfect health, my Lord.”

“And my sister-in-law?”

“Her Majesty the Queen Mother still suffers from the complaint in her chest but has been somewhat better for the past month.”

“They tell me you come on the behalf of Sir Prince? Surely they were mistaken.”

“No, My Lord. Sir Prince has charged me with bringing Your Royal Highness this letter, and I am to await a reply.”

His voice trailed off in this final phrase; Raoul had been a little put off by his cold and formal reception. The prince forgot that he was responsible for the messenger’s confusion and bit his lip anxiously. He took the Prince de Condé’s letter with a haggard look, opened it as he might a suspicious package, and then, to read it without anyone seeing his expression as he did so, turned away. Madam observed all these manoeuvres on the part of her august husband with an anxiety almost the equal of his own. Raoul, impassive and seemingly forgotten by his hosts, looked through the open window at the château garden and its crowded population of statues. “Ah!” Sir said suddenly, with a radiant smile. “A charming letter from Sir le Prince, with a pleasant surprise! Here, Madam.” The table was too long for the prince’s arm to reach the princess’s hand, so Raoul hastened to act as intermediary, passing the letter along with a grace that charmed the princess and won the viscount a flattering thanks. “You know the contents of this letter, do you not?” said Gaston to Raoul. “Yes, my Lord; Sir le Prince gave me the message verbally at first, then upon reflection His Highness took up the plume.” “It’s beautiful handwriting,” said Madam, “but I can’t make it out.” “Will you read it to Madam, Sir de Bragelonne?” said the prince. “Yes, Sir, please read it.” Raoul began to read, with Sir giving him his full attention. The letter read as follows:

My Lord,
The king is travelling to the Spanish frontier; from this you will understand that His Majesty’s marriage is to be finalised. The king has done me the honour to appoint me Royal Quartermaster for this journey, and as I know how happy His Majesty would be to spend a day at Blois, I dare to ask Your Royal Highness for permission to include his château on the itinerary. However, in the unforeseen event that this request might cause Your Royal Highness any inconvenience, I beg you to report it to me by the messenger I have sent, one of my gentlemen named the Viscount of Bragelonne. My itinerary will depend upon the decision of Your Royal Highness, as we could choose instead to travel by way of Vendôme or Romorantin. I hope that Your Royal Highness will take my request in good part as an expression of my boundless devotion and my desire to please him.

“Why, nothing could be more gracious,” said Madam, after carefully watching her husband’s expression during the reading of this letter. “The king, here!” she exclaimed, perhaps a bit louder than was consistent with the demands of secrecy. “Sir,” said His Highness, “you will thank Sir le Prince de Condé and convey my gratitude for the pleasure he gives me.” Raoul bowed. “On what day will His Majesty arrive?” the prince continued. “The king, My Lord, will in all probability arrive tonight.” “Tonight! But how would he have known it if my answer had been other than positive?” “I’d been assigned, My Lord, to hasten back to Beaugency and give a courier an order to countermand the march that he would bear to Sir le Prince.” “His Majesty is at Orléans, then?” “Closer than that, My Lord; His Majesty must even now be arriving at Meung.” “The Court accompanies him?” “Yes, My Lord.” “By the way, I forgot to ask for news of Sir Cardinal.” “His Eminence appears to be in good health, My Lord.” “His nieces accompany him, no doubt?” “No, My Lord; His Eminence ordered Mesdemoiselles de Mancini to depart for Brouage. They are following the left bank of the Loire while the Court proceeds along the right bank.” “What? Miss Marie de Mancini has left the Court?” asked Sir, whose reserve was beginning to fray. “Especially Miss Marie de Mancini,” replied Raoul discreetly. A fugitive smile, a brief vestige of his old spirit of intrigue, briefly lit the prince’s pale cheeks. “Thank you, Sir de Bragelonne,” said Gaston. “If you do not wish to render the prince the commission with which I charge you that is to tell him that I am very pleased with his messenger, I will do so myself.” Raoul bowed to thank Sir for the honour the prince did him. Sir gestured to Madam, who rang a bell placed to her right. Instantly Sir de Saint-Rémy came in and the refectory was suddenly filled with people. “Gentlemen,” said the prince, “His Majesty does me the honour to spend a day at Blois. I trust that my nephew the king will have no cause to regret the favour he shows to this house.” “Long live the king!” cried every member of Sir’s household, Sir de Saint-Rémy louder than anyone. Gaston’s head drooped in sudden sadness; all his life he’d heard, or rather suffered through, shouts of “Long live the king!” cried out for another. For a while he’d been spared that cry but now a younger, more dynamic, and more brilliant reign had begun, and the painful provocation was renewed. Madam understood the pain in his sad and fearful heart; she rose from the table and Sir imitated her mechanically, while all the servants, like bees buzzing around a hive, surrounded Raoul and plied him with questions. Madam saw this activity and beckoned to Sir de Saint-Rémy. “Now is not the time to talk but to work,” she said in the tone of an angry housewife. Saint-Rémy hastened to break up the circle of servants around Raoul so that he could escape to the antechamber. “You will attend to this gentleman’s needs, I hope,” said Madam to Sir de Saint-Rémy. The worthy man immediately ran to catch up with Raoul. “Madam has charged me with seeing to your refreshment,” he said. “I’ll assign a room for you here in the château.” “Thank you, Sir de Saint-Rémy,” replied Bragelonne, “but you know how eagerly I wish to go pay my respects to Sir Count of La Fère, my father.” “Quite so, quite so, Sir Raoul, and give him at the same time my most humble regards, I beg you.” Raoul reassured the old gentleman and went on his way. As he was passing out the gate, leading his horse by the bridle, a soft voice called from the gloom of a shaded path, “Sir Raoul!” The young man turned in surprise and saw a brown-haired young woman who was pressing a finger to her lips and holding out her other hand. This young lady was completely unknown to him.

267
The Interview

Raoul took a step toward the young woman who beckoned to him, and then said, “But my horse, Madam.” “True, you can’t bring the horse. There’s a shed just outside the courtyard; tie your horse in there and hurry back.” “I obey, Madam.” It took scarcely a minute for Raoul to follow her recommendation and return to her. In the shadows under the vines he saw his mysterious guide waiting in a doorway that opened onto the foot of a winding staircase. “Are you brave enough to follow me, Sir Knight Errant?” asked the young woman, laughing at Raoul’s momentary hesitation. He replied by darting into the shadows to follow her up the stairs. They climbed three flights, he right behind her, brushing with outstretched hands, as he searched for a banister, a wide silk dress that grazed both sides of the staircase. When Raoul made a false step at a landing his guide whispered, “Hush!” and held out a soft and perfumed hand to him. “One could climb this way to the château’s tallest tower without feeling fatigue,” said Raoul. “Which means, Sir, that though weary from your ride, you are much intrigued but a bit uneasy. Never mind that, we’ve arrived.” The young woman pushed open a door, the darkened staircase was flooded with light, and Raoul saw that he stood at the top of the stairs. His guide continued, so he followed her; she entered a room, and he went in right behind her. As soon as he was fairly in the trap, he heard a loud cry, turned and saw near him, hands clasped, eyes closed, the beautiful blond young woman with blue eyes and ivory shoulders, who’d just called out “Raoul!” He saw her and read in her eyes so much love and so much happiness that he fell to his knees in the centre of the room, murmuring “Louise.” “Ah, Montalais, Montalais!” she sighed. “It’s a great sin to deceive me so.” “I? Have I deceived you?” “Yes, you told me you’d go down to learn the news, and then here you bring Sir back up with you.” “It had to be done. How else could he receive the letter you wrote to him?” And she pointed to the letter that was still on the table. Raoul took a step toward it; Louise, though her first step was strangely hesitant, was faster, and reached out a hand to stop him. Raoul met this hand, warm and trembling, took it in his own, and brought it so respectfully to his lips, it was as if he placed a sigh upon it rather than a kiss. Meanwhile, Miss de Montalais took up the letter, folded it carefully, as women do, with three folds, and slipped it between her breasts. “Don’t worry, Louise,” she said. “Sir would no more take it from here than the late King Louis XIII would take her billet-doux from the bodice of Miss de Hautefort.” Raoul blushed so at the sight of the young ladies’ smiles, he didn’t even notice that Louise’s hand was still in his. “There!” said Montalais. “You’ve forgiven me, Louise, for having brought Sir to you, and Sir forgives me for leading him to see Miss. Now that peace is concluded, let’s talk like old friends. Present me, Louise, to Sir de Bragelonne.” “Sir le Viscount,” said Louise, with her serious grace and frank smile, “I have the honour to introduce you to Miss Aure de Montalais, Maid of Honour to Her Highness Madam, and moreover, my friend – my excellent friend.” Raoul bowed ceremoniously. “And me, Louise,” he said. “Won’t you introduce me to Miss as well?” “Oh, she knows you! She knows everything!” This last word made Montalais laugh and Raoul sigh with happiness as he’d interpreted it to mean: She knows all about our love. “The courtesies are complete, Sir le Viscount,” said Montalais. “Here’s an armchair; sit and quickly bring us up to date with your news.” “Miss, it’s no longer a secret: the king, on his way to Poitiers, will stop at Blois to visit His Royal Highness.” “The king, here!” cried Montalais, clapping her hands. “We’ll see the Court! Can you imagine it, Louise? The real Court of Paris! But, my God – when will they arrive, Sir?” “Perhaps as soon as tonight, Miss; certainly, no later than tomorrow.” Montalais made an angry gesture. “No time to get ready! No time to update a single dress! We live here in the past like Poles! We’ll look like we stepped out of portraits from King Henri’s reign. Ah, Sir, what terrible news you bring!” “Mesdemoiselles, you will still be beautiful.” “Cold comfort! Yes, we’ll still be beautiful, because Nature has made us passable but we’ll also be ridiculous, because fashion has left us behind. Alas! Ridiculous! To think that I’ll be mocked!” “By who?” said Louise, naïvely. “By who? Are you kidding, my dear? What kind of a question is that? By everyone! By the courtiers, by the nobles, and above all – by the king!” “Pardon me, dear friend but as everyone here is used to seeing us as we are...” “True but that won’t last, and then we’ll be ridiculous, even for Blois. Because we’re going to see the Parisian fashions while wearing the clothes of Blois, and then we’ll find ourselves ridiculous. It’s hopeless!” “Take comfort in who you are, Miss.” “There’s truth. Fah! If they find me not to their taste, that’s their loss!” said Montalais philosophically. “Small chance of that,” said Raoul, faithful to his system of general gallantry. “Thank you, Sir le Viscount. So, you say the king comes to Blois?” “With all his Court.” “Including Mesdemoiselles de Mancini, of course.” “No, decidedly not.” “But isn’t it said that the king can’t bear to be apart from Miss Marie?” “The king will have to bear it, Miss. The cardinal has decided to exile his nieces to Brouage.” “Him! That hypocrite!” “Hush!” said Louise, putting a finger to her rosy lips. “Fah! No one can hear me. I say that old Mazarino Mazarini is a hypocrite who’s out to make his niece the Queen of France.” “On the contrary, Miss, the cardinal has negotiated for His Majesty to marry the Infanta Maria Theresa.”

Montalais looked Raoul in the eye and said, “Do you Parisians really believe in such fables? Come, we know better than that in Blois.”

“Miss, once the marriage contract is finalized between Don Luis de Haro and His Eminence, and the king goes beyond Poitiers to the Spanish frontier, you’ll see that the childhood games are done.”

“Ah çà! But the king is still the king, isn’t he?”

“No doubt about it, Miss – but the cardinal is the cardinal.”

“Is he not a man, then, the king? Doesn’t he love Marie de Mancini?”

“He adores her.”

“Well, then – he’ll marry her. We’ll have a war with Spain, Sir Mazarin will spend some of the millions he’s hidden away, our gentlemen will perform feats of heroism against the proud Castilians, many of them will return to us to be crowned with laurels, and we shall re-crown them with myrtles. And that’s politics as I understand it.”

“You’re a madwoman, Montalais,” said Louise, “as drawn to hyperbole as a moth is to flames.”

“Louise, you are so restrained you’ll never really fall in love.”

“Oh, Montalais!” said Louise in tender reproach. “Consider this: the queen mother wishes her son to marry the Infanta. Do you want the king to disobey his mother? Could one with a heart as royal as his set a bad example? When parents forbid love, love must be banished!”

And Louise sighed, while Raoul looked down sadly. But Montalais laughed. “As for me, I have no parents!”

After her sigh that revealed so much pain, Louise said, “You’ve no doubt already inquired after the health of Sir le Count of La Fère.”

“No, Miss,” Raoul replied, “I’ve not yet seen my father; I was on my way to his house when Miss de Montalais was so good as to stop me. I hope the count is doing well – you haven’t heard otherwise, have you?”

“Not at all, Sir Raoul, not at all, thank God!”

Then a silence ensued, while two souls in perfect harmony thought the same thoughts without even exchanging a glance. Montalais suddenly said, “My God! Somebody’s coming up the stairs.”

“Who can it be?” said Louise, rising anxiously.

“Ladies, I’m at fault here, my presence is bound to get you in trouble,” stammered Raoul, flustered.

“It’s a heavy footstep,” said Louise.

“Ah!” said Montalais. “If it’s only Sir Malicorne, we’ve nothing to fear.”

Louise and Raoul looked at each other, as if asking who Sir Malicorne could be. “Don’t worry,” continued Montalais. “He’s not the jealous type.”

“But, Miss...” said Raoul.

“Oh, I know. But he’s just as discreet as I am.”

“My God!” cried Louise, who’d pressed her ear to the half-open door. “Those are my mother’s footsteps!”

“Madam de Saint-Rémy! Where can I hide?” exclaimed Raoul, tugging at the sleeve of Montalais who seemed stunned.

“You’re right, Louise,” she said, shaking her head, “I recognise the sound of those barges – it’s your worthy mother! Sir Viscount, it’s a shame that the window opens on a sheer drop of fifty feet.”

Raoul glanced at the window as if he might try it anyway but Louise grabbed his arm and stopped him. “Oh that! Am I crazy?” said Montalais. “Don’t I have a big armoire to hold my ceremonial dresses? It’s made to order for this kind of emergency!”

It was time, as Madam de Saint-Rémy was climbing more quickly than usual. She arrived on the landing just as Montalais, in a scene right out of the theatre, shut the armoire door on Raoul and leaned against it. “Ah!” said Madam de Saint-Rémy. “Are you here too, Louise?”

“Yes, Madam,” she replied, as pale as if accused of a heinous crime.

“Good! Just as well!”

“Have a seat, Madam,” said Montalais, offering Madam de Saint-Rémy an armchair, while facing it away from the armoire.

“Thank you, Miss Aure.” Then, to Louise, “Now go, my child, and be quick.”

“Where do you want me to go, Madam?”

“Why, home – don’t you want to prepare?”

“Prepare? For what?” said Montalais, pretending surprise, and hoping to prevent Louise from saying something foolish.

“You haven’t heard the news?” said Madam de Saint-Rémy.

“What news, Madam, could two girls hear up in this pigeon coop?”

“What? You haven’t spoken to anyone?”

“Madam, you’re speaking in riddles, and it’s killing us,” said Montalais, desperate to distract the lady from Louise who was white as a sheet.

At last Montalais caught a wide-eyed glance from her friend, one of those looks that would awaken a stone, as Louise pointed a trembling figure at where Raoul’s treacherous hat sat upon the table. Montalais darted forward, seized the hat with her left hand and passed it behind her to her right, holding it behind her back. “Well!” said Madam de Saint-Rémy. “A courier has come, announcing the imminent arrival of the king. So, ladies, it’s all about looking your best!”

“Quickly! Quickly!” said Montalais. “Follow Madam your mother, Louise, while I see to my dress.”

Louise arose, her mother took her by the hand and hurried her to the landing. “Come,” she said, and then added in a lower voice, “and when I forbid you to visit Montalais, why do I find you here?”

“Madam, she’s my friend. Besides, I’d only just arrived.”

“You didn’t catch her concealing someone?”

“Madam!”

“I saw that man’s hat, yes I did, and I say to you, she’s a hussy and a scamp!”

“Really, Madam!” cried Louise.

“It’s that rascal Malicorne! A maid of honour to consort with such as he ... fie!”

And their voices faded into the depths of the staircase. Montalais hadn’t lost a word of this exchange that had been projected up the stairs as if by a trumpet. She shrugged her shoulders, and seeing that Raoul, who’d come out of hiding, had heard it as well, she said, “Poor Montalais, the victim of friendship! And poor Malicorne, the victim of love!”

She paused when she saw the tragicomic face of Raoul, who was bewildered by encountering so many secrets in a single day. “Miss,” he said, “how can I repay you for your kindness?”

“We’ll settle our accounts another day, Sir de Bragelonne,” she replied. “For the moment, you’d better get moving, as Madam de Saint-Rémy is far from lenient, and a word from her in the wrong place could send us an inconvenient visitor. Farewell!”

“But Louise ... how will I know...?”

“Go! Go! King Louis XI knew what he was doing when he invented the postal service.”

“Alas!” said Raoul.

“And aren’t I here, who are better than any postman in the realm? Return to your horse, so that if Madam de Saint-Rémy comes back up to lecture me, she won’t find you here.”

“She’d tell my father, wouldn’t she?” murmured Raoul.

“And then you’d be scolded. Ah, Viscount, it’s clear you come from Court; you’re as timid as the king. Plague! At Blois, we know better than to ask for a father’s consent to follow our passions. Ask Malicorne.” And with these words, the brash young woman pushed Raoul out the door by the shoulders. The latter rushed down to the shed, found his horse, jumped into the saddle and set off as if all 8 of Sir’s guards were on his heels.

268
Father & Son

Raoul followed the familiar road, so dear to his memory, that led from Blois to the estate of the Count of La Fère. The reader needs no new description of this dwelling, having visited it with us before. But since our last visit the walls had assumed a greyer hue and the bricks a more harmonious copper tone, while the trees had grown, those that had formerly stretched slender arms over the hedges now towering above them, rounded, bushy, luxuriant, and bearing a lush crop of flowers or fruit for the passer-by. Raoul saw in the distance the high roof with its two small turrets, the dovecote among the elms, and around that cone of bricks the flocks of pigeons ever circling without being able to leave it, like the sweet memories that soar around a serene soul. As he approached, he heard the sound of pulleys groaning under the weight of heavy buckets, and seemed as well to hear the melancholy echoing of water pouring back into the well, a sad and solemn noise that attracts the ear of the child and the dreamy poet alike, a sound the English call splash, the Arab poets call gagachau but which the French who think themselves poets, describe only with the phrase “the sound of water falling into water.”

It was more than a year since Raoul had been to see his father, having spent that time as a retainer of Sir le Prince. In fact, after the turmoil of the Fronde, of which we formerly attempted to recount the first phases, Louis de Condé had made a frank and solemn reconciliation with the Court. During the entire time the prince had been at odds with the king, the prince, who had long been fond of Bragelonne, had offered him every inducement to join him that might dazzle a young man. But the Count of La Fère, ever faithful to his principles of loyalty to the monarchy, as he’d expounded one day to his son in the vaults of Saint-Denis, had refused on behalf of his son all the prince’s offers. Moreover, instead of following Sir de Condé into rebellion, the viscount had attached himself to Sir de Turenne who fought for the king. Then when Sir de Turenne, in his turn, had seemed to abandon the king’s cause, he had left Turenne as he had left Condé. The result of this consistent line of conduct was that, though Turenne and Condé had never been victorious except when commanding under the king’s colours, Raoul, young as he was, had ten victorious royal battles to his credit, and not a single rebellious defeat to tarnish his courage and weigh on his conscience. Thus Raoul, by following his father’s wishes, had stubbornly followed the fortunes of King Louis XIV, despite all the factional infighting that was endemic and, one might almost say, inevitable to the period. Sir de Condé, upon being returned to favour, had taken advantage of the royal amnesty to ask for the restoration of the many rights and privileges he’d previously enjoyed, including the service of Raoul. The Count of La Fère, showing his usual good sense and wisdom, had immediately sent Raoul back to the Prince de Condé. A year had passed since the last meeting of the father and son, during which a few letters had consoled, though not cured, the pain of separation. As we’ve seen, Raoul had also left in Blois an attachment other than his filial love. But to be fair, without the intervention of chance and of Miss de Montalais, those two demons of temptation, Raoul, his mission accomplished, would have immediately galloped toward his father’s house – not without turning his head to look behind, however, though he wouldn’t have stopped even if he’d seen Louise holding out her arms. The first part of the ride Raoul spent missing the lover he had just left, while the second half was spent looking forward to the father’s love he’d find when he arrived that couldn’t come soon enough for him. Raoul found the garden gate open and rode right up the path, without paying any attention to the outraged gestures of an old man wearing a purple wool jerkin and a large hat of faded velvet. This old servant, who’d been weeding a bed of daisies and dwarf roses, was indignant at seeing a horse plough up his freshly raked path, growling out a surly “Hrm!” that made the rider turn his head. Then came a sudden change, for the man, having seen Raoul’s face, straightened up and began to run toward the house, shouting for joy. Raoul stopped at the stable, handed his horse to a young lackey, and dashed up the steps with an ardour that would have delighted his father’s heart. He crossed the foyer, the dining room, and the parlour without meeting anyone; at last, arriving at the Count of La Fère’s door, he knocked impatiently and then went in almost without waiting for the word, “Enter!” spoken in a resonant voice both soft and serious.

The count was seated at a table covered with papers and books. He was still the noble and handsome gentleman of old but time had given his nobility and features a more solemn and distinguished character. A brow broad and smooth below long hair now more white than black; a piercing yet gentle eye beneath the lashes of a much younger man; a slender, scarcely salted moustache framing lips strong but delicate, as if they’d never been strained by mortal passions; a straight and supple figure; and an irreproachable hand – he was still that illustrious gentlemen whom so many eminent men had praised under the name of Athos. He was occupied in correcting the pages of a manuscript in a notebook, entirely filled with his handwriting. Raoul gripped his father by the shoulders and kissed him so quickly and tenderly that the count had neither the strength nor the speed to avoid it, nor to control his upwelling of paternal emotion. “You, here, Raoul?” he said. “How is it possible?”

“Oh, Sir, what joy it is to see you again!”

“You didn’t answer me, Viscount. Has a holiday brought you to Blois, or has something gone wrong in Paris?”

“No, Sir, thank God!” said Raoul, his natural calm returning. “Nothing has happened but happy events; the king is getting married, as I had the honour to tell you in my last letter, and is on his way to Spain. His Majesty will stop at Blois.”

“To visit Sir?”

"Yes, Sir le Count. And to make sure His Highness wasn't taken by surprise, and to do him honour, Sir le Prince sent me on ahead to warn him to prepare lodgings."

"You saw Sir?" the count asked eagerly.

"I had that honour."

"At his château?"

"Yes, Sir," replied Raoul, lowering his eyes as he began to suspect the count's interrogation had another end than curiosity.

"Ah, really, Viscount! My congratulations."

Raoul bowed. "But did you see anyone else at Blois?"

"Sir, I saw Her Royal Highness Madam."

"Excellent. But it's not of Madam that I speak."

Raoul blushed deeply but said nothing. "Didn't you hear my question, Sir le Viscount?" continued Sir de La Fère without hardening his voice but with a sharper look in his eye.

"I understood you perfectly, Sir," Raoul replied, "and if I pause to form my answer, it's not because I'm looking for a lie – as you know, Sir."

"I know you never lie. But I'm surprised that it takes you this long to tell me yes or no."

"It's not that I don't understand you but that I understand you all too well ... and that you won't be pleased by what I have to tell you. I'm sure you won't like it, Sir le Count but I also saw..."

"Miss de La Vallière, yes?"

"And it's about her that you wish to speak, as well I know, Sir le Count," Raoul said, humbly and gently.

"And I'm asking if you've seen her."

"Sir, I was completely ignorant when I entered the château that Miss de La Vallière might be there; it was only upon returning toward you, after completing my mission, that chance brought us face to face. I then had the honour to pay her my respects."

"What name do you give the chance that brought you to meet Miss de La Vallière?"

"Miss de Montalais, Sir."

"Who is Miss de Montalais?"

"A young person I didn't know and had never seen before. She's a maid of honour to Madam."

"Sir Viscount, I will go no further in my interrogation, and I reproach myself for having gone so far. I asked you to avoid Miss de La Vallière and to see her only with my permission. Oh, I know that what you've said is true, and you didn't seek her out! Chance caused the injury, and I won't accuse you of it. I will just content myself with a reminder of what I've already said about this young lady. I have nothing to reproach her with, as God is my witness but it does not accord with my plans for you to permit you to visit her. I beg you once more, Raoul, to hear me on this."

It was clear from the expression of Raoul's eyes, usually so bright and clear, that he was troubled by this speech. "Now, my son," continued the count, with his sweet smile and in his usual tone, "let's talk about something else. Must you hurry back to your service?"

"No, Sir, I have nothing else to do today other than to spend it with you. The prince, fortunately, made that my only other mission, and I could wish nothing more."

"The king is doing well?"

"Perfectly so."

"And Sir le Prince also?"

"As always, Sir."

The count forgot to inquire after Mazarin – but that was an old habit. "Well, Raoul! Since you have no other duty but me, you shall have my entire day. Now, embrace me. And again! How fine to have you at home, Viscount. Ah, here is good old Grimaud! Come, Grimaud, Sir le Viscount wants to embrace you as well."

The old man didn't wait to make him repeat it; he ran to Raoul with open arms and Raoul met him halfway. "And now, Raoul, let's take a turn around the gardens. Then you'll see how I've improved your rooms for the holidays, and while I show you our preparations for fall, and introduce you to our two new horses, you can give me the news of our friends in Paris."

The count closed his notebook, took the young man by the arm, and led him to the gardens. Grimaud gazed sadly at Raoul, whose head now nearly grazed the top of the doorway, and, fingering his white pointed goatee, he blinked damply and muttered, "All grown up!"

Which Speaks of Cropoli & Cropole & a Great Unknown Painter

While the Count of La Fère showed Raoul his new outbuildings and the new horses in his stable, our readers will allow us to draw them back to the town of Blois to witness an unaccustomed flurry of activity in the city. The impact of the news brought by Raoul was especially felt in the town's inns. Indeed, the king of France and his Court coming to Blois, that is to say, a hundred cavaliers, ten carriages, two hundred horses, as many valets as masters – where would everyone stay, in addition to all the local gentry who would arrive in the next two to three hours as soon as the news rippled and spread, like the widening waves from a stone thrown into the waters of a quiet lake? Blois, so peaceful in the morning, as we've seen, the quietest pond in the world, at the news of the royal visit suddenly was abuzz with tumult and turmoil. All the château's servants, at the orders of their officers, went out into the city to fetch provisions, and ten couriers on horseback rode to the reserves of Chambord to seek game, to the fisheries of Beuvron for seafood, and to the gardens of Cheverny for flowers and fruit. Out from trunks and wardrobes came silken tapestries and chandeliers with gilded chains; an army of the poor swept the courtyards and washed the stone facings, while their wives stalked the meadows beyond the Loire to collect greenery and wildflowers. The city, to be as groomed as the château, scrubbed itself with brushes, brooms, and water. The gutters in the upper town, swollen by the runoff, became rivers in the lower town, and the pavement that it must be said was often quite muddy, was washed clean and gleamed in the sunlight. Then musical instruments were brought out, and drawers of décor were emptied; merchants did a brisk business in wax polish, ribbons, and sword-knots, while the housewives laid in provisions of bread, meat, and spices. Soon the citizens, their houses stuffed enough to survive a siege, were donning holiday garb and heading to the city gate, hoping to be the first to see and announce the royal procession. They knew the king wouldn't arrive before evening, or even the next morning – but what is anticipation but a kind of madness, and what is madness if not an ecstasy of hope? In the lower town, barely a hundred paces from the Hall of the Estates General, between the promenade and the château, in a rather pretty street that was then called Rue Vieille and was indeed very old, stood a venerable edifice, squat, broad, and with peaked gables, endowed with three windows at the street level, two on the next floor, and a small bull's-eye window on the top. On the side of this old triangle had recently been built a new parallelogram that in accord with the practices of the time bulged right out into the street. Though the street was narrowed by a quarter, the house was nearly doubled, and wasn't that sufficient excuse? Local tradition held that in the time of Henri III this gabled house had been the residence of a Councillor of State whom Queen Catherine had come to visit – some said for advice, and some said to strangle him. Whatever the reason, no one doubted the good lady had crossed the house's threshold with her royal foot. After the councillor's death, by natural causes or by strangulation, the house had been sold, then abandoned and isolated from the other houses on the street. It wasn't until the middle of the reign of Louis XIII that an Italian named Cropoli, escaped from the kitchens of Marshal d'Ancre, had taken the house. There he'd founded a small inn that served a macaroni so delicious that people came from leagues away to eat it or fetch it home. The fame of the inn was further spread by the fact that Queen Marie de Médicis, when a prisoner in the château, used to send for its cooking. On the very day that she escaped from the famous high window, she left behind on her table a plate of the celebrated macaroni, tasted only by the royal mouth. The double celebrity of this triangular house, for the strangulation and the macaroni, had given its owner Cropoli the idea of dubbing his inn with a pompous name. His own wouldn't do, as Italian names weren't well regarded at the time, and he didn't wish to draw attention to his hoarded wealth, so carefully hidden. In 1643, after the death of King Louis XIII, when he felt himself approaching the end of his own life, he sent for his son, a young man for whom he had high hopes. With tears in his eyes, he advised him to guard carefully the secret recipe of the famous macaroni, to make his name more French, to marry a Frenchwoman, and, when the political horizon had cleared of its former clouds, to have a neighbouring artisan carve out a fine sign, upon which a famous artist he would name would paint a portrait of the two queens above the words:

The Médicis

The worthy Cropoli, after delivering this advice, had only enough strength left to point his heir toward a brick in the chimney behind which he had hidden a thousand ten-franc coins, and then he expired. The younger Cropoli, a man of heart, bore his loss with resignation and his gain without arrogance. He began familiarizing his customers and neighbours with the practice of not pronouncing his name's final syllable until eventually he was known as Monsieur Cropole that as a name is tolerably French. In due time he married, giving his hand to a little French girl whom he loved, and whose parents provided a suitable dowry once he'd shown them what was behind the brick in the chimney. The first two points concluded, Monsieur Cropole sought for the artist who was to paint the promised sign. This painter was soon found: he was an Old Italian of the school of Raphael and the Caracci but it was a school he'd never graduated. He called himself a painter in the Venetian style, doubtless because he was so fond of colour. His works looked good at a hundred paces but not at close range, and had never pleased the bourgeois – in fact, he'd never sold a one. But he boasted of having painted a bathroom for Madam la Maréchal d'Ancre though it had burned during the disaster of the marshal's downfall, and he was bitter at the loss. The elder Cropoli, as a compatriot, had been indulgent toward this Pittrino that was the name of the artist. Perhaps he had seen the lost and lamented bathroom. He had so much esteem and even friendship for Pittrino that he'd taken him into his home. Pittrino, grateful for a roof over his head and macaroni in his belly, had helped to spread the reputation of the savoury noodles and was reckoned thereby to have done great service to the house of Cropoli. As he grew older, Pittrino became as attached to the son as he had been to the father, and became a sort of fixture in the house, thanks he believed to his honest integrity, his acknowledged sobriety, his proverbial chastity, and a thousand other virtues that he enumerated at length, and which gave him an eternal place in the home with rights of authority over the servants. Besides, he'd established himself as the arbiter of the macaroni, maintaining the pure devotion to the ancient tradition, and wouldn't allow one peppercorn too many or one atom of parmesan too little in the recipe. His joy was very great on the day when the younger Cropole told him of the promised sign. He was soon seen rummaging through an old box, from which he drew some brushes nibbled a bit by rodents but still passable, some dried-up colours in leather pouches, a bottle of linseed oil, and a palette that had once belonged to Bronzino that god among painters as the transalpine artist had called him in his once-youthful enthusiasm. Pittrino was excited and rejuvenated by his return to painting. As Raphael had done, he changed his style to suit the subject, and painted in the manner of Albani two partially clad goddesses rather than two queens. Thanks to Pittrino's effusive new style, these illustrious ladies so nobly graced the sign, where they posed as Anacreontic sirens among a riot of lilies and roses, that the town's principal alderman, when invited into Cropole's parlour to view the proposed emblem, immediately declared that the two beauties were entirely too provocative to hang in the public view of passers-by. "His Royal Highness Monsieur," said the alderman to Pittrino, "who does us the honour to reside in our town, would not be pleased to see his mother in such a state of undress and would clap you in the royal dungeons, for he's not always tender of heart, our glorious prince. Either remove these two sirens or change the title, or I must forbid the exhibition of this sign. This is for your own good, Maître Cropole, and yours as well, Signor Pittrino."

What could one say to that? Cropole thanked the alderman for his consideration and advice. But Pittrino was stricken with gloom and disappointment, for he saw which way things were going. The visitor was barely gone before Cropole, crossing his arms, said, "Well, Signor, what we shall do?"

"We'll have to change the title," said Pittrino sadly. "I have some deep charcoal black that will cover the old name completely, and we can replace 'The Médicis' with 'The Nymphs' or 'The Sirens,' whichever you like."

"But no," said Cropole. "That would go against my father's wishes. My father desired..."

"He desired the queens' portraits most of all," said Pittrino.

"He insisted on the title," said Cropole.

"The proof that the portraits were of prime importance was his insistence that they resemble their models, and they do," replied Pittrino.

"Maybe so but who would recognise them without the title? Nowadays the memory of the citizens of Blois is vague on their appearance. Who would know it was Catherine and Marie without the title of the Médicis?"

"But what about my portraits?" said Pittrino desperately, for deep down he knew Cropole was right. "What's to become of the fruit of my artistic labours?"

"I don't want to go to jail or see you thrown in the dungeons."

"Erase 'The Médicis,' I beg you," said Pittrino.

"No," said Cropole firmly. "But I have an idea, a sublime idea ... your artistry will appear, and so will my title. Doesn't médicis mean doctor in Italian?"

"Yes, in the plural."

"Then we'll get another signboard from our neighbour, you'll paint six doctors on it, and below you'll write 'The Médicis' – which will be an amusing play on words."

"Six doctors? Impossible! What about the composition?" cried Pittrino.

"That part's up to you but since that's what I want, that's what we'll have. Enough – my macaroni's burning." This was incontestable, so Pittrino obeyed. He composed the sign with the six doctors and the designated title, the alderman approved of it, and the sign was well received by the citizenry. It just proved, Pittrino said, that poetry was wasted on the bourgeois. Cropole, to console the painter and acknowledge the artistry of the original, hung the image of the nymphs in his bedroom that made Madam Cropole blush beneath them every night while undressing. That was where the gabled house got its sign, and how, making its fortune, the Inn of the Médicis was able to expand in the manner described. And that was how Blois happened to have a hostelry of that name, with a painter-in-residence named Pittrino.

270 The Stranger

Established thus on a firm foundation and advertised by a bold sign, the inn of Maître Cropole enjoyed a respectable prosperity. It's not that Cropole was likely to earn a vast fortune but he might in time hope to double the thousand Louis d'or bequeathed to him by his father, make another thousand by the sale of his house and goods, and retire as a free citizen of the town. Cropole was eager for profit and welcomed the news of the arrival of King Louis XIV. He, his wife, Pittrino, and two scullions immediately laid their hands on all the inhabitants of the dovecote, the coop, and the hutches, so that the kitchen yard of the Hôtellerie des Médicis resounded with as many cries and lamentations as Rama. At the time, Cropole had only one lodger. He was a man of scarcely thirty, handsome, tall, austere, or rather melancholy in attitude and appearance. He was dressed in a black velvet coat with buttons of jet; a white collar, as simple as that worn by the Puritans, brought out the fair and youthful tint of his neck; while a slight blond moustache barely covered a quivering and disdainful lip. When he spoke to people he looked them in the eye, not to intimidate but with brutal candour, so that the brilliance of his blue eyes became so hard to bear that the other's gaze often fell before his, as the weaker sword does in single combat. At that time when men, though created equal by God, were divided by prejudice into two castes, the gentleman and the commoner, as they really divide into two races, the black and the white – at that time, as we say, the man whose portrait we just sketched could not fail to be taken for a gentleman, and of the best breeding. One need only look at his hands, long, tapered, and pale, with every muscle and vein visible beneath the skin at the slightest movement, the fingers blushing at the slightest tension. This gentleman had arrived at Cropole's inn alone. He had taken without hesitation, without even thinking about it, the best rooms in the inn that the innkeeper had shown him right away, in the service of what some would call reprehensible greed and others just good business. It certainly showed that Cropole was a physiognomist who could size people up at first glance. These rooms occupied the upstairs front of the old triangular house: a large living room lit by two windows on the first floor up, a small room next to it, and another one above. Since his arrival, the gentleman had scarcely touched the meal that had been served to him the night before. He had said just a few words to his host to warn him that he awaited a traveller named Parry, and that when he arrived the host should show him up. Then he'd kept so quietly to himself that Cropole was almost offended, as he preferred guests who were good company. This gentleman had risen early on the morning of the day this story began and placed himself in the window of his drawing room, sitting on the sill and leaning on the banister of the balcony, watching both sides of the street sadly and stubbornly, doubtless awaiting the arrival of the traveller he had mentioned to his host. He had watched the passing of Monsieur's little cortege returning from the hunt, then had seemed to savour the town's sleepy tranquillity as he settled into his waiting. Suddenly there came the commotion of the poor folk hastening out to the meadows, of couriers departing, of washers scrubbing the pavement, of servants hurrying from the château, the rush of chattering school boys, the clatter of carts, of hairdressers on the run, and pages bearing packages; this tumult and din had surprised him but without affecting his air of impassive majesty that resembled that which gives the eagle and the lion their supremely contemptuous looks despite the clamour and scurry of hunters and hyenas. Soon the sounds from the street were joined by the cries of the victims in the kitchen yard, as well as the hurried footsteps of Madam Cropole, along with the bounding gait of Pittrino, who usually spent the morning smoking at the door with the phlegm of a Dutchman, a flurry of sounds that carried up the echoing wooden staircase. This all caused the lodger to start in surprise and agitation. As he was getting up to inquire into this commotion, the door to his chamber opened. The lodger thought that no doubt the traveller he awaited had arrived at last. In unaccustomed haste, he took three quick steps toward the opening door. But instead of the figure he hoped to see, that of Maître Cropole appeared, and behind him, in the shadows of the staircase, the rather graceful face of Madam Cropole, pointedly curious as she glanced at the stranger and then withdrew. Cropole advanced smiling, hat in hand, more bent than bowing. A silent gesture from the stranger asked him his intentions. "Monsieur," said Cropole, "I've come to ask – but how should I address Monsieur, as Your Lordship? Monsieur le Count? Monsieur le Marquis?"

"Just say Monsieur, and come to your business quickly," said the stranger in that haughty tone that admits neither discussion nor question.

"I came to find out how Monsieur had spent the night and ask if Monsieur intended to keep the apartment."

"Yes."

"Monsieur, I must say that an unforeseen event has occurred."

"What's that?"

"His Majesty Louis XIV is arriving in our city today and will spend a night here, or perhaps two."

The stranger appeared astonished by this news. "The King of France is coming to Blois?"

"He's on his way, Monsieur."

"Then, all the more reason for me to stay," said the stranger.

"Very good, Monsieur – but will Monsieur wish to retain the entire apartment?"

"I don't understand. Why would I want less today than I did yesterday?"

"Because, Monsieur, if Your Lordship will allow me to say so, when Your Lordship engaged the apartment yesterday, its price was that of ordinary times ... but now..."

The stranger flushed, perhaps thinking himself insulted by an implication that his means might be limited. "And now," he said coldly, "what of now?"

"Monsieur, I'm an honest man, thank God, and though I may be only an innkeeper, within me flows the blood of a gentleman – my father was a servant and officer of the late Marshal d'Ancre, God rest his soul!"

"I'll not dispute the point, Monsieur; but I want to know, and quickly, what you have to ask."

"You are, Monsieur, too wise not to understand that our town is small, that the Court is numerous, that all our houses will overflow with visitors, and that consequently the value of a room ... goes up."

The stranger flushed again. "State your conditions, Monsieur," he said.

"I say in all honesty, Monsieur that I seek only fair profit from the situation and seek to do business without incivility or rudeness. Now, the apartment you occupy is spacious, and you are alone..."

"That's my business."

"Of course, Monsieur! I'm not seeking to turn Monsieur out."

The stranger coloured red to his temples, and he flashed a look at poor Cropole that, descended though he was from an officer of Marshal d'Ancre, would have sent him crawling back under that famous brick in the chimney if he hadn't been fixed immovably by the interest of profit. "Do you want me to leave? Explain yourself and be quick about it."

"Monsieur, Monsieur, you misunderstand me. It's a delicate situation, difficult to address properly, and doubtless I express myself badly – or perhaps, since Monsieur is a foreigner, as I can tell from his accent..."

In fact, the stranger spoke with that brusqueness that was the principal hallmark of an English accent, even among those of his countrymen who speak the purest French. "As Monsieur is a foreigner, I say, perhaps it's he who misunderstands the nuances of my request. I propose that Monsieur give up one or two of the rooms he occupies, as that would reduce his rent quite a bit and relieve my conscience – for under the circumstances I see no alternative but to increase the price of these chambers that as Monsieur must see is only reasonable."

"What was the rent for the first day?"

"One louis, Monsieur, including meals plus fodder for the horse."

"Fine. And the rate now?"

"Ah, that's the difficulty! With the arrival of the king, the price of beds goes up, and three double rooms cost six Louis. Two louis, Monsieur, are nothing but six Louis, that's a lot."

The stranger, from red, had gone very pale. With heroic bravery, he drew from his pouch a coin purse embroidered with arms that he carefully concealed in the hollow of his hand. This purse had a flatness, a flaccidity that didn't escape Cropole's eye. The stranger emptied his purse into his hand. It contained three double Louis, six Louis altogether, as the innkeeper had asked. Except that it was seven that Cropole required, including the previous day. He looked at the stranger as if to say, "And?"

"It's a Louis short, is it not, Master Host?"

"Yes, Monsieur but..."

The stranger rummaged through his breeches pocket and drew out a little wallet, a golden key, and some small change. Combining these coins he had just enough to add up to another Louis. "Thank you, Monsieur," said Cropole. "Now I just have to ask if Monsieur intends to remain tomorrow as well. If so, fine – but if not, I'll let it out to His Majesty's people when they come."

"That's fair," said the stranger, after a long silence. "But as I have no more coins, as you've seen, to keep the apartment you must take this diamond and either sell it in the city or hold it as security."

Cropole looked at the diamond with such uncertainty that the stranger hastened to add, "I prefer that you sell it, Monsieur, for it's worth three hundred pistoles. A Jew – is there a Jew in Blois? – will give you two hundred for it, or even a hundred and fifty. Take whatever he offers you, so long as it covers the rent of your apartment. Be gone!"

"Oh, Monsieur!" cried Cropole, ashamed of the sudden inferiority reflected on him by this noble and disinterested disdain for money, and of having shown such ignoble suspicions. "Oh, Monsieur, I hope we're not such thieves in Blois as you seem to believe, and if the diamond is worth what you say..."

The stranger again pierced Cropole with a look from his azure eyes.

"I know nothing about diamonds, Monsieur but I believe it," Cropole said.

"But the jewellers will know, so ask them," said the stranger. "Now, does that conclude our business?"

"Yes, Monsieur, and I'm very sorry, for I believe Monsieur is offended."

"It's nothing," said the stranger, with the majesty of high rank.

"Oh but to be suspected of fleecing a noble traveller ... please pardon me, Monsieur, I act only out of necessity."

"Say no more about it, as I said, and leave me to myself."

Cropole bowed deeply and departed with an agitation that revealed he was a man of heart who felt genuine remorse. The stranger locked the door himself, and then looked into the bottom of his purse, from which he'd drawn the small silk bag that contained the diamond, his last resource. He also searched once again through his pockets, looked through the papers in his wallet, and was convinced that complete destitution was upon him. Then he raised his eyes to heaven in a sublime movement of calm despair, wiped a few drops of sweat from his brow with a trembling hand, and then, in a look that displayed an almost divine majesty, returned his gaze to the earth. The inner storm had passed, thanks to a prayer that arose from the bottom of his soul. He returned to the window, resuming his place at the balcony, and remained motionless, torpid, paralysed, until the sky darkened, the first torches crossed the shadowy street, and nightfall signalled that it was time for lights to appear in all the windows of the town.

271 Parry

As the stranger listened to the noises of the town and watched its lights appear, Maître Cropole quietly entered the chamber with two scullions who set the table for supper. The stranger paid no attention to them. Cropole, approaching his guest, whispered in his ear with the deepest respect: "Sir, the diamond has been appraised."

"Ah!" said the traveller. "Well?"

"Well, Sir! The jeweller of His Royal Highness himself offered two hundred eighty pistoles."

"You have it?"

"I thought I ought to take the money, Sir. However, I made it a condition of the sale that if Sir wanted to repurchase his diamond when he could afford to, that it would be made available to him."

"By no means; I told you to sell it."

"Which I did, more or less, since without definitively concluding the sale, I got the money."

"Pay yourself," added the stranger.

"Sir, I will do so, since you require it."

A sad smile passed across the gentleman's lips. "Put the money on that sideboard," he said, turning to indicate the piece of furniture.

Cropole set down a bulging purse, from which he collected his rent. "Now," he said, "it would sadden me if Sir refused to take his supper. Already dinner was passed over, a sad reflection on the house of The Médicis. See, Sir, your meal is served, and I venture to say it's a good one."

The stranger asked for a glass of honey, broke off a piece of bread, and stayed by his post at the window as he ate and drank. Presently there was a tumult of drums and trumpets, cries arose in the distance, and a confused buzz filled the lower town; the first distinct noise that struck the ear of the stranger was the sound of horses approaching. “The king! The king!” repeated the loud and surging crowd.

“The king!” repeated Cropole who abandoned his guest and his ideas of refined service to run and satisfy his curiosity.

He collided on the stairs with Madam Cropole, Pittrino, the houseboys, and scullions. The royal procession advanced slowly, lit by thousands of torches, some in the street, and some in the windows. After a company of King’s Musketeers and a body of mounted gentlemen came the litter of Cardinal Mazarin, drawn like a carriage by four black horses. The pages and servants of the cardinal marched behind. Then came the carriage of the queen mother, her maids of honour leaning out the doors, her gentlemen riding on both sides. The king came next, mounted on a beautiful Saxon horse with a flowing mane. The young prince, illuminated by his pages’ torches, bowed toward those windows from which came the loudest acclamations, showing off his noble and graceful profile. At the side of the king but two paces behind, rode the Prince de Condé, Sir Dangeau, and twenty other courtiers, followed by a train of retainers and baggage, ending a veritable triumphal march. This pomp had a distinctly military character. Some of the courtiers, mainly the older ones, wore travelling outfits but most of the others were dressed as for war. Many wore the gorget and buffcoat of the times of Henri IV and Louis XIII. When the king passed before him, the stranger, who’d leaned out over the balcony to see better but with his face concealed behind his arm, felt his heart swell and overflow with bitter jealousy. The fanfares of the trumpets intoxicated him, the popular acclamations deafened him, and he was dizzy for a moment by the clamour, the dancing lights, and the bright figures before him. “That is a king!” he murmured with such an accent of despair and anguish it could have risen straight to the foot of God’s throne.

Then, before he could return to his sombre reveries, all the sound and pageantry passed on and was gone. The street below the stranger emptied out and nothing remained but a few hoarse voices calling, “Long live the king!”

Then there were only six candles held by the household of the Médicis, that is, two held by the Cropoles, one by Pittrino, and one by each servant. Cropole kept repeating, “How well he looked, the king, and how he resembles his illustrious father!”

“Handsome,” said Pittrino.

“And with such a proud look!” added Madam Cropole, already turning to chat with their neighbours.

Cropole added some remarks of his own to the general discussion, without noticing an old man approaching on foot but leading a little Irish horse by the bridle, trying to make his way through the knot of men and women in front of The Médicis. At that moment the voice of the stranger was heard from the balcony above. “Make way, Sir Innkeeper, to let the newcomer into your house.”

Cropole turned, saw the old man, and made room for him to pass, as the balcony window slammed shut. Pittrino pointed the way to the newcomer who went in without saying a word. The stranger was waiting for him at the top of the stairs. He opened his arms to the old man and led him to a chair but he resisted. “Oh, no, no, Milord!” he said. “Me, to sit before you? Never!”

“Parry,” said the gentleman, “think nothing of it – you, who’ve come so far! From England! Ah, it’s not right for one of your age to exhaust yourself in my service. Rest, now...”

“First, I must give you my report, Milord.”

“Parry ... I beg you, say nothing for now. If the news was good, you wouldn’t need to introduce it so. Your delay tells me the news must be bad.”

“Milord,” said the old man, “don’t alarm yourself unduly. All is not lost, or so I hope. It is will and perseverance we need now, and above all resignation.”

“Parry,” replied the young man, “I’ve come here alone, past a thousand snares and a thousand perils. Do you think I lack will? I planned this journey for ten years, despite all obstacles and advice to the contrary; do you doubt my perseverance? Tonight, I sold my father’s last diamond, because I didn’t have enough money to pay for my lodging and my host was asking me for it.”

Parry made an indignant gesture but the young man just patted his hand and smiled. “Suddenly I have two hundred seventy-four more pistoles, and I feel rich, so no despair there. Now, why do I have need of resignation?”

The old man just raised his trembling hands toward heaven. “Come,” said the young stranger. “Conceal nothing from me. What’s happened?”

“My story won’t take long, Milord; but in heaven’s name, don’t shudder so!”

“It’s impatience, Parry. Come, what did the general tell you?”

“At first the general refused to see me.”

“He thought you were some kind of spy.”

“Yes, Milord but I wrote him a letter.”

“Well?”

“He accepted it, and read it, Milord.”

“That letter explained my position and my wishes?”

“Yes, indeed!” said Parry, with a sad smile. “It faithfully conveyed your thoughts.”

“Then, Parry?”

“Then the general sent the letter back to me by an aide-de-camp, who informed me that, if I was still in the general’s area of command the next day, he’d have me arrested.”

“Arrested!” murmured the young man. “Arrested! You, my most faithful servant!”

“Yes, Milord.”

“Even though you’d signed the letter Parry?”

“Every letter, Milord,” said the old man with a sigh. “And that aide-de-camp had known me at Saint James’s and at Whitehall.”

The young man’s eyes closed and his head drooped. “Perhaps ... that’s what the general did in front of his people,” he said, trying to deceive himself, “but behind their backs, in private, he sent to you? Tell me.”

“Alas, Milord! What he sent me was four burly cavalrymen who put me on the horse you saw me lead in. These cavalrymen made me ride to the little port of Tenby, embarked me, or rather threw me aboard a small fishing boat bound for Brittany, and here I am.”

“Oh!” sighed the young man, convulsively gripping his throat to stifle a sob. “And that’s all, Parry? That’s all?”

“Yes, Milord. That’s all.”

After this brief reply from Parry there was a long interval of silence, during which nothing was heard but the sound of the young man furiously grinding his heel on the parquet floor. The old man decided to change the subject. “Milord,” he said, “what was all that noise just before I arrived? Why were all those people shouting, ‘Long live the king’? Which king? And why all the torches?”

“Ah, Parry, don’t you know?” said the young man ironically. “It’s the King of France who is pleased to visit his good city of Blois. All those fanfares were for him, all those shining cloaks were on his courtiers, all those gentlemen wear swords to defend him. His royal mother precedes him in a magnificent carriage encrusted with silver and gold. Oh, happy mother! His minister amasses millions and conducts him to a marriage with a rich fiancée. Thus, all his people are joyful, they love their king, they shout their acclamations until they’re hoarse, and still they cry, ‘Long live the kin! Long live the kin!’”

“Now, now, Milord,” said Parry, even more anxious about the tone of this new subject than the old one.

“And you know,” continued the stranger, “that during all this honour paid to King Louis XIV, my mother and my sister live in poverty, without money or bread. You know that within a fortnight, when what you’ve just told me is generally known, I’ll be an object of scorn across all Europe. Is this not a situation, Parry, where even a man of my condition might consider...?”

“Milord, in heaven’s name!”

“You’re right, Parry, I’m a coward, and if I do nothing for myself, what should God do for me? No, no, I have two arms, Parry, I have a sword...”

He struck his arm with a fist and then took his sword down from the wall. “What are you going to do, Milord?”

“What am I going to do, Parry? I’ll do as the rest of my family does. My mother lives on public charity, my sister asks alms for my mother, and my brothers do likewise. And it’s time that I, the eldest, do the same. I’m going to beg, Parry!”

And with these words that he cut short with a nervous and terrible laugh, the young man belted on his sword, picked up his hat from a chest, and tied a black cloak around his shoulders, the same one he’d worn travelling the high roads. Then he took up the hands of the old man, who was looking at him anxiously, and said, “My good Parry, make yourself a fire, drink, eat, sleep, and be happy. Be happy, my faithful friend, my only friend, for we’re rich – as rich as kings!” He slapped the bag of pistoles that dropped to the floor, repeated the dismal laugh that had frightened Parry so, and while the whole house was humming and hustling, preparing to receive and house the Parisian courtiers and their lackeys, he slipped out through the common room into the street, where the old man, who had gone to the window to watch him, soon lost sight of him in the darkness.

272

His Majesty Louis XIV at the Age of 22

As we related, the entrance of King Louis XIV into the city of Blois had been brilliant and boisterous, and so the young monarch had seemed satisfied. Arriving under the carriage door of the Hall of the Estates General, the king met there, surrounded by his guards and gentlemen, His Royal Highness Gaston d’Orléans, whose demeanour, never less than majestic, boasted an added dignity and grandeur for this solemn occasion. For her part, Madam, resplendent in her grand ceremonial gown, awaited the entrance of her nephew on the interior balcony. All the windows of the old château, bleak and deserted on most days, glistened with bright ladies and lights. Then it was to the sound of tambours, trumpets, and cheers that the young king crossed the threshold of that château in which King Henry III, seventy-two years earlier, had stooped to betrayal and assassination to keep on his head and in his house a crown that was already slipping from the Valois to the Bourbons. After admiring the young king, so handsome, so charming, and so noble, all eyes sought out that second King of France, more powerful than the first, the man so old, so pale, and so bent who was called Cardinal Mazarin. Louis was brimming with all those natural gifts that made him the perfect gentleman. His eyes were a brilliant, mild, azure blue – but even the most brilliant physiognomist, those delvers into the soul, upon fixing their gaze upon them, assuming they could sustain the regard of a king, even they couldn’t see beyond into the depths that seeming mildness concealed. The eyes of the king contained the infinite depths of the summer sky, or the more sublime but frightening abysses beneath the hull of a ship on a summer’s day on the blue Mediterranean, that immense mirror of the sky that sometimes reflects its stars, and sometimes its storms. The king wasn’t large, if anything shorter than average but his youth outweighed this defect, and he moved with the grace of an athlete, shown by his easy mastery of most physical skills. In truth, he looked every inch a king, and it was no small thing to be a king who looked the part in that period of traditional respect and devotion. Until recently he’d been little seen by his people, and when he had been it was next to his mother, a tall and majestic woman, or Sir Cardinal, a handsome and magnetic man, and beside those two veteran rulers few had thought much of the king. Unaware of these belittling comparisons that were mainly confined to the capital, the citizens of Blois received the young prince like a god, while Sir and Madam, the lords of the château, paid him nearly kingly honors. However, it must be said that when the king saw awaiting them in the Reception Hall a row of chairs of equal height, for him, his mother, the cardinal, his aunt and his uncle, an arrangement cleverly mitigated by their placement in a semicircle, Louis XIV flushed with anger, and looked around at the others to see if anyone was amused at his expense by this calculated humiliation. But as he saw nothing on the cardinal’s face, nothing in his mother’s expression, and nothing from the courtiers, he resigned himself and sat down, though he deliberately sat first and on the centremost chair. The local gentlemen and ladies were then introduced to Their Majesties and to Sir Cardinal. The king noticed that where he and his mother were rarely familiar with the names of those presented, the cardinal, on the contrary, knew all of them, and never failed to ask about their estates or absent family members, mentioning their children by name that delighted these provincials and confirmed in them the idea that he was truly the sole king. It is the true king who knows his subjects, just as there is only one sun, for only the sun shines equally on everyone. These lessons for the young king, who’d begun his studies some time ago without anyone noticing, were duly absorbed, and he spent some time observing those circulating in the hall, trying to draw conclusions about even the least significant of them. They were served a collation; the king, without daring to demand hospitality of his uncle, had awaited this impatiently – and this time he received all the honors due, if not to his rank, then at least to his appetite. As for the cardinal, he contented himself with touching to his withered lips a little broth served in a golden cup. The all-powerful minister, who had appropriated her regency from the queen mother and his royalty from the king, had been unable to command nature to give him good digestion. Anne of Austria already suffering from the cancer that in a few more years would take her life, ate little more than the cardinal. As for Sir, preoccupied with this great event that had overturned his provincial life, he ate nothing at all. Madam alone, like a true Lorrainer, kept up with His Majesty, so that Louis XIV, who’d been embarrassed to be the only one eating, was grateful to his aunt, and also to Sir de Saint-Rémy, her maître d’hôtel, who’d likewise distinguished himself. The collation complete, at a gesture from Mazarin the king rose, and at the invitation of his aunt began to circulate among the ranks of those assembled there. The ladies observed, for there are certain things that the ladies are as quick to observe in Blois as in Paris, that Louis XIV had a bold and lingering eye that promised to those with attractions a distinguished appreciation. The men, for their part, observed that the prince was proud and haughty, and that he would hold the gaze of those who looked at him too openly or too long until they dropped their eyes that seemed to foretell a masterful ruler. Louis XIV had completed a third of his circuit when his ears pricked up at a word spoken by His Eminence, who was conversing with Sir. This word was a woman’s name. Louis XIV had scarcely heard this word before he cut short the arc of his circulation and began drifting toward the cardinal, whose conversation, despite his pretense otherwise, now occupied all the king's attention. Sir, as a good courtier, had inquired of His Eminence about the health of his nieces. In fact, five or six years earlier, three nieces had arrived at the cardinal's house from Italy: Mesdemoiselles Hortense, Olympe, and Marie de Mancini. Therefore, Sir asked after the health of these nieces, regretting that he didn't have the pleasure of receiving them at the same time as their uncle, as they must certainly have grown in both beauty and grace since Sir had seen them last. The king had been struck by the difference in the voices of the two speakers. The voice of Sir was calm and natural but that of Sir de Mazarin was strident and elevated above its usual tone. It was as if he were pitching his voice so it would carry to the end of the hall. "My Lord," he replied, "Mesdemoiselles de Mancini still have to complete their educations, comprehend their positions, and learn how to fulfill their duties. To stay at a young and brilliant Court would distract or even dissipate them."

Louis smiled sadly at this last characterisation. The Court was young, it was true but the cardinal's thrift and avarice ensured it was far from brilliant. "But surely you have no intention," replied Sir, "of keeping them cloistered or educating them among the bourgeois?"

"Not at all," said the cardinal, emphasizing his Italian accent so that his voice, usually soft and smooth, became sharp and penetrating. "Not at all; I intend to see them married, and as well as possible."

"You'll have no shortage of suitors, Sir Cardinal," replied Sir like a cheerful merchant congratulating another on his bustling trade.

"So I hope, My Lord, especially since God has graced them with charm, wisdom, and beauty."

During this conversation, Louis XIV, led by Madam, had been making a circuit of the room. "Miss Arnoux, the daughter of my music tutor," said the princess, presenting to His Majesty a buxom blonde of twenty-two who at a village festival might have been taken for a peasant in her Sunday best.

The king smiled. Madam had never been able to play four fair notes in a row on the viol or the harpsichord. "Miss Aure de Montalais," continued Madam, "a young lady of quality, and my good servant."

This time it wasn't the king who smiled, it was the young woman presented to him, because for the first time in her life she heard Madam, who was usually rather brusque, speak well of her. So Montalais, our old acquaintance, made a deep bow to His Majesty, as much from respect as from the need to hide an inappropriate and quite unladylike smirk that the king might have misunderstood. It was at just that moment that the king heard the name that had made him start. "And the third one is called...?" asked Sir.

"Marie, My Lord," replied the cardinal.

There was, beyond doubt, some magical power in this name, for as we've said, at this word the king shuddered, and drew Madam toward the origin of the conversation, as if he wished to put some confidential question to her but in reality to get closer to the cardinal. "My Aunt Madam," he said, in a laughing undertone, "my geography tutor never informed me that Blois was at such a prodigious distance from Paris."

"How so, my Nephew?" asked Madam.

"Because it seems it takes several years for fashion to travel that distance. Look at these young ladies."

"Well! I know them all."

"Some of them are pretty."

"Don't say that too loudly, my Nephew, or you'll drive them to distraction."

"Patience, my dear Aunt," said the king, smiling, "for the second part of my sentence outweighs the first. Because, my dear Aunt, some of them seem positively old and ugly, thanks to their ten-years-out-of-date fashions."

"But, Sire, Blois is no more than five days from Paris."

"Oh?" said the king. "Then that's, let's see, two years behind for each day."

"You really think it's that bad? I hadn't noticed."

"Look here, Aunt," said Louis XIV, still approaching Mazarin under the pretense of leading Madam toward someone else. "Look, past this ancient jewellery and these pretentious coiffures, look at the elegance of this simple white dress. This must be one of my mother's maids of honor, though I don't know her. Look at her artless finesse and graceful posture. There's no comparison: here is a lady, while these others are just mannequins."

"My dear Nephew," replied Madam, laughing, "permit me to tell you that this time your keen senses have failed you. This young woman is no Parisian but a native of Blois."

"Really, Aunt?" replied the king, sceptically.

"Come here, Louise," said Madam.

And the girl whom we've already met under this name approached, timid, blushing, eyes dropping under the royal gaze. "Miss Louise-Françoise de La Baume Le Blanc, daughter of the Marquis de La Vallière," said Madam ceremoniously to the king.

The young lady bowed with such grace despite being intimidated by the royal presence that the king, watching her, actually missed a few words of the conversation between the cardinal and Sir. "Stepdaughter," continued Madam, "of Sir de Saint-Rémy, my maître d'hôtel, who oversaw the creation of that excellent truffled turkey that Your Majesty seemed to enjoy so well."

There was nothing that grace, beauty, and youth could do to overcome a vulgar association like that. The king smirked. Whether Madam meant her words as a pleasantry or was merely naïve, the connection annihilated anything Louis might have found charming or poetic in the young woman. For Madam, and therefore at that moment for the king, Miss La Vallière was nothing but the stepdaughter of a man who saw to the preparation of truffle-turkeys. But such is the nature of princes. The gods were much the same on Olympus, and no doubt Diana and Venus were just as condescending when they spoke of the beauty of the poor mortals Alcmene and Io, if they deigned to address the subject while taking nectar and ambrosia at Jupiter's table. Fortunately, Louise had bent so low that she didn't hear Madam's remarks or see the king's smile. Indeed, if the poor child, the only one of all her companions with the natural good taste to dress in white, had heard Madam's words and seen the king's cold sneer, her delicate dove's heart would have stopped and she'd have died on the spot. Even Montalais herself, with all her ingenuity and ambition, wouldn't have tried to recall her to life, for ridicule is the death of everything, even beauty. But fortunately, as we said, Louise, whose ears were ringing and whose gaze was averted, Louise saw and heard nothing, and the king, preoccupied with the cardinal's conversation, hastened to move on. He arrived just as Mazarin concluded with, "Marie, like her sisters, is bound for Brouage. I had them follow the opposite bank of the Loire from us, and if they obey my instructions, I calculate they should be across from Blois tomorrow morning."

These words were pronounced with that tact, that precision, and that mastery of tone that made Signor Giulio Mazarini the world's greatest comic actor. As a result, the words struck right to the heart of Louis XIV – as the cardinal, turning at the sound of His Majesty's approaching footsteps, could see from the effect on his pupil's face, a subtle reddening that was nonetheless noted by the eye of His Eminence. But what was one more trick of persuasion and perception to a man who'd been hoodwinking the diplomats of Europe for over twenty years? From the moment the king heard these words it seemed he'd taken a poisoned dart to the heart. He lost all confidence and, suddenly uncertain, cast anxious looks at the assembly surrounding him. He tried again and again to catch the queen mother's eye but she, engrossed in the pleasure of speaking with her sister-in-law, and moreover warned off by a glance from Mazarin, didn't seem to notice her son's pleading glances. From then on, all music, flowers, lights, even beauty itself seemed hateful and tedious to Louis XIV. Back in his chair, after he'd bitten his lips a dozen times, stretched out his arms and legs as if confined, like a well-bred child who, not daring to yawn, seeks every other way possible to express his boredom, after having once more tried and failed to implore mother and minister, he turned a desperate look toward the door, that is, toward freedom. At this door, framed by the doorway against which he was leaning, he saw, standing out in strong contrast to his surroundings, a proud and spare figure, with an aquiline nose, a severe but sparkling eye, hair long and grey, and a black moustache, a veritable model of military virtue, whose gleaming gorget, shining like a mirror, broke all the reflected lights of the hall into shimmering flashes. This officer wore on his head a grey felt hat with a red plume, proof that he was there on duty rather than for his pleasure; if he'd been a courtier rather than a soldier he'd have been holding his hat in his hand, as one must always pay a price for pleasure. What showed even more clearly that this officer was on duty and performing a familiar task was the way in which he watched, arms folded and with utter indifference, the party with all its joys and disappointments. He seemed above it all, like a philosopher – but all old soldiers are philosophers, with a much greater understanding of disappointment than of joy that they've had little opportunity to sample. So, he stood there, leaning against the richly carved door frame, until the king's sad and anxious eyes met his own. And it wasn't the first time, it seemed, that the officer's eyes had met such a look, because as soon as he saw the expression on Louis XIV's face, he knew just what was passing in the king's heart, his anxiety and the desire for freedom from what oppressed him. Instantly seeing what duty required of him, the officer stood tall and said, in a voice that resounded like that of a commander on the battlefield: "On the service of the king!"

At these words that burst like a roll of thunder above the sound of the orchestra, the singers, the talkers, and the strutters, the cardinal and the queen mother looked with surprise at His Majesty. Louis XIV, pale but resolute, supported by his thought being echoed and magnified by the voice of his Lieutenant of Musketeers, rose from his chair and took a step toward the door. "Are you leaving, my son?" asked the queen while Mazarin contented himself with an inquiring glance that might have seemed concerned if it hadn't been so piercing.

"Yes, Madam," replied the king. "I am fatigued and would like to write this evening."

A smile touched the lips of the minister, who appeared, with a nod, to give the king his permission. Sir and Madam hastened to give orders to their guards to present arms. The king bowed, crossed the hall, and approached the door, where a double file of twenty musketeers awaited His Majesty. At the end of the line stood the impassive officer with his naked sword in his hand. As the king passed, the crowd stood, some on tiptoe, to watch him go by. Ten musketeers preceded him out into the antechamber, ten more falling in behind the king and Sir, who wanted to accompany His Majesty. Assorted servants followed, a little procession escorting the king toward his designated lodging, the same apartment occupied by Henry III when he'd convened the Estates General. Sir had given his orders. The musketeers, led by their officer, entered the narrow passage that connected one wing of the château to the other. This passage began in a small, square antechamber that was dark and sombre, even on sunny days. There Sir held up a hand to Louis XIV and said, "You're passing, Sire, the very spot where the Duke de Guise received the first thrust of the poniard."

Even the king, nearly ignorant of history, had heard of this event, though he knew nothing of its context or details. "Ah!" he said, shuddered and stopped.

Everyone else, both before and behind him, stopped as well. "The duke, Sire," continued Gaston, "was about where I am, walking in the direction Your Majesty was walking; Sir de Loignac was where your Lieutenant of Musketeers is standing, and Sir de Sainte-Maline and the King's Ordinaries were behind and around him. It was there that he was struck."

The king turned toward his officer of musketeers in time to see a cloud pass across his bold and martial countenance. "Yes, from behind," murmured the lieutenant with a gesture of supreme disdain.

And he turned as if to continue their march as though uncomfortable between walls that had witnessed such treachery. But the king, who appeared eager to learn, seemed disposed to pause and look around the lethal location. Gaston understood his nephew's curiosity. "See, Sire," he said, taking a torch from the hands of Sir de Saint-Rémy, "here is where he fell. There was a bed against the wall, and he tore down its curtains as he collapsed."

"Why is there a hollow in the parquet floor at this spot?" asked Louis.

"Because that's where his blood pooled," said Gaston. "The blood soaked deep into the oak and it was only by gouging out the wood that it was effaced – and yet," added Gaston, holding the torch near, "you can still see a reddish tint that has resisted all attempts to scrub it away."

Louis XIV raised his head. Perhaps he was thinking of the bloodstain he'd been shown one day at the Louvre, where the blood of Concini had been spilled at the command of his father, Louis XIII.

"Let's go," he said.

The march immediately resumed, for emotion had given his voice an as-yet-unaccustomed tone of command. They arrived at the apartment reserved for the king that communicated with the narrow passage by which he'd approached, as well as with a staircase that overlooked the courtyard. Gaston said, "I hope Your Majesty will accept this apartment, unworthy though it is to receive him."

"Uncle," replied the young prince, "I thank you for your cordial hospitality." Gaston bowed to his nephew, who embraced him, and then went out. Of the twenty musketeers who'd escorted the king, ten accompanied Sir back to the reception hall that was still busy despite His Majesty's departure. The other ten were assigned their night posts by their officer, after he'd spent five minutes exploring all the surrounding chambers, surveying them with that cold and considering regard that was less the fruit of experience than of a certain tactical genius. Then, with all his people placed, he chose for his headquarters an adjacent antechamber in which he found a large armchair, and next to it a lamp, some honey, water, and a half-loaf of bread. He turned up the lamp, drank half a glass of honey, curled his lip in a scornful smile, sat down in the big chair and prepared to fall asleep.

273

The Stranger from the Inn of the Médecis Drops his Incognito

Despite his air of nonchalance, the officer who was settling down to sleep was burdened with a grave responsibility. Lieutenant of the King's Musketeers, he commanded the entire company of one hundred twenty men that had come from Paris but other than the twenty already referred to, the other hundred were detailed to guard the queen mother and, especially, the cardinal. Monsignor Giulio Mazarini was thrifty, and instead of travelling with his own guards, he economized by using the king's, taking fifty of them for himself – which, to a stranger to this Court, might have seemed an unusual escort for a foreigner. What such a stranger might have found even more unseemly, even extraordinary, was that the wing of the château occupied by the cardinal was brilliant with lights and busy with visitors. The musketeers who mounted guard over the doors of this wing admitted only couriers who brought the cardinal, even while travelling, his urgent correspondence. Twenty men were on duty outside the queen mother's rooms; thirty were resting to be ready to relieve their companions the next day. In contrast, the wing assigned to the king showed only darkness, silence, and solitude. Even the château's servants had one by one withdrawn. Monsieur le Prince had sent to inquire whether His Majesty required his attendance, and the Lieutenant of the Musketeers, who was accustomed to this nightly question, gave the customary negative reply. After this, all prepared for an early bed, as if in a good bourgeois household. And yet, from the rooms assigned to the king, it was easy to hear the festive music that issued from the richly illuminated windows of the great hall. 10 minutes after arriving in his rooms, Louis XIV had been able to recognise, by the grand procession that eclipsed his own entourage, the departure of the cardinal, who moved toward his bedroom accompanied by a numerous escort of gentlemen and ladies. To observe all this activity the king had only to look out his windows, whose shutters stood still open. His Eminence crossed the courtyard, his way lit by Monsieur himself, who bore a torch; they were followed by the queen mother, leaning on Madam's arm, the two whispering on their way like two old friends. Behind these two couples came columns of ladies, pages, and officers, their torches illuminating the courtyard like a walking bonfire surrounded by reflections from the windows; then the procession disappeared inside, moving toward the upper floors. No one thought of the king, leaning on his balcony, from which he'd sadly watched this flow of noise and light – no one, that is but the stranger from the Inn of the Médicis, whom we saw go out wrapped in his black cloak. He had gone straight up to the château and circled the main palace, watching, from behind his melancholy face, the people who still thronged it. Then, noticing that no one was guarding the main gate, since Monsieur's guards were all fraternizing with the royal troops, discreetly, or rather indiscreetly, sharing out the Monuca honey, he entered, passing through the people lingering in the courtyard until he came to the landing of the stairs leading to the cardinal's wing. Doubtless it was the torchlight and busy passage of pages and servants that drew him that way. But he was stopped by a horizontal musket and the challenge of a guard. "Where are you going, friend?" demanded the sentry.

"I go to see the king," replied the stranger with cool hauteur.

The soldier called one of His Eminence's ushers, who, in the tone of a functionary directing a petitioner to a sub-minister, said, "You want the other stairs across the way."

And the usher, without sparing another thought to the stranger, returned to his conversation. The stranger made no reply, just turned and crossed to the indicated staircase. On that side there was no noise and few torches lit the gloom, through which a single sentry paced like a shadow. It was so quiet the stranger could hear the sound of his footsteps and the noise of his spurs when his heels struck the flagstones. This sentry was one of the twenty musketeers assigned to the king's service, and he mounted his guard with the stiffness and impassivity of a statue. "Who goes there?" he said.

"A friend," replied the stranger.

"What do you want here?"

"To speak to the king."

"Oh ho! My dear Monsieur, that's out of the question."

"Why is that?"

"Because the king has gone to bed."

"To bed, already?"

"Yes."

"No matter; I must speak with him."

"And I tell you that's impossible."

"But..."

"Be off!"

"What about the password?"

"I don't have to give you a password. Be off."

And this time the sentry added to his words a threatening gesture. But the stranger never moved a hair and seemed rooted in place. "Sir Musketeer," he said, "are you a gentleman?"

"I have that honour."

"Well! So am I, and between gentlemen there ought to be some measure of consideration and respect."

The sentry lowered his weapon, impressed by the dignity with which the stranger had delivered these words. "Speak, Monsieur," he said, "and if what you need is within my power..."

"Thank you. You have an officer, I suppose?"

"Yes, Monsieur, our lieutenant."

"Well, I would like to speak to your lieutenant."

"Ah! That's another thing entirely. Follow me, Monsieur."

The stranger saluted the sentry in a lofty manner and mounted the stairs, while the sentry called ahead, "Lieutenant, a visitor!"

This word was passed from sentry to sentry until it reached the officer's antechamber and roused him. He dragged on his boots, rubbed his eyes, threw on his coat, and then stepped toward the stranger as he came in. "What can I do for you, Monsieur?" he asked.

"You are the officer on duty, the Lieutenant of Musketeers?"

"I have that honour," replied the officer.

"Monsieur, I absolutely must speak with the king."

The lieutenant looked closely at the stranger, and in that look, brief though it was, he learned all he needed to know, perceiving a proud distinction concealed by common clothes. "I don't take you for any kind of fool," he replied, "yet it seems to me you must know, Monsieur, that no one approaches the king without his consent."

"He will consent, Monsieur."

"Permit me to doubt it, Monsieur; the king retired more than a quarter of an hour ago and by now must be nearly undressed. Besides, the order has gone out."

"When he knows who I am," said the stranger, lifting his chin, "he will withdraw the order."

The officer was growing increasingly surprised and increasingly impressed. "If I agree to announce you, Monsieur, will you at least consent to tell me what name to announce?"

"You will announce His Majesty Charles II, King of England, Scotland, and Ireland."

The officer stifled a cry of astonishment and recoiled slightly, his pale face showing an unexpectedly poignant expression on the visage of such a man of action. He looked closer and said, "Oh, yes, Sire! In fact, I should have recognised you."

"You've seen my portrait?"

"No, Sire."

"Or did you see me at Court before I was expelled from France?"

"No, Sire, not that either."

"How could you recognise me, then, if you've seen neither my portrait nor my person?"

"Sire, I saw His Majesty the King, your father, on a terrible occasion."

"The day..."

"Yes."

A dark cloud passed over the prince's face but then, waving it away, he said, "Do you still see any problem with announcing me?"

"Pardon me, Sire," replied the officer. "I couldn't imagine I was addressing a king under so simple an exterior, though as I had the honor to tell Your Majesty a moment ago, I'd seen King Charles I ... but excuse me, I must go warn the king."

He turned, then retracing his steps, he asked, "Your Majesty doubtless wishes this interview to remain a secret?"

"I don't insist upon it but if it's possible..."

"Quite possible, Sire, for I can dispense with notifying the First Gentleman on duty; but Your Majesty will have to consent to give me his sword."

"Ah, right. I'd forgotten that no one may go in to see the King of France while armed."

"Your Majesty may insist on an exception but then it will be my responsibility to notify the First Gentleman."

"Here is my sword, Monsieur. Would you care to announce me to His Majesty now?"

"This very moment, Sire."

The officer immediately marched to the king's door that the valet opened to him. "His Majesty, the King of England!" the officer announced.

"His Majesty, the King of England!" repeated the valet.

At these words an attending gentleman opened the inner door of the king's apartments to reveal Louis XIV without hat or sword, doublet unlaced, and advancing with every indication of surprise. "You, my Brother! You, at Blois!" cried Louis XIV, dismissing with a gesture the gentleman and valet, who withdrew into an antechamber.

"Sire," replied Charles II, "I was on my way to Paris in hopes of seeing Your Majesty when I heard of your visit to this city. I extended my stay, as I have something very important to say to you."

"Does this chamber suit you, Brother?"

"Perfectly, Sire, for it seems private enough."

"I've sent my gentleman and my valet into the next room. Outside this room is the antechamber, where you saw just one officer, right?"

"Yes, Sire."

"Well, then! Speak, Brother; I'm listening."

"I'll begin, then, Sire, and may Your Majesty take pity on the troubles of my house."

The King of France blushed, covering it by drawing together two armchairs.

"Sire," said Charles II, "I need not ask Your Majesty if he knows the deplorable details of my history."

Louis XIV coloured even more, and then, placing a hand over that of the King of England, he said, "My Brother, I'm ashamed to say that the cardinal rarely speaks of politics in front of me. Worse, in former days I had La Porte, my personal valet, read history to me in the evening but the cardinal stopped these readings and sent La Porte away, so that I must beg my Brother Charles to tell me everything, speaking as if to a man who knows nothing."

"Well, Sire, I think that by starting at the beginning I may have a better chance of touching Your Majesty's heart."

"Speak, Brother, speak."

"You know, Sire, that I was called to Edinburgh by loyalists in 1650, during Cromwell's expedition to Ireland, and I was crowned at Scone. A year later, after being wounded in one of the provinces he'd subjugated, Cromwell returned to come down upon us. To meet him in battle was my goal, to get out of Scotland my desire."

"But isn't Scotland almost your native country?" asked the younger king.

"Yes but the Scots were cruel compatriots to me! Sire, they forced me to deny the religion of my fathers, and they hanged Lord Montrose, my most devoted servant, because he wouldn't become a Covenanter. The poor martyr, offered a boon when he was dying, asked that his body should be cut into as many pieces as there were cities in Scotland, so that there might be proof of his loyalty everywhere, and as a result I couldn't leave one town or enter another without passing some scrap of that body that had acted, fought, even breathed for me. In a bold move, I dashed through Cromwell's army and made it into England. The Protector then joined me in a strange race, with a crown for the goal. If I'd been able to get to London before him, doubtless the prize of the race would have been mine but he caught up to me at Worcester. The Spirit of England had passed from us and into him. On 3 September 1651, the anniversary of the Battle of Dunbar, so fatal to the Scots, I was defeated, Sire. Two thousand men fell around me before I thought of retreating a step. Finally, I had to flee. From then on, my life became a melodrama. With my pursuers close behind me, I cut off my hair and disguised myself as a woodcutter. A day spent hiding in the branches of a broad oak gave that tree the name of Royal Oak that it bears to this day. My adventures in the county of Strafford that I escaped with my host's daughter riding pillion behind me, are still told around the fireside there, and became the subject of a ballad. One day I'll write all this down, Brother, for the instruction of my brother kings. I will say how, upon arriving at Mister Norton's, I met a chaplain from the Court who watched me suspiciously as I played a game of bowls, and an old servant who recognised me and burst into tears, nearly betraying me out of loyalty rather than treachery. Finally, I'll mention my terror – yes, Sire, my terror – when, at the house of Colonel Windham, the hostler who looked after our horses declared that they'd been shod in the north."

"How strange," murmured Louis XIV, "that I never heard of any of this. I only knew that you'd embarked at Shoreham and then landed in Normandy."

"Oh!" lamented Charles. "Dear God above, if you allow it to happen that kings don't hear one another's stories, how can you expect them to help each other?"

"But tell me, Brother," continued Louis XIV, "how, having been treated so rudely in England, you can still hope for anything from that unhappy country and her rebellious people?"

"Because, Sire, since the Battle of Worcester, everything has changed! Cromwell has died, after signing a treaty with France on which he dared to place his name above yours. He died on September 3, 1658 – another anniversary to add to that date, after the battles of Worcester and Dunbar."

"His son succeeded him..."

"But some men, Sire, may have a son without having an heir. Oliver Cromwell's legacy was too great a burden for Richard Cromwell. Richard, who was neither Republican nor Royalist; Richard, who let his guards eat his lunch and his generals govern his state; Richard abdicated the Protectorate on 25 May 1659, a little over a year ago, Sire.

"Since then England has been little more than a casino where everyone throws dice for my father's crown. The two players still at the table are Lambert and Monck.* Well, Sire, it's my turn! I'd like a seat at the game that's being played on my royal cloak. A million, Sire, to corrupt one of these players and buy me an ally, or two hundred of your gentlemen to drive them from my palace of Whitehall, as Jesus chased the moneychangers from the temple."

"So," replied Louis XIV, "you've come to ask of me..."

"Your aid; not just what kings owe to one another but no more than the duty between simple Christians; your aid, Sire, whether in money or men; your aid, Sire, and within a month, whether I pit Lambert against Monck, or Monck against Lambert, I'll have reconquered my paternal inheritance without having cost my country a single guinea, or my subjects a drop of blood, because they're now so sick of the fever of revolution, of protectorate and republic, that they ask nothing more than to fall safely asleep in the arms of royalty. Give me your aid, Sire, and I'll owe my throne more to Your Majesty than to my father. My poor father, who paid dearly for the ruin of our house! You can see how desperate, how unhappy I am, Sire, since I blame my own father."

And the blood mounted in the pale face of Charles II, who put his head between his hands for a moment as if blinded by the flush of such filial blasphemy. The young king was as unhappy as his elder brother and squirmed in his seat, unable to find the words to respond. Finally, Charles II, to whom ten extra years gave a greater ability to master his emotions, regained his voice. "Sire," he said, "your answer? I'm like the condemned awaiting his sentence. Must I die?"

"My Brother," the French prince replied to Charles II, "you ask me for a million but I've never had even a quarter of that sum! I have nothing! I'm no more the King of France than you are King of England. I'm just a name, a figurehead dressed in velvet fleurs-de-lys, nothing more. I can see my own throne but that's the only advantage I've over Your Majesty. I've nothing and can do nothing."

"Is this true?" cried Charles II.

"My Brother," said Louis, lowering his voice, "I have suffered humiliations not even my poorest gentlemen would endure. If poor old La Porte were still here, he'd tell you how I slept in ragged sheets with holes big enough for my legs to pass through; how when I was older, and asked for my carriage, they brought me a vehicle half-gnawed by the rats of the coach house; how, when I asked for my dinner, they sent to the cardinal's kitchen to see if there was any food for the king. And today, today when I'm twenty-two years old, today when I've attained the age of royal majority, today when I should have the key to the treasury, the command of politics, the decision of peace or war, cast your eyes around and see what leavings they give me. I am abandoned, disdained, silenced, while across the way all is light, activity, and homage to power. There! There you see the real King of France, my Brother."

"The cardinal's chambers?"

"The cardinal's, yes."

"Then, I am condemned, Sire."

Louis XIV said nothing.

"Condemned is the word, for I will never plead with the one who left, to die of cold and hunger, my mother and my sister, the daughter and grand-daughter of Henri IV, saved only by Monsieur de Retz and the Parliament, who sent them wood and bread."

"To die!" murmured Louis XIV.

"Why not?" continued the King of England. "Poor Charles II, grandson like you of Henri IV, Sire, having neither parliament nor Cardinal Retz to help him, will die of hunger as his mother and sister nearly did."

Louis frowned and tore at the lace of his cuffs. This futile fidgeting as he tried to mask his internal emotions struck King Charles, and he took the younger man's hand. "Thank you, Brother," he said.

"You were frank with me, and that's all I could ask of someone in your position."

"Sire," said Louis XIV, suddenly raising his head, "you need a million in gold or two hundred gentlemen, isn't that what you said?"

"Sire, a million would do it."

"That's not so much."

"Offered to one man, it's quite a lot. Convictions have been bought for far less, and I'd be dealing with mere venality."

"And two hundred gentlemen – why, that's hardly more than a company."

"Sire, there's a tradition in our family that four men, just four French gentlemen devoted to my father, came this close to saving him, though he was condemned by parliament, guarded by an army, and in the middle of an angry nation."

"So, if I can find you a million, or two hundred gentlemen, you'll be satisfied, and feel I've treated you as a true brother should?"

"I'll call you my saviour, and when I regain my father's throne, England, so long as I reign, shall be like a sister to France, as you have been a brother to me."

"Well, Brother!" said Louis, rising. "What you hesitated to ask of me, I will go ask for without hesitation! Though I've never asked such things for myself, I'll ask them for you. I'll go see the King of France – the other, the one who's rich and powerful – and demand this million in gold or two hundred men. And then we'll see!"

"Oh!" cried Charles. "You're a noble friend, Sire, a heart blessed by God! You save me, Brother, and if you ever need the life you hereby preserve, ask it of me!"

"Not so loud, my Brother! Hush!" whispered Louis. "We don't want to be overheard. We're not yet at our goal. To ask Mazarin for money? Why, it's like passing through the enchanted forest where each tree harbours a demon. There's nothing harder in the world!"

"But still, Sire, when it's you who asks..."

"I've already said that I never ask," replied Louis with a hauteur that made the King of England go pale. When he saw Charles wilting like a wounded man, he quickly added, "Please pardon me, Brother – I don't have a mother and sister who are suffering. Forgive me my pride, and I'll pay for it with a sacrifice. I go now to see the cardinal. Wait for me, I beg. I will return."

274

The Arithmetic of Sir Mazarin

While the king was traversing the corridors that led to the cardinal's wing of the château, accompanied only by his valet, his officer of musketeers, breathing like a man who'd been holding his breath a long time, stepped out from the entry chamber which the king had thought empty. This little room was really part of the king's bedchamber, separated by nothing but a thin partition. And this partition that blocked only the eyes, did nothing to prevent the ears from hearing everything that passed within. So, there was no doubt but that this Lieutenant of Musketeers must have heard every word exchanged in His Majesty's chamber. Warned in time by the king's final words, the officer had exited into the antechamber ahead of him, to salute him as he passed and to watch him until he disappeared down the corridor. Once the king had disappeared, he shook his head in a way that belonged only to him, and said, in voice that forty years after leaving Gascony still retained its accent, "It's a sad service for a sad king."

Then, these words pronounced, the lieutenant resumed his place in the armchair, extending his legs and closing his eyes like a man who intends to meditate or to sleep. During this short monologue and the arrangements that followed, while the king passed down the long corridors of the old château, a different kind of scene was playing out in the cardinal's chambers. Mazarin had gone to bed suffering somewhat from the gout but as he was a man of order who made use even of pain, he made his wakefulness into the humble servant of his work. Therefore, he'd had Bernouin,* his personal valet, bring him a small travel desk so he could write while lying in bed. But gout is not an adversary that gives in easily, and as every movement stabbed him with pain, he asked Bernouin, "Is Brienne still there?"

"No, My Lord," replied the valet. "Sir de Brienne, by your leave, has gone to bed. But if Your Eminence so desires we can always wake him."

"No, it isn't worth it. Now let's see. Damn these numbers!"

And the cardinal gazed at nothing while counting on his fingers. "The numbers again?" said Bernouin. "Fine! If Your Eminence is going to return to his calculations, I can promise him a fine migraine in the morning. And Doctor Guénaud didn't come with us."

"You're right, Bernouin. Well, you'll just have to stand in for Brienne, my friend. Really, though, I should have brought Sir Colbert. That young man will go far, Bernouin, very far. Such orderly thinking!"

"Maybe," said the valet, "but personally I don't like the face of your young man who will go far."

"Enough, Bernouin, enough. I didn't ask for your opinion. Now sit here, take the pen, and write."

"Very well, My Lord. Where shall I write?"

"There, under those two lines I drew across."

"Got it."

"Write: seven hundred sixty thousand livres."

"Done."

"In Lyons..."

The cardinal seemed to hesitate. "In Lyons," repeated Bernouin.

"Three million nine hundred thousand livres."

"Fine, My Lord."

"In Bordeaux, seven million."

"Seven," repeated Bernouin.

"Ah, yes," said the cardinal with a smile, "seven." He sighed and resumed, "You understand, Bernouin, that this is all money there to be spent."

"Ah, My Lord, whether it's to be spent or saved is nothing to me, since none of these millions are mine."

"These are the king's millions; this is the king's money we're counting. Can we get on with it? You always interrupt me!"

"Seven million in Bordeaux."

"Yes, that's right! In Madrid, four. I tell you whose money it is, Bernouin, because everyone is so foolish as to think I'm rolling in millions. I reject such nonsense! A minister has nothing of his own. Now, let's continue: general receipts, seven million. Real estate, nine million. Got all that, Bernouin?"

"Yes, My Lord."

"On the markets, six hundred thousand livres. Assorted properties, two million. Oh, I forgot – the furnishings of the various châteaux..."

"Should I add the royal crown?" asked Bernouin.

"No need for that, its inclusion is implied. Now, got everything, Bernouin?"

"Yes, My Lord."

"And these sums...?"

"Are all lined up in a column."

"Total them, Bernouin."

"Thirty-nine million two hundred and sixty thousand livres, My Lord."

"Agh!" spat the cardinal. "Still short of forty million!"

Bernouin added the numbers again. "Yes, My Lord, short by seven hundred forty thousand livres."

Mazarin asked for the ledger and checked it over carefully. "Just the same," said Bernouin, "thirty-nine million two hundred and sixty thousand livres is a nice round sum."

“Ah, Bernouin! But I wish the king had forty million for us.”

“Didn’t Your Eminence say that all this money belongs to His Majesty?”

“Absolutely, that couldn’t be clearer. But these thirty-nine million are spoken for, and well beyond.”

Bernouin smiled to himself like a man who believes no more than he has to, meanwhile preparing the cardinal’s night medicine and fluffing his pillow. “Hmpf!” said Mazarin, once the valet had left the chamber. “Still less than forty million! Will I never achieve my goal of reaching forty-five? Who knows if I have enough time left to do it? I’m sinking fast, I’ll never make it. Still, maybe I can find two or three million in the pockets of our good friends the Spaniards. They plundered Peru, those people, and there must be some of that still around.”

He was talking this way, focused on his figures and forgetting about his gout that gave way to this most important of his preoccupations, when Bernouin, upset, suddenly burst back into his room.

“Well?” demanded the cardinal. “What is it?”

“The king! The king, My Lord!”

“The king? How?” said Mazarin, stuffing the ledger under his covers. “The king here – and at this hour! I should think he’d been long abed. What is it?”

Louis XIV heard these final words and saw the cardinal sitting up in surprise, for he came in at just that moment. “It’s nothing, Sir Cardinal,” he said, “or at least nothing to alarm you; it’s just an important discussion that I need to have with Your Eminence tonight, that’s all.”

Mazarin immediately thought of the attention the king had paid to his remarks about Miss Mancini and assumed the discussion had to be about that. That was reassuring, and he adopted a charming and receptive demeanour that in turn reassured the young king. When Louis was seated, the cardinal said, “Sire, I should by rights listen to Your Majesty while standing but the agony of my condition…”

“No standing on ceremony between us, my dear Cardinal,” said Louis affectionately. “I’m not the king, just your pupil, as you know, and it’s doubly true this evening, as I come to you as a supplicant, a very humble supplicant both eager and hopeful.”

Mazarin, seeing the colour mounting in the king’s face, was confirmed in his first idea that was that thoughts of love were behind these pretty words. But this time that cunning politician, wise though he was, had it wrong: this blush wasn’t caused by shy and youthful passion but rather by the nervous rise of royal pride. Like a good uncle, Mazarin sought to facilitate the expected amorous confidence.

“Speak, Sire,” he said, “and since Your Majesty will temporarily forget that I’m his subject and call me his tutor and teacher, I listen to Your Majesty with an open heart.”

“Thank you, Sir Cardinal,” replied the king, “but what I have to say to Your Eminence is not on my own account.”

“Too bad, Sire,” said the cardinal. “I’m just in the mood for Your Majesty to ask me for something important, even at personal sacrifice … but whatever you’ve come to ask me, I’m ready to gratify you by granting it, my dear Sire.”

“Well, then! Here’s what it’s about,” said the king, his heart beating at a rate equalled only by that of his minister. “I just received a visit from my royal brother, the King of England.”

Mazarin sprang up in bed as if he’d been jolted by a Leyden bottle or Voltaic battery, while an expression of surprise, or rather deep disappointment, was followed by such a flash of anger that even Louis XIV, novice diplomat though he was, could tell that the minister had expected him to say something else. “Charles II!” cried Mazarin, his lip curling in disdain. “You received a visit from Charles II?”

“From King Charles II,” replied Louis XIV, according his fellow grandson of Henri IV the title Mazarin appeared to forget. “Yes, Sir Cardinal, that unhappy prince has touched my heart with an account of his misfortunes. He’s in great distress, Sir Cardinal. and I share his pain – I, who have seen my own throne disputed, and was forced, in the time of unrest, to leave my own capital – I, in short, who understand such misfortune, was moved to help a royal brother now dispossessed and fugitive.”

“Indeed?” sneered Mazarin. “Why doesn’t he have a Jules Mazarin near him as you do, Sire? His crown would still be on his head.”

“I know all that my house owes to Your Eminence,” said the king, with some hauteur. “You must believe that, for my part, Sir, I will never forget it. It’s because my brother the King of England lacks the minister of genius who saved me that I turn now to that same minister to come to his aid. If you extend your hand over his head, rest assured, Sir Cardinal that your hand would be able to restore the crown to his brow from where it fell at the foot of his father’s scaffold.”

“Sire,” replied Mazarin, “I’m grateful for your good opinion of me but we have no business meddling over there. They are madmen who deny God and behead their kings. They’re dangerous, Sire, and their hands reek with the stain of royal blood. That policy offends me, and I reject it.”

“Then help us to replace it with another.”

“Such as?”

“The restoration of Charles II.”

“What? My God!” said Mazarin. “Does that poor prince flatter himself that he can grasp such a mirage?”

“But yes!” replied the young king, intimidated by the difficulties his minister seemed to foresee in the project. “He’s only asking for a million.”

“Is that all? One little million, if you please?” said the cardinal ironically, his Italian accent creeping out. “One little million, if you please, my brother? Bah! A family of beggars.”

“Cardinal,” said Louis XIV, lifting his chin, “this family of beggars is a branch of my own family.”

“And are you rich enough to give others millions, Sire? Do you have such millions?”

“Oh!” said Louis XIV with an agony in his heart that he struggled not to show on his face. “Yes, Sir Cardinal, I know how poor I am. But I’m sure the Crown of France must be worth a million, and for this good deed, I’m even willing to pledge my crown. There must be a Jewish moneylender who will give me a million for it.”

“So, Sire, you say you need a million?” asked Mazarin.

“Yes, Sir, that’s what I’m saying.”

“You’re badly mistaken, Sire, you’d need much more than that. I will show you, Sire, how much you really need. Bernouin! Where are you?”

“What, Cardinal?” said the king, “Are you going to consult a lackey about my royal business?”

“Bernouin!” the cardinal called again, appearing not to notice the young king’s feeling of humiliation. “Come here and repeat to me that sum we were discussing just now.”

“Cardinal, didn’t you hear me?” said Louis, pale with indignation.

“Don’t be angry, Sire; I manage Your Majesty’s affairs in an open and above-board fashion; everyone in France knows I keep an open book. What was I having you do just now, Bernouin?”

“Your Eminence had me adding up sums, My Lord.”

“Which you did, didn’t you?”

“Yes, My Lord.”

“To figure the sum that His Majesty needs at the moment, right? Isn’t that what I said? Speak frankly, my friend.”

“As Your Eminence says.”

“Well, then! How much did I say I wanted?”

“Forty-five million, I believe.”

“And how much do we have if we combine all our resources?”

“Thirty-nine million two hundred sixty thousand livres.”

“Very well, Bernouin, that’s all I needed to know. You may leave us now,” said the cardinal, turning his sharp eyes on the young king, who was dumb with stupefaction.

“But … that is…” stammered the king.

“Ah, Sire! You still doubt?” said the cardinal. “Well! Here’s the proof of what you just heard.”

And Mazarin drew from under his covers the number-filled ledger and presented it to the king, who averted his eyes, so deep was his grief and shame. “So, if you want a million, Sire, that’s a million not accounted for here, and it’s actually forty-six million Your Majesty needs. Well, I fear there aren’t enough Jews in the world to lend you such a sum, even if you did pledge the Crown of France.”

The king, clenching his trembling fists, pushed back his chair. “Then it seems,” he said, “my brother the King of England must die of hunger.”

“Sire,” replied Mazarin, in a softer tone, “remember this proverb that I offer you as a basis of sound policy: ‘Rejoice in being poor when your neighbour is poor as well.’”

Louis thought for a few moments, while glancing curiously at the ledger peeking out from under the cardinal’s bolster. “So,” he said, “it’s impossible to fulfil my request for money, Sir Cardinal?”

“Absolutely, Sire.”

“Remember that this will make an enemy of him if he regains the throne without my help.”

“If that’s Your Majesty’s only concern, then he should rest easy,” said the cardinal eagerly.

“All right, I don’t insist,” said Louis XIV.

“Have I convinced you, at least, Sire?” said the cardinal, placing his hand on the king’s.

“Completely.”

“If there’s anything else, ask for it, Sire, and I’ll be happy to see that you get it, having refused you this.”

“Anything else, Sir?”

“Why, yes! Am I not in service, body and soul, to Your Majesty? Hey, Bernouin! Torches and guards for His Majesty! His Majesty is returning to his apartments.”

“Not yet, Sir. Since I find your good will at my disposal, I’ll take advantage of it.”

“Something personal, Sire?” asked the cardinal, hoping that the subject would finally turn to his niece.

“No, Sir, nothing for me,” replied Louis, “but once more for my brother Charles.” Mazarin’s expression darkened, and he muttered something that Louis couldn’t hear.

275

The Politics of Sir Mazarin

Instead of the hesitation with which he’d approached the cardinal a quarter of an hour before, now there could be read in the eyes of the young king a will to win, an urge that, though it might fail because it wasn’t backed by true power, showed that he would at least keep the memory of a defeat deep in his heart. “This time, Sir Cardinal, it’s for something easier to find than a million in gold.”

“You think so, Sire?” said Mazarin, regarding the king with that gaze that read what was written on men’s hearts.

“Yes, I think so, and when you hear what I’m asking for…”

“Do you think I don’t already know, Sire?”

“You know what I’m going to ask for?”

“Listen, Sire, and I’ll tell you what King Charles said.”

“But you couldn’t!”

“Listen. He said, ‘And if that stingy Italian peasant …’”

“Sir Cardinal …!”

“If not his exact words, that’s the sense of them. My God, I can hardly blame him; everyone is driven by their passions. He said, ‘If that Italian peasant refuses you the million we ask, Sire, and we’re forced, for lack of money, to renounce diplomacy, well! We’ll ask him for five hundred gentlemen.’”

The king shuddered, for the cardinal was right in everything but the number. “Isn’t that how it went, Sire?” cried the minister with a note of triumph. “And then he added some lovely, encouraging words, saying, ‘I have friends on the other side of the Channel, friends who need only a leader and a flag to follow. When they see me, and they see the banner of France, they’ll rally to my side, for they’ll know I have your support. The French flag and uniform are worth more to me than the million that Sir de Mazarin has refused us.’

“For he knew very well that I’d refuse it. ‘With these five hundred gentlemen, Sire, I will conquer but the honour of the victory will be yours.’ That’s what he said, isn’t it? That or something very similar, embroidering his words with brilliant metaphors and proud imagery, because they’re fine orators in that family. Why, the father even gave a speech on the scaffold.”

The sweat of shame beaded Louis’s brow. He felt that this insult to his royal brother was an attack on his dignity but he didn’t know how to respond, especially to the man to whom he’d always seen everyone bow, even his mother. Finally, he made an effort. “But, Sir Cardinal,” he said, “he didn’t ask for five hundred men, only two hundred.”

“You see that I guessed what he was after.”

"I have never denied, Sir, that you see deeper and farther than others, that's why I thought you'd not refuse my brother Charles something so simple and easy to grant as what I ask in his name, Sir Cardinal – or rather in mine."

"Sire," said Mazarin, "I've laboured in politics for thirty years, first under Cardinal Richelieu, then on my own. My policies have not always been entirely forthright, I admit but they have never been inept. Now, the idea that's been proposed to Your Majesty is both dishonest and inept."

"Dishonest, Sir!"

"Sire, you signed a treaty with Sir Cromwell."

"Yes, a treaty on which Sir Cromwell signed his name above mine!"

"Why did you sign it down so low, Sire? Sir Cromwell found a good place for his signature, and he took it; that was his way. The point is you signed a treaty with Cromwell – or in other words, England, since when you signed that treaty Sir Cromwell was England."

"Sir Cromwell is dead."

"Do you think so, Sire?"

"Beyond a doubt, since his son Richard succeeded him, and then abdicated."

"So he did! Richard inherited from Cromwell upon his death, and England inherited when he resigned. The treaty was part of that inheritance, whether it was in Richard's hands or in England's. That treaty is as legal and as valid as ever. Why would you abandon it, Sire? What has changed? What Charles II wants today we didn't want to give him ten years ago, and don't want to now. You are allied with England, Sire, and not Charles II. It might have been unseemly, from the family point of view, to sign a treaty with the man who beheaded your father's brother-in-law, and to have contracted an alliance with the body they call the Rump Parliament; that might be unseemly, as I say but politically it was far from inept, since, thanks to that treaty, I saved Your Majesty, who was then still a minor, from the danger of a foreign war during the Fronde ... you remember the Fronde, don't you, Sire?"

The young king lowered his head. "A war that would have fatally complicated settling the uprisings of the Fronde. And I say to Your Majesty that to change course now without warning our allies would be both dishonest and inept. We'd be going to war without right on our side, and it would justify the same being done to us, for an attack by five hundred men, or two hundred men, or fifty or even ten, is still an act of aggression. A Frenchman is the nation; the uniform is our army. Suppose, for example, Sire, that you were at war with Holland that sooner or later is bound to happen, or with Spain that could occur if somehow your marriage fell through" – Mazarin looked closely at the king – "and there are a thousand reasons why that might happen ... anyway! In that case, would you approve of England sending the United Provinces or the Infanta a regiment, a company, or even a squad of English gentlemen? Would you think that comports with the elements of your treaty of alliance?"

Louis listened, and thought it strange to hear Mazarin invoking good faith, when he was the originator of so much political chicanery that such tricks were known as mazarinades. "However," said the king, "unless I directly forbade it, I couldn't prevent gentlemen of our state from going to England on their own account."

"You would have to order them to return, Sire, or at least protest their presence as enemies in an allied country."

"But see here, Sir Cardinal, surely a political genius like you could find a way to help this poor king without compromising ourselves."

"But that's exactly what I don't want to do, my dear Sire," said Mazarin. "For my purposes, events in England couldn't be unfolding better if I'd planned them myself. Governed the way it's governed, England is a magnet of trouble for all of Europe. Holland wants to protect Charles II? Let Holland do it; the only two maritime powers will clash, we'll watch as they sink one another's fleets, and we'll use the debris to build our own ships, if we can ever afford the nails to do so."

"Oh! This all sounds so miserable and petty, Sir Cardinal!"

"Yes, quite true, Sire, I admit it. More than that: if I admit for a moment the possibility of your evading the terms of your treaty that happens sometimes when there is a great interest at stake, or the terms bind one too closely; well! You'd authorise the engagement you request, France, or its flag that is the same thing, would cross the Channel to fight – and France would be defeated."

"Why is that?"

"My faith! We know what manner of general His Majesty Charles II is, as we saw at Worcester!"

"He no longer has to deal with Cromwell, Sir."

"That's right: now he has to deal with General Monck, who is far more dangerous. Cromwell was a visionary, a man with moments of exaltation, of expansiveness during which he, that former brewer, overflowed like an overfilled barrel. Then we might taste a drop of his thoughts that gave us the savour of his intentions, a flaw that enabled us repeatedly to penetrate to Cromwell's soul, though they claimed that soul was armoured in triple brass, as Horace says. But Monck! Ah, Sire, God forbid that you must come to grips with Sir Monck! He's the one who in the last year has given me all these grey hairs! Monck is no visionary, no, not he; alas, Monck is a politician. He keeps close, and never overflows. For the last ten years he's had his eyes fixed on a goal but no one can figure out what it is. Like Louis XI, to prevent anyone from guessing his thoughts of the night before, every morning he burns his nightcap. On the day his plans, slowly and solemnly matured, finally burst forth, they will explode with the certain success of the unexpected. It's this Monck, Sire, of whom you may never have heard, whose name you may not even know, who stands against your brother Charles II. Charles, believe me, knows that name well, though he doubtless didn't mention it to you. When you say Monck, you say a marvel of depth and tenacity, the only two things against which spirit and ardour are no use. Sire, I was ardent when I was young, and I always had my wits. I can boast about them, since I'm criticized for them. I got pretty far with those two qualities, the son of a angler in Piscina who became prime minister to the King of France, and in that capacity, if Your Majesty will recognise it, I've rendered a few services to Your Majesty's throne. Well, Sire! If I'd encountered Monck along my way instead of Sir de Beaufort, Sir de Retz, or Sir le Prince, I'd have been lost. Keep your distance, Sire, or you'll fall into the clutches of this political soldier. Monck's helmet, Sire, is an iron coffer in which he locks away his thoughts, and no one has the key to it. I wear only a biretta of velvet, Sire, so to him I bow and defer."

"What do you think Monck wants then?"

"Heh! If I knew that, Sire, I wouldn't tell you to be wary of him, because then I'd be stronger than he is. But with Monck, I'm afraid to even guess – to even guess, do you understand? For if I think I've guessed what he wants, I'll stop thinking, and despite myself, I'll follow my guess. Since that man came to power over there, I'm like those damned souls in Dante whose necks have been twisted by Satan so they walk forward but look backward: I march toward Madrid but look back toward London. To guess, with this devil of a man, is to fool yourself, and if you fool yourself, you're lost. God forbid I should try to guess what he wants; I limit myself to spying on what he does, and that's going far enough. Now, I believe – you understand the scope of the word believe? – I believe that Monck, though he doesn't want to commit himself to anything, is nonetheless eager to succeed Cromwell. Your Charles II has already sent ten envoys with proposals to him, and he's contented himself with chasing them away, saying nothing more than, 'Be gone, or I'll have you hanged.' He's as silent as a sepulchre, that man! Right now, Monck supports the Rump Parliament but this support doesn't fool me: Monck just wants to avoid being assassinated. An assassination would foil him before his goal can be reached, and his goal must be reached; or so I believe. Again, don't believe that just because I say I believe it, Sire – I only do that out of habit. I think Monck just supports the Parliament until the time comes to dismiss it. You've been sent to ask for swords but those swords are to fight against Monck. God forbid we ever fight against Monck, Sire, for Monck will defeat us, and I could never console myself for being beaten by Monck. That victory would be something that Monck would have been planning for a decade. By God! Sire, out of friendship for you, if not out of consideration for himself, let Charles II retire and keep a low profile. Your Majesty can give him one of your châteaux and a little income. But no! That infamous treaty we were just talking about prohibits Your Majesty from even giving him a château!"

"How's that?"

"Yes, Your Majesty is committed to denying hospitality to King Charles, to deny him France itself. That's why you must make your royal brother understand that he can't stay with us, we can't allow him to compromise us, or I myself..."

"Enough, Sir!" said Louis XIV, rising. "To refuse me a million is your prerogative; those millions are yours to manage. To refuse me two hundred gentlemen is likewise your right, for you are prime minister, and you have, in the eyes of France, the responsibility for peace and war. But to presume to prevent me, the king, from granting hospitality to the grandson of Henri IV, to my cousin, my childhood companion! That's where your power ends and my will begins."

"Sire," said Mazarin, delighted to get off so cheaply, the more so because that's why he'd fought so hard in the first place, "I will always bow before the will of my king. My king can keep the King of England near at hand or in one of his châteaux; you can inform Sir Mazarin of it, just don't tell the prime minister."

"Good night, Sir," said Louis XIV. "I leave in despair."

"But convinced that is all that I need, Sire," replied Mazarin.

The king made no response but withdrew thoughtfully, convinced, not of all that Mazarin had told him but on the contrary of something he was careful not to mention that was of the necessity to make a serious study of his place in the affairs of Europe, because those matters seemed complex and obscure to him. Louis found the King of England sitting in the same chair where he'd left him. On seeing him, the English prince rose but saw at first glance the discouraging expression on his cousin's face. He spoke first, to help Louis in the painful confession he had to make. "No matter what," he said, "I will never forget the kindness and friendship you've shown me."

"Alas," replied Louis XIV mournfully. "Only empty friendship, Brother."

Charles II went very pale, drew a cold hand across his forehead, and was staggered by momentary dizziness. "I understand," he said at last. "No hope!"

Louis took Charles II by the hand. "Wait, Brother," he said, "don't do anything rash, all might change. It's only reckless acts that ruin a cause. I beg of you, add just one more year's trial to your time of suffering. There's no more reason to take drastic action now than at any other time, neither occasion nor opportunity. Stay near me, Brother, I'll give you one of my houses for a residence, and together we'll keep an eye on events and prepare for what may come; Brother, take courage!"

Charles II withdrew his hand from the king's and stood tall before him. "With all my heart, I thank you, Sire," he said. "But I have pleaded for aid from the greatest king in the world without result, and now I must seek a miracle from God."

And he went out before Louis could say anything more, his head high but hands shaking, with an expression of weary sadness on his face, and a distant gaze that, finding nothing to rest upon in the world of men, seemed to look beyond into unknown lands. The officer of the musketeers, seeing him pass like a phantom, bowed nearly to the ground before him. He then took a torch, called two of his troopers, and went down the deserted stairs with the unhappy king, holding in his left hand his hat, its plume brushing the steps. At the gate, the officer asked the king which direction he was going so he could send the musketeers as escort. "Sir, you who once knew my father," replied Charles II quietly, "did you ever pray for him, perchance? If so, remember me in your prayers now. Where I go I travel alone, and I beg you to give me neither company nor escort any further."

The officer bowed and sent his musketeers back inside. But he remained for a moment under the portico to watch Charles II walk away until he disappeared into the shadows of the street. "To him, as before to his father," he murmured, "as Athos would say, and with good reason: 'Hail to His Fallen Majesty!'"

Then, climbing the stairs, "How wretched his service is!" he murmured at every step. "What a pitiful master I serve! To go on with this life is intolerable. It's time I acted for myself! No more giving my all for nothing!" he continued. "The master may yet rise and achieve but the servant is done. God be with you! I'll put it off no longer. Come, you two," he said, entering the antechamber. "Why are you waiting around here? Put out your torches and return to your posts. Oh, you were watching out for me? Keeping an eye on me, my men? You geese! I'm no Duke Guise, and they won't assassinate me in the narrow hall. Besides," he added to himself, "someone would have to decide to do that, and no one makes decisions since Cardinal Richelieu died. Ah, now there was a man, back in the day! No, it's decided: tomorrow I hang up my hat for good!"

Then, after a thought, he said, "No, not yet! I have one last great challenge before me but this one, I swear, will be the last, God be with you!"

He had scarcely finished when a voice came from the king's chamber. "Sir Lieutenant!" it called.

"I'm here," he replied.

"The king would like to speak to you."

"Come now," said the lieutenant. "Perhaps this is the challenge I was thinking of." And he went in to see the king.

276 The King & the Lieutenant

When the king saw the officer come in, he dismissed his valet and his attending gentleman. "Who's on duty tomorrow, Sir?" he asked.

The lieutenant bowed with military precision and replied, "I am, Sire."

"What, you again?"

"Always me."

"How can that be, Sir?"

"Sire, the musketeers, when travelling, assume all the duties of guarding Your Majesty's household, that is to say, yourself, the queen mother, and Sir Cardinal, who borrows from the king the best part of the royal guard, or at least the most numerous."

"But in between watches?"

"There is no in-between, Sire, just twenty or thirty men of your hundred and twenty who are off duty to rest. At the Louvre it's different, and if we were at the Louvre, I'd rely on my adjutant; but when travelling, Sire, anything can happen, and I prefer to manage things myself."

"So, you're on duty every day?"

"And every night, yes, Sire."

"Sir, we can't have that. You must find time to rest."

"Perhaps, Sire but I'd rather not."

"You'd ... rather not?" said the king, perplexed by this unusual response.

"I'm saying, Sire, that I'd rather not expose myself to being at fault. If the devil wanted to play a trick on me, Sire, you'll understand that since he knows the man he's dealing with, he'd do it at a moment when I was absent. My duty, and the peace of my conscience, comes before all."

"But that way of life, Sir – it will kill you."

"Oh, Sire! I've followed this way of life for thirty-five years and I'm the healthiest man in France and Navarre. Besides, Sire, don't worry about me, I beg you; it's unexpected and I'm not used to it."

The king cut short the conversation with a new question. "Then, you'll be here tomorrow morning?" he asked.

"Like now, like always, yes, Sire."

The king paced back and forth across the room. It was easy to see that he was burning with the need to speak but some fear restrained him. The lieutenant, erect, immobile, his hat in his hand, his fist on his hip, watched this activity, while grumbling into his moustache, "He hasn't got a half-pistole's worth of resolution in him, upon my honour! I'd wager he won't speak on his own."

The king continued to pace, occasionally glancing toward the lieutenant. "He's the spit and image of his father," the officer told himself. "He's simultaneously proud, ambitious, and timid. Plague take such a master!"

Louis stopped. "Lieutenant?" he said.

"Right here, Sire."

"This evening, down in the hall, why did you cry out, 'The king's service, His Majesty's Musketeers?'"

"I was obeying your orders, Sire."

"Me?"

"Yourself."

"But I didn't say a word, Sir."

"Sire, an order may be given by a sign, by a gesture, or by a look, as clearly as by speech. A servant who had only ears would be but half a servant."

"Your eyes are pretty sharp, then, Sir."

"Why do you say that, Sire?"

"Because they see what isn't there."

"My eyes are indeed sharp, Sire, though they've served their master a long time. But when there's something to be seen, they rarely miss the opportunity. Tonight they saw Your Majesty blushing with the effort not to yawn; that Your Majesty looked with eloquent supplication first at His Eminence, and then at Her Majesty the queen mother, and finally at the door that led out of the hall; and they saw all that so well, they practically read the words on Your Majesty's lips that said, 'Who will get me out of here?'"

"Sir!"

"Or words to that effect, Sire. Thus, I didn't hesitate; that look was for me, and as good as an order, so I cried, 'His Majesty's Musketeers!' And I was right, Sire, as Your Majesty proved on the spot."

The king turned away to conceal a smile, and then, after a few seconds, turned his gaze back on that countenance so intelligent, so bold and firm, that it looked like the dynamic and proud profile of an eagle facing the sun. "Well done," he said after a short silence, during which he tried, and failed, to stare his officer into dropping his gaze.

But seeing him say nothing more, the officer turned on his heels and took three steps toward the door, murmuring, "He won't speak, God be with you! He won't speak."

"Thank you, Sir," the king said then.

"Really, that was the only thing missing," continued the lieutenant to himself, "to be thanked for doing my duty as if I might have failed to do it." And he marched to the door in a military jingle of spurs.

But when he arrived on the threshold, he sensed the king's desire calling him back and he turned. "Has Your Majesty told me everything?"

He asked this in a tone impossible to describe but which, without seeming to actually solicit a confidence, was so persuasively frank that the king replied at once, "Approach me, Sir."

"Here, now!" murmured the officer. "It's coming at last."

"Listen to me."

"Every word, Sire."

"You'll mount your horse tomorrow at four in the morning, Sir, and you'll have one saddled for me."

"From Your Majesty's stable?"

"No, from the musketeers."

"Very good, Sire. Is that all?"

"Then you will accompany me."

"Alone?"

"Alone."

"Will I come to get Your Majesty, or shall I await him?"

"You'll await me."

"Where shall I do that, Sire?"

"At the park's back gate."

The lieutenant bowed, understanding that the king had said all that he would at that time. In fact, the king then dismissed him with a friendly gesture. The officer left the king's chamber and returned philosophically to his armchair where instead of falling asleep as one might expect at such an advanced hour of the night, he began to think more deeply than he ever had. The result of these reflections was less sad than previously. "Come, he's started at last," he said. "Love drives him, and he moves, he moves! This king is nothing in his Court but he may amount to something as a man. Anyway, we'll see come morning ... But, oh!" he said suddenly, sitting up very straight. "Now there's an idea, a gigantic idea, God be with you! And maybe that idea will make my fortune!"

With this exclamation, the officer rose and paced the broad antechamber, hands in the pockets of his coat. The candle guttered furiously in the path of a cool breeze that entered through the slightly opened window and crossed the room diagonally, projecting a reddish flickering glow, sometimes bright, sometimes diminished, and casting on the wall a great shadow of the lieutenant, drawn in silhouette like a figure from Callot, with the plumed felt hat and the sword at his belt. "Of course," he murmured, "unless I'm very much mistaken, Mazarin is laying a trap for the young lover; Mazarin set up a time and place for a rendezvous this evening as smoothly as if he were Sir Dangeau himself. I heard it all clearly enough: 'Tomorrow morning,' he said, 'they'll be passing the bridge from Blois.' God! That's clear enough – especially to a lover! And that explains his embarrassment, his hesitation, and this order: 'Sir my Lieutenant of Musketeers, a horse tomorrow, at four in the morning.' Which is as clear as if he'd said, 'Sir my Lieutenant of Musketeers, tomorrow at four in the morning, on the bridge from Blois, do you hear?'"

"And thus, I'm in possession of a state secret, insignificant though I am. And how did I get it? Because I have sharp eyes, as I just told His Majesty. They say he loves this little Italian doll to distraction!"

They even say he cast himself at his mother's feet for permission to marry her. Moreover, they say the queen consulted the Holy See of Rome to find out if such a marriage, made against her will, would be valid. Oh, to be twenty-five again! If only those I once had by my side were with me once more! I'd pit Mazarin against the queen mother, France against Spain, and set up a new queen all on my own! But now? Bah!"

And the lieutenant snapped his fingers in disdain. "This miserable Italian, this coward, this peasant who dared refuse a million in gold to the King of England, how quickly would he give me a thousand pistoles if I brought him this news? No, God be with you! I'm being childish. I must be drunk! Him, Mazarin, give something to someone? Haha ha!"

With an effort, the officer swallowed his laughter. "To sleep," he said. "To sleep, and without delay. This night's work has dulled my edge, and I'll see things more clearly on the morrow."

And having made himself this recommendation, he wrapped himself in his cloak, and sniffed in disdain at his royal neighbour. Five minutes later, he was sleeping with his hands clenched and his lips slightly apart, from which escaped, not his state secret but a sonorous snore that echoed from the vault of the majestic antechamber.

277

Marie de Mancini

The first rays of the sun were barely topping the great trees of the park and gilding the high wind-vanes of the château when the young king, already awake for over two hours, burning with the insomnia of love, opened his shutters to the dawn, and cast a curious glance across the courtyards of the sleeping palace. He saw that it was the appointed hour; the big clock above the courtyard showed a quarter past four. He didn't call his valet, still deeply asleep on the other side of the room but dressed himself. The sound awoke the valet, who awakened quite frightened, afraid he'd overslept and missed his duty but Louis sent him back to bed, warning him to remain silent. Then he went down the staircase to the courtyard, passed out through a side gate, and saw along the wall of the park a rider who was holding a spare horse by the bridle. This rider was unrecognisable under his cloak and broad hat. As to the horse, saddled like that of a wealthy bourgeois, it showed nothing remarkable to even the most inquisitive eye. Louis went and took the horse's bridle; without leaving his saddle, the officer bent down and held the king's stirrup as he mounted, then asked in a low voice for orders from His Majesty. "Follow me," replied Louis XIV.

The officer put his horse into a trot behind that of his master, and they rode down toward the bridge. When they were on the other side of the Loire, the king said, "Sir, be so good as to ride on until you see a carriage, and then return to warn me; I'll wait here."

"Would Your Majesty deign to give me some details, so I'll recognise the right carriage when I see it?"

"The carriage will bear two ladies and will probably be followed by servants."

"Sire, I don't wish to make a mistake; is there some other sign by which I'd recognise this carriage?"

"It will probably display the arms of Sir Cardinal."

"Very good, Sire," replied the officer, now completely clear on the object of his quest. He spurred his horse into a trot in the direction indicated by the king. But he'd gone scarcely five hundred paces before he saw a carriage drawn by four matched mules coming over the crest of a rise. Behind that carriage came another. At a glance he knew that these were the vehicles he was looking for. He turned on the spot, rode back to the king, and said, "Sire, here come the carriages. The first, in fact, contains two ladies and their maids, while the second carries footmen, supplies, and luggage."

"Ah, very good," replied the king in a voice full of emotion. "Go, please, and tell these ladies that a cavalier of the Court wishes to pay them his private respects."

The officer went off at a gallop. "God!" he said as he rode. "Here's a new and honourable position! I complained of being insignificant, and now I'm the confidant of the king. It's enough to make a musketeer burst with pride!"

He approached the carriage and delivered his message with wit and gallantry. There were indeed two ladies in the coach, one a great beauty, though perhaps over-slender, and a second, less favoured by nature but lively and graceful, her face alight with wilful intelligence. Her keen and piercing eyes, in particular, spoke more eloquently than all the amorous phrases current in that time of gallantry. The officer addressed himself to this second lady without hesitation, though as we've said, the first was perhaps more beautiful. "Mesdames," he said, "I'm the Lieutenant of the Musketeers, here to announce that a cavalier who wishes to pay you his respects awaits you on the road just ahead."

At these words, whose effects he awaited with curiosity, the dark-eyed lady gave a gasp of joy, leaned out the door, and, seeing the rider approaching, extended her arms, calling, "Ah! My dear Sire!"

And her eyes brimmed with tears. The coachman abruptly reined in the mules, the maids tumbled to the carriage floor, and the prettier lady bowed humbly, while her mouth curved in the most ironic smile ever sketched on feminine lips by jealousy. "Marie! Dear Marie!" said the king, taking the hands of the dark-eyed lady between his own. And then, opening the carriage's heavy door himself, he drew her out with such ardour that she was in his arms before touching the ground. The lieutenant, taking a position on the other side of the carriage, watched and listened without being noticed. The king offered his arm to Miss de Mancini and gestured to the coachmen and servants to continue on their way. It was almost six in the morning; the road was still fresh and pleasant; the tall trees lining the highway, with flowers just bursting from their buds, were bedizened with dewdrops that coated their branches with liquid diamonds. The grasses clustered at the foot of the hedges, and the sparrows, who had returned only a few days before, swooped in their graceful curves between sky and water; a breeze perfumed by the flowering forest whispered along the road and wrinkled the surface of the river. All these beauties of the morning, the aromas of the plants, the scent of the earth rising toward the sky, intoxicated the two lovers, walking side by side, leaning against each other, hand in hand, eyes seeking eyes, neither daring to speak, they had so much to say to each other. The officer saw that the abandoned horse was wandering here and there, distracting Miss de Mancini, and used this as an excuse to approach and take charge of the royal mount. Then, walking nearby but between the horses, he observed the lovers' every word and gesture. It was Miss de Mancini who spoke first.

"Ah, my dear Sire!" she said. "So, you're not abandoning me then?"

"No," the king replied, "As you can see, Marie."

"Everyone told me that once we were separated, you'd think no more of me!"

"Dear Marie, is it only today that you've realised we're surrounded by people eager to deceive us?"

"But, Sire, this journey, this alliance with Spain? They're marrying you off!"

Louis lowered his head. At the same time the officer saw the sun glint from Marie de Mancini's eyes, flashing like daggers drawn from their sheaths. "And you've done nothing on behalf of our love?" asked the young woman after a moment of silence. "Ah, Miss! How can you believe that? I threw myself at my mother's feet, I begged, I pleaded. I said that my entire happiness depended on you. I even threatened..."

"Well?" Marie asked eagerly.

"Well! The queen mother wrote to the See of Rome, and they told her that an unapproved marriage between us would be invalid and would be nullified by the Holy Father. Finally, seeing there was no hope for us, I asked at least for a delay of my marriage with the Infanta."

"That doesn't seem to have kept you from travelling to meet her."

"What would you have? All my prayers, my pleadings, and my tears, have been dismissed, negated by reasons of state."

"And so?"

"So, what, then? What would you have me do, Miss, with the will of all the powerful leagued against me?"

This time Marie lowered her head. "Then I must say goodbye and forever," she said. "You know they're exiling me, almost burying me alive. More than that, you know they're planning to marry me off too!"

Louis turned pale and clutched at his heart. "If it were only a matter of my life, persecuted as I was, I would have yielded – but I thought your life was at stake as well, my dear Sire, so I fought for your future."

"Oh, yes! My love, my treasure," murmured the king, more gallantly perhaps than passionately.

"The cardinal would have given in," said Marie, "if you'd gone to him, if you'd insisted. For the cardinal to call the King of France his nephew! Think of it, Sire! He'd risk anything for that, even a war; the cardinal, assured of his sole rule under the double pretext that he'd raised the king and had given him his niece, oh, the cardinal would have fought everybody, overcome all obstacles! Oh, Sire! I can answer for that. I'm a woman, and I see clearly where love is concerned."

These words produced a singular impression on the king. Instead of inflaming his passion, they cooled it. He stopped their progress and said, suddenly, "There's nothing more I can say, Miss. Everything has failed."

"Except your own will in the matter, dear Sire, isn't that so?"

"Alas!" said the king, blushing. "Do I even have a will of my own?"

"Oh!" cried Miss de Mancini, as if struck a physical blow.

"The king has no will but that which politics dictates, no will but reasons of state."

"It's not will you lack but love!" cried Marie. "If you loved me, Sire, you'd find the will."

And pronouncing these words, Marie raised her eyes to meet those of her lover, whom she saw more pallid and crushed than an exile who is about to leave his native land forever. "Accuse me of anything," murmured the king, "but don't say I don't love you."

A long silence followed these words that the king had spoken with an undeniable sincerity. "I can't bear to think, Sire," continued Marie, making a final effort, "that tomorrow, or the day after, I'll never see you again. I can't bear to think that I'll spend the rest of my days away from Paris, that the lips of an old man, a stranger, will kiss the hand you hold in yours; no, truly, I can't bear to think this, Sire, without my poor heart breaking in despair."

And indeed, Marie de Mancini burst into tears. For his part, the king brought his handkerchief to his lips and stifled a sob. "See," she said, "the carriages have stopped; my sister is waiting, and the time is now. What you decide here will bind us for life! Oh, Sire – do you want me to lose you? Is what you want, Louis that the one to whom you said, 'I love you,' should belong to someone other than her king, her master, and her beloved? Oh, have courage, Louis! Just say the word, a single phrase, just say, 'I want you!' And all my life will be yours, all my heart will be yours forever."

The king said nothing. Marie then looked at him as Dido looked at Aeneas in the Elysian Fields, with fierce disdain. "Goodbye, then," she said. "Goodbye to life. Goodbye to love. Goodbye to heaven!"

And she turned to leave but the king restrained her, seizing her hand that he carried to his lips. Then, despair prevailing over the resolution that he seemed to have taken internally, he let fall on that beautiful hand a burning tear of regret that made Marie shudder, as though it really had burned her. She saw the king's wet eyes, his pale brow, his trembling lips, and she exclaimed in a tone impossible to describe, "Oh, Sire! You're the king, so you may weep but still I must go!"

The king's only reply was to hide his face in his handkerchief. The horses shied as something like a muffled roar came from the officer who held them. And then Miss de Mancini, indignation incarnate, left the king and hastened back to her carriage, calling to the coachman, "Drive, and quickly!" The coachman obeyed, whipping up the mules, and the heavy carriage squealed on its straining axles while the King of France, alone, cast down, annihilated, and dared not turn to watch it go.

278

The King & the Lieutenant exchange Proofs of Memory

The king, looking like every lover since time began, stood staring blankly at the horizon over which his mistress's carriage had disappeared. When he'd turned away and looked back again a dozen times and had at last succeeded in restoring some calm to his mind and his heart, he remembered that he wasn't alone. The officer was still holding their horses by the bridles and hadn't yet lost all hope of seeing the king's resolve return: He could still mount up and go after the carriage, he thought. We've lost nothing but a little time.

But the imagination of the lieutenant of Musketeers was more optimistic than the reality, an indulgence the king was careful to avoid. He contented himself with approaching the officer and saying, in a sad voice, "Come, we're done here. To horse."

